their victorie,hauing warres with enemies that were ſo eaſily to be ouercome. For(ſaid he)if fortune fauored me that I were Generall of the ACHAIANS at this preſent, I would haue killed them euery man in the cellers and tippling houſes. Now when the ROMAINES had ouercome Antiochus, they began to haue ſurer footing in GRECE: and to compaſſe in the ACHAIANS of all ſides, and ſpecially, by reaſon the heads and gouernours of the cities about them did yeeld to the ROMAINES,to winne their fauour. And now their greatneſſe grew in haſt, by the fauour of the gods, ſo as they were become the monarche of the whole worlde, who brought them now to the ende that fortune had determined. Philopæmen in the meane time did like a good pylot,bare hard againſt the billowes and roughneſſe of their waues: and though for the time he was forced to giue place,and to let things paſſe, yet for all that he was againſt the ROMAINES and did withſtand them in the moſt part of their proceedings,by ſeeking euer to defend the liberty of thoſe,who by their eloquence and well doing caried great authority among the ACHAIANS. And when Ariſtænetus MEGALOPOLITAN, (a man of great authoritie among the ACHAIANS, and one that euer bare great deuotion to the ROMAINES(ſaid in open Senate among the ACHAIANS, that they ſhould deny the ROMAINS nothing,nor ſhew themſelues vnthankfull to them: Philopæmen hearing what he ſaid,held his peace a while,and ſuffered him to ſpeake(though it boiled in his heart, he was ſo angrie with him)and in the end,breaking all pacience,& as one ouercome with choller,he ſaid. O Ariſtænetus,why haue you ſuch haſt to ſee the vnfortunate ende of GRECE? An other time,when Manius Conſull of ROME (after he had conquered king Antiochus) did make requeſt to the counſell of the ACHAIANS, that ſuch as were baniſhed from LACEDÆMON, might returne home into their countrie againe, and that Titus Quintius Flaminius alſo did earneſtly intreate them: Philopæmen was againſt it,not for any hatred he bare vnto the baniſhed mē, but becauſe he would haue done it by his owne meane, and the onely grace of the ACHAIANS, to the end they ſhould not be beholding for ſo good a turne, neither vnto Titus, nor yet to the ROMAINES. Afterwards he himſelfe,being Generall of the ACHAIANS, did reſtore them wholly to their owne again. Thus was Philopæmen ſomtime,a litle too bolde & quarrellous,by reaſon of his great ſtomack: and ſpecially when any man of authority ſought for to haue things. Laſtlie, being three ſcore and ten yeares of age, he was the eight time choſen Generall of the ACHAIANS,and hoped well,not onely to paſſe the yeare of his charge in peace and quietneſſe, but alſo all the reſt of his life without any ſturre of new warres,he ſaw the affaires of GRECE take ſo good ſucceſſe. For like as the force and ſtrength of ſickneſſe declineth, as the naturall ſtrength of the ſickly body empaireth: ſo through all the cities and people of GRECE enuy of quarrell and wars ſurceaſed,as their power diminiſhed. Neuertheleſſe, in the end of his yeares gouernment,the gods diuine (who iuſtly puniſh all inſolent words and deeds) threw him to the ground, as they ſuffer a rider vnfortunately to take a fall off his horſe, being come almoſt to the ende of his cariere. For they write, that he being in a place on a time amongſt good companie, where one was maruellouſly praiſed for a good Captaine, ſaid vnto them: why, maiſters,can yee commend him that was contented to be taken priſoner aliue of his enemies? Shortly after came newes that Dinocrates MESSINIAN (a priuate enemie of Philopæmens for certaine controuerſies paſt betweene them,and a man generally hated beſides of all honorable and vertuous men,for his licentious wicked life)had withdrawne the city of MESSINA from the deuotion of the ACHAIANS: and moreouer, that he came with an armie to take a towne called COLONIDE. Philopæmen was at that time in the citie of ARGOS,ſick of an ague, and yet hearing theſe newes, tooke his iorney towards MEGALOPOLIS,making all the haſt he could poſſible,for that he came aboue foure hundred furlongs that day. Straight he departed thence toward MESSINA, and taried not, but tooke with him a company of men at armes of the luſtieſt and wealthieſt MEGALOPOLITANS: who were all young noble men of the city,and willingly offered themſelues to go with him for the goodwill they bare him, and for the deſire they had to follow his valiantneſſe. Thus went they on their way towards the city of MESSINA,& marched ſo long,that they came neere to the hil of Euander,where they met with Dinocrates and his company, & gaue ſo fierce an onſet on them,that they made them all turne taile: howbeit in the meane while, there came a reliefe of 500 men to Dinocrates,

which he had left to keepe the countrey of Messina. The flying men that were ſcattered here and there, ſeeing this ſupply, gathered them ſelues againe together, and ſhewed vpon the hils. Philopœmen fearing to be enuironed, and being deſirous to bring his men ſafe home againe, who moſt of loue had followed him: began to march away through narrow buſhy places, him ſelfe being in the rereward, and turned oftentimes vpon his enemies, and skirmiſhed with them, onely to driue them away from following of the reſt of his company, and not a man that durſt once ſet vpon him: for they did but cry out aloofe, and wheele as it were about him. Howbeit Philopœmen ſundry times venturing far from his company, to giue theſe young noble men leyſure to ſaue them ſelues one after an other: tooke no heede to him ſelfe that he was alone, enuironed on euery ſide with a great number of enemies. Notwithſtãding, of all his enemies there was not a man that durſt come to hand ſtrokes with him, but ſtil ſlinging and ſhooting at him a farre off, they draue him in the end amongſt ſtony places betweene hewen rockes, where he had much a doe to guide his horſe, although hee had ſpurred him that he was all of a gore bloud. And as for his age, that did not lette him but he might haue ſaued him ſelfe, for he was ſtrong and luſty by the continuall exerciſe he tooke: but by curſed happe his body being weake with ſickenes, and weary with the long iorney he had made that day, he found him ſelfe very heauy and ill diſpoſed, that his horſe ſtumbling with him, threw him to the ground. His fall was very great, and bruſed all his head, that he lay for dead in the place a great while, and neuer ſturred nor ſpake: ſo that his enemies thinking hee had beene dead, came to turne his body to ſtrippe him. But when they ſaw him lift vp his head and open his eyes, then many of them fell all at once vppon him, and tooke him, and bound both his hands behinde him, and did all the villany and miſchiefe they could vnto him, and ſuch, as one would litle haue thought Dinocrates would haue vſed in that ſort, or that hee could haue had ſuch an ill thought towardes him. So, they that taried behinde in the city of Messina, were maruellous glad when they heard theſe newes, and ranne all to the gates of the city to ſee him brought in. When they ſaw him thus ſhamefully bound, and pinnioned, againſt the dignity of ſo many honours as he had receiued, and of ſo many triumphes and victories as he had paſſed: the moſt part of them wept for pity, to conſider the miſhappe and ill fortune of mans nature, where there is ſo litle certainety, as in manner it is nothing. Then beganne there ſome curteous ſpeach to runne in the mouths of the people by litle and litle, that they ſhould remember the great good he hadde done vnto them in times paſt, and the liberty hee had reſtored them vnto, when he expulſed the tyrant Nabis out of Messina. But there were other againe (howbeit very few) that to pleaſe Dinocrates, ſayed they ſhould hang him on a gibbet, and put him to death as a daungerous enemy, and that would neuer forgiue man that had once offended him: and the rather, becauſe he would be more terrible to Dinocrates, then euer he was before, if he eſcaped his hands, receiuing ſuch open ſhame by him. Neuertheles, in the end they caried him into a certaine dungeon vnder the ground, called the treaſury, (which had neither light nor aire at all into it, nor dore, nor halfe dore, but a great ſtone rolled on the mouth of the dungeon) and ſo they did let him downe the ſame, and ſtopped the hole againe with the ſtone, and watched it with armed men for to keepe him. Now when theſe young noble Achaian horſemen had fled vpon the ſpurre a great way from the enemy, they remembred them ſelues, and looked round about for Philopœmen: and finding him not in ſight, they ſuppoſed ſtraight he had bene ſlaine. Thereupon they ſtayed a great while, and called for him by name, and perceiuing he aunſwered not, they beganne to ſay among them ſelues, they were beaſtes and cowardes to flie in that ſort: and how they were diſhonored for euer ſo to haue forſaken their Captaine, to ſaue them ſelues, who had not ſpared his owne life, to deliuer them from daunger. Hereupon riding on their way, and enquiring ſtill for him: they were in the end aduertiſed how he was taken. And then they went and caried thoſe newes through all the townes and cities of Achaia, which were very ſory for him, and tooke it as a ſigne of great ill fortune toward them. Whereupõ they agreed to ſend Ambaſſadors forthwith to the Messinians, to demaund him: and in the meane time euery man ſhould prepare to arme them ſelues, to goe thither, and get him either by force or loue. When the Achaians had thus ſent, Dinocrates feared nothing ſo much, as that delay of time might ſaue Philopœmens life: wherefore to preuent it, as ſoone as night came, and that the people were at reſt, he ſtraight cauſed the ſtone to be rolled from the mouth of the dungeon, and willed the hangman to be let downe to Philopæmen with a cup of poyſon to offer him, who was commaunded alſo not to goe from him, vntill he had drunke it. When the hangman was come downe, he found Philopæmen laid on the ground vpon a litle cloke, hauing no liſt to ſleepe, he was ſo grieuouſly troubled in his minde. Who when he ſaw light, and the man ſtanding by him, holding a cuppe in his hand with this poyſon, he ſate vpright vpon his couch, howbeit with great paine he was ſo weake: and taking the cuppe in his hand, asked the hangman if he heard any newes of the horſemen that came with him, and ſpecially of Lycortas. The hangman made him anſwer, that the moſt of them were ſaued. Then he caſt his handes a litle ouer his head, and looking merrily on him he ſayd: it is well, ſeeing we are not all vnfortunate. Therewith ſpeaking no moe words, nor making other a doe, he drunke vp all the poiſon, and layed him downe as before. So nature ſtraue not much withall, his body being brought ſo low, and thereupon the poiſon wrought his effect, and rid him ſtraight out of his paine, The newes of his death ran preſently through all Achaia, which generally frō high to low was lamented. Whereupon all the Achaian youth and counſellors of their cities and townes, aſſembled them ſelues in the citie of Megalopolis, where they al agreed without delay to reuenge his death. They made Lycortas their Generall, vnder whoſe conduct they inuaded the Messenians, with force and violence, putting all to the fire and ſword: ſo as the Messenians were ſo feared with this mercileſſe fury, that they yeelded themſelues, and wholly conſented to receiue the Achaians into their city. But Dinocrates wold not giue them leyſure to execute him by iuſtice, for hee killed himſelfe: and ſo did all the reſt make themſelues away, who gaue aduiſe that Philopæmen ſhould be put to death. But thoſe that would haue had Philopæmen hanged on a gibbet, Lycortas cauſed them to be taken, which afterwardes were put to death with all kind of torments. That done, they burnt Philopæmens body, and did put his aſhes into a pot. Then they ſtraight departed from Messina, not in diſorder, one vpon anothers necke as euery man liſted: but in ſuch an order and ray, that in the middeſt of theſe funerals they did make a triumph of victory. For the ſouldiers were all crowned with garlands of laurell in token of victory, notwithſtanding, the teares ranne downe their cheekes in token of ſorrow, and they ledde their enemies priſoners, ſhackled and chained. The funerall pot in the which were Philopæmens aſhes, was ſo couered with garlandes of flowers, noſegaies, and laces, that it could ſcant be ſeene or diſcerned, and was caried by one Polybius a young man, the ſonne of Lycortas, that was Generall at that time to the Achaians: about whom there marched all the nobleſt & chiefeſt of the Achaians, and after them alſo followed all the ſouldiers armed, and their horſes very well furniſhed. The reſt, they were not ſo ſorrowfull in their countenance, as they are commonly which haue great cauſe of ſorrow: nor yet ſo ioyful, as thoſe that came conquerers from ſo great a victory. Thoſe of the cities, townes, and villages in their way as they paſt, came and preſented them ſelues vnto them, to touch the funerall potte of his aſhes, euen as they were wont to take him by the hand, and to make much of him when he was returned from the warres: and did accompany his conuoy vnto the city of Megalopolis. At the gates wherof, were old men, women, and children, which thruſting them ſelues amongeſt the ſouldiers, did renewe the teares, ſorowes, and lamentations of all the miſerable and vnfortunate city: who tooke it that they had loſt with their citizen, the firſt and chiefeſt place of honor among the Achaians. So he was buried very honorably as appertained vnto him: and the other priſoners of Messina, were all ſtoned to death, about his ſepulchre. All the other cities of Achaia, beſides many other honors they did vnto him, did ſet vp ſtatues, and as like to him, as could be counterfeated. Afterwards in the vnfortunate time of Greece, when the city of Corinthe was burnt and deſtroied by the Romains, there was a malicious Romaine that did what he could to haue the ſame pulled down again, by burdening & accuſing Philopæmen (as if he had bene aliue) that he was alwaies enemy to the Romaines, and enuied much their proſperity and victories. But after Polybius had aunſwered him: neither the Conſull Mummius, nor his counſellers, nor lieutenaunts, would ſuffer them to deface and take away the honors done in memory of ſo famous & worthy a mā, although he had many waies done much hurt vnto T. Quintius Flaminius, &

vnto Manius. So, theſe good men then made a difference betweene duty and profite: and did thinke honeſty and profit two diſtinct things, and ſo ſeperated one from the other, according to reaſon and iuſtice. Moreouer they were perſwaded, that like as men receiue curteſie and goodneſſe of any, ſo are they bound to requite them againe, with kindneſſe and duety. And as men vſe to acknowledge the ſame: euen ſo ought men to honor and reuerence vertue. And thus much for the life of Philopœmen.

THE LIFE OF ## Titus Quintius Flaminius.

IT is eaſie to ſee Titus Quintius Flaminius forme, and ſtature, by Philopœmenes ſtatue of braſſe, to whom we compare him: the which is now ſet vp at ROME, neare to great Apollo that was brought from CARTHAGE, and is placed right againſt the comming into the ſhew place, vnder which there is an inſcription in Greeke letters. But for his nature and conditions, they ſay of him thus: he would quickly be angry, and yet very ready to pleaſure men again. For, if he did puniſh any man that had angered him, he would do it gently, but his anger did not long continue with him. He did good alſo to many, and euer loued them whom he had once pleaſured, as if they had done him ſome pleaſure: and was ready to do for them ſtill whom hee found thankfull, becauſe hee would euer make them beholding to him, and thought that as honorable a thing, as he could purchaſe to him ſelfe. Becauſe he greatly ſought honor aboue all things, when any notable ſeruice was to be done, he would do it him ſelfe, and no man ſhould take it out of his hand. He would euer be rather with them that needed his helpe, then with thoſe that could helpe him, or doe him good. For, the firſt he eſteemed as a meane to exerciſe his vertue with: the other, he tooke thē as his fellowes and followers of honour with him. He came to mans ſtate, when the city of ROME had greateſt warres and trouble. At that time all the youth of ROME, which were of age to cary weapon were ſent to the warre to learne to traile the pike, and how to become good Captaines. Thus was he entred into marſhall affaires, and the firſt charge he tooke, was in the warre againſt

Hanniball of CARTHAGE, where he was made Colonell of a thouſand footemen, vnder Marcellus the conſul: who being ſlaine by an ambuſh Hanniball had laied for him betweene the cities of BANCIA, and VENVSA, then they did chooſe Titus Quintius Flaminius gouernor of the prouince and city of TARENTVM, which was now taken againe the ſecond time. In this gouernment of his, he wan the reputation as much of a good and iuſt man, as hee did of an expert and skilfull Captaine. By reaſon whereof, when the ROMAINES were requeſted to ſend men to inhabite the cities of NARNIA and COSSA, he was appointed the chief leader of thē, which chiefly gaue him heart and corage to aſpire at the firſt to the Conſulſhip, paſſing ouer al other meane offices, as to be Ædile, Tribune, or Prætor, by which (as by decrees) other yong men were wont to attaine the Conſulſhip. Therefore when the time came that the Conſuls ſhould be elected, he did preſent him ſelfe among other, accompanied with a great number of thoſe he had brought with him, to inhabite the two new townes, who did make earneſt ſute for him. But the two Tribunes Fuluius, and Manlius, ſpake againſt him, and ſayd: it was out of all reaſon, that ſo young a man ſhould in ſuch manner preaſe to haue the office of the higheſt dignity, againſt the vſe and cuſtome of ROME, before he had paſſed through the inferior offices of the common wealth. Neuertheleſſe, the Senate preferred it wholly to the voices of the people: who preſently pronounced him Conſull openly, with Sextius AElius, although hee was not yet thirty yeare old. Afterwards, AElius and he deuiding the offices of the ſtate by lot: it fell vpon T. Quintius to make warre with Philip king of MACEDON. In the which mee thinkes fortune greatly fauoured the ROMAINS affaires, that made ſuch a man Generall of theſe wars: for, to haue pointed a Generall that by force and violence would haue ſought all things at the MACEDONIANS hands, that were a people to be won rather by gentleneſſe and perſwaſions, then by force and compulſion: it was all againſt them ſelues. Philip, to maintaine the brunt of a battell againſt the ROMAINES, had power enough of his own in his realme of MACEDON: but to make war any long time, to furniſh him ſelfe with money and victuals, to haue a place and cities to retire vnto, and laſtly, to haue all other neceſſaries for his men and army: it ſtood him vpon to get the force of GREECE. And had not the force of GREECE bene politickly cut from him, the wars againſt him had not beene ended with one battell. Moreouer, GREECE (which neuer before bare the ROMAINS any great good will) would not haue dealt then ſo inwardly in friendſhip with them, had not their General bene (as he was) a gentle perſon, lowly, and tractable, that wan them more by his wiſedome, then by his force, and could both eloquently vtter his minde to them, and curteouſly alſo heare them ſpeake, that had to doe with him, and chiefly miniſtred iuſtice and equity to euery man a like. For it is not to bee thought that GREECE would otherwiſe ſo ſoone haue withdrawen them ſelues from the rule of thoſe, with whom they were acquainted, and gouerned: and haue put them ſelues vnder the rule of ſtraungers, but that they ſaw great iuſtice and lenity in them. Howbeit that may more plainly appeare by declaring of his actes. Titus was informed, that the Generalles before him ſent to the warre in MACEDON (as Sulpitius, and Publius Iulius) vſed to come thither about the later end of the yeare, and made but could warres, and certaine light skirmiſhes, as ſomtime in one place, and ſometime in another againſt Philip, and all to take ſome ſtraight, or to cut off vittels: which he thought was not his way to follow their example. For they tarying at home, conſumed the moſt of their Conſulſhippe at ROME, in matters of gouernment, and ſo enioyed the honour of their office. Afterwardes in the end of their yeare, they would ſet out to the wars, of intent to get an other yeare ouer their heades in their office, that ſpending on yeare in their Conſulſhip at home, they might employ the other in the warres abroad. But Titus not minding to trifle out the halfe of his Conſulſhippe at ROME, and the other abroade in the warres: did willingly leaue all his honors and dignities he might haue enioyed by his office at ROME, and beſought the Senate that they would appoint his brother Lucius Quintius Lieutenaunt of their army by ſea. Furthermore, he tooke with him ſelfe about three thouſand old ſouldiers of thoſe that had firſt ouerthrowen Aſdruball in SPAINE, & Hanniball afterwards in AFRIKE, vnder the conduct of Scipio, which yet were able to ſerue, and were very willing to goe with him in his iourney, to be the ſtrength of his army. With this company hee paſſed the ſeas without daunger, and landed in EPIRVS, where he found Publius Iulius encamped with his army before king Philip, who of long time had lien in campe about the mouth of the riuer of Apſus, to keepe the ſtraight and paſſage which is the entry into EPIRVS. So that Publius Iulius had lien ſtill there, and done nothing, by reaſon of the naturall force and hardnes of the place. Then Titus tooke the army of him, and ſent him to ROME. Afterwards, him ſelfe went in perſon to view and conſider the nature of the countrey, which was in this ſort. It is a long valley walled on either ſide with great high mountaines, as thoſe which ſhut in the valley of Tempe in THESSALY. Howbeit it had no ſuch goodly woods, nor green forreſts, nor faire medowes, nor other like places of pleaſure, as the other ſide had: but it was a great deepe marriſhe or quauemyre, through the middeſt whereof the riuer called Apſus did runne, being in greatnes and ſwiftneſſe of ſtreame, very like to the riuer of Peneus. The riuer did occupy all the ground at the feete of the mountaines, ſauing a litle way that was cut out of the maine rocke by mans hand, and a narrow ſtraight path by the waters ſide, very vnhandſome for an army to paſſe that way, though they foūd not a man to keepe the paſſage. There were ſome in the army that counſelled Titus to fetch a great compaſſe about by the country of DASSARETIDE, & by the city of LYNCVS, where the country is very plaine, and the way maruellous eaſie. Howbeit he ſtood in great feare he ſhould lacke victuals, if he ſtayed farre from the ſea, and happely if hee fel into any barren or leane country, (Philip refuſing the battel, and purpoſing to flie) he ſhould be conſtrained in the end to returne againe towardes the ſea, without doing any thing, as his predeceſſor had done before. Wherefore he determined to croſſe the mountaines to ſet vpon his enemy, and to proue if he could winne the paſſage by force. Now Philip kept the top of the mountaines with his army, and when the ROMAINES forced to get vp the hils, they were receiued with dartes, ſlings, and ſhot, that lighted amongſt them here and there: inſomuch as the ſkirmiſh was very hot for the time it laſted, and many were ſlaine and hurt on either ſide. But this was not the end of the warre. For in the meane time there came certaine neatherds of the countrey vnto Titus (who did vſe to keepe beaſtes on theſe mountaines) and told him they could bring him a way which they knew the enemies kept not: by the which they promiſed to guide his army ſo, that in three daies at the furtheſt, they would bring them on the toppe of the mountaine. And becauſe they might be aſſured that their wordes were true, they ſaid they were ſent to him by Charopus, the ſonne of Machatas. This Caropus was the chiefeſt man of the EPIROTS, who loued the ROMAINS very well, yet he fauored them but vnder hand, for feare of Philip. Titus gaue credit vnto them, and ſo ſent one of his Captaines with them, with foure thouſand footmen, and three hundred horſemen. The heard men that were their guides, went before ſtill, faſt bound: and the ROMAINES followed after. All the day time the army reſted in thicke woddes, and marched all night by moone light, which was then by good happe at the full. Titus hauing ſent theſe men away, reſted all the reſt of his campe: ſauing that ſome daies he entertained them with ſome light ſkirmiſhes to occupy the enemy withall. But the ſame day, when his men that fetched a compaſſe about, ſhould come vnto the toppe of the mountaine aboue the campe of his enemies, he brought all his army out of the campe by breake of day, and deuided them into three troupes, with the one of them he him ſelfe went on that ſide of the riuer where the way is ſtraighteſt, making his bands to march directly againſt the ſide of the hil. The MACEDONIANS againe, they ſhot luſtely at them from the height of the hill, and in certaine places amongeſt the rockes they came to the ſword. At the ſelfe ſame time, the two other troupes on either hand of him did their endeuour likewiſe to get vp the hill, and as it were enuying one an other, they climed vp with great courage againſt the ſharpe and ſteepe hanging of the mountaine. When the ſunne was vp, they might ſee a far off as it were, a certain ſmoke, not very bright at the beginning, much like to the miſts we ſee cōmonly riſe from the tops of the mountaines. The enemies could ſee nothing, becauſe it was behinde them, and that the top of the mountain was poſſeſſed with the ſame. The ROMAINES, though they were not aſſured of it, did hope being in the middeſt of the fight, that it was their fellowes they looked for. But when they ſaw it increaſed ſtil more and more, and in ſuch ſort, that it darkned all the aire: then they did aſſure them ſelues it was certainely the token their men did giue them that they were come. Then they beganne to cry out, climing vp the hils with ſuch a luſty courage, that they draue their enemies vp the hill ſtill, euen vnto the very rough and hardeſt places of the moun-taine. Their fellowes alſo that were behinde the enemies, did aunſwere them with like loude cries from the top of the mountaine: wherewith the enemies were ſo aſtonied, that they fled preſently vpon it. Notwithſtanding, there were not ſlaine aboue two thouſand of them, becauſe the hardneſſe and ſtraightneſſe of the place did ſo gard them, that they could not be chaſed. But the ROMAINES ſpoiled their campe, tooke all that they found in their tents, tooke alſo their ſlaues, and wanne the paſſage into the mountains, by the which they entred the countrey of EPIRVS: and did paſſe through it ſo quietly, and with ſo great abſtinence, that though they were farre from their ſhips and the ſea, and lacked their ordinary portion of corne which they were wont to haue monthly, and that victuals were very ſcant with them at that time, yet they neuer tooke any thing of the country, though they found great ſtore and plenty of all riches in it. For Titus was aduertiſed, that Philip paſſing by THESSALY, and flying for feare, had cauſed the inhabitants of the cities to gette them to the mountaines, and then to ſet fire on their houſes, and to leaue thoſe goods they could not cary away, by reaſon of the weight and vnhandſome cariage therof, to the ſpoile of his ſouldiers: and ſo (as it ſeemed) he left the whole countrey to the conqueſt of the ROMAINES. Whereupon Titus looking conſideratly to his doings, gaue his men great charge to paſſe through the countrey without doing any hurt or miſchiefe, as the ſame which their enemies had now left to them as their owne. So they taried not long to enioy the benefit of their orderly and wiſe forbearing of the country. For, ſo ſoone as they were entred THESSALY, the cities willingly yeelded them ſelues vnto them: and the GRECIANS inhabiting beyong the countrey of THERMOPYLES, did maruellouſly deſire to ſee Titus, asking no other thing, but to put them ſelues into his hands. The ACHANIANS alſo on the other ſide, did renounce the league & alliance they had made with Philip: and furthermore did determine in their counſell, to make warre with him on the ROMAINS ſide. And although the ÆTOLIANS were at that time friends and confederats with the ROMAINS, and that they did ſhew them ſelues very louing to take their part in theſe wars: neuertheles when they deſired the OPVNTIANS that they would put their city into their hands, and were offered that it ſhould be kept and defended from Philip: they would not hearken thereto, but ſent for Titus, and put themſelues and their goods wholly into his protection. They ſay, that when king Pyrrus firſt ſaw the ROMAINES army range in order of battell from the top of a hill, hee ſaid: this order of the barbarous people, ſetting of their men in battell ray, was not done in a barbarous manner. And thoſe alſo that neuer had ſeene Titus before, and came for to ſpeake with him: were compelled in a manner to ſay as much. For where they had heard the MACEDONIANS ſay, that there came a Captaine of the barbarous people that deſtroyed all before him by force of armes, and ſubdued whole countries by violence: they ſayd to the cōtrary, that they found him a man in deede yong of yeares, howbeit gentle, and curteous to looke on, and that ſpake the Greeke tongue excellently well, and was a louer onely of true glory. By reaſon wherof they returned home maruellous glad, and filled al the cities and towns of GREECE with good will towards him, and ſayd: they had ſeene Titus the Captaine, that would reſtore them to their auncient liberty againe. Then it much more appeared, when Philip ſhewed himſelfe willing to haue peace, and that Titus alſo did offer it him, and the friendſhip of the people of ROME, with theſe conditions: that he would leaue the GRECIANS their whole liberties, & remoue his garriſons out of their cities and ſtrong holdes: which Philip refuſed to doe. And thereupon all GREECE, and euen thoſe which fauored Philip, ſayed with one voice: that the ROMAINES were not come to make warres with them, but rather with the MACEDONIANS in fauor of the GRECIANS. Whereupon all GREECE came in, and offered them ſelues vnto Titus without compulſion. And as he paſſed through the countrey of BOEOTIA, without any ſhew at all of wars, the chiefeſt men of the city of THEBES went to meet him: who though they tooke part with the king of MACEDON, becauſe of a priuate man called Brachylelis, yet they would honor Titus, as thoſe which were contented to keepe league and friendſhip with either ſide. Titus embraced them, and ſpake very curteouſly vnto them, going on his way ſtill faire and ſoftly, entertaining them ſomtime with one matter, and ſomtime with an other, and kept them talke of purpoſe, to the end his ſouldiers being wearied with iornying, might in the meane time take good breath: and ſo marching on by litle and litle, he entred into the city with them. Wherewith the Lordes of Thebes were not greatly pleaſed, but yet they durſt not refuſe him, though he had not at that time any number of ſouldiers about him. When he was within Thebes, he praied audience, and began to perſwade the people (as carefully as if he had not had the city already) that they would rather take part with the Romaines, then with the king of Macedon. And to further Titus purpoſe, king Attalus being by chaunce at that time in the aſſembly, did helpe to exhort the Thebans very earneſtly, that they would doe as Titus perſwaded them. But Attalus was more earneſt then became a man of his yeares, for the deſire he had (as was imagined) to ſhewe Titus his eloquence: who did ſo ſtraine and moue him ſelfe withall, that he ſounded ſodainely in the middeſt of his oration, whereby the rewme fell downe ſo faſt vpon him, that it tooke away his ſenſes, ſo as he fell in a traunce before them all, and few daies after was conueyed againe by ſea into Asia, where he liued not long after. In the meane time, the Boeotians came into the Romaines, and tooke their part. And Philip hauing ſent Ambaſſadors to Rome, Titus alſo ſent thither of his men to ſolicite for him, in two reſpects. The one, if the warres continued againſt Philip, that then they would prolong his time there. The other, if the Senate did graunt him peace: that they would do him the honour, as to make and conclude it with Philip. For Titus of his owne nature being very ambitious, did feare leaſt they would ſend a ſucceſſor to continue thoſe warres who ſhould take the glory from him, and make an end of them. But his friends made ſuch earneſt ſute for him, that neither king Philip attained that he praied: neither was there ſent any other generall in Titus place, but he ſtill continued his charge in theſe warres. Wherefore, ſo ſoone as he had receiued his commiſſion and authoritie from the Senate, he went ſtraight towards Thessaly, with great hope to ouercome Philip. For he had in his armie aboue ſixe and twentie thouſand fighting men, whereof the Ætolians made ſixe thouſand footmen, and three thouſand horſemen. King Philips armie on the other ſide was no leſſe in number, & they beganne to march one towards the other, vntill at the length they both drew neere the citie of Scotvsa, where they determined to try the battell. So, neither they nor their men were affraid to ſee themſelues one ſo neere an other: but rather to the contrarie, the Romaines on the one ſide tooke greater heart and courage vnto them, deſiring to fight, as thinking with themſelues what great honour they ſhould winne to ouercome the Macedonians, who were ſo highly eſteemed for their valiantnes, by reaſon of the famous acts that Alexander the great did by them. And the Macedonians on the other ſide alſo, taking the Romaines for other manner of ſouldiers then the Persians, beganne to haue good hope if they might winne the field, to make king Philip more famous in the world, then euer was Alexander his father. Titus then calling his men together, ſpake and exhorted them to ſtande to it like men, & to ſhew themſelues valiant ſouldiers in this battell, as thoſe which were to ſhew the proofe of their valiantneſſe in the heart of Grece: the goodlieſt Theater of the world, and againſt their enemies of moſt noble fame. Philip then by chance, or forced to it by the ſpeed he made, becauſe they were both readie to ioyne: did get vp vnwares vpon a charnell houſe, (where they had buried many bodies, being a litle hill raiſed vp aboue the reſt, and neere the trenches of his campe) and there began to encourage his ſouldiers, as all generals doe before they giue battell. Who when he ſaw them all diſcouraged, for they tooke it for an ill ſigne that he was gotten vp on the toppe of a graue to ſpeake vnto them: he of a conceit at the matter, did of him ſelfe deferre to giue battell that day. The next morning, becauſe the night was very wet by reaſon the South windes had blowen, the cloudes were turned to a myſt, and filled all the valley with a darke groſſe thicke aire comming from the mountaines there abouts, which couered the field betwene both campes with a miſt all the morning: by reaſon wherof the skoutes on both ſides that were ſent to diſcouer what the enemies did, in very ſhort time, met together, and one gaue charge vpon an other in a place they call the dogges heads, which are points of rockes placed vpon litle hils one before an other, and very neere one vnto an other, which haue bene called ſo, becauſe they haue had ſome likeneſſe of it. In this skirmiſh there were many chaunges, as commonly falleth out when they fight in ſuch ill fauoured ſtonie places. For ſometime the Romaines fled, & the Macedonians chaſed them: an other time the Macedonians that followed the chaſe, were glad to fly themſelues, and the Romaines who fled before, now had them in chaſe. This change and alteration came by ſending new ſupplies ſtill from both campes, to relieue them that were diſtreſſed and driuen to flie. Now began the miſt to breake vp, & the aire to cleare, ſo that both generals might ſee about them what was done in either campe: by reaſon wherof both of thē drew on their army to the field & battell. So Philip had the vantage on the right wing of his armie, which was placed on the height of an hanging hill, from which they came ſo a maine to ſet vpon the ROMAINES, & with ſuch a furie, that the ſtrongeſt and valianteſt that could be, had neuer bene able to abide the front of their battell, ſo cloſely were they ioined together, and their wall of pikes was ſo ſtrong. But on his left wing it was not ſo, becauſe the rancks of his battell could not ioine ſo neere nor cloſe target to target, the place being betwixt the hils & the rockes where the battell was comming ſo as they were compelled by reaſon of the ſtraightnes and vneuennes of the ground, to leaue it open, and vnfurniſhed in many places. Titus finding that diſaduantage, went from the left wing of his battell which he ſaw ouerlaid by the right wing of his enemies, and going ſodainely toward the left wing of king Philips battell, he ſet vpon the MACEDONIANS on that ſide, where he ſaw they could not cloſe their rankes in the front, nor ioine them together in the middeſt of the battell (which is the whole ſtrength and order of the MACEDONIAN fight) becauſe the field was vp hill and downe hill: and to fight hand to hand they were ſo peſtered behind, that one thronged & ouerlaid an other. For the battell of the MACEDONIANS hath this property, that ſo long as the order is kept cloſe and ioined together, it ſeemeth as it were but the body of a beaſt of a force inuincible. But alſo after that it is once open, and that they are ſundered and not ioyned together, it doth not only looſe the force and power of the whole bodie, but alſo of euery priuate ſouldier that fighteth: partly by reaſon of the diuerſitie of the weapons wherewith they fight, and partly for that their whole ſtrength conſiſteth moſt, in the diſpoſing and ioyning together of their rankes and orders which doth ſtay vp one an other, more then doth euery priuate ſouldiers ſtrength. So when this left wing of the MACEDONIANS was broken, and that they ran their way: one part of the ROMAINES followed the chaſe, and the other ran to giue a charge vppon the flankes of the right wing which fought yet, and they made great ſlaughter of them. Whereupon they now which before had the vantage, beganne to ſtagger & breake, and in the end ranne away as faſt as the other did, throwing downe their weapons: inſomuch as there were ſlaine of them eight thouſand in the fielde, and fiue thouſande taken priſoners in the chaſe. And had not the fault beene in the ÆTOLIANS, Philip had not ſaued him ſelfe by flying as he did. For whileſt the ROMAINES had their enemies in chaſe, the ÆTOLIANS taried, and rifled all king Philips campe, ſo as they had left the ROMAINES nothing to ſpoyle at their returne. Whereupon there grew great quarrell and hot wordes betweene them, and one with an other. But afterwards they angered Titus worſe, chalenging the honour of this victorie to themſelues, becauſe they gaue it out through GRECE, that they alone had ouerthrowen king Philip in the battell. So that in the ſongs and ballets the Poets made in praiſe of this victorie, which euery countrie and townes man had in his mouth: they alwaies put the ÆTOLIANS before the ROMAINES, as in this that followeth, which was currantly ſong in euery place.

The Poet was Alcæus that made theſe verſes for to ſing, who did them in diſgrace of king Philip, falſely increaſing the number of his men which died in the battell, onely to ſhame and ſpight him the more: howbeit he ſpighted Titus therby, more thē Philip, becauſe it was ſong in euery place. For Philip laughed at it, and to encounter him againe with the like mocke, he made a ſong to counterfaite his, as followeth.

But Titus tooke it grieuouſly, who chiefly deſired to be honored amongſt the GRECIANS, by reaſon whereof from that time forwards he delt in the reſt of his matters alone, without making account of the ÆTOLIANS: wherewith they were maruellous angry, & ſpecially when he receiued an Ambaſſador from Philip, and gaue eare vnto a treatie of peace which he offred. For then they were ſo netled againſt him, that they gaue it out through all GRECE, that Titus had ſold peace vnto Philip, when he might altogether haue ended the warre, and vtterly haue deſtroyed Philips whole power and Empire, who had firſt brought GRECE into bondage. Theſe ſlanderous reports and falſe tales which the ÆTOLIANS ſpread thus abroad, did much trouble the ROMAINES friendes and confederates: but Philip ſelfe pulled this ſuſpition out of their heads, when he came in perſon to require peace, and did ſubmit himſelfe wholly to the diſcretion of Titus and the ROMAINES. Titus then graunted him peace, and deliuered to him his realme of MACEDON, and commaunded him he ſhould giue ouer all that he helde in GRECE, and beſides, that he ſhould pay one thouſande talentes for tribute, taking from him all his armie by ſea, ſauing onely tenne ſhippes: and for aſſurance of this peace, he tooke one of his ſonnes for hoſtage, whom he ſent to ROME. Wherein Titus certainly did very well, and wiſely did foreſee the time to come. For then Hanniball of CARTHAGE (the great enemy of the ROMAINES) was baniſhed out of his countrie, and came to king Antiochus, whom he put in the head, and earneſtly moued, to follow his good fortune, and the increaſe of his Empire. Whom Hanniball ſo followed with theſe perſwaſions, that king Antiochus at length was come to it. And truſting to his former good ſucceſſe, and notable actes, whereby in the warres before he had attained the ſurname of great: he began now to aſpire to the monarchy of the whole world, & ſought how to find occaſion to make warres with the ROMAINES. So that if Titus (foreſeeing that a far off) had not wiſely inclined to peace, but that the wars of Antiochus had fallen out together with the warres of king Philip, and that theſe two the mightieſt Princes of the world had ioyned together againſt the citie of ROME: then it had beene in as great trouble and daunger, as euer it was before, in the time of their warres againſt Hanniball. Howbeit Titus hauing happily thruſt in this peace betweene both warres, hee cut off the warre that was preſent, before the other that was comming: by which meanes he tooke from one of the kings his laſt, and from the other his firſt hope. In the meane time the tenne commiſſioners that were ſent by the Senate from ROME to Titus, to aide and aſſiſt him in the order of the affaires of GRECE: did counſell him to ſet all the reſt of GRECE at libertie, and onely to keepe in their hands with good garriſon, the cities of CHALCIDE, of CORINTH, and of DEMETRIADE, to make ſure that by practiſe they ſhould not enter into league and alliance with Antiochus. Then the ÆTOLIANS (that were the common ſlaunderers of Titus proceedings) beganne openly to make theſe cities to rebell, and did ſummone Titus to looſe the chaines of GRECE: for ſo did king Philip call theſe three cities. Then they asked the GRECIANS in mockery, whether they were willing now to haue heauier fetters on their legges then before, being ſomewhat brighter and fairer then thoſe they had bene ſhackled with: and alſo whether they were not greatly beholding to Titus for taking off the fetters from the GRECIANS legs, and tying them about their neckes. Titus being maruellouſly troubled and vexed with this, moued the tenne counſellers ſo earneſtly, that he made them graunt his requeſt in the ende, that thoſe three cities alſo ſhould be deliuered from garriſon: becauſe the GRECIANS thenceforth might no more complaine, that his grace and liberalitie was not throughly performed, and accompliſhed in euery reſpect on them all. Wherefore, when the feaſt called Iſthmia was come, there were gathered together an infinite multitude of people come to ſee the ſport of the games plaied there: for GRECE hauing bene long time troubled with warres, they ſeeing themſelues now in ſure peace, & in very good hope of full liberty, looked after no other thing, but delighted only to ſee games, and to make merry. Proclamation was then made by ſound of trumpet in the aſſembly, that euery man ſhould keepe ſilence. That done, the herauld went forward, and thruſt into the middeſt of the multitude, and proclaimed out aloude: that the Senate of ROME, and Titus Quintius Flaminius, Conſull of the people of ROME (now that they had ouerthrowen king Philip and the MACEDONIANS in battell) did thenceforth diſcharge from all garriſons, and ſet at liberty from all taxes, ſubſidies, and impoſitions for euer, to liue after their old auncient lawes, and in full libertie: the CORINTHIANS, the LOCRIANS, thoſe of PHOCIDE, thoſe of the Ile of EVBOEA, the ACHAIANS, the PHTHIOTES, the MAGNESIANS, the THESSALIANS, and the PERRHOEBEIANS. At the firſt time of the proclamation, all the people could not heare the voice of the herauld, and the moſt part of thoſe that heard him, could not tell directly what hee ſaide: for there ranne vp and downe the ſhewe place where the games were plaide, a confuſed brute and tumult of the people that wondered, and asked what the matter ment, ſo as the herauld was driuen againe to make the proclamation. Whereupon after ſilence made, the heraulde putting out his voice farre louder then before, did proclaime it in ſuch audible wiſe, that the whole aſſembly heard him: and then roſe there ſuch a loud ſhoute and crie of ioy through the whole people, that the ſound of it was heard to the ſea. Then all the people that had taken their places, & were ſet to ſee the Swordplayers play, roſe vp all on their feete, letting the games alone, and went together with great ioy to ſalute, to embrace, and to thanke Titus the recouerer, protector, and patrone of all their liberties of GRECE. Then was ſeene (which is much ſpoken of) the power of mens voyces: for crowes fell downe at that preſent time among the people, which by chance flew ouer the ſhew place at that time that they made the ſame out ſhout. This came to paſſe, by reaſon the aire was broken and cut a ſunder with the vehemencie and ſtrength of the voices, ſo as it had not his naturall power in it, to keepe vp the flying of the birdes: which were driuen of neceſſitie to fall to the ground, as flying through a voide place where they lacked aire. Vnleſſe we will rather ſay, that it was the violence of the crie, which ſtrooke the birdes paſſing through the aire, as they had beene hit with arrowes, and ſo made them fall downe dead to the earth. It may be alſo, that there was ſome hurling winde in the aire, as we doe ſee ſometime in the ſea, when it riſeth high, and many times turneth about the waues, by violence of the ſtorme. So it is, that if Titus had not preuented the whole multitude of people which came to ſee him, and that he had not got him away betimes, before the games were ended: he had hardly ſcaped from being ſtifled amongeſt them, the people came ſo thicke about him from euery place. But after that they were wearie of crying and ſinging about his pauillion vntill night, in the end they went their way: and as they went, if they met any of their kinne, friendes or citizens, they did kiſſe and embrace one an other for ioy, and ſo ſupped and made merry together. In their more reioycing yet, as we may thinke full well, they had no other talke at the table, but of the warres of GRECE, diſcourſing amongeſt them what ſundry great warres they had made, what they had endured heretofore, and all to defend and recouer their libertie. And yet for all that, they could neuer ſo ioyfully nor more aſſuredly obtaine it, then they did euen at that preſent, receiuing the honorableſt reward, & that which deſerued greateſt fame through the worlde: that by the valiantneſſe of ſtraungers who fought for the ſame (without any ſpilt bloud of their owne in compariſon, or that they loſt the life of any one man, whoſe death they had cauſe to lament) they were ſo reſtored to their auncient freedome and libertie. It is a very rare thing amongeſt men, to finde a man very valiant, and wiſe withall: but yet of all ſortes of valiant men, it is harder to finde a iuſt man. For Ageſilaus, Lyſander, Nicias, Alcibiades, and all other the famous Captaines of former times, had very good skill to lead an armie, and to winne the battell, as well by ſea as by land: but to turne their victories to any honourable benefit, or true honour among men, they could neuer skill of it. And if you do except the battell againſt the barbarous people, in the plaine of MARATHON, the battell of SALAMINA, the iorney of PLATEES, the battell of THERMOPYLES, the battell Cimon fought about CIPRVS and vpon the riuer of Eurymedon: all the other wars and battels of GRECE that were made, fell out againſt themſelues, and did euer bring them into bondage: and all the tokens of triumph which euer were ſet vp for the ſame, was to their ſhame and loſſe. So that in the ende, GRECE was vtterly deſtroyed and ouerthrowen, and that chiefly through the wickednes and ſelfe will of her gouernors and captaines of the cities, one enuying an others doing. Where a ſtraunge nation, the which (as it ſhould ſeeme) had very ſmall occaſion to moue them to do it (for that they haue had no great familiaritie with auncient GRECE, and through the counſell and good wiſedome of the which, it ſhould ſeeme very ſtraunge that GRECE could receiue any benefite) haue notwithſtanding with daungerous battels and infinite troubles, deliuered it from oppreſſion and ſeruitude of violent Lordes and tyrants. This and ſuch like talke, did at that time occupie the GRECIANS heads: and moreouer, the deeds following did anſwere and performe the wordes of the proclamation. For at one ſelfe time, Titus ſent Lentulus into ASIA, to ſet the BARGILIANS at libertie, and Titillius into THRACIA, to remoue the garriſons out of the Iles and cities which Philip had kept there: and Publius Iulius was ſent alſo into ASIA, vnto king Antiochus, to ſpeake vnto him to ſet the GRECIANS at libertie which he kept in ſubiection. And as for Titus, he went himſelfe vnto the citie of CHALCIDE, where he tooke ſea, and went into the prouince of MAGNESIA, out of the which he tooke all the garriſons of the cities, and redeliuered the gouernment of the common wealth vnto the citizens of the ſame. Afterwardes when time came that the feaſt of Nemea was celebrated in the citie of ARGOS in the honour of Hercules, Titus was choſen iudge and rector of the games that were plaid there: where, after he had ſet all thinges in very good order, pertaining vnto the ſolemnitie of the feaſt, he cauſed againe ſolemne proclamation to be made openly, for the generall libertie of all GRECE. Furthermore viſiting the cities, he did ſtabliſh very good lawes, reformed iuſtice, and did ſet the inhabitants and citizens of euery one of them in good peace, amity, and concord one with an other: and did call home alſo all thoſe that were outlawes and baniſhed men, and pacified al old quarels & diſſentions among them. The which did no leſſe pleaſe & content him, that by perſwaſions he could bring the GRECIANS to be reconciled one with the other: then if he had by force of armes ouercome the MACEDONIANS. Inſomuch, as the recouery of the libertie which Titus had reſtored vnto the GRECIANS, ſeemed vnto them the leaſt part of the goodneſſe they had receiued at his handes. They ſay, that Lycurgus the orator ſeeing the collectors of taxes, carie Zenocrates the Philoſopher one day to priſon, for lacke of payment of a certaine impoſition, which the ſtrangers inhabiting within the city of ATHENS were to pay: he reſcued him from them by force, and moreouer proſecuted lawe ſo hard againſt them, that he made them pay a fine for the iniurie they had done vnto ſo worthy a perſon. And they tell, how the ſame Philoſopher afterwards meeting Lycurgus children in the citie, ſaid vnto them. I doe well requite your fathers good turne he did mee: for I am the cauſe that he is praiſed and commended of euery man, for the kindneſſe he ſhewed on my behalfe. So the good deeds of the ROMAINES, and of Titus Quintius Flaminius vnto the GRECIANS, did not onely reape this benefite vnto them, in recompence that they were praiſed and honored of all the worlde: but they were cauſe alſo of increaſing their dominions and Empire ouer all nations, and that the world afterwardes had great affiance and truſt in them, and that moſt iuſtly. So that the people and cities did not only receiue the Captaines and gouernors the ROMAINES ſent them: but they alſo went to ROME vnto them, and procured them to come, and did put themſelues into their handes. And not only the cities and communalties, but kings and princes alſo (which were oppreſſed by other more mightie than themſelues) had no other refuge, but to put themſelues vnder their protection: by reaſon whereof in a very ſhort time (with the fauour and helpe of the goddes as I am perſwaded) all the world came to ſubmit themſelues to their obedience, and vnder the protection of their Empire. Titus alſo did glory more, that he had reſtored GRECE againe vnto libertie, then in any other ſeruice or exploite he had euer done. For when he offered vppe vnto the temple of Apollo in the citie of DELPHES, the targets of ſiluer with his owne ſhield, he made theſe verſes to be grauen vpon them, in effect as followeth.

So hath the citie of CORINTHE enioyed this good happe, that the GRECIANS haue bene twiſe proclaimed to be ſet at libertie: the firſt time by Titus Quintius Flaminius, and the ſecond time, by Nero in our time, and at the ſelfe ſame inſtant when they ſolemnly kept the feaſt called Iſthmia. Howbeit the firſt proclamation of their libertie (as we haue told you before) was done by the voice of an herauld: and the ſecond time it was done by Nero himſelfe, who proclaimed it in an oration he made vnto the people in open aſſembly, in the market place of the citie of CORINTHE. But it was a long time after. Furthermore, Titus beganne then a goodly and iuſt warre againſt Nabis the curſed and wicked tyrant of LACEDÆMON. Howbeit in the ende he deceiued the expectation of GRECE. For when he might haue taken him, he would not doe it, but made peace with him, forſaking poore SPARTA vnworthily oppreſſed vnder the yoke of bondage: either becauſe he was affraide that if the warre helde on, there ſhould come a ſucceſſor vnto him from ROME, that ſhould cary the glorie away to end the ſame, or elſe he ſtoode Iealous and enuious of the honour they did vnto P*hilopœmen*. Who hauing ſhewed himſelfe in euery place as excellent a Captaine as euer came in GRECE, and hauing done notable actes and famous ſeruice, both of great wiſedome, and alſo of valiantneſſe, and ſpecially in the ACHAIANS warre: he was as much honored & reuerenced of the ACHAIANS in the Theaters and common aſſemblies, euen as Titus was. Whereat Titus was maruellouſly offended, for he thought it vnreaſonable, that an ARCADIAN who had neuer bene generall of an armie, but in ſmall litle warres againſt his neighbours, ſhould be as much eſteemed and honored, as a Conſull of ROME, that was come to make warres for the recouery of the libertie of GRECE. But Titus alleaged reaſonable excuſe for his doings, ſaying that he ſaw very well he could not deſtroy this tyrant Nabis, without the great loſſe and miſerie of the other SPARTANS. Furthermore, of all the honors the ACHAIANS euer did him (which were very great) me thinkes there was none that came neere any recompence of his honorable and well deſeruing, but one onely preſent they offered him, and which he aboue all the reſt moſt eſteemed: and this it was. During the ſeconde warres of AFRICKE, which the ROMAINES had againſt Hanniball, many ROMAINES were taken priſoners in the ſundry battels they loſt, and being ſolde here and there, remained ſlaues in many countries: and amongeſt other, there were diſperſed in GRECE to the number of twelue hundred, which from time to time did moue men with pitie and compaſſion towards them, that ſaw them in ſo miſerable chaunge and ſtate of fortune. But then much more was their miſerie to be pitied, when theſe captiues found in the ROMAINES army, ſome of them their ſonnes, other their brethren, and the reſt their fellowes and friendes, free and conquerours, and themſelues ſlaues and bondmen. It grieued Titus much to ſee theſe poore men in ſuch miſerable captiuitie, notwithſtanding he would not take them by force from thoſe that had them. Whereupon the ACHAIANS redeemed and bought them for fiue hundred pence a man, and hauing gathered them together into a troupe, they preſented all the ROMAINE captiues vnto Titus, euen as he was readie to take ſhippe to returne into ITALIE: which preſent made him returne home with greater ioy and contentation, hauing receiued for his noble deedes ſo honorable a recompence, and worthy of himſelfe, that was ſo louing a man to his citizens and country. And ſurely, that onely was the ornament (in my opinion) that did moſt beautifie his triumphe. For theſe poore redeemed captiues did that, which the ſlaues are wont to do on that day when they be ſet at libertie: to wit, they ſhaue their heades, and do weare litle hats vpon them. The ROMAINES that were thus redeemed, did in like manner: and ſo followed Titus charret, on the day of his triumphe and entrie made into ROME in the triumphing manner. It was a goodly ſight alſo, to ſee the ſpoyles of the enemies, which were caried in the ſhew of this triumphe: as, ſtore of helmets after the GRECIANS faſhion, heapes of targets, ſhieldes, and pykes after the MACEDONIAN manner, with a wonderfull ſumme of gold & ſiluer. For Itanus the hiſtoriographer writeth, that there was brought a maruellous great maſſe of treaſure in niggots of gold, of three thouſand ſeuen hundred and thirteen pound weight, and of ſiluer, of forty three thouſand, two hundred, three ſcore and ten pound weight, and of gold ready coyned in peeces called Philips foureten thouſand, fiue hundred, and fourteen, beſides the thouſand talents king Philip ſhould pay for a raunſome. The which ſumme, the ROMAINES afterwardes forgaue him, chiefly at Titus ſute and interceſſion, who procured that grace for him, and cauſed him to be called a friend and confederate of the people of ROME, & his ſonne Demetrius to be ſent vnto him againe, who remained before as an hoſtage at ROME. Shortly after, king Antiochus went out of ASIA into GRECE with a great fleete of ſhips, & a very puiſſant army, to ſtirre vp the cities to forſake their league and alliance with the ROMAINES, and make a diſſention amongeſt them. To further this his deſire and enterpriſe, the ÆTOLIANS did aide and backe him, which of long time had borne great and ſecret malice againſt the ROMAINES, and deſired much to haue had warres with them. So they taught king Antiochus to ſay, that the warre which he tooke in hand, was to ſet the GRECIANS at libertie, whereof they had no neede, becauſe they did already enioy their liberty: but for that they had no iuſt cauſe to make warre, they taught him to cloke it the honeſteſt way he could. Wherefore the ROMAINES fearing greatly the riſing of the people, and the rumour of the power of this great king, they ſent thither Manius Acilius their generall, & Titus, one of his Lieutenants for the GRECIANS ſakes. Which arriuall did more aſſure them that already bare good will to the ROMAINES, after they had once ſeene Manius and Titus: and the reſt that began to flie out, and to ſhrinke from them, thoſe Titus kept in obedience from ſtarting, remembring them of the friendſhip & good will they had borne him, euen like a good ſkilfull Phiſitian that could giue his patient Phiſicke to preſerue him from a contagious diſeaſe. Indeede there were ſome (but few of them) that left him, which were wonne and corrupted before by the ÆTOLIANS: and though he had iuſt cauſe of offence towardes them, yet he ſaued thẽ after the battell. For king Antiochus being ouercome in the country of THERMOPILES, fled his way, and in great haſt tooke the ſea to returne into ASIA. And the Conſull Manius following his victory, entred into the coũtry of the ÆTOLIANS, where he tooke certaine townes by force, and left the other for a prey vnto king Philip. So Philip king of MACEDON on the one ſide, ſpoyled & ſacked the DOLOPIANS, the MAGNESIANS, the ATHAMANIANS, & the APERANTINES: & the Conſull Manius on the other ſide, deſtroyed the citie of HERACLEA, and layd ſiege to the citie of NAVPACTVM, which the ÆTOLIANS kept. But Titus taking compaſſion of them, to ſee the poore people of GRECE thus ſpoyled and turned out of all: went out of PELOPONNESVS (where he was then) vnto Manius Acilius camp, and there reproued him for ſuffering king: Philip to vſurpe the benefit & reward of his honorable victory, ſtill cõquering many people, kings, and countries, whileſt he continued ſiege before a citie, and onely to wreake his anger vpon them. Afterwardes, when they that were beſieged ſaw Titus frõ their wals, they called him by his name, and held vp their hands vnto him, praying him he would take pitie vpon them: but he gaue them neuer a word at that time, and turning his backe vnto thẽ, he fell a weeping. Afterwards he ſpake with Manius, & appeaſing his anger, got him to grãt the ÆTOLIANS truce for certaine dayes, in which time they might ſend Ambaſſadours to ROME, to ſee if they could obtaine grace & pardõ of the Senate. But the moſt trouble & difficulty he had, was to intreat for the CHALCIDIANS, with whõ the Cõſull Manius was more grieuouſly offended, thẽ with all the reſt: becauſe that king Antiochus after the warres was begun, had maried his wife in their citie, when he was paſt yeares of mariage, and out of all due time. For he was now very old, and being in his extreme age, and in the middeſt of his warres, he fell in dotage with a young gentlewoman, the daughter of Cleoptolemus, the fayreſt woman that was at that time in all GRECE. Therefore the CHALCIDIANS were much affected vnto king Antiochus, and did put their citie into his handes, to ſerue him in this warre, for a ſtrong and ſafe retiring place. Whereupon, when Antiochus had loſt the battell, he came thither with all poſsible ſpeede, and taking from thence with him his paſſing fayre young Queene which he had maried, and his gold, his ſiluer and friendes, he tooke the ſeas incontinently, and returned into ASIA. For this cauſe the Conſull Manius hauing wonne the battell, did march ſtraight with his army towardes the citie of CHALCIDE in a great rage and fury. But Titus that followed him, did alwayes lye vpon him to pacifie his anger, and did ſo much intreate him, together with the other ROMAINES of ſtate and authoritie in coũſell: that in the end, he got him to pardon them of CHALCIDE alſo. Who, becauſe they were preſerued from perill by his meanes, they, to recompence this fact of his, did conſecrate vnto him, all their moſt ſtately and ſumptuous buildings and common workes in their citie, as appeareth yet by the ſuperſcriptions remaining to be ſeene at this day. As in the ſhew place of exerciſes: The people of CHALCIDE did dedicate this ſhew place of exerciſes, vnto Titus & Hercules. And in the temple called Delphinium: The people of CHALCIDE did conſecrate this temple, vnto Titus, and vnto Apollo. And furthermore, vnto this preſent time, there is a Prieſt choſen by the voyce of the people, purpoſely to do ſacrifice vnto Titus: in which ſacrifice, after that the thing ſacrificed is offered vp, & wine powred vpon it, the people ſtanding by, do ſing a ſong of triumph made in prayſe of him. But becauſe it were too lõg to write it all out, we haue onely drawen in briefe the latter end of the ſame: and this it is.

Now the CHALCIDIANS did not alone onely honour and reuerence Titus, but he was generally honoured alſo by the GRECIANS as he deſerued, and was maruellouſly beloued for his curteſie and good nature: which argueth plainly that they did not fainedly honour him, or through compulſion, but euen from the hart. For though there was ſome iarre betwixt him and Philopœmen at the firſt about ſeruice, for emulation of honour, and after betwixt him and Diaphanes alſo, both generals of the ACHAIANS: yet he neuer bare thẽ any malice in his hart, neither did his anger moue him at any time to hurt them any way, but he euer ended the heat of his wordes, in counſell and aſſemblies, where he vttered his minde franckely to them both. Therefore none thought him euer a cruell man, or eger of reuenge: but many haue thought him raſh, and haſty of nature. Otherwiſe, he was as good a companion in company as poſsibly could be, and would vſe as pleaſaunt wiſe mirth as any man. As when he ſayd to the ACHAIANS, on a time, who would needes vniuſtly vſurpe the Ile of the ZACYNTHIANS, to diſwade them from it: my Lordes of ACHAIA, if ye once go out of PELOPONNESVS, you put your ſelues in daunger, as the torteyſes do, when they thruſt their heades out of their ſhell. And the firſt time he parled with Philip to treate of peace: whẽ Philip ſaid vnto him, you haue brought many mẽ with you and I am come alone. Indeede it is true you are alone, ſayd he, becauſe you made all your friendes and kinne to be ſlaine. An other time, Dinocrates MESSINIAN being in ROME, after he had taken in his cuppes in a feaſt where he was, he diſguiſed himſelfe in womans apparell, and daunced in that manner: & the next day following he went vnto Titus, to pray him to helpe him through with his ſute, which was, to make the citie of MESSINA to rebell, and leaue the tribe of the ACHAIANS. Titus made him aunſwere, that he would thinke vpon it: but I can but wonder at you (ſayd he) how you can daunce in womans apparell, and ſing at a feaſt, hauing ſuch matters of weight in your head. In the counſell of the ACHAIANS, king Antiochus Ambaſſadours being come thither, to moue them to breake their league with the ROMAINES, & make alliance with the king their maiſter, they made a maruellous large diſcourſe of the great multitude of ſouldiers that were in their maiſters army, and did number them by many diuerſe names. Whereunto Titus aunſwered, and told how a friend of his hauing bidden him one night to ſupper, and hauing ſerued ſo many diſhes of meate to his bord, as he was angry with him for beſtowing ſo great coſt vpon him, as wondering how he could ſo ſodainly get ſo much ſtore of meate, and of ſo diuerſe kindes. My friend ſayd to me againe, that all was but porke dreſſed ſo many wayes, & with ſo ſundry ſawces. And euẽ ſo (quod Titus) my Lordes of ACHAIA, eſteeme not king Antiochus army the more, to heare of ſo many men of armes, numbred with their launces, & of ſuch a number of footemen with their pykes: for they are all but SYRIANS, diuerſly armed, onely with ill fauored litle weapons. Furthermore, after Titus had done theſe things, and that the warre with Antiochus was ended, he was choſen Cenſor at ROME, with the ſon of that ſame Marcellus, who had bene fiue times Cōſull. This office is of great dignitie, and as a man may ſay, the crowne of all the honours that a citizen of ROME can haue in their common wealth. They put off the Senate, foure men onely, but they were not famous. They did receiue all into the number of citizens of ROME, that would preſent themſelues to be enrolled in their cōmon regiſter: with a prouiſo, that they were borne free by father & mother. They were compelled to do it, by Terẽtius Culeo, Tribune of the people, who to deſpight the nobilitie, perſwaded the people of ROME to commaunde it ſo. Now at that time, two of the nobleſt & moſt famous men of ROME were great enemies one againſt an other: Publius Scipio AFRICAN, and Marcus P*orcius Cato*. Of theſe two, Titus named Publius Scipio AFRICAN, to be prince of the Senate, as the chiefeſt and worthieſt perſon in the citie: & got the diſpleaſure of the other, which was Cato, by this miſhap. Titus had a brother called Lucius Quintius Flaminius, nothing like vnto him in condition at all: for he was ſo diſſolutely & licentiouſly giuen ouer to his pleaſure, that he forgot all comlineſſe and honeſty. This Lucius loued well a young boy, and caried him alwayes with him whẽ he went to the warres, or to the charge and gouernement of any prouince. This boy flattering him, one day ſaid vnto Lucius Quintius, that he loued him ſo well, that he did leaue the ſight of the ſwordplayers at the ſharpe, which were making ready to the fight, although he had neuer ſene man killed before: to wait vpon him. Lucius being very glad of the boyes wordes, aunſwered him ſtraight, thou ſhalt looſe nothing for that my boy, for I will by & by pleaſe thee as well. So he cōmaunded a condemned man to be fetched out of priſon, and withall called for the hangman, whom he willed to ſtrike off his head in the middeſt of his ſupper, that the boy might ſee him killed. Valerius Antias the hiſtoriographer writeth, that it was not for the loue of the boy, but of a woman which he loued. But Titus Liuius declareth, that in an oration which Cato himſelfe made, it was writtẽ, that it was one of the GAVLES: who being a traitor to his coũtry mẽ, was come to Flaminius gate with his wife and children, and that Flaminius making him come into his hall, killed him with his owne handes, to pleaſe a boy he loued, that was deſirous to ſee a man killed. Howbeit it is very likely that Cato wrote in this ſort, to aggrauate the offence, and to make it more cruell. For, many haue written it that it is true, and that he was no traitor, but an offendour condemned to dye: and among other, Cicero the oratour doth recite it in a booke he made of age, where he made it to be told vnto Catoes own perſon. Howſoeuer it was, Marcus Cato being choſen Cenſor, and clenſing the Senate of all vnworthy perſons, he put off the ſame Lucius Quintius Flaminius, although he had bene Conſull: which diſgrace did ſeeme to redound to his brother Titus Quintius Flaminius alſo. Whereupō both the brethren came weeping with all humilitie before the people, and made a petition that ſeemed very reaſonable and ciuill: which was that they would commaunde Cato to come before them, to declare the cauſe openly why he had with ſuch open ſhame defaced ſo noble a houſe as theirs was. Cato then without delay, or ſhrinking backe, came with his companion into the market place, where he asked Titus out aloude, if he knew nothing of the ſupper where ſuch a fact was committed. Titus aunſwered, he knew not of it. Then Cato opened the whole matter as it was, and in the end of his tale, he bad Lucius Quintius ſweare openly, if he would deny that he had ſayd was true. Lucius aunſwered not a word. Whereupon the people judged the ſhame was iuſtly layd vpon him: and ſo to honour Cato, they did accompany him from the pulpit for orations, home vnto his owne houſe. But Titus being much offended at the diſgrace of his brother, became enemy to Cato, and fell in with thoſe that of long time had hated him. And ſo by practiſe he procured of the Senate, that all bargaines of leaſes, and all deedes of ſales made by Cato during his office, were called in, and made voyde: and cauſed many ſutes alſo to be commenced againſt him. Wherein, I can not ſay he did wiſely or ciuilly, to become mortall enemie to an honeſt man, a good citizen, and duetifull in his office, for his yeare, but vnworthy kinſeman, who had iuſtly deſerued the ſhame layed vpon him. Notwithſtanding, ſhortly after when the people were aſſembled in the Theater to ſee games played, and the Senatours were ſet according to their cuſtome, in the moſt honorable places: Lucius Flaminius came in alſo, who in lowly & humble manner went to ſit downe in the furtheſt ſeates of the Theater, without regard of his former honour: which whe͂ the people ſaw, they tooke pity of him, & could not abide to ſee him thus diſhonored. So they cried out to haue him come and ſit among the other Senatours the Conſuls, who made him place, and receiued him accordingly. But to returne againe to Titus. The naturall ambition and couetous greedy minde he had of honour, was very well taken and eſteemed, ſo long as he had any occaſion offered him to exerciſe it in the warres, which we haue ſpoken of before. For, after he had bene Conſull, of his owne ſeeking he became a Colonell of a thouſand footemen, not being called to it by any man. So whe͂ he began to ſtoupe for age, and that he had giuen ouer as a man at the laſt caſt, to beare office any longer in the ſtate: they ſaw plainly he was ambitious beyond meaſure, to ſuffer himſelfe in old age to be ouercome with ſuch youthfull violence, being farre vnmeete for any of his yeares. For me thinkes his ambition was the onely cauſe that moued him to procure Hannibals death, which bred him much diſliking and ill opinio͂ with many. For, after Hanniball had fled out of his own countrey, he went firſt vnto king Antiochus: who, after he loſt the battell in PHRYGIA, was glad the ROMAINES graunted him peace with ſuch conditions as themſelues would. Wherefore Hanniball fled againe from him, and after he had long wandered vp and down, at the length he came to the realme of BITHYNIA, and remained there about king Pruſias, the ROMAINES knowing it well enough: and becauſe Hanniball was then an old broken ma͂, of no force nor power, & one whom fortune had ſpurned at her feete, they made no more reckening of him. But Titus being ſent Ambaſſadour by the Senate, vnto P*ruſias* king of BITHYNIA, and finding Hanniball there, it grieued him to ſee him aliue. So that notwithſtanding P*ruſias* maruellouſly intreated him, to take pitie vpon Hanniball a poore old man, & his friend who came to him for ſuccour: yet he could not perſwade Titus to be content he ſhould liue. Hanniball long before had receiued aunſwere of his death from an oracle, to this effect.

The land of Lybia, ſhall couer vnder mowld,
The valiant corps of Hanniball, when he is dead and cold.

Hannibal kept at Libyſſa in Bithynia.

Midas and Themiſtocles poyſoned themſelues.

So Hanniball vnderſtood that of LYBIA, as if he ſhould haue dyed in AFRICKE, and bene buried in CARTHAGE. There is a certaine ſandy country in BITHYNIA neare to the ſeas ſide, where there is a litle village called LIBYSSA, and where Hanniball remained continually. He miſtruſting king Pruſias faint hart, and fearing the ROMAINES malice alſo, had made ſeuen priuy caues and vaultes vnder ground long before, that he might ſecretly go out at either of them which way he would, and euery one of them came to the maine vault where himſelfe did lye, and could not be diſcerned outwardly. When it was told him that Titus had willed P*ruſias* to deliuer him into his hands, he ſought then to ſaue himſelfe by thoſe mynes: but he found that all the ventes out, had watch and ward vpon them by the kings commaundement. So then he determined to kill himſelfe. Now ſome ſay, that he wound a linnen towell hard about his necke, and commaunded one of his men he ſhould ſet his knee vpon his buttocke, & wayghing hard vpon him, holding the towell faſt, he ſhould pull his necke backward with all the power and ſtrength he could, and neuer linne preſsing on him, till he had ſtrangled him. Other ſay that he drancke bulles bloud, as Midas and Themiſtocles had done before him. But Titus Liuius writeth, that he had poyſon which he kept for ſuch a purpoſe, and tempered it in a cup he held in his handes, and before he dranke, he ſpake theſe wordes. Come on, let vs deliuer the ROMAINES of this great care, ſith my life is ſo grieuous to them, that they thinke it too long to tary the naturall death of a poore old man, whom they hate ſo much: and yet Titus by this ſhall winne no honorable victorie, nor worthie the memorie of the auncient RO-

MAINS, who aduertiſed king Pyrrus their enemy, euen when he made warres with them, and had wonne battels of them, that he ſhould beware of poyſoning which was intẽded towardes him. And this was Hannibals end, as we finde it written. The newes whereof being come to ROME vnto the Senate, many of them thought Titus too violẽt and cruell, to haue made Hanniball kill himſelfe in that ſort, when extremitie of age had ouercome him already, and was as a birde left naked, her feathers falling from her for age: & ſo much the more, becauſe there was no inſtant occaſion offered him to vrge him to do it, but a couetous minde of honour, for that he would be chronicled to be the cauſe and author of Hannibals death. And then in contrariwiſe they did much honour & commend the clemencie & noble minde of Scipio AFRICAN. Who hauing ouercome Hanniball in battell, in AFRICKE ſelfe, and being then indeed to be feared, and had bene neuer ouercome before: yet he did not cauſe him to be driuen out of his country, neither did aske him of the CARTHAGINIANS, but both then, and before the battell, whẽ he parled with him of peace, he tooke Hanniball curteouſly by the hand, and after the battell, in the cõditions of peace he gaue them, he neuer ſpake word of hurt to Hannibals perſon, neither did he ſhew any crueltie to him in his miſery. And they tell how afterwardes they met againe together in the citie of EPHESVS, and as they were walking, that Hanniball tooke the vpper hãd of Scipio: & that Scipio bare it patiẽtly, & left not off walking for that, neither ſhewed any countenaunce of miſliking. And in entring into diſcourſe of many matters, they deſcẽded in the end to talke of auntiẽt Captaines: & Hanniball gaue iudgemẽt, that Alexander the great was the famouſeſt Captaine, Pyrrus the ſecond, & himſelfe the third. Then Scipio ſmiling, gently asked him: what wouldeſt thou ſay then, if I had not ouercome thee? Truely, quod Hanniball, I would not then put my ſelfe the third man, but the firſt, and aboue all the Captaines that euer were. So diuers greatly commending the goodly ſayings and deedes of Scipio, did maruellouſly miſlike Titus, for that he had (as a man may ſay) layd his handes vpon the death of an other man. Other to the contrary againe ſayd, it was well done of him, ſaying, that Hanniball ſo long as he liued, was a fire to the Empire of the ROMAINES, which lacked but one to blow it: and that when he was in his beſt force and luſty age, it was not his hand nor body that troubled the ROMAINES, ſo much, but his great wiſedome and skill he had in the warres, and the mortall hate he bare in his hart towardes the ROMAINES, which neither yeares, neither age would diminiſh or take away. For mens naturall conditions do remaine ſtill, but fortune doth not alwayes keepe in a ſtate, but chaungeth ſtill, and then quickeneth vp our deſires to ſet willingly vpon thoſe that warre againſt vs, becauſe they hate vs in their harts. The things which fell out afterwardes, did greatly proue the reaſons brought out for this purpoſe, in diſcharge of Titus. For one Ariſtonicus, ſonne of a daughter of a player vpon the citherne, vnder the fame & glory of Eumenes, whoſe baſtard he was, filled all ASIA with warre & rebellion, by reaſon the people roſe in his fauour. Again Mithridates, after ſo many loſſes he had receiued againſt Sylla and Fimbria, and after ſo many armies ouerthrowne by battell & warres, and after ſo many famous Captaines loſt and killed: did yet recouer againe, and came to be of power both by ſea & land againſt Lucullus. Truly Hanniball was no lower brought then Caius Marius had bene. For he had a king to his friend, that gaue him entertainement for him and his familie, & made him Admirall of his ſhips, and generall of his horſemen and footemen in the field. Marius alſo went vp and downe AFRIKE a begging for his liuing, in ſomuch as his enemies at ROME mocked him to ſcorne: & ſoone after notwithſtanding they fell downe at his feete before him, when they ſaw they were whipped, murthered, & ſlaine within ROME by his cõmandement. Thus we ſee no man can ſay certainely he is meane or great, by reaſon of the vncertaintie of things to come: cõſidering there is but one death, & change of better life. Some ſay alſo, that Titus did not this act alone, & of his own authoritie: but that he was ſent Ambaſſadour with Lucius Scipio to no other end, but to put Hanniball to death, by what meanes ſoeuer they could. Furthermore after this Ambaſſade, we do not finde any notable thing written of Titus worthy of memorie, neither in peace, nor in warres. For he dyed quietly of a naturall death at home in his country.

THE COMPARISON OF ## Titus Quintius Flaminius with Philopœmen.

IT is time now we come to compare them together. Therefore as touching the great benefites that came to the GRECIANS, neither Philopœmen, nor all the other former Captaines are to be compared with Titus. For all the aunciẽt Captaines almoſt being GRECIANS, made warres with other GRECIANS: but Titus being a ROMAINE, and no GRECIAN, made warres for the liberty of GRECE. When Philopœmen was not able to helpe his poore citizens diſtreſſed ſore, and vexed with warres, he ſayled away into CRETA. Titus hauing ouercome Philip king of MACEDON in battell, did reſtore againe to libertie all the people and cities of the ſame, which were kept before in bondage. And if any will narrowly examine the battels of either partie: they ſhall find, that Philopœmen being generall of the ACHAIANS, made more GRECIANS to be ſlaine, then Titus did of the MACEDONIANS, fighting with them for the libertie of the GRECIANS. And for their imperfections, the one of them was ambitious, the other was as obſtinate: the one was quicke and ſodainly angred, the other was very hard to be pacified. Titus left king Philip his realme and crowne after he had ouercome him, and vſed great clemency towardes the ÆTOLIANS: where Philopœmen for ſpite, and malice, tooke townes and villages from his owne natiue country, and citie, wherein he was borne, that had alwayes payed them tribute. Furthermore, Titus continued a ſound friend to them, to whom he had once profeſſed friendſhip, and done pleaſure vnto: and Philopœmen, in a geare and anger, was ready to take away that he had giuen, and to ouerthrow the pleaſure and good turne he had ſhewed. For Philopœmen when he had done the LACEDÆMONIANS great pleaſure, did afterwardes raſe the wals of their citie, and ſpoiled and deſtroyed all their country: and laſtly, ouerthrew their whole gouernement. It ſeemeth alſo by reaſon of his immoderate choller, he was himſelfe cauſe of his own death, for that he made more haſt then good ſpeede, to go out of time to ſet vpon thoſe of MESSINA: and not as Titus, who did all his affaires with wiſedome, and euer conſidered what was beſt to be done. But if we looke into the number of battels, and victories: the warre which Titus made againſt Philip was ended with two battels. Whereas Philopœmen in infinite battels in which he had the better, neuer left it doubtfull, but that his skill did euer helpe him the more to victory, then the good fortune he had. Moreouer, Titus wanne honour by meanes of the power of ROME, when it floriſhed moſt, and was in beſt proſperitie: Philopœmen made himſelfe famous by his deedes, when GRECE began to ſtoupe and fall all together. So that the deedes of the one, were cõmon to all the ROMAINES: & the deedes of the other, were priuate to himſelfe alone. For Titus was generall ouer good and valiant ſouldiers, that were already trained to his hand:

and Philopœmen being choſen Generall, did traine his men himſelfe, & made them afterwards very expert and valiant, that were but meane and greene ſouldiers before. And whereas Philopœmen had continuall wars with the GRECIANS, it was not for any good fortune he had, but that it made a certaine proofe of his valiantneſſe. For where all other things are anſwerable to his, there we muſt iudge that ſuch as ouercome, haue the moſt courage. Now Philopœmen making warres with the moſt warlike nations of all GRECE, (as the CRETANS, and the LACEDÆMONIANS) did ouercome the ſubtilleſt of them, by fineneſſe and policie: and the moſt valiant by proweſſe and hardineſſe. But Titus ouercame, by putting that only in practiſe, which was already found and ſtabliſhed: as the diſcipline of the warres, and order of battell, in the which his ſouldiers had long before bene trained. Whereas Philopœmen brought into his countrie, both the one and the other, and altered all the order which before they were accuſtomed vnto. So that the chiefeſt point how to winne a battell, was found out a new, and brought in by the one, into a place where it was neuer before: and onely employed by the other, which could very good skill to vſe it, and had found it out already before. Againe, touching the valiant actes done in the perſon of themſelues, many notable actes may be tolde of Philopœmen, but none of Titus: but rather to the contrarie. For there was one Archedamus an ÆTOLIAN, who flouting Titus one day, ſaid in his reproche: that at a day of battell, when Philopœmen ran with his ſworde in his hand, to that ſide where he ſaw the MACEDONIANS fighting, and making head againſt the enemie, Titus held vp his hands vnto heauen, and was buſie at his praiers to the gods, not ſtirring one foote, when it was more time to handle the ſword, and to fight of all hands. All the goodly deeds Titus euer did, were done alwaies as a Conſull, or lieutenant, or a magiſtrate: whereas Philopœmen ſhewed himſelf vnto the ACHAIANS, a man no leſſe valiant, and of execution, being out of office, then when he was a General. For when he was a Generall, he did driue Nabis the tyrant of the LACEDÆMONIANS out of MESSINA, and deliuered the MESSINIANS out of bondage: and being a priuate man, he ſhut the gates of the citie of SPARTA, in the face of Diophanes (Generall of the ACHAIANS) and of Titus Quintius Flaminius, and kept them both from comming in, and therby ſaued the city from ſacking. Thus being borne to command, he knew not onely how to command according to the law, but could commaund the law it ſelfe vpon neceſſity, and when the commonwealth required it. For at ſuch a time he would not tary, while the Magiſtrates which ſhould gouerne him, did giue him authority to commaund, but he tooke it of himſelfe, and vſed them when the time ſerued: eſteeming him indeed their Generall, that knew better then they what was to be done, then him whom they choſe of themſelues. And therefore they do well, that do commend Titus actes, for his clemencie, and curteſie, vſed to the GRECIANS: but much more the noble and valiant acts of Philopœmen vnto the ROMAINES. For it is much eaſier to pleaſure and gratifie the weake, then it is to hurt and reſiſt the ſtrong. Therefore, ſithence we haue throughly examined, and compared the one with the other: it is very harde to iudge altogether the difference that is betwene them. Peraduenture therefore the iudgement would not ſeeme very ill, if we doe giue the GRECIAN, for diſcipline of warre, the preheminence and praiſe of a good Captaine: and to the ROMAINE, for iuſtice and clemencie, the name and dignity of a moſt iuſt and courteous gentleman.

PYRHVS.R.EPI

How Pyrrus being an infant was ſaued

IT is written, that ſince Noes floud, the firſt king of the Thesprotians, and of the Molossians, was P*haëton*, one of thoſe who came with P*elaſgus*, into the realme of Epirvs. But ſome ſay otherwiſe, that Deucalion, and his wiſe P*yrra* remained there, after they had built and founded the temple of Dodone, in the country of the Molossians. But how ſoeuer it was, a great while after that, Neoptolemus the ſonne of Achilles, bringing thither a great nũber of people with him, conquered the country, and after him left a ſucceſſion of kings, which were called after his name, the P*yrrides*: becauſe that from his infancie he was ſurnamed Pyrrus, as much to ſay, as redde: and one of his legitimate ſonnes whom he had by Lanaſſa, the daughter of Cleodes, the ſonne of Hillus, was alſo named by him P*yrrus*. And this is the cauſe why Achilles is honored as a god in Epirvs, being called in their language, Aſpetos, that is to ſay, mighty, or very great. But from the firſt kings of that race vntill the time of Tharrytas, there is no memory nor mention made of them, nor of their power that raigned in the meane time, becauſe they all became very barbarous, and vtterly voide of ciuility. Tharrytas was indeed the firſt that beautified the cities of his country with the Grecian tongue, brought in ciuill lawes and cuſtomes, and made his name famous to the poſterity that followed. This Tharrytas left a ſonne called Alcetas, of Alcetas came Arymbas, of Arymbas and Troiade his wife, came AEacides, who maried P*hthia*, the daughter of Menon Thessalian: a famous man in the time of the warres ſurnamed Lamiacus, and one that had farre greater authority then any other of the cõfederats, after Leoſthenes. This AEacides had two daughters by his wife P*hthia*, to ſay, Deidamia and Troiade, and one ſonne called P*yrrus*. In his time the Molossians rebelled, draue him out of his kingdome, and put the crowne into the hands of the ſonnes of Neoptolemus. Wherupon all the friends of AEacides that could be taken, were generally murthered, & ſlaine outright. Androclides & Angelus in the meane time ſtole away P*yrrus*, being yet but a ſuckling babe (whome his enemies neuertheleſſe egerly ſought for to haue deſtroyed) and fled away with him as faſt as poſsibly they might, with few ſeruants, his nurſes and neceſſarie women only to looke to the childe, and giue it ſucke: by reaſon wherof their flight was much hindred, ſo as they could go no great iorneis, but that they might eaſily be ouertaken by them that followed. For which cauſe they put the childe into the handes of

Androclion, Hippias, and Neander, three luſty young men, whom they truſted with him, and commaunded them to runne for life to a certaine citie of MACEDON, called MEGARES: and they themſelues in the meane time, partly by intreaty, and partly by force, made ſtaye of thoſe that followed them till night. So as with much a do hauing driuen them back, they ran after them that caried the childe Pyrrus, whom they ouertooke at ſunne ſet. And now, weening they had bene ſafe, and out of all daunger: they found it cleane contrarie. For when they came to the riuer vnder the towne walles of MEGARES, they ſaw it ſo rough and ſwift, that it made them afraide to beholde it: and when they gaged the forde, they found it vnpoſſible to wade through, it was ſo ſore riſen and troubled with the fall of the raine, beſides that the darkneſſe of the night made euery thing ſeeme fearfull vnto them. So as they now that caried the childe, thought it not good to venter the paſſage ouer of themſelues alone, with the women that tended the childe: but hearing certajne countrimen on the other ſide, they prayed and beſought them in the name of the gods, that they would helpe them to paſſe ouer the childe, ſhewing Pyrrus vnto them a farre off. But the countrimen by reaſon of the roaring of the riuer vnderſtoode them not. Thus they continued a long ſpace, the one crying, the other liſtning, yet could they not vnderſtand one an other, till at the laſt one of the company bethought himſelfe to pill of a peece of the barke of an oke, and vpon that he wrote with the tongue of a buckle, the hard fortune and neceſſitie of the childe. Which he tied to a ſtone to giue it weight, and ſo threw it ouer to the other ſide of the riuer: other ſay that he did prick the barke through with the point of a dart which he caſt ouer. The countrimen on the other ſide of the riuer, hauing read what was written, and vnderſtanding thereby the preſent danger the childe was in: felled downe trees in all the haſt they could poſsibly, bound them together, and ſo paſſed ouer the riuer. And it fortuned that the firſt man of them that paſſed ouer, and tooke the childe, was called Achilles: the reſidue of the countrimen paſſed ouer alſo, and tooke the other that came with the childe, and conueyed them ouer as they came firſt to hand. And thus hauing eſcaped their hands, by eaſie iorneis they came at the length vnto Glaucias king of ILLYRIA, whom they found in his houſe ſitting by his wife: and laide downe the childe in the middeſt of the flower before him. The king hereupon ſtaied a long time without vttering any one word, waihging with himſelfe what was beſt to be done: becauſe of the feare he had of Caſſander, a mortall enemy of AEacides. In the meane time, the childe Pyrrus creeping of all foure, tooke holde of the kings gowne, and ſcrawled vp by that, and ſo got vp on his feete againſt the kings knees. At the firſt, the king laughed to ſee the childe: but after it pitied him againe, becauſe the childe ſeemed like an humble ſuter that came to ſeeke ſanctuarie in his armes. Other ſay that Pyrrus came not to Glaucias, but vnto the alter of the familiar gods, alongſt the which he got vp on his feete, and embraced it with both his hands. Which Glaucias imagining to be done by gods prouidence, preſently deliuered the childe to his wife, gaue her the charge of him, and willed her to ſee him brought vp with his owne. Shortly after, his enemies ſent to demaund the childe of him: and moreouer, Caſſander cauſed two hundred talents to be offered him, to deliuer the childe Pyrrus into his hands. Howbeit Glaucias would neuer graunt thereunto, but contrarily, when Pyrrus was come to twelue yeares olde, brought him into his country of EPIRVS with an army, and ſtabliſhed him king of the realme againe. Pyrrus had a great maieſty in his countenance, but yet indeed more fearefull then friendly. He had alſo no teeth in his vpper iawe that ſtood diſtinctly one from an other, but one whole bone throughout his gumme, marked a litle at the top onely, with certaine riftes in the place where the teeth ſhould be deuided. Men held opinion alſo, that he did heale them that were ſicke of the ſplene, by ſacrifieing a white cocke, and touching the place of the ſpleene on the left ſide of them that were ſicke, ſoftly with his right foote, they lying on their backes: and there was not ſo poore nor ſimple a man that craued this remedie of him, but he gaue it him, and tooke the cocke he ſacrificed, for reward of the remedy, which pleaſed him very well. They ſay alſo that the great toe of his right foote had ſome ſecret vertue in it. For when he was dead, and that they had burnt all parts of his body, and conſumed it to aſhes: his great toe was whole, and had no hurt at all. But of that, we will write more hereafter. Now, when he was ſeauenteene yeares of age, thinking himſelfe ſure enough of his kingdome, it chanced him to make a iorney into ILLY-

RIA, where he maried one of Glaucias daughters, with whom he had bene brought vp. But his backe was no ſooner turned, but the MOLOSSIANS rebelled againe againſt him, & draue out his friends & ſeruants, and deſtroied all his goods, and yeelded themſelues vnto his aduerſarie Neoptolemus. King Pyrrus hauing thus loſt his kingdome, and ſeeing himſelſe forſaken on all ſides, went to Demetrius (Antigonus ſonne) that had maried his ſiſter Deidamia, who in her young age was aſſured to Alexander, the ſonne of Alexander the great, and of Roxane, and was called his wife. But when all that race was brought to wicked end, Demetrius thē maried her, being come to full and able age. And in that great battell which was ſtriken neere to the citie of HIPSVS, where all the kings fought together, Pyrrus being then but a young man, & with Demetrius, put them all to flight that fought with him, and was worthily reputed for the valianteſt prince amongſt them all. Furthermore, when Demetrius was ouercome, and had loſt the battell: Pyrrus neuer forſooke him, but faithfully did keepe for him the cities of GRECE, which he put into his hands. And afterwards when peace was concluded betwixt Demetrius and Ptolomie, Pyrrus was ſent an hoſtage for Demetrius into the realme of ÆGIPTE: where he made P*tolomie* know (both in hunting and in other exerciſes of his perſon) that he was very ſtrong, harde, and able to endure any labour. Furthermore perceiuing that Berenice amongſt all king P*tolomies* wiues, was beſt beloued and eſteemed of her husband, both for her vertue and wiſedome: he began to entertaine and honour her aboue all the reſt. For he was a man that could tell how to humble himſelfe towards the great (by whom he might winne benefit) and knew alſo how to creepe into their credit: and in like manner was he a great ſcorner and deſpiſer of ſuch as were his inferiours. Moreouer, for that he was found maruellous honorable and of faire condition, he was preferred before all other young princes, to be the husband of Antigona, the daughter of Queene Berenice, whom ſhe had by P*hillip*, before ſhe was maried vnto P*tolomie*. From thenceforth growing through the alliance of that mariage, more and more into eſtimation and fauour by meanes of his wife Antigona, who ſhewed her ſelfe very vertuous and louing towards him: he found meanes in the end, to get both men & money to returne againe into the realme of EVIRVS, and to conquer it: ſo was he then very well receiued of the people, and the better, for the malice they bare to Neoptolemus, becauſe he dealt both hardly and cruelly with them. That notwithſtanding, Pyrrus fearing leaſt Neoptolemus would repaire vnto ſome of the other kings, to ſeeke aide againſt him, thought good to make peace with him. Wherupon it was agreed betweene them, that they ſhould both together be kings of EPIRVS. But in proceſſe of time, ſome of their men ſecretly made ſtrife againe betweene them, and ſet them at defiance one with an other: and the chiefeſt cauſe as it is ſaied, that angered Pyrrus moſt, grew vpon this. The kings of EPIRVS had an ancient cuſtome of great antiquity, after they had made ſolemne ſacrifice vnto Iupiter Martiall, in a certaine place in the prouince of MOLOSSIDE, called PASSARON) to take their othe, & to be ſworne to the EPIROTES, that they would raigne well and iuſtly, according to the lawes and ordinances of the countrie: and to receiue the ſubiects othes interchangeably alſo, that they would defend and maintaine them in their kingdome, according to the lawes in like maner. This ceremony was done in the preſence of both the kings, and they with their friends did both giue and receiue preſents each of other. At this meeting and ſolemnitie, among other, one Gelon a moſt faithfull ſeruant and aſſured friend vnto Neoptolemus, who beſides great ſhewes of friendſhip and honour he did vnto P*yrrus*, gaue him two paire of draught oxen, which one Myrtilus a cupbearer of P*yrrus* being preſent, and ſeeing, did craue of his maiſter. But P*yrrus* denyed to giue them vnto him, whereat Myrtilus was very angrie. Gelon perceiuing that Myrtilus was angrie, prayed him to ſup with him that night. Now ſome ſay, he ſought to abuſe Myrtilus, becauſe he was faire and young: and began to perſwade him after ſupper to take part with Neoptolemus, and to poiſon Pyrrus. Myrtilus made as though he was willing to giue eare to this perſwaſion, and to be well pleaſed withall. But in the meane time, he went and tolde his maiſter of it, by whoſe commaundement he made Alexicrates, P*yrrus* chiefe cupbearer, to talke with Gelon about this practiſe, as though he had alſo giuen his conſent to it, and was willing to be partaker of the enterpriſe. This did P*yrrus* to haue two witneſſes, to prooue the pretended poyſoning of him. Thus Gelon being finely deceiued, and Neoptolemus alſo with him, both imagining they had cunningly ſpunne the thred of their treaſon: Neoptolemus was ſo glad of it, that he could not keepe it to himſelfe, but told it to certaine of his friends. And on a time going to be mery with his ſiſter, he could not keepe it in, but muſt be pratling of it to her, ſuppoſing no body had heard him but her ſelfe, becauſe there was no liuing creature neere them, ſauing P*hænareta Samons* wife, the kings chiefe heardman of all his beaſts, and yet ſhe was laide vpon a little bed by, and turned towards the wall: ſo that ſhe ſeemed as though ſhe had ſlept. But hauing heard all their talke, and no body miſtruſting her: the next morning ſhe went to Antigona king P*yrrus* wife, and told her euery word what ſhe had heard Neoptolemus ſay to his ſiſter. P*yrrus* hearing this, made no countenance of any thing at that time. But hauing made ſacrifice vnto the gods, he bad Neoptolemus to ſupper to his houſe, where he ſlue him, being well informed before of the goodwill the chiefeſt men of the realme did beare him, who wiſhed him to diſpatche Neoptolemus, and not to content himſelfe with a peece of EPIRVS only, but to follow his naturall inclination, being borne to great things: and for this cauſe therefore, this ſuſpition falling out in the meane while, he preuented Neoptolemus, and ſlue him firſt. And furthermore, remẽbring the pleaſures he had receiued of P*tolomie* and Berenice, he named his firſt ſonne by his wife Antigona, P*tolomie*, and hauing built a city in the PRESCQVE, an Ile of EPIRVS, did name it BERENICIDA. When he had done that, imagining great matters in his head, but more in his hope, he firſt determined with himſelfe how to winne that which lay neereſt vnto him: and ſo tooke occaſion by this meanes, firſt to ſet foote into the Empire of MACEDON. The eldeſt ſonne of Caſſander, called Antipater, put his owne mother Theſſalonica to death, and draue his brother Alexander out of his owne country, who ſent to Demetrius for helpe, and called in P*yrrus* alſo to his aide. Demetrius being troubled with other matters, could not ſo quickly go thither. And P*yrrus* being arriued there, demaunded for his charge ſuſteined, the citie of NYMPHÆA, with all the ſea coaſtes of MACEDON: and beſides all that, certaine landes alſo that were not belonging to the auncient crowne and reuenues of the kings of MACEDON, but were added vnto it by force of armes, as Ambracia, Acarnania, and Amphilochia. All theſe, the young king Alexander leauing vnto him, he tooke poſſeſſion thereof, and put good garriſons into the ſame in his owne name: and conquering the reſt of MACEDON in the name of Alexander, put his brother Antipater to great diſtreſſe. In the meane time king Lyſimachus lacked no good will to helpe Antipater with his force, but being buſied in other matters, had not the meane to do it. Howbeit knowing very well that Pyrrus in acknowledging the great pleaſures he had receiued of Ptolomie, would denie him nothing: he determined to write counterfeit letters to him in Ptolomies name, and thereby inſtantly to pray and require him to leaue off the warres begun againſt Antipater, and to take of him towards the defraying of his charges, the ſumme of three hundred talents. Pyrrus opening the letters, knew ſtraight that this was but a fetche and deuiſe of Lyſimachus. For king Ptolomies common manner of greeting of him, which he vſed at the beginning of his letters, was not in them obſerued: To my ſonne Pyrrus, health. But in thoſe counterfeit was, king Ptolomie, vnto king Pyrrus, health. Whereupon he preſently pronounced Lyſimachus for a naughty man: neuertheleſſe, afterwards he made peace with Antipater, and they met together at a day appointed, to be ſworne vpon the ſacrifices vnto the articles of peace. There were three beaſts brought to be ſacrificed, a goate, a bull, and a ramme: of the which, the ramme fell downe dead of himſelfe before he was touched, whereat all the ſtanders by fell a laughing. But there was a Soothſaier, one Theodotus, that perſwaded P*yrrus* not to ſweare: ſaying, that this ſigne and token of the gods did threaten one of the three kings with ſodaine death. For which cauſe P*yrrus* concluded no peace. Now Alexanders warres being ended, Demetrius notwithſtanding came to him, knowing well enough at his cõming that Alexander had no more neede of his aide, and that he did it onely but to feare him. They had not bene many dayes together, but the one began to miſtruſt the other, and to ſpie all the wayes they could to intrap each other: but Demetrius embracing the firſt occaſion offered, preuented Alexander, and ſlue him, being a young man, and proclaimed himſelfe king of MACEDON in his roome. Now Demetrius had certaine quarrels before againſt P*yrrus*, becauſe he had ouerrun the country of THESSALIE: and furthermore, greedy couetouſneſſe to haue the more(which is a common vice with princes and noble men)made,that being ſo neere neighbours,the one ſtoode in feare and miſtruſt of the other, and yet much more after the death of Deidamia. But now that they both occupied all MACEDON betwene them,and were to make diuiſion of one ſelfe kingdome. Now I ſay began the matter and occaſion of quarrell, to grow the greater betwene them. Wherupon Demetrius went with his armie to ſet vpon the ÆTOLIANS, and hauing conquered the country, left Pantauchus his Lieutenant there with a great armie: and himſelfe in perſon in the meane time, marched againſt Pyrrus, and Pyrrus on the other ſide againſt him. They both miſſed of meeting, and Demetrius going on further on the one ſide,entred into the realme of EPIRVS, and brought a great ſpoile away with him: Pyrrus on the other ſide marched on,till he came to the place where Pantauchus was. To whome he gaue battell,and it was valiantly fought out betweene the ſouldiers of either party, but ſpecially betweene the two Generals. For doubtleſſe, Pantauchus was the valianteſt Captaine,the ſtouteſt man,and of the greateſt experience in armes, of all the Captaines and ſouldiers Demetrius had. Whereupon, Pantauchus truſting in his ſtrength and courage, aduanced himſelfe forwards,and luſtely chalenged the combat of Pyrrus. Pyrrus on the other ſide being inferiour to no king in valianteſſe, nor in deſire to win honour, as he that would aſcribe vnto himſelfe the glory of Achilles,more for the imitation of his valiancie, then for that he was deſcended of his bloud: paſſed through the middeſt of the battell vnto the firſt rancke, to buckle with Pantauchus. Thus they began to charge one an other, firſt with their dartes, and then comming nearer,fought with their ſwords,not only artificially, but alſo with great force and furie: vntill ſuch time as Pyrrus was hurte in one place,and he hurt Pantauchus in two. The one neere vnto his throte and the other in his legge: ſo as in the ende Pyrrus made him turne his backe,and threw him to the ground, but neuertheleſſe killed him not. For,ſo ſoone as he was downe,his men tooke him,and caried him away. But the EPIROTES encoraged by the victorie of their king,and the admiration of his valiantneſſe, ſtuck too it ſo luſtily, that in the end they brake the battell of the MACEDONIAN footmen: & hauing put them to flight,followed them ſo liuely, that they ſlue a great number of them, and tooke fiue thouſand priſoners. This ouerthrowe did not ſo much fill the hearts of the MACEDONIANS with anger,for the loſſe they had receiued,nor with the hate conceiued againſt Pyrrus: as it wanne Pyrrus great fame and honour,making his courage and valiantneſſe to be wondred at of all ſuch as were preſent at the battell that ſaw him fight,and how he laide about him. For they thought that they ſaw in his face the very life and agilitie of Alexander the great, and the right ſhadowe as it were, ſhewing the force and fury of Alexander himſelfe in that fight. And where other kings did but onely counterfeit Alexander the great in his purple garments,and in numbers of ſouldiers and gardes about their perſons, and in a certaine faſhion and bowing of their necks a litle, and in vttering his ſpeech with an high voice: Pyrrus onely was like vnto him,and followed him in his marſhall deeds and valiant actes. Furthermore,for his experience and skill in warlike diſcipline,the bookes he wrote himſelfe thereof, doe amply prooue and make manifeſt. Furthermore, they reporte, that king Antigonus being asked, whome he thought to be the greateſt Captaine: made aunſwer, Pyrrus, ſo farre forth as he might liue to be olde,ſpeaking only of the captaines of his time. But Hanniball generally ſaid, Pyrrus was the greateſt Captaine of experience and skill in warres of all other, Scipio the ſecond, and himſelfe the third: as we haue written in the life of Scipio. So it ſeemeth that Pyrrus gaue his whole life and ſtudie to the diſcipline of warres,as that which indeed was princely and meete for a king,making no reckoning of all other knowledge. And furthermore touching this matter, they report that he being at a feaſt one day, a queſtion was asked him, whom he thought to be the beſt plaier of the flute, Python or Cepheſias: whereunto he aunſwered, that Polyperchon in his opinion was the beſt Captaine,as if he would haue ſaid, that was the onely thing a prince ſhould ſeeke for,and which he ought chiefly to learne and know. He was very gentle & familiar with his friends, eaſie to forgiue when any had offended him,and maruellous deſirous to requite and acknowledge any curteſie or pleaſure by him receiued. And that was the cauſe why he did very vnpaciently take the death of AEropus,not ſo much for his death (which he knew was a common thing to euery liuing creature)as for that he was angry with himſelfe he had deferred the time

ſo long, that time it ſelfe had cut him off from all occaſion and meanes to requite the curteſies he had receiued of him. True it is that money lent, may be repaied againe vnto the heires of the lender: but yet it grieueth an honeſt nature, when he can not recompence the good will of the lender, of whom he hath receiued the good turne. Another time Pyrrus being in the city of AMBRACIA, there were certain of his friends that gaue him counſel to put a naughty man out of the city that did nothing but ſpeake ill of him. But he aunſwered, it is better (quoth he) to keepe him here ſtill, ſpeaking ill of vs but to a few: then driuing him away, to make him ſpeake ill of vs euery where. Certaine youths were brought before him on a time, who making merry together, drinking freely, were bold with the king to ſpeake their pleaſure of him in very vnduetifull ſort. So, Pyrrus asking them whether it was true they ſayed or ſo no: it is true, and it pleaſe your grace, ſayed one of them, we ſayed it in deede, and had not our wine failed vs, we had ſpoken a great deale more. The king laughed at it, and pardoned them. After the death of Antigona, hee maried many wiues to encreaſe his power withall, and to get moe friendes. For hee maried the daughter of Autoleon king of PÆONIA, and Bircenna the daughter of Bardillis, king of ILLYRIA and Lanaſſa, the daughter of Agathocles, tyrant of SYRACVSA, that brought him for her dower the Ile of CORPHVE, which her father had taken. By Antigona his firſt wife, he had a ſonne called Ptolomie: By Lanaſſa, an other called Alexander: and by Bircenna, an other (the yongeſt of all) called Hilenus: all which though they were martiall men by race and naturall inclination, yet were they brought vp by him in wars, and therein trained as it were euen from their cradle. They write, that one of his ſonnes being but a boy, asked him one day to which of them he would leaue his kingdome: Pyrrus aunſwered the boy, to him that hath the ſharpeſt ſword. That was much like the tragicall curſe wherewith Oedipus curſed his children.

So cruell, hatefull, and beaſtly is the nature of ambition and deſire of rule. But after this battell, Pyrrus returned home againe to his countrey, full of honour and glory, his heart highly exalted, and his mind throughly contented. And as at his returne the EPIROTES his ſubiects called him an Eagle, he aunſwered them: if I be an Eagle, it is through you that I am ſo, for your weapons are the winges that haue raiſed mee vp. Shortly after, being aduertiſed that Demetrius was fallen ſicke, and in great daunger of death, he ſodainely went into MACEDON, onely to inuade it, and to make prey thereof: howbeit he had in deede almoſt taken the whole realme, and made him ſelfe Lord of all without ſtroke ſtriken. For he came as farre as the city of EDESSA, and found no reſiſtance: but rather to the contrary, many of the country willingly came to his campe, and ſubmitted them ſelues. The daunger Demetrius was in to looſe his realme, did moue him more: then the diſeaſe and ſickenes of his body. And on the other ſide, his friends, ſeruaunts, and Captaines, hauing gathered a great number of men of warre together in a maruellous ſhort time, marched with great ſpeede towards Pyrrus, being earneſtly bent to do ſome exploite againſt him: who being come into MACEDON but to make a road only vpon them, would not tary them, but fled, and flying, loſt part of his men, becauſe the MACEDONIANS followed him hard, & ſet vpon him by the way. But now, though they had driuen Pyrrus thus eaſily out of MACEDON, Demetrius for al that did not make light accompt of him: but pretending greater thinges, (as to recouer the landes and dominions of his father, with an army of an hundred thouſand fighting men, and of fiue hundred ſaile which he put to the ſea) would not ſtand to make wars againſt Pyrrus, neither yet leaue the MACEDONIANS (whileſt he was abſent) ſo dangerous a neighbour, and ſo ill to deale withall. But lacking leyſure to make warres with Pyrrus, concluded a peace with him, to the end he might with the more liberty ſet vpon the other kings. Thus now, the peace concluded betwixt Demetrius and Pyrrus, the other kinges and princes beganne to finde out Demetrius intent, and why he had made ſo great preparation: and being afrayed thereof, wrote vnto Pyrrus by their Ambaſſadors, that they wondred how he could let go ſuch oportunity and occaſion, and to tary til Demetrius might with better leyſure make warres vpon him. And why he choſe rather to tary & fight with him for the aulters, temples, and ſepulchers of the MOLOSSIANS, when he ſhould be of greater power, and haue no wars elſewhere to trouble him: then now that he might eaſily driue him out of MACEDON, hauing ſo many things in hand, and being troubled as he was in other places. And conſidering alſo that very lately he had taken one of his wiues from him, with the city of CORPHVE. For Lanaſſa miſliking, that Pyrrus loued his other wiues better then her, (they being of a barbarous natiõ) got her vnto CORPHVE. & deſiring to mary ſome other king, ſent for Demetrius, knowing that he of all other kings would ſooneſt bee wonne thereunto. Whereupon Demetrius went thither, and maried her, and left a garriſon in his city of CORPHVE. Now theſe other kings that did aduertiſe Pyrrus in this ſort, themſelues did trouble Demetrius in the meane while: who tracted time, and yet went on with his preparation notwithſtanding. For on the one ſide Ptolomy entred GREECE with a great army by ſea, where he cauſed the cities to reuolt againſt him. And Lyſimachus on the other ſide alſo, entring into high MACEDON by the countrey of THRACIA, burnt and ſpoiled all as he went. Pyrrus alſo arming him ſelfe with them, went vnto the city of BERROEA, imagining (as afterwards it fell out) that Demetrius going againſt Lyſimachus, would leaue all the low country of MACEDON naked, without garriſon or defence. And the ſelfe ſame night that Pyrrus departed, he imagined that king Alexander the great did cal him, and alſo that he went vnto him, and found him ſicke in his bed, of whom he had very good wordes and entertainement: inſomuch as he promiſed to helpe him throughly. And Pyrrus imagined alſo that he was ſo bold to demaund of him againe: how (my Lord) can you helpe me, that lie ſicke in your bed? and that Alexander made aunſwer: with my name onely. And that moreouer he ſodainely therewithall got vp on his horſe Niſea, & rode before Pyrrus to guide him the way. This viſion he had in his dreame, which made him bolde, and furthermore encouraged him to goe on with his enterpriſe. By which occaſion, marching forward with all ſpeede, in few daies he ended his entended iorney to the city of BERROEA, which ſodainely he tooke at his firſt comming to it: the moſt part of his army he layed in garriſon there, the reſidue hee ſent away vnder the conduct of his Captaines, here and there, to conquer the cities thereabouts. Demetrius hauing intelligence hereof, and hearing alſo an ill rumor that ranne in his campe amongſt the MACEDONIANS, durſt not lead them any further, for feare leaſt (when hee ſhould come neare to Lyſimachus being a MACEDONIAN king by nation, and a prince eſteemed for a famous captaine) they would ſhrinke from him, and take Lyſimachus part: for this cauſe therefore he turned againe vpon the ſodaine againſt Pyrrus, as againſt a ſtrange prince, and ill beloued of the MACEDONIANS. But when he came to encampe neare him, many comming from BERROEA into his campe, blew abroad the praiſes of Pyrrus, ſaying, that he was a noble prince, inuincible in wars, and one that curteouſly intreated all thoſe he tooke to his party: and amongeſt thoſe, there were other that were no natural MACEDONIANS born, but ſet on by Pyrrus, and fained themſelues to be MACEDONIANS, who gaue out, that now occaſion was offered to ſet them at liberty, from Demetrius proud and ſtately rule, and to take king Pyrrus part, that was a curteous prince, and one that loued ſouldiers and men of war. Theſe words made the moſt part of Demetrius army very doubtfull, inſomuch as the MACEDONIANS looked about, to ſee if they could finde out Pyrrus to yeeld themſelues vnto him. He had at that preſent left off his head peece: by mean whereof, perceiuing he was not knowen, he put it on againe, and then they knew him a far off, by the ſight of his goodly faire plume, and the goates hornes which he caried on the toppe of his creaſt. Whereupon there came a great number of MACEDONIANS to his part, as vnto their ſoueraigne Lord and king, and required the watch word of him. Other put garlandes of oken boughs about their heads, becauſe they ſaw his men crowned after that ſort. And ſome were ſo bold alſo, as to goe to Demetrius him ſelfe, and tell him, that in their opinions he ſhould do very well and wiſely to giue place to fortune, and referre all vnto Pyrrus. Demetrius hereupon, ſeeing his campe in ſuch vprore, was ſo amaſed, that he knew not what way to take, but ſtole away ſecretly, diſguiſed in a thred bare cloke, and a hoode on his head to keepe him frõ knowledge. Pyrrus forthwith ſeazed vppon his campe, tooke all that hee found, and was preſentlie proclaimed in the field, king of MACEDON. Lyſimachus on thother ſide, came ſtraight thither after him, and ſayed that hee had holpen to chaſe Demetrius out of his realme, and therefore claimed halfe the kingdome with him. Wherefore, Pyrrus not truſting the MACEDONIANS too farre as yet, but rather ſtanding in doubt of their faith: graunted Lyſimachus his deſire, and thereupon deuided all the cities and prouinces of the realme of MACEDON betweene them. This partition was profitable for them both at that preſent, and ſtoode then to good purpoſe to pacifie the warre, that otherwiſe might ſodainly haue riſen betweene them. But ſhortly after, they found that this partition was no end of their enmity, but rather a beginning of quarrell and diſſention betweene them. For they whoſe auarice and inſatiable greedy appetite, neither the ſea, the mountaines, nor the vnhabitable deſertes could containe, nor yet the confines that ſeparate ASIA from EVROPE determine: how ſhould they bee content with their owne, without vſurping others, when their fronters ioyne ſo neare together, that nothing deuides them? Sure it is not poſſible. For to ſay truely, they are willingly together by the eares, hauing theſe two curſed things rooted in them: that they continually ſeeke occaſion how to ſurpriſe each other, and either of them enuies his neighbours well doing. Howbeit in apparaunce they vſe theſe two tearmes of peace and warres, as they doe money: vſing it as they thinke good, not according to right and iuſtice, but for their priuate profite. And truely they are men of farre greater honeſty, that make open warre, and auow it: then thoſe that diſguiſe and colour the delay of their wicked purpoſe, by the holy name of iuſtice or friendſhip. Which Pyrrus did truly then verefie. For deſiring to keepe Demetrius down from riſing another time, and that he ſhould not reuiue againe as eſcaped from a long daungerous diſeaſe: hee went to aide the GRECIANS againſt him, and was at ATHENS, where they ſuffered him to come into the caſtle, and doe ſacrifice there vnto the goddeſſe Minerua. But comming out of the caſtle againe the ſame day, hee told the ATHENIANS he was greatly beholding vnto them for their curteſie, and the great truſt they had repoſed in him: wherefore to requite them againe, he gaue them counſell, neuer to ſuffer prince nor king from thenceforth to enter into their city, if they were wiſe, nor once open their gates vnto thē. So, after that he had made peace with Demetrius, who within ſhort time being gone to make warres in ASIA, Pyrrus yet once againe (perſwaded thereunto by Lyſimachus) cauſed all THESSALY to riſe againſt him, & went him ſelfe to ſet vpon thoſe garriſons which Demetrius had left in the cities of GREECE, liking better to continue the MACEDONIANS in warre, then to leaue them in peace: beſides that, him ſelfe alſo was of ſuch a nature, as could not long continue in peace. Demetrius thus in the end being vtterly ouerthrowen in SYRIA, Lyſimachus ſeeing him ſelfe free from feare on that ſide, and being at good leyſure, as hauing nothing to trouble him otherwaies: went ſtraight to make war vpon Pyrrus, who then remained near vnto the city of EDESSA, and meeting by the way with the conuoy of victuals cōming towards him, ſet vpon the conducters, and rifled them wholy. By this means, firſt he diſtreſſed Pyrrus for want of victuals: then he corrupted the princes of MACEDON with letters and meſſengers, declaring vnto them, what ſhame they ſuſtained to haue made a ſtranger their king (whoſe anceſters had euer bene their vaſſals & ſubiects) and to haue turned all thoſe out of MACEDON, that had bene familiar friendes of king Alexander the great. Many of the MACEDONIANS were won by theſe perſwaſions, which fact ſo feared Pyrrus, that he departed out of MACEDON with his men of warre, the EPIROTES, and other his confederates: and ſo loſt MACEDON by the ſelfe ſame meanes hee wanne it. Kings and princes therefore muſt not blame priuate men, though they chaunge and alter ſometime for their profit: for therein they doe but follow the example of princes, who teach them all diſloyaltie, treaſon, and infidelity, iudging him moſt worthy of gaine, that leaſt obſerueth iuſtice and equity. So Pyrrus being come home againe to his kingdome of EPIRVS, forſaking MACEDON altogether, fortune made him happy enough, and in deede he had good meanes to liue peaceably at home, without any trouble, if hee could haue contented him ſelfe only with the ſoueraignty ouer his owne naturall ſubiects. But thinking, that if he did neither hurt other, nor that other did hurt him, hee could not tell how to ſpend his time, and by peace he ſhould pine away for ſorrow, as Homer ſayed of Achilles:

He languiſhed and pinde by taking eaſe and reſt:
And in the warres where trauaile was, he liked euer beſt.

And thus ſeeking matter of new trouble, fortune preſented him this occaſion. About this time, the ROMAINS by chaunce made war with the TARENTINES, who could neither beare

their force, nor yet deuiſe how to pacifie the ſame, by reaſon of the raſhneſſe, folly, and wickedneſſe of their gouernours, who perſwaded them to make Pyrrus their Generall, and to ſend for him for to conduct theſe warres: becauſe he was leſſe troubled at that time, then any of the other kings about them, and was eſteemed of euery man alſo to bee a noble ſouldier, and famous Captaine. The elders and wiſe men of the city, vtterly miſliked that counſell: but ſome of them were put to ſilence, through the noiſe and fury of the people, who cried for warres. Some other ſeeing them checked, and taken vp by the multitude in this manner, would no more repaire to their common aſſemblies. Among the reſt, there was one Meton, an honeſt worſhipfull citizen, who when the day was come that the people ſhould conclude in counſell, the decree for the calling in of Pyrrus: all the people of TARENTVM being aſſembled, and ſet in the Theater, this Meton put an olde withered garlande of flowers vpon his head, and carying a torch in his hand as though he had bene drunke, and hauing a woman minſtrell before him playing on a pipe, went daunſing in this goodly aray through the middeſt of the whole aſſembly. And there, (as it happeneth commonly in euery hurly burly of people that will be maiſters them ſelues, and where no good order is kept) ſome of them clapped their hands, other burſt out in a laughter, and euery man ſuffered him to doe what he luſt: but they all cried out to the woman minſtrell, to play on and ſpare not, and to Meton him ſelfe, that he ſhould ſing, and come forward. So Meton made ſhew as though hee prepared him ſelfe vnto it: and when they had giuen ſilence to heare him ſing, he ſpake vnto them with a loude voice in this manner. My Lordes of TARENTVM, yee doe well ſure, not to forbid them to play and to be merry that are ſo diſpoſed, whileſt they may lawfully do it: and if ye be wiſe, euery of you alſo (as many as you be) will take your liberty whileſt you may enioy it. For when king Pyrrus ſhall be in this city, you ſhall liue I warrant you after an other ſort, and not as yee now doe. Theſe words of Meton moued many of the TARENTINES, and ſodainely there ran a rumor through all the aſſembly, that he had ſayd truely. But they that had offended the ROMAINES, fearing if peace were made, that they ſhould be deliuered into their handes, they checked the people, asking them if they were ſuch fooles, as would abide to be mocked and played withall to their teeth: and with thoſe words all ranne vpon Meton, and draue him out of the Theater. The decree thus confirmed by voices of the people, they ſent Ambaſſadours into EPIRVS, to cary preſents vnto king Pyrrus, not only from the TARENTINES, but from other GRECIANS alſo that dwelt in ITALIE, ſaying that they ſtood in neede of a wiſe and skilfull Captaine, that was reputed famous in martiall diſcipline. And as to the reſt, for numbers of good ſouldiers, they had men enough in ITALIE, and were able to bring an army into the field, of the LVCANIANS, the MESSAPIANS, the SANNITES, and TARENTINES, of twenty thouſand horſe, and three hundred thouſand footemen being all aſſembled together. Theſe words of the Ambaſſadors did not only lift vp Pyrrus heart, but made the EPIROTES alſo maruellous deſirous to go this iourney. There was in king Pyrrus court one Cineas THESSALIAN, a man of great vnderſtanding, and that had bene Demoſthenes the orators ſcholler, who ſeemed to be the only man of al other in his time in common reputation, to be moſt eloquent, following the liuelie image and ſhadow of Demoſthenes paſſing eloquence. This Cineas, Pyrrus euer entertained about him, and ſent him Ambaſſador to the people and cities thereabouts: where hee verefied Euripides wordes.

As much as trenchant blades, in mighty handes may doe,
So much can skill of eloquence, atchieue and conquer to.

And therefore Pyrrus would often ſay, that Cineas had wonne him moe townes with his eloquence, then he himſelfe had done by the ſword: for which he did greatly honor and imploy him in all his chiefe affaires. Cineas perceiuing that Pyrrus was maruellouſly bent to theſe wars of ITALIE, finding him one day at leyſure, diſcourſed with him in this ſort. It is reported, and it pleaſe your maieſty, that the ROMAINS are very good men of war, and that they command many valiant and warlike nations: if it pleaſe the goddes we doe ouercome them, what benefit ſhall we haue of that victory? Pyrrus aunſwered him againe, thou doeſt aske me a queſtion that is manifeſt of it ſelfe. For when we haue once ouercome the ROMAINES, there can neyther GRECIAN nor barbarous city in all the countrey withſtand vs, but we ſhall ſtraight conquer

quer all the reſt of ITALIE with eaſe: whoſe greatneſſe, wealth, and power, no man knoweth better then thy ſelfe. Cineas pawſing a while, replied: and when we haue taken ITALIE, what ſhal we do then? Pyrrus not finding his meaning yet, ſaid vnto him. SICILIA as thou knoweſt is hard adioyning to it, and doth as it were offer it ſelfe vnto vs, and is a maruellous populous and rich land, and eaſie to be taken: for all the cities within the Iland are one againſt another, hauing no head that gouerns them, ſince Agathocles died, more then oratours onely that are their counſellers, who will ſoone be wonne. In deede it is likely which your grace ſpeaketh, quoth Cineas: but when we haue won SICILIA, ſhall then our wars take end? If the goddes were pleaſed, ſayd Pyrrus, that victory were atchieued: the way were then broad open for vs to attain great conqueſts. For who would not afterwards go into AFRICKE, and ſo to CARTHAGE, which alſo will be an eaſie conqueſt, ſince Agathocles ſecretly flying from SYRACVSA, and hauing paſſed the ſeas with a few ſhips, had almoſt taken it? And that once conquered, it is moſt certaine there durſt not one of all our enemies that now do daily vexe and trouble vs, lift vp their heades or handes againſt vs. No ſurely, ſayed Cineas: for it is a cleare caſe, that with ſo great a power we may eaſily recouer the realme of MACEDON againe, and commaund all GREECE beſides, without let of any. But when we haue all in our handes: what ſhall we doe in the end? Then Pyrrus laughing, told him againe: we will then (good Cineas) be quiet, and take our eaſe, and make feaſts euery day, and be as merry one with an other as we can poſſible. Cineas hauing brought him to that point, ſayed againe to him: my Lord, what letteth vs now to be quiet, & merry together, ſith we enioy that preſently without further trauell and trouble, which we will now go ſeeke for abroad, with ſuch ſheading of bloud, and ſo manifeſt danger? and yet we know not whether euer we ſhall attain vnto it, after we haue both ſuffered, and cauſed other to ſuffer infinit ſorrows and troubles. Theſe laſt words of Cineas, did rather offend Pyrrus, then make him to alter his minde: for he was not ignoraunt of the happy ſtate he ſhould thereby forgoe, yet could he not leaue off the hope of that hee did ſo much deſire. So he ſent Cineas before vnto the TARENTINES, with three thouſand footemen: and afterwardes the TARENTINES hauing ſent him great ſtore of flatbottomes, gallies, and of all ſortes of paſſengers, he ſhipped into them twenty Elephantes, three thouſand horſemen, and two and twenty thouſand footemen, with fiue hundred bowmen and ſlings. All thinges thus ready, he wayed anckers, and hoyſed ſailes, and was no ſooner in the maine ſea, but the north winde blew very roughly, out of ſeaſon, and draue him to leeward. Notwithſtanding, the ſhip which he was in him ſelfe, by great toile of the pilots and mariners turning to windeward, and with much a do, and maruellous daunger recouered the coaſt of ITALIE. Howbeit the reſt of his fleete were violently diſperſed here and there, whereof ſome of them failing their courſe into ITALIE, were caſt into the ſeas of LIBYA, and SICILIA. The other not able to recouer the point of APVLIA, were benighted, and the ſea being high wrought, by violence caſt them vpon the ſhore, and againſt the rockes, and made ſhipwrackes of them, the Admirall onely reſerued, which through her ſtrength, and the greatneſſe of her burden, reſiſted the force of the ſea that moſt violently beat againſt her. But afterwards, the wind turning & comming from the land, the ſea cruelly raking ouer the height of her forecaſtell: in fine brought her in manifeſt perill of opening, and ſplitting, and in daunger to be driuen from the coaſt, putting her out againe to the mercy of the windes, which chaunged euery hower. Wherefore Pyrrus caſting the perill euery way, thought beſt to leape into the ſea. After him forthwith leapt his gard, his ſeruaunts, and other his familiar friends, venturing their liues to ſaue him. But the darkenes of the night, and rage of the waues (which the ſhore breaking, forced ſo to rebound backe vpon them) with the great noiſe alſo, did ſo hinder their ſwimming: that it was euen day before they could recouer any land, and yet was it by meanes that the winde fell. As for Pyrrus, he was ſo ſea beaten, and wearied with the waues, that he was able to do no more: though of him ſelfe he had ſo great a heart, and ſtout a courage, as was able to ouercome any perill. Moreouer, the MESSAPIANS (vpon whoſe coaſt the ſtorme had caſt him) ran out to helpe him, and diligently labored in all they could poſſible to ſaue him, and receiued alſo certaine of his ſhippes that had ſcaped, in which were a few horſemen, about two thouſand footemen, and two Elephants. With this ſmall force, Pyrrus marched on his iourney to go by land vnto TARENTVM: and Cineas being aduertiſed of his comming, went with his men to meete him.

Now when he was come to TARENTVM, at the firſt he would do nothing by force, not againſt the good will of the inhabitantes: vntill ſuch time as his ſhippes that had eſcaped the daungers of the ſea, were all arriued, and the greateſt part of his army come together againe. But when he had all his army he looked for, ſeeing that the people of TARENTVM could neither ſaue them ſelues, nor be ſaued by any other, without ſtraight order and cōpulſion, becauſe they made their reckoning that Pyrrus ſhould fight for them, & in the meane time they would not ſtirre out of their houſes from bathing them ſelues, from banqueting, and making good chere: firſt of all he cauſed all the parkes and places of ſhew to be ſhut vp, where they were wont to walke and diſport them ſelues, in any kind of exerciſe, and as they walked to talke of wars as it were in paſtime, and to fight with words, but not to come to the blows. And further he forbad all feaſtings, mummeries, and ſuch other like pleaſures, as at that time were out of ſeaſon.

He trained them out alſo to exerciſe their weapons, and ſhewed him ſelfe very ſeuere in muſters, not pardoning any whoſe names were billed to ſerue in the warres: inſomuch as there were many (which vnacquainted with ſuch rough handling & gouernment) forſooke the city altogether, calling it a bondage, not to haue liberty to liue at their pleaſure.

Furthermore, Pyrrus hauing intelligence that Leuinus the ROMAINE Cōſull came againſt him with a great puiſant army, and that he was already entred into the land of LVCANIA, where he deſtroied and ſpoiled all the countrey before him: albeit the TARENTINES aide of their confederats, was not as yet come, hee thought it a great ſhame to ſuffer his enemies approch ſo neare him, and therefore taking that ſmall number he had, brought them into the field againſt Leuinus. Howbeit he ſent a herauld before to the ROMAINS, to vnderſtand of them, if (before they entred into this war) they could be content the controuerſies they had with all the GRECIANS dwelling in ITALY, might be decided by iuſtice, and therein to refer them ſelues to his arbiterment, who of himſelfe would vndertake the pacification of them. Wherunto the Conſull Leuinus made aunſwere, that the ROMAINES would neuer allow him for a iudge, neither did they feare him for an enemy.

Siris fl.

Wherefore Pyrrus going on ſtill, came to lodge in the plaine which is betweene the cities of PANDOSIA, and of HERACLEA: and hauing newes brought him that the ROMAINS were encamped very neare vnto him on the other ſide of the riuer of Siris, he tooke his horſe, and rode to the riuers ſide to view their campe. So hauing throughly conſidered the forme, the ſituation, and the order of the ſame, the manner of charging their watch, and all their faſhions of doing: he wondered much thereat. And ſpeaking to Megacles, one of his familiars about him, he ſaid: this order Megacles (quoth he) though it be of barbarous people, yet is it not barbarouſly done, but we ſhall ſhortly proue their force. After he had thus taken his view, he beganne to be more carefull then he was before, and purpoſed to tarie till the whole aide of their confederates were come together, leauing men at the riuers ſide of Siris, to keepe the paſſage, if the enemies ventured to paſſe ouer as they did in deede. For they made haſt to preuent the aide that Pyrrus looked for, and paſſed their footemen ouer vppon a bridge, and their horſemen at diuerſe fordes of the riuer: inſomuch as the GRECIANS fearing leaſt they ſhould be compaſſed in behinde, drew backe.

Pyrrus aduertiſed thereof, and being a litle troubled therewithall, commaunded the Captaines of his footemen preſently to put their bandes in battell ray, and not to ſturre till they knew his pleaſure: and hee himſelfe in the meane time marched on with three thouſand horſe, in hope to finde the ROMAINES by the riuer ſide, as yet out of order, and vtterly vnprouided. But when he ſaw a far off a greater number of footemen with their targettes ranged in battell, on this ſide the riuer, and their horſemen marching towards him in very good order: he cauſed his men to ioyne cloſe together, and him ſelfe firſt beganne the charge, being eaſie to bee knowen from other, if it had bene no more but his paſſing rich gliſtering armour and furniture, and withall, for that his valiaunt deedes gaue manifeſt proofe of his well deſerued fame and renowne.

For, though he valiantly beſturred his hands and body both, repulſing them he encountered withall in fight yet he forgate not himſelfe, nor neglected the iudgement and foreſight, which ſhould neuer be wanting in a Generall of an army: but as though hee had not fought at all, quietly and diſcreetly gaue order for euery thing, riding to and fro, to defend and encourage his men in thoſe places, where he ſaw them in moſt diſtreſſe. But euen in the hotteſt of the battell, Leonatus MACEDONIAN ſpyed an ITALIAN a man of armes, that followed Pyrrus vppe and downe where he went, and euer kept in manner of euen hand with him, to ſet vpon him. Wherefore he ſaid to Pyrrus: my Lord doe you not ſee that barbarous man there vpon a baye horſe with white feete? Sure he looketh as though he ment to doe ſome notable feate and miſchiefe with his own handes: for his eye is neuer off you, but waiteth only vpon you, being ſharpe ſet to deale with your ſelfe & none other, and therfore take heede of him. Pyrrus anſwered him, it is impoſſible Leonatus, for a man to auoide his deſtinie: but neither he, nor any other ITALIAN whatſoeuer, ſhall haue any ioy to deale with me. And as they were talking thus of the matter, the ITALIAN taking his ſpeare in the middeſt, and ſetting ſpurs to his horſe, charged vpon Pyrrus, and ranne his horſe through and through with the ſame. Leonatus at the ſelfe ſame inſtant ſerued the ITALIANS horſe in the like manner, ſo as both their horſes fell dead to the ground. Howbeit Pyrrus men that were about him, ſaued him preſently, and ſlew the ITALIAN in the field, although he fought it out right valiantly. The ITALIANS name was Oplacus, borne in the citie of FERENTVM, and was Captaine of a band of men of armes. This miſchance made king Pyrrus looke the better to himſelfe afterwardes, and ſeeing his horſemen giue backe, ſent preſently to haſten his footemen forwarde, whom he ſtraight ſet in order of battell: and deliuering his armour and cloke to one of his familiars called Megacles, and being hidden as it were in Meglaces armor, returned againe to the battell againſt the ROMAINES, who valiantly reſiſted him, ſo that the victorie depended long in doubt. For it is ſaid, that both the one ſide and the other did chaſe, and was chaſed, aboue ſeauen times in that conflict. The changing of the kings armour ſerued very well for the ſafetie of his owne perſon, howbeit it was like to haue marred all, and to haue made him looſe the field. For many of his enemies ſet vpon Megacles, that ware the kings armour: and the partie that ſlue him dead, and threw him ſtarke to the ground, was one Dexias by name, who quickly ſnatched off his head peece, tooke away his cloake, and ranne to Leuinus the Conſull, crying out alowde, that he had ſlaine Pyrrus, and withall ſhewed foorth the ſpoiles he ſuppoſed to haue taken from him. Which being caried about through all the bands, & openly ſhewed from hand to hand, made the ROMAINES maruellous ioyfull, and the GRECIANS to the contrary, both afeard and right ſorowfull: vntill ſuch time as Pyrrus hearing of it, went and paſſed alongſt all his bands bare headed, and bare faced, holding vp his hand to his ſouldiers, and giuing them to vnderſtande with his owne voice, that it was himſelfe. The elephants in the ende were they indeed that wanne the battell, and did moſt diſtreſſe the ROMAINES: for, their horſes ſeeing them a farre off, were ſore afraide, and durſt not abide them, but caried their maſters backe in deſpight of them. Pyrrus at the ſight thereof, made his THESSALIAN horſemen to giue a charge vpon them whileſt they were in this diſorder, and that ſo luſtily, as they made the ROMAINES flie, and ſuſtaine great ſlaughter. For Dionyſius writeth, that there died few leſſe, then fifteene thouſand ROMAINES at that battell. But Hieronymus ſpeaketh onely of ſeuen thouſand. And of Pyrrus ſide, Dionyſius writeth, there were ſlaine thirteene thouſand. But Hieronymus ſayth leſſe then foure thouſand: howbeit they were all of the beſt men of his army, and thoſe whom moſt he truſted. King Pyrrus preſently hereupon alſo tooke the ROMAINES campe, which they forſooke, and wan many of their cities from their alliance, ſpoiled, and ouercame much of their country. Inſomuch as he came within ſixe and thirty mile of ROME, whither came to his aid, as confederats of the TARENTINES, the LVCANIANS, & the SAMNITES, whom he rebuked becauſe they came too late to the battell. Howbeit a man might eaſily ſee in his face, that he was not a litle glad and proud to haue ouerthrowen ſo great an army of the ROMAINES with his own men, and the aide of the TARENTINES onely. On the other ſide, the ROMAINS harts were ſo great, that they would not depoſe Leuinus from his Conſulſhippe, notwithſtanding the loſſe he had receiued: and Caius Fabricius ſayed openly, that they were not the EPIROTES that had ouercome the ROMAINES, but Pyrrus had ouercome Leuinus: meaning thereby, that this ouerthrow chaunced vnto them, more through the ſubtilty and wiſe conduction of the Generall, then through the valiant feates and worthineſſe of his army. And hereuppon they ſpeedily ſupplied their legions againe that were diminiſhed, with other new ſouldiers in the dead mens place, and leauied a freſh force beſides, ſpeaking brauely and fiercely of this warre, like men whoſe hearts were nothing appauled. Whereat Pyrrus maruelling much, thought good firſt to ſend to the ROMAINES, to proue if they would giue any eare to an offer of peace, knowing right well that the winning of the citie of ROME was no eaſie matter to cōpaſſe, or attaine, with that ſtrength he preſently had: and alſo that it would be greatly to his glory, if he could bring them to peace after this his valiant victory.

The noble mind of the Romaines.

And hereupon he ſent Cineas to ROME, who ſpake with the chiefeſt of the citie, and offered preſents to them and their wiues, in the behalfe of the king his maſter. Howbeit, neither man nor woman would receiue any at his handes, but anſwered all with one voice: that if the peace might be generall to all, they all priuately would be at the kings commaundement, and would be glad of his friendſhip. Moreouer, when Cineas had talked in open audience before the Senate, of many courteous offers, and had deliuered them profitable capitulations of peace: they accepted none, nor ſhewed any affection to giue eare vnto them, although he offered to deliuer them their priſoners home againe without ranſome, that had beene taken at the battell, and promiſed alſo to aide them in the conqueſt of ITALIE, requiring no other recompence at their handes, ſauing their goodwils only to his maſter, & aſſurance for the TARENTINES, that they ſhould not be annoyed for anie thing paſt, without demaund of other matter. Neuertheleſſe in the end, when they had heard theſe offers, many of the Senatours yeelded, and were willing to make peace: alledging that they had already loſt a great battell, and how they looked for a greater, when the force of the confederates of ITALIE ſhould ioyne together with king Pyrrus power.

But Appius Claudius, a famous man, who came no more to the Senate, nor delt in matters of ſtate at all by reaſon of his age, and partly becauſe he was blinde: when he vnderſtood of king Pyrrus offers, and of the common brute that ranne through the city, how the Senate were in minde to agree to the capitulations of peace propounded by Cineas, he could not abide, but cauſed his ſeruants to cary him in his chaire vpon their armes vnto the Senate doore, his ſonnes, and ſonnes in lawe taking him in their armes, caried him ſo into the Senate houſe. The Senate made ſilence to honour the comming in of ſo notable and worthy a perſonage: and he ſo ſoone as they had ſet him in his ſeate, began to ſpeake in this ſorte.

Hithervnto with great impatience (my Lords of ROME) haue I borne the loſſe of my ſight, but now, I would I were alſo as deafe as I am blinde, that I might not (as I doe) heare the reporte of » your diſhonourable conſultations determined vpon in Senate, which tende to ſubuert the » glorious fame and reputation of ROME. What is now become of all your great and mighty » bragges you blazed abroad through the whole worlde? That if Alexander the great himſelfe » had come into ITALIE, in the time that our fathers had bin in the flower of their age, and we
» in the prime of our youth, they would not haue ſaide euery where that he was altogether inuincible, » as now at this preſent they do: but either he ſhould haue left his body ſlaine here in » battell, or at the leaſtwiſe haue bene driuen to flie, and by his death or flying ſhould greatly » haue enlarged the renowme and glory of ROME. You plainely ſhew it nowe, that all theſe » words ſpoken then, were but vaine & arrogant vaunts of fooliſh pride. Conſidering that you
» tremble for fear of the MOLOSSIANS & CHAONIANS, who were euer a prey to the MACEDONIANS:
» and that ye are afraid of Pyrrus alſo, who all his life time ſerued and followed one of » the gard vnto Alexander the great, and now is come to make wars in theſe parts, not to aide the » GRECIANS inhabiting in ITALY, but to flie from his enemies there about his own country, » offering you to conquer all the reſt of ITALIE with an army, wherewith he was nothing able » to keepe a ſmall part of MACEDON only for him ſelfe. And therefore you muſt not perſwade
» your ſelues, that in making peace with him, you ſhall thereby be rid of him: but rather ſhall
» you draw others to come & ſet vpon you beſides. For they will vtterly deſpiſe you, when they » ſhall heare ye are ſo eaſily ouercome, and that you haue ſuffered Pyrrus to eſcape your handes,
» before you made him feele the iuſt reward of his bolde preſumptuous attempt vpon you: carying
» with him for a further hier, this aduantage ouer you, that he hath giuen a great occaſion
» both to the SAMNITES, and TARENTINES, hereafter to mocke and deride you.

After that Appius had tolde this tale vnto the Senate, euery one through the whole aſſembly, deſired rather warre then peace. They diſpatched Cineas away thereupon with this aunſwer, that if Pyrrus ſought the ROMAINES friendſhippe, he muſt firſt depart out of ITALIE, and then ſende vnto them to treate of peace: but ſo long as he remained there with his armie, the ROMAINES would make warres vpon him, with all the force and power they could make, yea although he had ouerthrowen and ſlaine tenne thouſand ſuch Captaines as Leuinus was. They ſay that Cineas, during the time of his abode at ROME, intreating for this peace, did curiouſly labour to conſider and vnderſtand the manners, order, and life of the ROMAINES, and their common weale, diſcourſing thereof with the chiefeſt men of the citie: and how afterwards he made ample report of the ſame vnto Pyrrus, and tolde him amongeſt other things, that the Senate appeared to him, a councell-houſe of many kings. And furthermore (for the number of people) that he feared greatly they ſhould fight againſt ſuch a ſerpent, as that which was in olde time in the mariſhes of LERNE, of which, when they had cut off one head ſeuen other came vp in the place: becauſe the Conſull Leuinus had now leauied an other armie, twiſe as great as the firſt was, and had left at ROME alſo, many times as many good able men to carie armor. After this, there were ſent Ambaſſadors from ROME vnto Pyrrus, and amongſt other, Caius Fabricius touching the ſtate of the priſoners. Cineas tolde the king his maſter, that this Fabricius was one of the greateſt men of account in all ROME, a right honeſt man, a good Captaine, and a very valiant man of his handes, yet poore in deede he was notwithſtanding. Pyrrus taking him ſecretly a ſide, made very much of him, and amongſt other things, offered him both golde and ſiluer, praying him to take it, not for any diſhoneſt reſpect he ment towards him, but onely for a pledge of the goodwill and friendſhip that ſhould be betweene them. Fabricius would none of his gift: ſo Pyrrus left him for that time. Notwithſtanding the next morning thinking to feare him, becauſe he had neuer ſeene elephant before, Pyrrus commaunded his men, that when they ſawe Fabricius and him talking together, they ſhould bring one of his greateſt elephants, and ſet him harde by them, behinde a hanging: which being done at a certaine ſigne by Pyrrus giuen, ſodainly the hanging was pulled backe, and the elephant with his truncke was ouer Fabricius head, and gaue a terrible and fearefull crie. Fabricius ſoftly giuing backe, nothing afraide, laughed and ſaid to Pyrrus ſmiling: neither did your golde (oh king) yeſterday moue me, nor your elephant to day feare me. Furthermore, whileſt they were at ſupper, falling in talke of diuerſe matters, ſpecially touching the ſtate of GRECE, and the Philoſophers there: Cineas by chance ſpake of EPICVRVS, and rehearſed the opinions of the EPICVRIANS touching the gods and gouernment of the commonwealth, how they placed mans chiefe felicity in pleaſure, how they fled from all office and publike charge, as from a thing that hindereth the fruition of true felicity: how they maintained that the gods were immortall, neither mooued with pitty nor anger, & led an idle life full of all pleaſures and delightes, without taking any regarde of mens doings. But as he ſtill continued this diſcourſe, Fabricius cried out aloude, and ſaid: the goddes grant that Pyrrus and the SAMNITES were of ſuch opinions, as long as they had warres againſt vs. Pyrrus maruelling much at the conſtancy and magnanimity of this man, was more deſirous a great deale to haue peace with the ROMAINES, then before. And priuately prayed Fabricius very earneſtly, that he would treate for peace, whereby he might afterwards come and remain with him, ſaying: that he would giue him the chiefe place of honor about him, amongſt all his friends. Wherunto Fabricius aunſwered him ſoftly. that were not good (oh king) for your ſelfe, quoth he: for your men that preſently doe honor and eſteeme you, by experience if they once knew me, would rather chooſe me for their king, then your ſelfe. Such was Fabricius talke, whoſe wordes Pyrrus tooke not in ill part, neither was offended with them at all, as a tyrant would haue bene: but did him ſelfe report to his friends and familiars the noble minde hee found in him, and deliuered him vppon his faith only, all the ROMAINE priſoners: to the end that if the Senate would not agree vnto peace, they might yet ſee their friendes, and keepe the feaſt of Saturne with them, and then to ſend them backe againe vnto him. Which the Senate eſtabliſhed by decree, vppon paine of death to all ſuch as ſhould not performe the ſame accordingly. Afterwardes Fabricius was choſen Conſull, and as he was in his campe, there came a man to him that brought him a letter from king Pyrrus Phiſitian, written with his owne handes: in which the Phiſitian offered to poiſon his maſter, ſo he would promiſe him a good reward, for ending the warres without further danger. Fabricius deteſting the wickedneſſe of the Phiſitian, and hauing made Q. Æmylius his colleague and fellowe Conſull alſo, to abhorre the ſame: wrote a letter vnto Pyrrus, and bad him take heede, for there were that ment to poyſon him. The contents of his letter were theſe: Caius Fabricius, and Quintus Æmylius Conſuls of ROME, vnto king Pyrrus greeting. You haue (oh king) made vnfortunate choiſe, both of your friends and of your enemies, as ſhall appeare vnto you by reading of this letter which one of yours hath written vnto vs: for you make warres with iuſt and honeſt men, and do your ſelfe truſt altogether the wicked and vnfaithfull. Hereof therefore we haue thought good to aduertiſe you, not in reſpect to pleaſure you, but for feare leaſt the misfortune of your death might make vs vniuſtly to be accuſed: imagining that by trecherie of treaſon, we haue ſought to end this warre, as though by valiantneſſe we could not otherwiſe atchieue it. Pyrrus hauing read this letter, and proued the contentes thereof true, executed the Phiſitian as he had deſerued: and to requite the aduertiſement of the Conſuls, he ſent Fabricius and the ROMAINES their priſoners, without paying of ranſome, and ſent Cineas againe vnto them, to proue if hee could obtaine peace. Howbeit, the ROMAINES, becauſe they would neither receiue pleaſure of their enemies, and leaſt of all reward, for that they conſented not vnto ſo wicked a deede: did not onely refuſe to take their priſoners of free gift, but they ſent him againe ſo many SAMNITES, and TARENTINES. And furthermore, for peace and his friendſhip, they would giue no eare to it, before the warres were ended, and that he had ſent away his armie againe by ſea, into his kingdome of EPIRVS. Wherefore Pyrrus ſeeing no remedie, but that he muſt needs fight an other battell, after he had ſomewhat refreſhed his armie, drewe towards the citie of ASCVLVM, where he fought the ſecond time with the ROMAINES: and was brought into a maruellous ill ground for horſemen, by a very ſwift running riuer, from whence came many brookes and deepe mariſhes, inſomuch as his elephants could haue no ſpace nor ground to ioine with the battell of the footmen, by reaſon wherof there was a great number of men hurt and ſlaine on both ſides. And in the end, the battell being fought out all day long, the darke night did ſeuere them: but the next morning, Pyrrus to winne the aduantage to fight in the plaine field, where he might preuaile with the force of his elephants, ſent firſt certaine of his bandes to ſeize vpon the naughty ground they had fought on the day before. And by this policy hauing brought the ROMAINES into the plaine field, he thruſt in amongſt his elephants, ſtore of ſhot, and ſlingmen, and then made his army marche (being very well ſet in order) with great furie againſt his enemies. They miſſing the other dayes turnings and places of retire, were now compelled to fight all on a front in the plaine field: and ſtriuing to breake into the battell of Pyrrus footemen before the elephants came, they deſperately preaſed in vpon their enemies pikes with their ſwordes, not caring for their owne perſons what became of them, but only looked to kill and deſtroy their enemies. In the end notwithſtanding, after the battell had holden out very long, the ROMAINES loſt it, and they firſt beganne to breake and flie on that ſide where Pyrrus was, by reaſon of the great force and fury of his charge, and much more through the violence of the Elephants: againſt which, the ROMAINES valiantneſſe nor courage could ought preuaile, but that they were driuen to giue them place (much like the rage of ſurging waues, or terrible trembling of the earth) rather then tary to bee troden vnder feete, and ouerthrowen by them, whom they were not able to hurt againe, but be by them moſt grieuouſly martyred, and their troubles thereby yet nothing eaſed. The chaſe was not long, becauſe they fled but into their campe: and Hieronymus the hiſtoriographer writeth, that there died ſixe thouſand men of the ROMAINES, and of Pyrrus part about three thouſand fiue hundred and fiue, as the kings owne Chronicles doe witneſſe. Neuertheleſſe, Dionyſius makes no mention of two battels giuen neare vnto the citty of ASCVLVM, nor that the ROMAINES were certainely ouerthrowen: howbeit he confirmeth that there was one battell only that continued vntil ſunne ſet, and that they ſcarcely ſeuered alſo when night was come on, Pyrrus being hurt on the arme with a ſpeare, and his cariage robbed and ſpoiled by the SAMNITES beſides. And further, that there died in this battell, aboue fifteene thouſand men, as well of Pyrrus ſide, as of the ROMAINES part: and that at the laſt, both the one and the other did retire. And ſome ſay, that it was at that time Pyrrus aunſwered one, who reioyced with him for the victorie they had wonne: if we win an other of the price, quoth he, we are vtterly vndone. For indeed then had he loſt the moſt part of his army he brought with him out of his realme, and all his friendes and Captaines in manner euery one, or at the leaſt there lacked litle of it: and beſides that, he had no meanes to ſupply them with other from thence, and perceiued alſo that the confederates he had in ITALIE, beganne to waxe colde. Where the ROMAINES to the contrary, did eaſily renew their army with freſh ſouldiers, which they cauſed to come from ROME as neede required (much like vnto a liuely ſpring, the head whereof they had at home in their country) and they fainted not at all for any loſſes they receiued, but rather were they ſo much the more hotly bent, ſtoutly determining to abide out the warres, what euer betide. And thus whileſt Pyrrus was troubled in this ſort, new hopes and new enterpriſes were offred vnto him, that made him doubtfull what to do. For euen at a clap came Ambaſſadors to him out of SICILIA, offering to put into his hands, the cities of SYRACVSA, of AGRIGENTVM, and of the LEONTINES, & beſeeching him to aide them to driue the CARTHAGINIANS out of the Ile, thereby to deliuer them from all the tyrants. And on the other ſide alſo, newes was brought him from GRECE, how Ptolomie ſurnamed the lightning, was ſlaine, and all his army ouerthrowen in battell againſt the GAVLES, and that now he ſhould come in good houre for the MACEDONIANS, who lacked but a king. Then he curſed his hard fortune that preſented him all at once, ſuch ſundry occaſions to doe great things: and as if both enterpriſes had bene already in his hande, he made his accompt that of neceſſitie he muſt looſe one of them. So, long debating the matter with him ſelfe, which of the two wayes he ſhould conclude vpon: in the ende he reſolued, that by the warres of SICILIA, there was good meane to attaine to the greater matters, conſidering that AFRICKE was not farre from them. Wherefore, diſpoſing himſelfe that way, he ſent Cineas thither immediatly to make his way, and to ſpeake to the townes and cities of the countrie as he was wont to do: & in the meane time left a ſtrong garriſon in the city of TARENTVM, to keepe it at his deuotion, wherwith the TARENTINES were very angry. For they made requeſt vnto him, either to remaine in their countrie to maintaine wars with them againſt the ROMAINS, (which was their meaning why they ſent for him) or elſe if he would needs go, at the leaſtwiſe to leaue their city in as good ſtate as he found it. But he aunſwered them againe very roughly, that they ſhould ſpeake no more to him in it, and that they ſhould not chooſe but tary his occaſion. And with this aunſwer tooke ſhip, and ſailed towardes SICILIA: where ſo ſoone as he was arriued, he found all that he hoped for, for the cities did willingly put themſelues into his hands. And where neceſſitie of battell was offered him to employ his armie, nothing at the beginning could ſtand before him. For, with thirtie thouſand footemen, two thouſand fiue hundred horſemen, and two hundred ſaile which he brought with him, he draue the CARTHAGINIANS before him, and conquered all the country vnder their obedience. Nowe at that time, the city of ERIX was the ſtrongeſt place they had: and there were a great number of good ſouldiers within to defend it. Pyrrus determined to proue the aſſault of it, and when his army was ready to giue the charge, he armed him ſelfe at all peeces from toppe to toe, and approching the walles, vowed vnto Hercules to giue him a ſolemne ſacrifice, with a feaſt of common playes, ſo that he would graunt him grace to ſhew him ſelfe vnto the GRECIANS inhabiting in SICILIA, worthy of the noble anceſters from whence he came, and of the great good fortune he had in his handes. This vow ended, he ſtraight made the trumpettes ſound to the aſſault, and cauſed the barbarous people that were on the wals, to retire with force of his ſhot. Then when the ſcaling ladders were ſet vp, him ſelfe was the firſt that mounted on the walle, where he found diuerſe of the barbarous people that reſiſted him. But ſome he threw ouer the wals on either ſide of him, and with his ſword ſlew many dead about him, him ſelfe not once hurt: for the barbarous people had not the heart to looke him in the face, his countenaunce was ſo terrible. And this doth proue that Homer ſpake wiſely, and like a man of experience, when he ſayed: that valiantneſſe onely amongeſt all other morall vertues is that, which hath ſomtimes certaine furious motions and diuine prouocations, which makes a man beſides him ſelfe. So the city being taken, he honorably performed his vowed ſacrifice to Hercules, & kept a feaſt of all kindes and ſorts of games and weapons. There dwelt a barbarous people at that time about MESSINA, called the MAMERTINES, who did much hurt to the GRECIANS thereabouts, making many of them pay taxe & tribute: for they were a great number of them, and all men of warre and good ſouldiers, and had their name alſo of Mars, becauſe they were martiall men, and giuen to armes. Pyrrus led his army againſt them, and ouerthrewe them in battell: and put their collectors to death, that did leauy and exact the taxe, and raſed many of their fortreſſes. And when the CARTHAGINIANS required peace and his friendſhip, offering him ſhippes and money, pretending greater matters: he made them a ſhort aunſwere, that there was but one way to make peace and loue betwene them, to forſake SICILIA altogether, and to be contented to make Mare Libycum the border betwixt GRECE and them. For his good fortune, and the force he had in his handes, did ſet him aloft, and further allured him to follow the hope that brought him into SICILIA, aſpiring firſt of all vnto the conqueſt of LIBYA. Now, to paſſe him ouer thither he had ſhips enough, but he lacked owers and mariners: wherefore when he would preſſe them, then he began to deale roughly with the cities of SICILIA, and in anger compelled, and ſeuerely puniſhed them, that would not obey his commaundement. This he did not at his firſt comming, but contrarily had wonne all their good wils, ſpeaking more courteouſly to them then any other did, & ſhewing that he truſted them altogether, and troubled them in nothing. But ſodainely being altered from a popular prince, vnto a violent tyrant, he was not only thought cruell and rigorous, but that worſt of al is, vnfaithfull and ingratefull: neuertheleſſe, though they receiued great hurt by him, yet they ſuffered it, and granted him any needfull thing he did demaund. But when they ſaw he began to miſtruſt Thanon and Soſtratus, the two chiefe Captaines of SYRACVSA, and they who firſt cauſed him to come into SICILIA, who alſo at his firſt arriuall deliuered the city of SYRACVSA into his hands, & had bin his chiefe aiders in helping him to compaſſe that he had done in SICILIA: when I ſay they ſaw he would no more cary him with them, nor leaue them behinde him for the miſtruſt he had of them, and that Soſtratus fled from him, and abſented himſelfe, fearing leaſt Pyrrus would do him ſome miſchiefe: and that Pyrrus moreouer, had put Thanon to death, miſtruſting that he would alſo haue done him ſome harme. Then all things fell out againſt Pyrrus, not one after an other, nor by litle and litle, but all together at one inſtant, and all the cities generally hated him to the death, and did againe ſome of them confederate with the CARTHAGINIANS, and others with the MAMERTINES, to ſet vpon him. But when all SICILIA was thus bent againſt him, he receiued letters from the SAMNITES & TARENTINES, by which they aduertiſed him, how they had much a doe to defende themſelues within their cities and ſtrong holdes, and that they were wholly driuen out of the field: wherefore they earneſtly beſought him ſpeedily to come to their aide. This newes came happely to him, to cloake his flying, that he might ſay it was not for deſpaire of good ſucceſſe in SICILIA that he went his way: but true it was indeed, that when he ſaw he could no longer keepe it, then a ſhippe could ſtand ſtill among the waues, hee ſought ſome honeſt ſhadow to colour his departing. And that ſurely was the cauſe why he returned againe into ITALIE. Neuertheleſſe, at his departure out of SICILE, they ſay that looking backe vpon the Ile, he ſaid to thoſe that were about him: O what a goodly field for a battell, my friends, doe we leaue to the ROMAINS and CARTHAGINIANS, to fight the one with the other. And verily ſo it fell out ſhortly after, as he had ſpoken. But the barbarous people conſpiring together againſt Pyrrus, the CARTHAGINIANS on the one ſide watching his paſſage, gaue him battell on the ſea, in the very ſtraight it ſelfe of MESSINA, where he loſt many of his ſhips, and fled with the reſt, & took the coaſt of ITALIE. And there the MAMERTINES on the other ſide, being gone thither before, to the number of eighteene thouſand fighting men: durſt not preſent him battell in open field, but taried for him in certaine ſtraights of the mountaines, and in very hard places, and ſo ſet vpon his rereward, and diſordered all his army. They ſlew two of his elephants, and cutte off a great number of his rereward, ſo as he was compelled him ſelfe in perſon to come from his vangard, to helpe them againſt the barbarous people, which were luſty valiant men, and old trained ſouldiers. And there Pyrrus caught a blow on his head with a ſword, and was in great danger: inſomuch as he was forced to retire out of the preaſe and fight, which did ſo much the more encorage his enemies. Among which there was one more aduenturous then the reſt, a goodly man of perſonage,fayre armed in white armour, who aduauncing himſelfe farre before his company, cried out to the king with a bold and fierce voice,and chalenged him to fight with him if he were aliue. Pyrrus being mad as it were with this brauery,turned againe with his gard, in ſpight of his men, hurte as he was. And beſides that, he was all on a fire with choller, and his face al bloody and terrible to behold,he went through his men,and came at the length to this barbarous villaine that had chalenged him: and gaue him ſuch a blow on his head with all his force & power,that what by the ſtrength of his arme,& through the goodnes of the temper and mettle of the ſword,the blow claue his head right in the middeſt, downe to the ſhoulders: ſo that his heade being thus deuided, the one parte fell on the one ſhoulder, & the other part on the other. This matter ſodainely ſtayed the barbarous people, and kept them from going any further, they were ſo afrayde and amaſed both to ſee ſo great a blow with ones hande,and it made them thinke indeede that Pyrrus was more then a man. After that,they let him go,and troubled him no more. Pyrrus holding on his iorney,arriued at the length in the city of TARENTVM,with twenty thouſand footmen,and three thouſand horſe. And with theſe (ioyning therto the choiceſt picked men of the TARENTINES) he went incontinently into the field to ſeeke out he ROMAINES,who had their camp within the territories of the SAMNITES,which were thẽ in very hard ſtate. For their hartes were killed,becauſe that in many battels & encounters with the ROMAINES,they were euer ouerthrowen. They were very angry beſides with Pyrrus,for that he had forſaken them,to go his voyage vnto SICILIA, by reaſon whereof there came no great number of ſouldiers into his campe. But notwithſtanding,he deuided all his ſtrength into two partes,whereof he ſent the one part into LVCANIA, to occupy one of the ROMAINE Conſulles that was there, to the end he ſhould not come to ayde his companion: and with the other part he went himſelfe againſt Manius Curius,who lay in a very ſtrange place of aduantage neere to the cittie of BENEVENTO, attending the aide that ſhould come to him out of LVCANIA,beſides alſo that the Soothſayers(by the ſignes and tokens of the birdes and ſacrifices) did counſell him not to ſtur from thence. Pyrrus to the contrary,deſiring to fight with Manius before his ayde came vnto him,which he looked for out of LVCANIA,took with him the beſt ſouldiers he had in al his army, and the warlikeſt elephants, and marched away in the night, ſuppoſing to ſteale vpon Manius on the ſodaine,and giue an aſſault vnto his campe. Now Pyrrus hauing a long way to go,and through a woddy country,his lights and torches failed him,by reaſon whereof many of his ſouldiers loſt their way,and they loſt a great deale of time alſo,before they could again be gathered together: ſo as in this ſpace the night was ſpent,and the day once broken,the enemies perceiued plainely how he came downe the hils. This at the firſt ſight made thẽ muſe a while, and put them in a litle feare: neuertheleſſe Manius hauing had the ſignes of the ſacrifices fauorable,and ſeing that occaſion did preſſe him to it, went out into the field, and ſet vpon the voward of his enemies,and made them turne their backes. The which feared all the reſt in ſuch wiſe, that there were ſlaine a great number of them in the field,and certaine elephantes alſo taken. This victory made Manius Curius leaue his ſtrength; and come into the plaine field,where he ſet his men in battel ray, and ouerthrew his enemies by plaine force on the one ſide: but on the other he was repulſed by violence of the elephants, and compelled to draw backe into his own campe, wherein he had left a great number of men to garde it. So when he ſaw them vpon the rampers of his campe al armed,ready to fight, he called them out,and they commig freſh out of places of aduantage, to charge vpon the elephantes, compelled them in a very ſhort time to turne their backes,& flie through their owne men, whom they put to great trouble,and diſorder: ſo as in the end, the whole victory fell vpon the ROMAINES ſide,and conſequently by meanes of that victory, followed the greatnes and power of their Empire. For the ROMAINES being growen more couragious by this battel and hauing increaſed their force,and wonne the reputation of men vnconquerable: immediatly after conquered all ITALIE beſides,and ſoone after that, all SICILIA. To this end as you ſee, came king Pyrrus vaine hope he had to conquer ITALIE & SICILIA,after he had ſpent ſixe yeres continually in warres,during which time his good fortune decayed, & his army conſumed. Notwithſtãding,his noble courage remained alwaies inuincible, what loſſes ſoeuer he had ſuſtained: and moreouer whileſt he liued, he was euer eſteemed the chiefeſt of all the kings & princes in his time, as well for his experience and ſufficiency in warres, as alſo for the valiantnes and hardines of his perſon. But what he wanne by famous deeds, he loſt by vaine hopes: deſiring ſo earneſtly that which he had not, as he forgot to keepe that which he had. Wherefore Antigonus compared him vnto a dice player that caſteth well but cannot vſe his lucke. Now hauing brought backe againe with him into EPIRVS, eight thouſand footemen, and fiue hundreth horſemen, and being without money to pay them, he deuiſed with himſelfe to ſeeke out ſome new warre to entertaine thoſe ſouldiers, and keepe them together. Wherefore vpon a new aide of certaine GAVLES being come vnto him, he entred into the realme of MACEDON (which Antigonus, Demetrius ſonne held at that time) with intent onely to make a forrey, and to get ſome ſpoile in the country. But when he ſawe that he had taken diuerſe holdes, and moreouer, that two thouſand men of warre of the country came and yeelded themſelues vnto him: he beganne to hope of better ſucceſſe, then at the firſt he looked for. For vpon that hope he marched againſt king Antigonus ſelfe, whom he met in a very ſtraight valley, and at his firſt cõming, gaue ſuch a luſty charge vpon his rereward, that he put all Antigonus army in great diſorder. For Antigonus had placed the GAVLES in the rereward of his army to cloſe it in, which were a conuenient number, and did valiantly defend the firſt charge: and the skirmiſh was ſo hotte, that the moſt of them were ſlaine. After them, the leaders of the elephants perceiuing they were enuironed on euery ſide, yeelded themſelues and their beaſtes. Pyrrus ſeing his power to be now increaſed, with ſuch a ſupply, truſting more to his good fortune, then any good reaſon might moue him: thruſt further into the battell of the MACEDONIANS, who were all afraide, and troubled for the ouerthrow of their rereward, ſo as they would not once baſe their pikes, nor fight againſt him. He for his part holding vp his hand, and calling the Captaines of the bands by their names, ſtraight wayes made all the footmen of Antigonus turne wholly to his ſide: who flying ſaued himſelfe with a fewe horſemen, and kept certaine of the citties in his realme vpon the ſea coaſt. But Pyrrus in all his proſperitie iudging nothing more to redound to his honour and glory, then the ouerthrow of the GAVLES, layed aſide their goodlieſt and richeſt ſpoyles, and offred vp the ſame in the temple of Minerua Itonida, with this inſcription.

Immediatly after this battell, all the cities of the realme of MACEDON yeelded vnto him: but when he had the citie of ÆGES in his power, he vſed the inhabitants thereof very hardly, & ſpecially becauſe he left a great garriſõ of the GAVLES there which he had in pay. This nation is extreame couetous, as then they ſhewed themſelues: for they ſpared not to breake vp the tombes wherein the kings of MACEDON lay buried there, tooke away all the gold & ſiluer they could finde, and afterwards with great inſolency caſt out their bones into the open winde. Pyrrus was tolde it, but he lightly paſſed it ouer, and made no reckoning of it: either becauſe he deferred it till another time, by reaſon of the warres he had then in hande: or elſe for that he durſt not medle with puniſhing of theſe barbarous people at that time. But whatſoeuer the matter was, the MACEDONIANS were very angry with Pyrrus, and blamed him greatly for it. Furthermore, hauing not yet made all things ſure in MACEDON, not being fully poſſeſt of the ſame: new toyes and hope came into his head, and mocking Antigonus ſayd, he was a mad man to go apparelled in purple like a king, when a poore cloke might become him like a priuate man. Now, Cleonymus king of SPARTA being come to procure him, to bring his army into the coũtry of LACEDÆMON, Pyrrus was very willing to it. This Cleonymus was of the blud royall of SPARTA, but becauſe he was a cruel man & would do al things by authority, they loued him not at SPARTA, nor truſted him at all: and therefore did they put him out, & made Areus king, a very quiet man And this was the oldeſt quarrell Cleonymus had againſt the cõmon wealth of SPARTA: but beſides that, he had another priuate quarrell, which grew vpon this cauſe. In his old yeares, Cleonymus had maried a faire yoũg lady called Chelidonide, which was alſo of the blood royall, & the daughter of Leotychides. This lady being fallen extreamely in loue with Acrotatus, king Areus ſonne, a goodly yong gentleman, and in his luſty youth, ſhe greatly vexed and diſhonored her husband Cleonymus, who was ouer heade and eares in loue and ielouſie with her: for there was not one in all SPARTA, but planely knew that his wife made none account of him. And thus his home ſorrowes, being ioyned with his outward common grieues, euen for ſpight, deſiring a reuenge, in choller he went to procure Pyrrus to come vnto SPARTA, to reſtore him againe to his kingdome. Hereupon he brought him into LACEDÆMONIA forthwith, with fiue & twenty thouſand footmen, two thouſand horſe, and foure and twenty elephantes: by which preparation, though by nothing elſe, the world might plainely ſee, that Pyrrus came with a minde not to reſtore Cleonymus againe vnto SPARTA, but of intẽt to conquer for himſelfe (if he could) all the coũtrie of PELOPONNESVS. For in words he denied it to the LACEÆDMONIANS themſelues, who ſent Ambaſſadors vnto him, when he was in the city of MEGALOPOLIS, where he told them that he was come into PEIOPONNESVS, to ſet the townes and cities at libertie which Antigonus kept in bondage: & that his true intent and meaning was to ſend his young ſonnes into SPARTA (ſo they would be contẽted) to the end they might be trained after the LACONIAN manner, and from their youth haue this aduantage aboue all other kings, to haue beene well brought vp. But fayning theſe things, and abuſing thoſe that came to meete him on his way, they tooke no heede of him, till he came within the coaſt of LACONIA, into the which he was no ſooner entred, but he began to ſpoyle and waſt the whole country. And when the Ambaſſadors of SPARTA reproued and found fault with him, for that he made warres vpon them in ſuch ſort, before he had openly proclaimed it: he made them anſwer: no more haue you your ſelues vſed to proclaime that, which you purpoſed to do to others. Then one of the Ambaſſadors called Mandricidas: replied again vnto him in the LACONIAN tongue. If thou be a god, thou wilt doe vs no hurte, becauſe we haue not offended thee: and if thou be a man, thou ſhalt meete with another that ſhalbe better then thy ſelfe. Then he marched directly to SPARTA, where Cleonymus gaue him counſell euen at the firſt, to aſſault it. But he would not ſo do fearing (as they ſayed) that if he did it by night, his ſouldiers would ſacke the city: and ſayed it ſhould be time enough to aſſault it the next day at broad day light, becauſe there were but few men within the town, and beſide they were very ill prouided. And furthermore, king Areus himſelfe was not there, but gone into CRETA to aide the GORTYNIANS, who had warres in his owne country. And doubtles, that only was the ſauing of SPARTA from taking, that they made no reckning to aſſault it hotly: becauſe they thought it was not able to make reſiſtance. For Pyrrus camped before the towne, throughly perſwaded with himſelfe, that he ſhould finde none to fight with him: and Cleonymus friends and ſeruantes alſo did prepare his lodging there, as if Pyrrus ſhould haue come to ſupper to him, and logded with him. When night was come the LACEDÆMONIANS counſelled together, & ſecretly determined to ſend away their wiues, and litle children into CRETA. But the women themſelues were againſt it, and there was one among them called Archidamia, who went into the Senate houſe with a ſword in her hand, to ſpeak vnto them in the name of all the reſt, and ſayd. That they did their wiues great wrong, if they thought them ſo fainte harted, as to liue after SPARTA were deſtroyed. Afterwards it was agreed in councell, that they ſhould caſt a trench before the enemies campe, and that at both the endes of the ſame they ſhould bury cartes in the ground vnto the middeſt of the wheeles, to the end that being faſt ſet in the ground, they ſhould ſtay the elephantes, and keepe them from paſſing further. And when they began to go in hand withall, there came wiues and maydes vnto them, ſome of them their clothes girt vp round about them, and others all in their ſmockes, to worke at this trench with the olde men, aduiſing the young men that ſhould fight the next morning, to reſt themſelues in the meane while. So the women tooke the third parte of the trench to taske, which was ſixe cubites broade, foure cubits deepe, and eight hundreth foote long as Philarchus ſayeth or litle leſſe as Hyeronimus writeth. Then when the breake of day appeared, & the enemies remoued to come to the aſſault: the women themſelues fecthed the weapons which they put into the young mens hands, and deliuered them the taske of the trench ready made, which they before had vndertaken, praying them valiantly to keepe and defend it, telling them withall, how great a pleaſure it is to ouercome the enemies, fighting in view and ſight of their natiue country, & what great felicity and honor it is to die in the armes of his mother and wife, after he hath fought valiantly like an honeſt man, & worthy of the magnanimity of SPARTA. But Chelidonida being gone a ſide, had tyed a halter with a riding knot about her necke, ready to ſtrangle & hang herſelfe, rather thẽ to fall into the hands of Cleonymus, if by chance the city ſhould come to be taken. Now Pyrrus marched in perſon with his battell of footemen, againſt the front of the SPARTANS, who being a great number alſo, did tarry his comming on the other ſide of the trench: the which, beſides that it was very ill to paſſe ouer, did let the ſouldiers alſo to fight ſteadily in order of battell, becauſe the earth being newly caſt vp, did yeeld vnder their feet. Wherefore, Ptolomie king Pyrrus ſonne, paſſing all alongſt the trẽch ſide with two thouſand GAVLES, & all the choice men of the CHAONIANS, aſſayed if he could get ouer to the other ſide at one of the endes of the trench where the cartes were: which being ſet very deepe into the ground, and one ioyned vnto another, they did not only hinder the aſſaylants, but the defendants alſo. Howbeit in the end, the GAVLES began to plucke off the wheels of theſe cartes, and to draw them into the riuer. But Acrotatus, king Areus ſonne, a young man, ſeing the daunger, ranne through the city with a troupe of three hundreth luſty youths beſides, & went to incloſe Ptolomie behind, before he eſpied him, for that he paſſed a ſecret hollow way till he came euen to giue the charge vpon them: wherby they were enforced to turne their faces towardes him, one running in anothers necke, and ſo in great diſorder were thruſt into the trenches, and vnder the cartes: inſomuch as at the laſt, with much a do, and great bloodſhed, Acrotatus and his company draue them backe, and repulſed them. Now the women and old men, that were on the other ſide of the trench, ſaw plainly before their face, how valiantly Acrotatus had repulſed the GAVLES. Wherefore after Acrotatus had done this exployte, he returned againe through the city vnto the place from whence he came, all on a goare blood: couragious and liuely, for the victory he came newly from. The women of SPARTA thought Acrotatus farre more noble and fayrer to behold, then euer he was: ſo that the all thought Chelidonida happy to haue ſuch a friend and louer. And there were certaine olde men, that followed him crying after him, go thy way Acrotatus, and enioy thy loue Chelidonida: beget noble children of her vnto SPARTA. The fight was cruel on that ſide where Pyrrus was, and many of the SPARTANS fought very valiantly. Howbeit, amongſt other, there was one named Phillius, who after he had fought long, and ſlaine many of his enemies with his owne hands, that forced to paſſe ouer the trench: perceiuing that his hart fainted for the great number of woundes he had vpon him, called one of them that were in the rancke next behind him, and giuing him his place, fell downe dead in the armes of his friendes, becauſe his enemies ſhould not haue his bodie. In the ende, the battell hauing continued all the day long, the night did ſeparate them: and Pyrrus, being layd in his bed, had this viſion in his ſleepe. He thought he ſtroke the city of LACEDÆMON with lightning, that he vtterly conſumed it: whereat he was ſo paſſing glad, that euen with the very ioy he awaked. And thereuppon forthwith commaunded his Captaines to make their men ready to the aſſault: and told his dreame vnto his familiars, ſuppoſing that out of doubt it did betoken he ſhould in that approach take the cittie. All that heard it, beleeued it was ſo, ſauing one Lyſimachus: who to the contrary ſayed, that this viſion liked him not, becauſe the places ſmitten with lightning are holy, and it is not lawful to enter into them: by reaſon whereof he was alſo afraide, that the gods did ſignifie vnto him, that he ſhould not enter into the cittie of SPARTA. Pyrrus anſwered him: that ſayed he, is a matter diſputable to & fro in an open aſſembly of people, for there is no mãner of certainty in it. But furthermore, euery man muſt take his weapon in his hand, & ſet this ſentence before his eyes,

Alluding vnto Homers verſes, which he wrote for the defence of his country. And ſaying thus, he roſe, and at the breake of day led his army vnto the aſſault. On the other ſide alſo, the LACEDÆMONINS with a maruellous courage and magnanimity, far greater thē their force, beſtirred themſelues wonderfully to make reſiſtance, hauing their wiues by them that gaue them their weapons wherewith they fought, and were ready at hand to giue meate & drinke to them that needed, and did alſo withdrawe thoſe that were hurt to cure them. The MACEDONIANS likewiſe for their parte, indeuored themſelues with all their might to fill vp the trench with wood and other things, which they caſt vpon the dead bodies and armours lying in the bottome of the ditch: & the LACEDÆMONIANS again, labored all that they could poſſible to let them. But in this great broile, one perceiued Pyrrus on horſe backe to haue lept the trench, paſt ouer the ſtrength of the cartes, and make force to enter into the city. Wherefore thoſe that were appointed to defend that part of the trenche, cryed out ſtraight: and the women fell a ſhreekng, and running as if all had bene loſt. And as Pyrrus paſſed further, ſtriking down with his owne hands all that ſtood before him, a CRETAN ſhot at him, & ſtroke his horſe through both ſides: who leaping out of the preaſe for paine of his wound, dying, caried Pyrrus away, and threw him vpon the hanging of a ſteepe hill, where he was in great danger to fall from the toppe. This put all his ſeruantes and friendes about him in a maruellous feare, and therewithall the LACEDÆMONIANS ſeing them in this feare and trouble ran immediatly vnto that place, and with force of ſhotte draue them all out of the trench. After this retyre, Pyrrus cauſed all aſſault to ceaſe, hoping the LACEDÆMONIANS in the end would yeelde, conſidering there were many of them ſlaine in the two dayes paſt, and all the reſt in a manner hurt. Howbeit, the good fortune of the city (whether it were to proue the valiantnes of the inhabitants themſelues, or at the leaſt to ſhew what power they were of euen in their greateſt need and diſtreſſe, whē the LACEDÆMONIANS had ſmall hope left) brought one Aminias Phocian from CORINTH, one of king Antigonus Captains with a great band of men, and put them into the city to aide them: and ſtraight after him, as ſoone as he was entred, king Areus arriued alſo on the other ſide frō CRETA, & two thouſand ſouldiers with him. So the women went home to their houſes, making their reckening that they ſhould not neede any more to trouble themſelues with warres. They gaue the olde men liberty alſo to go and reſt themſelues, who being paſt all age to fight, for neceſſities ſake yet were driuen to arme themſelues, and take weapon in hand: and in order of battell placed the newe-come ſouldiers in their roomes. Pyrrus vnderſtanding that new ſupplies were come, grew to greater ſtomacke then before, and inforced all that he could to win the town by aſſault. But in the end, when to his coſt he found that he wanne nothing but blowes, he gaue ouer the ſiege, and went to ſpoyle all the country about, determining to lye there in garriſon all the winter. He could not for all this auoide his deſtinie. For there roſe a ſedition in the city of ARGOS betwene two of the chiefeſt citizens, Ariſteas and Ariſtippus: and becauſe Ariſteas thought that king Antigonus did fauor his enemie Ariſtippus, he made haſt to ſend firſt vnto Pyrrus, whoſe nature and diſpoſition was ſuch, that he did continually heape hope vpon hope, euer taking the preſent proſperity, for an occaſion to hope after greater to come. And if it fell out he was a loſer, then he ſought to recouer himſelfe, and to reſtore his loſſe by ſome other newe attemptes. So that neither for being conquerour, nor ouercome, he would euer be quiet, but alwayes troubled ſome, and himſelfe alſo: by reaſon whereof, he ſodainly departed towards ARGOS. But king Areus hauing layed ambuſhes for him in diuerſe places, and occupied alſo the ſtraighteſt and hardeſt paſſages, by the which he was to paſſe: gaue a charge vpon the GAVLES and MOLOSSIANS, which were in the tayle of his army. Now, the ſelfeſame day Pyrrus was warned by a ſoothſayer, who ſacrificing had found the liuer of the ſacrificed beaſt infected: that it betokned the loſſe of ſome moſt neere vnto him. But when he heard the noyſe of the charge giuen, he thought not on the warning of the Soothſayer, but commaunded his ſonne to take his houſeholde ſeruantes with him, and to go thither: as he himſelfe in the meane time with as great haſt as he coulde, made the reſt of his army march, to get them quickely out of this dangerous way. The fray was very hotte about Ptolomie Pyrrus ſonne, for they were all the chiefe men of the LACEDÆMONIANS with whom he had to doe, led by a valiant Captaine, called Eualcus. But as he fought valiantly againſt thoſe that ſtoode before him, there was a ſouldier of CRETA called Oræſus, borne in the city of APTERA, a mã very ready of his hand, and light of foote, who running alongſt by him, ſtroke him ſuch a blow on his ſide, that he fell downe dead in the place. This prince Ftolomie being ſlaine, his company began ſtraight to flye: and the LACEDÆMONIANS followed the chaſe ſo hotly, that they tooke no heede of themſelues, vntill they ſaw they were in the plaine field farre from their footmen. Wherfore, Pyrrus vnto whom the death of his ſonne was newly reported, being on fire with ſorrow & paſſion, turned ſodainly vpon them with the men of armes of the MOLCSSIANS, and being the firſt that came vnto them, made a maruellous ſlaughter among them. For, notwithſtanding that euery where before that time he was terrible and inuincible, hauing his ſworde in his hand: yet then he did ſhew more proofe of his valiantneſſe, ſtrength, and courage, then he had euer done before. And when he had ſette ſpurres to his horſe againſt Eualcus to cloſe with him: Eualcus turned on the one ſide, and gaue Pyrrus ſuch a blowe with his ſword, that he miſſed litle the cutting off his bridle hand: for he cut indeede all the raines of the bridle aſunder. But Pyrrus ſtraight ran him through the bodie with his ſpeare, and lighting off frõ his horſe, he put all the troupe of the LACEDÆMONIANS to the ſword that were about the body of Eualcus, being all choſen men. Thus the ambition of the Captaines was cauſe of that loſſe vnto their country for nothing, conſidering that the wars againſt thẽ were ended. But Pyrrus hauing now as it were made ſacrifice of theſe poore bodies of the LACEDÆMONIANS, for the ſoule of his dead ſonne, and ſought thus wonderfully alſo, to honor his funerals, conuerting a great part of his ſorrow for his death, into anger and wrath againſt the enemies: he afterwards held on his way directly towards ARGOS. And vnderſtanding that king Antigonus had already ſeazed the hils that were ouer the valley, he lodged neere vnto the city of NAVPLIA: and the next morning following ſent an herauld vnto Antigonus, & gaue him defiance, calling him wicked man, and chalenged him to come downe into the valley to fight with him, to trye which of them two ſhould be king. Antigonus made him anſewr, that he made warres as much with time as with weapon: & furthermore, that if Pyrrus were weary of his life, he had wayes open enough to put himſelfe to death. The cittizens of ARGOS alſo ſent Ambaſſadors vnto them both, to pray them to departe, ſith they knew that there was nothing for them to ſee in the city of ARGOS, and that they would let it be a neuter, & friend vnto them both. King Antigonus agreed vnto it, and gaue them his ſonne for hoſtage. Pyrrus alſo made them faire promiſe ſo to do to, but becauſe he gaue no caution nor ſufficient pledge to perform it, they miſtruſted him the more. Then there fell out many great & wonderful tokens, as well vnto Pyrrus, as vnto the ARGIVES. For Fyrrus hauing ſacrificed oxen, their heads being ſtricken off from their bodies, they thruſt out their tongues, and licked vp their owne blood. And within the city of ARGOS, a ſiſter of the temple of Apollo Lyſias, called Apollonide, ranne through the ſtreetes, crying out that ſhe ſaw the city full of murther, and blood running all about, and an Eagle that came vnto the fray, howbeit ſhe vanquiſhed away ſodainly and no body knew what became of her. Pyrrus then comming hard to the walles of ARGOS in the night & finding one of the gates called Diãperes, opened by Ariſteas, he put in his GAVLES: who poſſeſſed the market place, before the citizens knew any thing of it. But becauſe the gate was too low to paſſe the elephantes through with their towers vpon their backes, they were driuen to take them off, & afterwards when they were within, to put them on in the dark, and in tumult: by reaſon whereof they loſt much time, ſo that the citizens in the end perceiued it, and ran incontinently vnto the caſtell of Aſpides, & into other ſtrong places of the city. And therewithall, they ſent with preſent ſpeede vnto Antigonus, to pray him to come and helpe them, and ſo he did: and after he was come hard to the wals, he remained without with the skowtes, and in the meane time ſent his ſon with his chiefeſt Captaines into the towne, who brought a great nũber of good ſouldiers, and men of warres with them. At the ſame time alſo arriued Areus king of SPARTA, with a thouſand of the CRETANS, & moſt luſty SPARTANS: all which ioyning together, came to giue a charge vpõ the GAVLES that were in the market place, place, who put them in a maruellous feare and hazard. Pyrrus entring on that ſide alſo of the citie called Cylarabis, with terrible noiſe and cries: when he vnderſtoode that the GAVLES anſwered him not luſtily and couragiouſly, he doubted ſtraight that it was the voice of men diſtreſſed, and that had their hands full. Wherefore, he came on with ſpeede to relieue them, thruſting the horſemen forwardes that marched before him, with great danger and paine, by reaſon of holes, and ſinckes, and water conduites, whereof the citie was full. By this meane there was a wonderfull confuſion amongſt them, as may be thought fighting by night, where no man ſaw what he had to doe, nor could heare what was commaunded, by reaſon of the great noiſe they made, ſtraying here and there vp and downe the ſtreetes, the one ſcattered from the other: neither could the Captaines ſet their men in order, as well for the darkeneſſe of the night, as alſo for the confuſed tumult that was all the citie ouer, and for that the ſtreetes alſo were very narrow. And therefore they remained on both ſides without doing any thing, looking for day light: at the dawning whereof, Pyrrus perceiued the caſtle of Aſpides, full of his armed enemies. And furthermore, ſodainly as he was come into the market place, amongſt many other goodly common works ſet out to beautifie the ſame, he ſpied the images of a bull and a wolfe in copper, the which fought one with an other. This ſight made him affraide, becauſe at that preſent he remembred a prophecie that had bene told him, that his end and death ſhould be when he ſaw a wolfe and a bull fight together. The ARGIVES report, that theſe images were ſet vp in the market place, for the remembrance of a certaine chance that had happened in their countrie. For when Danaus came thither firſt, by the way called Pyramia (as one would ſay, land ſowen with corne) in the country of THYREATIDE, he ſaw as he went, a wolfe fight with a bull: whereupon he ſtaied to ſee what the ende of their fight would come to, ſuppoſing the caſe in himſelfe, that the wolfe was of his ſide, becauſe that being a ſtranger as he was, he came to ſet vpon the naturall inhabitants of the countrie. The wolfe in the end obtained the victorie: wherefore Danaus making his prayer vnto Apollo Lycias, followed on his enterpriſe, and had ſo good ſucceſſe, that he draue Gelanor out of ARGOS, who at that time was king of the ARGIVES. And thus you heare the cauſe why they ſay theſe images of the wolfe & bull were ſet vp in the market place of ARGOS. Pyrrus being halfe diſcouraged with the ſight of them, and alſo becauſe nothing fell out well according to his expectation, thought beſt to retire: but fearing the ſtraightneſſe of the gates of the citie, he ſent vnto his ſonne Helenus, whom he had left without the citie with the greateſt part of his force and armie, commaunding him to ouerthrow a peece of the wall that his men might the more readily get out, and that he might receiue them, if their enemies by chance did hinder their comming out. But the meſſenger whom he ſent, was ſo haſtie and fearefull, with the tumult that troubled him in going out, that he did not well vnderſtand what Pyrrus ſaid vnto him, but reported his meſſage quite contrarie. Whereupon the young prince Helenus taking the beſt ſouldiers he had with him, and the reſt of his Elephants, entered into the citie to helpe his father, who was now giuing backe: and ſo long as he had roome to fight at eaſe, retyring ſtill, he valiantly repulſed thoſe that ſet vppon him, turning his face oft vnto them. But when hee was driuen vnto the ſtreete that went from the market place to the gate of the citie, he was kept in with his owne men that entered at the ſame gate to helpe him. But they could not heare when Pyrrus cried out, and bad them go backe, the noiſe was ſo great: and though the firſt had heard him, and would haue gone backe, yet they that were behind, and did ſtill thruſt forward into the preaſe, did not permit them. Beſides this moreouer, the biggeſt of all the Elephantes by misfortune fell downe ouerthwart the gate, where he grinding his teeth did hinder thoſe alſo, that would haue come out and giuen backe. Furthermore, another of the Elephants that were entred before into the citie, called Nicon (as much to ſay, as conquering) ſeeking his gouernour that was ſtriken downe to the ground from his backe with terrible blowes: ranne vpon them that came backe vpon him, ouerthrowing friends and foes one in an others necke, till at the length hauing found the bodie of his maſter ſlaine, he lift him vp from the ground with his troncke, and carying him vpon his two tuſhes, returned backe with great furie, treading all vnder feete he founde in his way. Thus euery man being thronged and crowded vp together in this ſort, there was not one that could helpe himſelfe: for it ſeemed to be a maſſe & heape of a multitude, and one whole bodie ſhut together, which ſometime thruſt forwarde, and ſometime gaue backe, as the ſway went. They fought not ſo much againſt their enemies, who ſet vpon them behinde: but they did themſelues more hurt then their enemies did. For if any drewe out his ſworde, or baſed his pike, he could neither ſcabarde the one againe, nor lift vp the other, but thruſt it full vpon his owne fellowes that came in to helpe them, and ſo killed themſelues one thruſting vpon an other. Wherefore Pyrrus ſeeing his people thus troubled and harried to and fro, tooke his crowne from his head which he ware vpon his helmet, that made him knowen of his men a farre off, & gaue it vnto one of his familiars that was next vnto him: and truſting then to the goodneſſe of his horſe, flew vpon his enemies that followed him. It fortuned that one hurt him with a pike, but the wound was neither dangerous nor great: wherefore Pyrrus ſet vpon him that had hurt him, who was an ARGIAN borne, a man of meane condition, and a poore old womans ſonne, whoſe mother at that preſent time was gotten vp to the toppe of the tyles of a houſe, as all other women of the citie were, to ſee the fight. And ſhe perceiuing that it was her ſonne whom Pyrrus came vpon, was ſo afrighted to ſee him in that danger, that ſhe tooke a tyle, and with both her handes caſt it vpon Pyrrus. The tyle falling off from his head by reaſon of his head peece, lighted full in the nape of his necke, and brake his neck bone a ſunder: wherewith he was ſodainely ſo benummed, that he loſt his ſight with the blow, the raines of his bridle fell out of his hande, and himſelfe fell from his horſe to the ground, by Licymnias tombe, before any man knew what he was, at the leaſt the common people. Vntill at the laſt there came one Zopyrus that was in pay with Antigonus, and two or three other ſouldiers alſo that ran ſtraight to the place, and knowing him, dragged his body into a gate, euen as he was comming againe to himſelfe out of this traunſe. This Zopyrus drew out a SLAVON ſword he wore by his ſide, to ſtrike off his head. But Pyrrus caſt ſuch a grimme countenance on him betwene his eyes that made him ſo afraid, and his hand ſo to ſhake therewith: that being thus amazed, he did not ſtrike him right in the place where he ſhould haue cut off his head, but killed him vnder his mouth about his chinne, ſo that he was a great while ere he could ſtrike off his head. The matter was ſtraight blowen abroad amongſt diuerſe: whereupon Alcyoneus running thither, asked for the head that he might know it againe. But when he had it, he ran preſently vnto his father withall, and found him talking with his familiar friendes, and caſt Pyrrus head before him. Antigonus looking vpon it, when he knew it, laide vpon his ſonne with his ſtaffe, and called him cruell murderer, and vnnaturall barbarous beaſt: and ſo hiding his eyes with his cloke, wept for pitie (remembring the fortune of his grandfather Antigonus, and of his father Demetrius) and then cauſed Pyrrus head and bodie to be honorably burnt and buried. Afterwards Alcyoneus meeting Helenus (king Pyrrus ſonne) in very poore ſtate, mufled vp with a poore ſhort cloke: vſed him very courteouſly with gentle words, and brought him to his father. Antigonus ſeeing his ſonne bringing of him, ſaide vnto him: this part now (my ſonne) is better then the firſt, and pleaſeth me a great deale more. But yet thou haſt not done all thou ſhouldeſt: for thou ſhouldeſt haue taken from him his beggerly cloke he weareth which doth more ſhame vs that are the gainers, then him that is the looſer. After he had ſpoken theſe wordes, Antigonus embraced Helenus, and hauing apparelled him in good ſort, ſent him home with honourable conuoy into his Realme of EPYRVS. Furthermore, ceazing all Pyrrus campe and army, he courteouſly receiued all his friendes and ſeruantes.

Caius Marius.

COS.

IT is not knowen what was the third name of Caius Marius, no more then of Quintius Sertorius, who had all SPAYNE in his hands at one time: nor of Lucius Mummius, he that deſtroyed the citie of CORINTHE. For this name of Achaicus that was giuen vnto Mummius, of Africanus vnto Scipio: and of Numidicus vnto Metellus: were all ſurnames giuen them, by reaſon of the conqueſts they wan. By this reaſon Poſidonius thinketh to ouercome them that ſay, that the third name the ROMAINES haue, is their proper name: as Camillus, Marcellus, Cato. For if it fell out ſo, ſaid he, then it muſt needes follow that they which haue two names, ſhould haue no proper name. But on the other ſide alſo, he doth not conſider that by the like reaſon he ſhould ſay, that women haue no names: for there is not a woman in ROME that is called by her firſt name, which Poſidonius iudgeth to be the proper name of the ROMAINES. And that of the other two, the one is the common name of all the houſe or family, as of the POMPEIANS, of the MANLIANS, and of the CORNELIANS, like as the HERACLIDES and the PELOPIDES are amongſt the GRECIANS: and the other is a ſurname taken of the deedes, or of the nature, forme, or ſhape of the bodie, or of ſome other like accident, as are theſe ſurnames, Macrinus, Torquatus, and Sylla. Euen as amongeſt the GRECIANS likewiſe, Mnemon, which ſignifieth hauing good memory: Grypos, hauing a crooked noſe: Callinicos, conquering. But as for that, the diuerſitie of cuſtome would deliuer obiection ſufficient to the contrarie, to him that liſted. And furthermore, as touching the fauour of Marius face, we haue ſeene an image of his in marble at RAVENNA, a citie of the GAVLES, which doth liuely repreſent that rough ſeueritie of nature and maner which they ſay was in him. For being borne a rough man by nature and giuen to the warres, and hauing followed the ſame altogether from his youth, more then the ciuill life: when he came to authoritie, he could not bridle his anger and cholericke nature. And they ſay furthermore, that he neuer learned the Greeke tongue, nor vſed it in any matters of weight: as though it had bene a mockery to ſtudie to learne the tongue, the maſters whereof liued in bondage vnder others. After his ſecond triumph, in the dedication of a certaine temple, hee made Greeke plaies to ſhewe the ROMAINES paſtime: and came into the Theater, howbeit he did but ſit downe only, and went his way ſtraight. Wherefore me thinkes, that as Plato was wont to ſay oft vnto Xenocrates the

Philoſopher, who was of a curriſh nature, had his head euer occupied, & too ſeuere: Xenocrates, my friend, I pray thee do ſacrifice to the Graces. So if any man could haue perſwaded Marius to haue ſacrificed to the Muſes, and to the GRECIAN Graces: (that is to ſay, that he had knowen the Greeke tongue) to ſo many famous and glorious deedes as he did, both in peace and warres, he had not ioyned ſo vnfortunate and miſerable an end as he made, through his choller and extreame ambition, at ſuch yeares, and through an vnſatiable couetouſnes, which like boyſterous windes made him to make ſhipwracke of all, in a moſt cruell, bloudy, and vnnaturall age. The which is eaſily knowen in reading the diſcourſe of his doings.

Marius parents, maners, and countrie.

Firſt of all he was of a meane houſe, borne of poore parents by father and mother, that got their liuings by ſweate of their browes. His father as himſelfe, was called Caius: Fulcinia was his mother. And this was the cauſe why he beganne ſo late to haunt the citie, and to learne the ciuilitie and manners of ROME, hauing bene brought vp alwaies before in a litle poore village called CIRROBATON, within the territory of the citie of ARPOS: where he led a hard country life, in reſpect of thoſe that liued pleaſantly and finely in the cities, but otherwiſe well reformed, and neareſt vnto the maners of the ancient ROMAINES.

The firſt iourney he made vnto the warres, was againſt the CELTIBERIANS in SPAYNE, vnder Scipio AFRICAN, when he went to beſiege the citie of NVMANTIA: where his captaines in ſhort time found that he was a better ſouldier then any other of his companions. For he did maruellous eaſily receiue the reformation of manners, and the diſcipline of warres, which Scipio aduaunced amongeſt his ſouldiers that were ill trained before, and giuen ouer to all pleaſure. And they ſay, that in the ſight of his Generall he fought hand to hand with one of his enemies, and ſlew him: vpon which occaſion, Scipio to make him loue him, did offer him many courteſies and pleaſures. But ſpecially one day aboue the reſt, hauing made him ſuppe with him at his table, ſome one after ſupper falling in talke of Captaines that were in ROME at that time: one that ſtood by Scipio, asked him (either becauſe in deede he ſtoode in doubt, or elſe for that he would curry fauour with Scipio) what other Captaine the ROMAINES ſhould haue after his death, like vnto him.

Scipio hauing Marius by him, gentlely clapped him vpon his ſhoulder, and ſaid: peraduenture this ſhal be he. Thus happily were they both borne, the one to ſhew from his youth that one day he ſhould come to be a great man, and the other alſo for wiſely coniecturing the end, by ſeeing of the beginning. Well, it fortuned ſo, that theſe wordes of Scipio (by report) aboue all things elſ put Marius in a good hope, as if they had bene ſpoken by the oracle of ſome god, and made him bold to deale in matters of ſtate and common wealth: where by meanes of the fauor & countenance Cæcilius Metellus gaue him (whoſe houſe his father and he had alwaies followed and honoured) he obtained the office of Tribuneſhip.

Cotta Conſull.

In this office he preferred a law touching the manner how to giue the voices in election of the Magiſtrates, which did ſeeme to take from the nobilitie the authority they had in iudgement. And therefore the Conſull Cotta ſtepped vp againſt it, and perſwaded the Senate to reſiſt that lawe, and not ſuffer it to be authoriſed, and therewithall preſently to call Marius before them to yeeld a reaſon of his doing. So was it agreed vpon in the Senate. Now Marius comming into the Senate, was not abaſhed at any thing, as ſome other young man would haue bene, that had but newly begunne to enter into the world as he did, & hauing no other notable calling or qualitie in him, ſauing his vertue only to commend him: but taking boldneſſe of himſelfe (as the noble actes he afterwardes did, gaue ſhew of his valure) he openly threatned the Conſull Cotta to ſende him to priſon, if he did not preſently withdrawe the concluſion he had cauſed to be reſolued vpon. The Conſull then turning himſelfe vnto Cæcilius Metellus, asked him how he liked it? Metellus ſtanding vp, ſpake in the behalfe of the Conſull: and then Marius calling a ſergeant out, commaunded him to take Metellus ſelfe, and to carrie him to priſon. Metellus appealed to the other Tribunes, but neuer a one would take his matter in hand: ſo that the Senate when all was done, were compelled to call backe the concluſion that before was taken. Then Marius returning with great honour into the market place among the aſſembly of the people, cauſed this law to paſſe and be authoriſed: and euery man held opinion of him that he would proue a ſtout man, and ſuch a one, as would not ſtoupe for any feare, nor ſhrinke for baſhfulnes, but would beard the Senate in fauour of the people. Notwithſtanding, hee ſhortly after changed opinion, and altered the firſt, by an other act he made. For when an other went about to haue a law made, to diſtribute corne vnto euery citizen without payment of any penny, he was vehemently againſt it, and ouerthrew it: ſo that thereby he came to be a like honored and eſteemed of either partie, as he that would neither pleaſure the one, nor the other, to the preiudice of the common wealth. After he had bene Tribune, he ſued for the chiefeſt office of Ædilis. Of the Ædiles there are two ſortes: the firſt is called Ædilitas Curulis, ſo named becauſe of certaine chaires that haue crooked feete, vpon which they ſit when they giue audience. The other is of leſſe dignitie, and that is called Ædilitas popularis: and when they had choſen the firſt and greater Ædilis at Rome, they preſently proceede the ſame day alſo in the market place vnto election of the leſſer. Marius ſeeing plainely that he was put by the chiefeſt of the Ædiles, turned againe ſtraight yet to demaund the ſecond: but this was miſliked in him, and they tooke him for too bold, too ſhameleſſe, and too preſumptuous a man. So that in one ſelfe day he had two denials and repulſes, which neuer man but him ſelfe before had. And neuertheleſſe, all this could not cut his combe, but ſhortly after he ſued alſo for the Prætorſhippe, and hee lacked but litle of the deniall of that: yet in the ende, being laſt of all choſen, he was accuſed to haue bribed the people, and bought their voices for money. And ſurely amongeſt many other, this preſumption was very great: that they ſaw a man of Cassius Sabacon within the barres where the election is made, running to and fro among them that gaue their voices, becauſe this Sabacon was Marius very great friend. The matter came before the iudges, and Sabacon was examined vpon it. Whereunto he aunſwered, that for the great extreame heate he felt, he was very dry, and asked for colde water to drinke, and that this man had brought him ſome in a potte where he was, howbeit that he went his way as ſoone as euer he had drunke. This Sabacon was afterwardes put out of the Senate by the next Cenſors, and many iudge that he was worthy of this infamie, for that he was periured in iudgement, or becauſe he was ſo ſubiect and giuen to his pleaſure. Caius Herennius was alſo called for a witneſſe againſt Marius: but he did alleage for his excuſe, that the law and cuſtome did diſpence with the Patrone, to be a witnes againſt his follower & client, and he was quit by the iudges. For the Romaines alwaies call thoſe Patrons, who take the protection of meaner then them ſelues into their handes: ſaying, that Marius predeceſſors, and Marius himſelfe, had euer bene followers of the houſe of the Herennians. The iudges receiued his aunſwere, and allowed thereof. But Marius ſpake againſt it, alleaging, that ſince he had receiued this honor to beare office in the common wealth, he was now growen from this baſe condition, to be any more a follower of any man: the which was not true in all. For euery office of a Magiſtrate doth not exempt him that hath the office, nor yet his poſteritie to be vnder the patronage of another, nor doth diſcharge him from the dutie of honoring them: but of neceſſity he muſt be a Magiſtrate, which the lawe doth permit to ſit in the crooked chaire called Curulis, that is to ſay, caried vppon a charet through the citie. But notwithſtanding that at the firſt hearing of this cauſe, Marius had but ill ſucceſſe, and that the iudges were againſt him all they could: yet in the end for all that, at the laſt hearing of his matter, Marius, contrarie to all mens opinions, was diſcharged, becauſe the iudges opinions with and againſt him fell to be of like number. He vſed himſelfe very orderly in his office of Prætorſhippe, and after his yeare was out, when it came to deuide the prouinces by lot, Spaine fell vnto him, which is beyond the riuer of Bætis: where it is reported that he skowred all the country thereabouts of theeues and robbers, which notwithſtanding was yet very cruell and ſauage, for the rude, barbarous, and vnciuill manner and faſhion of life of the inhabitantes there. For the Spanyards were of opinion euen at that time, that it was a goodly thing to liue vpon theft and robberie. At his returne to Rome out of Spayne, deſiring to deale in matters of the common wealth, he ſaw that he had neither eloquence nor riches, which were the two meanes, by the which thoſe that were at that time in credite and authoritie, did carie the people euen as they would. Notwithſtanding, they made great account of his conſtancie and noble minde they found in him, of his great paines and trauell he tooke continually, and of the ſimplicitie of his life: which were cauſes to bring him to honour and preferment, inſomuch as he maried very highly. For he maried Iulia, that was of the noble houſe of the Cæſars, and aunt vnto Iulius Cæſar: who afterwardes came to be the chiefeſt man of all the ROMAINES, and who by reaſon of that alliance betwene them, ſeemed in ſome things to follow Marius, as we haue written in his life.

Marius was a man of great temperance and patience, as may be iudged by an acte he did, putting him ſelfe into the handes of ſurgeons. For his ſhankes and legges were full of great ſwollen veines, and being angrie becauſe it was no pleaſant thing to beholde: hee determined to put him ſelfe into the handes of ſurgeons to be cured. And firſt, laying out one of his legges to the ſurgeon to worke vpon, he would not be bound as others are in the like caſe: but patiently abode all the extreame paines a man muſt of neceſſitie feele being cut, without ſturring, groning or ſighing, ſtill keeping his countenance, and ſaid neuer a word. But when the ſurgeon had done with his firſt legge, and would haue gone to the other, he would not giue it him: nay ſaid he, I ſee the cure is not worth the paine I muſt abide.

Afterwardes, Cæcilius Metellus the Conſull, being appointed to go into AFRICKE to make warre with king Iugurthe, tooke Marius with him for one of his Lieutenants. Marius being there, ſeeing notable good ſeruice to be done, and good occaſion to ſhew his manhood, was not of mind in this voyage to increaſe Metellus honour and reputation, as other Lieutenantes did: and thought that it was not Metellus that called him forth for his Lieutenant, but fortune her ſelfe that preſented him a fit occaſion to raiſe him to greatneſſe, and (as it were) did leade him by the hand into a goodly field, to put him to the proofe of that he could doe. And for this cauſe therefore, he endeuoured himſelfe to ſhew all the poſſible proofes of valiantneſſe and honour he could. For, the warres being great continually there, he neuer for feare refuſed any attempt or ſeruice, how dangerous or painefull ſoeuer it were, neither diſdained to take any ſeruice in hand, were it neuer ſo litle: but exceeding all other his fellowes and companions in wiſedome and foreſight, in that which was to be done, and ſtriuing with the meaneſt ſouldiers in liuing hardly and painefully, wanne the goodwill and fauour of euery man. For to ſay truly, it is a great comfort and refreſhing to ſouldiers that labour, to haue companions that labour willingly with them. For they thinke, that their cōpany labouring with them, doth in maner take away the compulſion and neceſſitie.

Furthermore, it pleaſeth the ROMAINE ſouldier maruellouſly to ſee the Generall eate openly of the ſame bread he eateth, or that he lyeth on a hard bed as he doth, or that himſelfe is the firſt man to ſet his hande to any worke when a trench is to be caſt, or their campe to be fortified. For they doe not ſo much eſteeme the Captaines, that honour and reward them: as they doe thoſe that in dangerous attempts labour, and venture their liues with them. And further, they doe farre better loue them that take paines with them, then thoſe that ſuffer them to liue idlely by them. Marius performing all this, and winning thereby the loue & goodwils of his ſouldiers: he ſtraight filled all LIBYA and the citie of ROME with his glory, ſo that he was in euery mans mouth. For they that were in the campe in AFRICKE, wrote vnto them that were at ROME, that they ſhould neuer ſee the end of theſe warres againſt this barbarous king, if they gaue not the charge vnto Marius, and choſe him Conſull.

Theſe things miſliked Metellus very much, but ſpecially the misfortune that came vpon Turpilius did maruellouſly trouble him: which fell out in this ſort. Turpilius was Metellus friend, yea he and all his parentes had followed Metellus in this warre, being maſter of the workes in his campe. Metellus made him gouernour ouer the citie of VACCA, a goodly great citie: and he vſing the inhabitants of the ſame very gentlely & courteouſly, miſtruſting nothing till he was fallen into the hands of his enemies through their treaſon. For they had brought king Iugurthe into their city vnknowing to him, howbeit they did him no hurt, but onely begged him of the king, and let him goe his way ſafe. And this was the cauſe why they accuſed Turpilius of treaſon. Marius being one of his iudges in the councell, was not contented to be bitter to him himſelfe, but moued manie of the Councell beſides to be againſt him. So that Metellus by the voices of the people, was driuen againſt his will to condemne him to ſuffer as a traitor: and ſhortly after, it was found and proued, that Turpilius was wrongfully condemned & put to death.

To ſay truly, there was not one of the Councell but were very ſory with Metellus, who maruelous impatiently tooke the death of the poore innocent. But Marius contrarily reioyced, and tooke it vpon him that he purſued his death, and was not aſhamed to make open vaunts, that he had hanged a furie about Metellus necke, to reuenge his friends bloud, whom he guiltleſſe had cauſed to be put to death. After that time they became mortall enemies. And they ſay, that one day Metellus to mocke him withall, ſayd vnto him: O good man, thou wilt leaue vs then, & returne to ROME to ſue for the Conſulſhip, and canſt thou not be contented to tary to be Conſull with my ſonne? Now his ſonne at that time was but a boy. But whatſoeuer the matter ment, Marius left him not ſo, but laboured for leaue all he could poſsible. And Metellus after he had vſed many delayes and excuſes, at the length gaue him leaue, twelue dayes onely before the day of election of the Conſuls. Wherefore Marius made haſt, and in two dayes and a night came from the camp to VTICA vpon the ſea ſide, which is a maruellous way from it: and there before he tooke ſhip, did ſacrifices vnto the goddes, and the Soothſayer told him, that the goddes by the ſignes of his ſacrifices, did promiſe him vncredible proſperitie, and ſo great, as he himſelfe durſt not hope after. Theſe wordes made Marius hart greater. Whereupon he hoyſed ſayle, and hauing a paſsing good gale of winde in the poope of the ſhip, paſſed the ſaes in foure dayes, and being landed, rode poſt to ROME. When he was arriued, he went to ſhew himſelfe vnto the people: who were maruellous deſirous to ſee him. And being brought by one of the Tribunes of the people vnto the pulpit for orations, after many accuſations which he obiected againſt Metellus, in the end he beſought the people to chooſe him Conſull, promiſing that within few dayes he would either kill, or take king Iugurthe priſoner. Whereupō he was choſen Conſull without any contradiction. And ſo ſoone as he was proclaimed, he began immediatly to leauie men of warre, cauſing many poore men that had nothing, and many ſlaues alſo, to be enrolled againſt the order of auncient cuſtome: where other Captaines before him did receiue no ſuch manner of men, and did no more ſuffer vnworthy men to be ſouldiers, thē they did allow of vnworthy officers in the common wealth: in doing the which euery one of them that were enrolled, left their goods behind them, as a pledge of their good ſeruice abroad in the warres. Yet this was not the matter that made Marius to be moſt hated, but they were his ſtout proude wordes, full of contempt of others, that did chiefly offende the noble men in the citie. For he proclaimed it euery where abroad as it were, that his Conſulſhip was a ſpoyle he had gotten of the effeminate rich noble men through his valiantneſſe, and that the wounds which he had vpon his body for ſeruice of the common wealth, and not the monuments of the dead, nor the images and ſtatues of others, were thoſe that recommended him to the people, nor were his ſtrength. And oft times naming Albinus, and otherwhile Beſtia, both noble men, and of great houſes, who hauing bene generals of the ROMAINE army, had very ill fortune in the country of LIBYA: he called them cowardes, and ſimple ſouldiers, asking them that were about him, if they did not thinke that their aunceſters would rather haue wiſhed to haue left their children that came of them like vnto himſelfe, then ſuch as they had bene: conſidering that they themſelues had wonne honour and glory, not for that they were deſcended of noble bloud, but through their deſerued vertue and valiant deedes. Now Marius ſpake not theſe wordes in a fooliſh brauery, and for vaine glory onely, to purchaſe the ill will of the nobilitie for nothing: but the common people being very glad to ſee him ſhame and deſpight the Senate, and meaſuring alwayes the greatneſſe of his courage with his haughty fierce words, they egged him forward ſtill not to ſpare the nobility, & to reproue the great men, ſo that he euer held with the communalty. And furthermore, when he was paſſed ouer again into AFRICKE, it ſpighted Metellus to the hart, becauſe that he hauing ended all the warre, that there remained almoſt no more to take or winne, Marius ſhould come in that ſort to take away the glory and triumph out of his hands, hauing ſought to riſe & increaſe by vnthankefulneſſe towardes him. He would not come to him therefore, but went an other way, & left the army with Rutilius one of his Lieutenants, to deliuer the ſame vnto him. Howbeit the reuenge of this ingratitude, lighted in the end vpon Marius owne necke. For Sylla tooke out of Marius hands, the honour of ending this warre: euen as Marius had taken it from Metellus. But how, and after what ſort, I will repeat it in few wordes, becauſe we haue written the particularities more at large in the life of Sylla. Bocchus king of high NVMIDIA, was father in law vnto king Iugurthe, vnto whom he gaue great aide, whileſt he made warres with the ROMAINES, becauſe he hated his vnfaithfulneſſe, & feared leaſt he would make himſelf greater then he was: but in the end, after Iugurthe had fled, and wandered vp and down in euery place, he was conſtrained of very neceſsitie to caſt his laſt hope and ancker vpon him, as his finall refuge, and ſo repayre vnto him. King Bocchus receiued him rather for ſhame, becauſe he durſt not puniſh him, then for any loue or good will he bare him: & hauing him in his hands, ſeemed openly to intreate Marius for him, and ſecretly to write the contrary vnto him. But in the meane time, he practiſed treaſon vnder hand, and ſent priuely for Lucius Sylla, who then was Quæſtor (to ſay, high treaſurer) vnder Marius, and of whom he had receiued certaine pleaſures in thoſe warres. Sylla truſting to this barbarous king, went at his ſending for to him. But when he was come, king Bocchus repented him of his promiſe, and altered his minde, ſtanding many dayes in doubt with himſelfe how to reſolue, whether he ſhould deliuer king Iugurthe, or keepe Sylla himſelfe: yet at the laſt he went on with his purpoſe and intended treaſon, and deliuered king Iugurthe aliue into Syllaes handes. And this was the firſt originall cauſe of the peſtilent and mortall enmitie that grew afterwardes betwixt Marius and Sylla, and was like to haue vtterly ouerthrowen the citie of ROME, and to haue raſed the foundation of the empire vnto the ground. For many enuying the glorie of Marius, gaue it out euery where, that this acte of the taking of king Iugurthe, appertained onely vnto Sylla: & Sylla himſelfe cauſed a ring to be made, which he ware commonly, and had grauen vpon the ſtone of the ſame, how Bocchus deliuered Iugurthe into his handes. And afterwardes he made it alwayes his ſeale to deſpite Marius withall, who was an ambitious and proude man, and could abide no companion to be partaker of the glorie of his doings: and Sylla did it eſpecially at the procurement of enemies and ill willers, who gaue the glorie of the beginning and chiefe exploites of this warre, vnto Metellus, and the laſt and finall concluſion vnto Sylla, to the end that the people ſhould not haue Marius in ſo great eſtimation and good opinion, as they had before. But all this enuie, detraction, and hatred againſt Marius, was ſoone after extinguiſhed and troden vnder foote, by reaſon of the great daunger that fell vpon all ITALIE out of the Weſt: and they neuer ſpake of it afterwardes, knowing that the common wealth ſtoode in neede of a good Captaine, and that they began to looke about, and conſider who ſhould be that great wiſe Pylot, that might ſaue and preſerue it, from ſo exceeding daungerous ſtorme of warres. For there was not a noble man of all the auntient houſes of ROME, that durſt vndertake to offer himſelfe to demaunde the Conſulſhip: but Marius being abſent, was choſen Conſull the ſecond time. For Iugurthe was no ſooner taken, but newes came to ROME of the cōming down of the TEVTONS, and of the CIMBRES, the which would not be beleeued at the firſt, by reaſon of the infinite number of the fighting men which was ſaid to be in their company, and for the vncredible force and power of armies which was iuſtified to come alſo: but afterwardes they knew plainly, that the rumour that ranne abroad was leſſe, then the truth fell out indeed. For they were three hundred thouſand fighting men all armed, who brought with them alſo an other multitude as great (or more) of women and children: which wandered vp and down ſeeking countrys and townes to dwell and liue in, as they heard ſay the GAVLES had done in old time, who leauing their owne country, came, and had poſſeſſed the beſt part of ITALIE, which they had taken away from the THVSCANS. Now to ſay truely, no man knew of what nation they were, nor from whence they came: as well for that they had no friendſhip with any other people, as alſo becauſe they came out of a farre country, as a cloud of people that was ſpread all ouer GAVLE & ITALIE. It was doubted much that they came out of GERMANIE, dwelling about the North ſea: and this they coniectured by view of the greatneſſe of their bodies, and alſo for that they had darke blew eyes and red, beſides that the GRECIANS in their toungs do call theeues and robbers, Cimbri. Other ſay that Celtica, for the great length and largeneſſe of the country, ſtretching it ſelfe from the coaſt of the great Ocean ſea and from the North parts, drawing towards the mariſſes Mœotides, and the Eaſt runneth into SCYTHIA, or TARTARIA PONTICA: and that for neighbourhood theſe two nations ioyned together, and went out of their country, not that they made this great voyage all at one time, but at many ſundry times, marching yearely in the ſpring further and further into the country. And thus by continuance of time, they paſſed by force of armes through all the firme land of EVROPE: and that for this cauſe, although they had many particular names according to the diuerſitie of their nations, yet all this maſſe and multitude of people gathered together, were called notwithſtanding, the army of the CELTOSCYTHES, as who would ſay, the CELTOTARTARES. Other hold opiniō that the natiō of the CIMMERIANS, who were knowen in old time for auncient GRECIANS, the one part of them were not very great in reſpect of the whole, the which being fled (or driuē out of their country for ſome ciuill diſſention) were compelled by the TARTARES to paſſe beyond the mariſſes Mœotides, into the countrys of ASIA, vnder the conduction of a Captaine called Ligdamis. But the reſidue of them which were a farre greater number, and more warlike men, they dwelt in the furtheſt partes of the earth, adioyning vnto the great Ocean ſea, in a darke ſhadowed country, couered with wonderfull forreſtes, of ſuch length, and ſo great and thicke, and the trees ſo high, that the ſunne can haue no power vpon the ground, and they ioyne hard vpon the great forreſt of Hercynia. And furthermore, they are vnder ſuch a climate, where the pole is of ſuch a height by the inclination of the circles equidiſtant, which they call Parallelles, that it is not farre from the point that aunſwereth directly to the plummet vpon the head of the inhabitants: and where the dayes are equinoctiall. They do deuide all their time in two partes, the which giueth Homer occaſion to fayne, that when Vlyſſes would call vpon the dead, he went into the country of the CIMMERIANS, as into the country of hell. And this is the cauſe why they ſay theſe barbarous people left their owne countrys to come into ITALIE, which from the beginning were called CIMMERIANS, and afterwardes they ſay (and not without great likelyhood) that they were ſurnamed CIMBRES: howbeit that is ſpoken rather by a likely coniecture, then by any aſſured troth of hiſtory. And as for the multitude of men, the moſt part of hiſtoriographers do write, that they were rather mo, then leſſe then we haue ſpoken of: and that they were ſo hardy and valiant, that nothing could ſtand before them, they did ſo great things by the ſtrength of their handes where they fought with any, ſo violently, and ſo ſodainly, that they ſeemed to be like a lightening fire all about where they came. By meanes whereof, they met with no man that durſt reſiſt them, but ſcraped together and caried away, all that they found, hand ouer head: and there were many ROMAINE Captaines appointed gouernours to keepe that which the ROMAINES held in GAVLE beyond the mountaines, who with great armies were ſhamefully ouerthrown by them. The cowardlyneſſe of thoſe, whō they had ouercome, was the chiefeſt cauſe that moued them to direct their iourney to ROME. For when they had vanquiſhed the firſt the fought withall, and gotten great richeſſe alſo: they were ſo fleſhed by this, that they determined to ſtay no where before they had deſtroyed ROME, and ſacked all ITALIE. The ROMAINES hearing of this out of all parts, ſent for Marius to giue him the conduction and leading of theſe warres, and choſe him Conſull the ſecond time: notwithſtanding that it was directly againſt the law, that did expreſly forbid any man to be choſen being abſent, and vntill alſo a certaine time appointed had paſt betweene the vacation and election, before they could chooſe him officer twiſe in one office. Some alledged this law, of intent to hinder the election. But the people repulſed them, obiecting to the contrary: that this was not the firſt time the law had giuen place to the benefit of the common wealth, and that the occaſion offered to abrogate the law at that preſent was no leſſe, then former occaſions by the which they choſe Scipio Conſull, againſt the courſe and time appointed by the law, not for any feare they ſtood in to loſe their owne country, but for the deſire they had to deſtroy the country of the CARTHAGINIANS, by reaſon whereof the people proceeded to election. And Marius bringing home his armie againe out of LIBYA into ITALIE, tooke poſſeſsion of his Conſulſhip the firſt day of Ianuary (on which day the ROMAINES begin their yeare) and therewithall made his triūph into the city of ROME, ſhewing that to the ROMAINES, which they thought neuer to haue ſeene: and that was, king Iugurthe priſoner, who was ſo ſubtill a man, and could ſo well frame himſelfe vnto his fortune, and with his craft and ſubtiltie was of ſo great courage beſides, that none of his enemies euer hoped to haue had him aliue. But it is ſayd, that after he was led in this triumph, he fell mad ſtraight vpon it. And the pompe of triumphe being ended, he was caried into priſon, where the ſergeants for haſt to haue the ſpoyle of him, tare his apparell by force from off his backe: and becauſe they would take away his rich gold eare rings that hung at his eares, they pulled away with them the typpe of his eare, and then caſt him naked to the bottome of a deepe dungeon, his wits being altogether troubled. Yet when they did throw him downe, laughing he ſayd: O Hercules, how cold are your ſtoues He liued there yet ſix dayes, fighting with hunger, and deſiring alwayes to prolong his miſerable life vnto the laſt houre: the which was a iuſt deſerued puniſhment for his wicked life. In this triumphe were caried (as they ſay) three thouſand and ſeuen hundred pound weight in gold, & of ſiluer nigots, fiue thouſand ſeuen hũdred & lxxv. pound weight: and more in gold and ready coyne, eight and twentie thouſand and ſeuen hundred crownes. After this triumphe Marius cauſed the Senate to aſſemble within the Capitoll, where he entred into the companie with his triumphing robe, either becauſe he forgot it, or elſe of too groſſe and vnciuill arrogancie: but perceiuing that all the aſſemblie miſliked of it, he roſe ſodainly, and tooke his long Conſuls gowne, and then returned quickly againe into his place.

Furthermore Marius departing to go to the warres, thought to traine his army by the way, and to harden his ſouldiers vnto labour, cauſing them to runne euery way, making great long iourneys, compelling ech ſouldier to cary his own furniture, and to prepare him neceſſary victuals to finde himſelfe withall: ſo that euer after they made a prouerbe of it, and called ſuch as were painfull and willing to do that which they were commaunded without grudging, Marius moyles.

Other notwithſtanding, do ſhew an other cauſe and beginning of this prouerbe. For they ſay, that Scipio lying at the ſiege of the city of NVMANTIA, would not only take view of the armour and horſes of ſeruice that were in his armie, but alſo of the moyles and other beaſtes of burden, becauſe he would ſee how they were kept & furniſhed. So Marius brought his horſe and moyle to the muſter which he kept himſelfe, fatte, fayre, and very well dreſt, and his moyles haire ſo ſlike and ſmooth, and there withall ſo luſty and trimme, as none of the reſt were like vnto them. Scipio tooke great pleaſure to ſee theſe beaſtes ſo well kept, and in ſo good plighte: in ſomuch as he ſpake of it afterwards many a time and oft. And vpon his words, this manner of talke was taken vp euer after, and became a common prouerbe: when they meane to mocke any man that is painfull, and giuen to ſore labour, making as though they would praiſe him, they call him Marius moyle. Furthermore, it was a happy turne for Marius (in mine opinion) that theſe barbarous people (like in force to the beating backe of the raging ſeas) turned their firſt fury towardes SPAYNE: and that he in the meane ſpace had time and leaſure to traine and exerciſe his ſouldiers, to make them bold, and withall, himſelfe to be throughly knowen amongeſt them. For when by litle and litle they had learned not to offend, nor diſobey: then they found his rough commaunding, and ſharpe ſeueritie in puniſhing ſuch as ſlacke their duetie, both profitable and very neceſſarie, beſides that it was alſo iuſt and reaſonable. Againe, his great fury, his ſharpe wordes, and his fierce lookes, after they had a while bene vſed to them, by litle and litle they ſeemed nothing ſo fearefull to them, as to their enemies.

But the thing that pleaſed the ſouldiers more then all the reſt, was his iuſtice and vpright dealing: whereof they report ſuch an example: Marius had a nephew of his in his camp called Caius Luſius, who had charge of mẽ in the army. This Luſius was taken for a maruellous honeſt man, ſauing that he had this fowle vice in him, that he would be ſodainly in loue with fayre young boyes: and as at that time he fell in loue with a trimme young ſtripling, called Trebonius, that ſerued vnder him, and hauing many times lewdly entiſed him, and neuer could obtaine his purpoſe, at the laſt ſent for him one night by his ſeruaunt. The young man might not diſobey his Captaine being ſent for, but preſently went vnto him. When he was come into his tent, and that his Captaine did ſtriue with all his force to do him villanny: he drew out his ſword, and killed him in the place. And this was done when Marius was out of his camp: who ſo ſoone as he returned, cauſed the martiall to bring the young man before him. Many ſtepped forth ſtraight to accuſe him, but no man to defend him. Wherefore he boldly began to tell his tale himſelf, & to name many witneſſes, who had both ſeene & knowen how his dead Captaine had oftentimes offered him diſhonour, and how that he had continually reſiſted his abhominable motion, and would neuer yeeld himſelfe vnto him, for any gift or preſent he could offer him. Wherefore Marius commending him greatly, and being very glad of it, cauſed preſently one of thoſe crownes to be brought vnto him, which are vſed to be giuen to them that in a day of battell haue done ſome valiant deede, and he himſelfe did crowne Trebonius withall, as one that had done a noble act, and at ſuch a time, as good and honeſt examples were requiſite. This iudgement of Marius being caried to ROME, ſtood him to great good purpoſe towardes the obtaining of his third Conſulſhip: beſides alſo that they looked for the comming backe of theſe barbarous people about the ſpring, with whom the ROMAINE ſouldiers would not fight vnder any other Captaine, then Marius. Howbeit they came not ſo ſoone againe as they looked for them, but Marius paſſed ouer alſo the yeare of his third Conſulſhip. So time comming about againe for the election of new Conſuls, and his companion alſo being dead: he was driuen to go himſelfe vnto ROME, leauing the charge of his camp in his abſence, vnto Manius Acilius. At that time there were many noble men that ſued for the Conſulſhip: but Lucius Saturninus one of the Tribunes, who had the communalty vnder his girdle as he would himſelfe, more then any of the other Tribunes, and being wonne vnder hand by Marius, made many orations, in the which he perſwaded the people to chooſe Marius Conſull the fourth time. Marius to the contrary, ſeemed to refuſe it, ſaying that he would none of it, though the people choſe him. Whereupon Saturninus called him traytor, crying out, that his refuſall in ſuch a danger and time of neceſsity, was an apparant part to betray the common wealth. It was found ſtraight that this was a groſſe packe betwixt Saturninus and Marius, by ſuch as could ſee day at a litle hole. Neuertheleſſe, the people conſidering that their preſent troubles required Marius skill & good fortune in the warres, they made him Conſull the fourth time, and ioyned Catulus Luctatius Conſull with him, a mã that was greatly honored of the nobility, and not miſliked alſo of the common people. Marius hauing newes of the approching of the barbarous people, paſſed ouer the Alpes with great ſpeed, and fortifying his camp by the riuer of Rhone, he brought great prouiſion of all kindes of victuals thither with him, leaſt being ſtraighted by lacke threof, he ſhould be forced to come to battell at any other time, but euen as he would himſelfe, and as it ſhould ſeeme good vnto him. And where before that time the tranſporting of victuals vnto his camp by ſea was very long, and dangerous, and a maruellous great charge beſides: he made it very ſhort and eaſie by this meanes. The mouth of the riuer of Rhone had gathered together ſo much mudde, and ſuch ſtore of ſand, which the waues of the ſea had caſt on heapes together, that the ſame was become very high and deepe: ſo as the banckes made the entry into it very narrow, hard, and dangerous for great ſhippes of burden that came from the ſea. Marius conſidering this matter, ſet his men a worke while they had nothing to do, & made them digge a large trench and deepe channell, into the which he turned a great part of the riuer, and caried it to a conuenient place of the coaſt, where the water fell into the ſea by an open gulfe, whereby he made it able to cary the greateſt ſhippes that were: and beſides that, it was in a very ſtill quiet place, not being troubled with windes nor waues. The channell carieth yet his name, and is called Marius channell or trench. Theſe barbarous people diuided themſelues into two armies to paſſe into ITALIE, ſo that it fell out to the one part which were the CIMBRES, to go through high GERMANIE, and to force that paſſage which Catulus kept: and vnto the other part, which were the TEVTONS and AMBRONS, to paſſe through the country of the GENOVESIANS by the ſea ſide againſt Marius. Now the CIMBRES hauing the greater compaſſe to fetch about, ſtayed longer, and remained behind: but the TEVTONS and the AMBRONS going their way firſt, had in few dayes diſpatched their iourney they had to go, to bring them to the camp where the ROMAINES lay, vnto whom they preſented themſelues by infinite numbers, with terrible faces to behold, and their cryes and voyces farre contrary vnto other mens. They tooke in a maruellours deale of ground in length to camp vpon, and ſo came forth to defie Marius, and prouoke him to battell in open field. Marius made no reckoning of all their bragging deficiãces, but kept his men together within his camp, taking on terribly with them that would raſhly take vpon them to moue ought to the contrary, and which through impatience of choller would needs go forth to fight, calling them traytors to their coũtry. For ſayd he, we are not come to fight for our priuate glory, neither to winne two triumphes nor victories for our ſelues: but we muſt ſeeke by all meanes to diuert and put by this great ſhower of warres from vs, & this lightning and tempeſt, that it ouercome not all ITALIE. Theſe wordes he ſpake vnto the priuate Captaines which were vnder him, as vnto men of hauiour and qualitie. But as for the common ſouldiers, he made them ſtand vpon the trenches of his camp, one after an other to behold the enemies, and to acquaint themſelues with ſight of their faces, their countenaunce, and marching, and not to be afrayed of their voyces to heare them ſpeake, which were wonderfull, both ſtraunge and beaſtly: and alſo that they might know the faſhion of their weapons, and how they handled them. And by this order & ordinary viewing of thẽ, in time he made the things that ſeemed fearefull vnto his mẽ at the firſt ſight, to be afterwardes very familiar: ſo that they made no more wondring at them. For he iudged, the thing which indeede is true, that a rare and new matter neuer ſeene before, for lacke of iudgement and vnderſtanding, maketh things vnknowen to vs, more horrible & fearefull then they are: & to the contrary, that cuſtome taketh away a great deale of feare, & terrour of thoſe things, which by nature are indeede fearefull. The which was ſeene then by experience. For they being daily acquainted to looke vpon theſe barbarous people, it did not onely diminiſh ſome part of the former feare of the ROMAINE ſouldiers: but furthermore they whetting their choller with the fierce vntollerable threates and bragges of theſe barbarous brutiſh people, did ſet their harts a fire to fight with them, becauſe they did not only waſt & deſtroy all the country about them, but beſides that, came to giue aſſault euen vnto their camp with ſuch a boldneſſe, that the ROMAAINE ſouldiers could no longer ſuffer them, and they letted not to ſpeake wordes that came to Marius eares himſelfe. What cowarlineſſe hath Marius euer knowen in vs, that he keepes vs thus frõ fighting, & vnder locke & key as it were, in the gard of porters, as if we were women? Let vs therefore ſhew our ſelues like men, and go aske him if he looke for any other ſouldiers beſides our ſelues to defend ITALIE: and if he haue determined to employ vs as pioners onely, when he would caſt a trench to rid away the mudde, or to turne a riuer contrary. For therein hath he onely hitherunto employed vs in great labour, & they are the notable workes he hath done in his two Conſulſhips, whereof he maketh his boaſt vnto them at ROME. Is he afrayed they ſhould take him, as they did Carbo & Capio, whom the enemies haue ouerthrowen? He muſt not be afrayed of that: for he is a Captaine of an other manner of valour and reputation then they were, and his army much better then theirs was. But howſoeuer it be, yet were it much better in prouing to looſe ſomething, then to be idle, & to ſuffer our friends and confederates to be deſtroyed and ſacked before our eyes. Marius was maruellous glad to heare his men complaine thus, and did comfort them, & told them that he did nothing miſtruſt their courage & valiantneſſe: howbeit that through the counſell of certaine prophecies and oracles of the gods, he did expect time and place fit for victory. For he euer caried a SYRIAN woman in a litter about with him called Martha, with great reuerence, whom they ſayd had the ſpirit of prophecie in her: and that he did euer ſacrifice vnto the gods by her order, & at ſuch time as ſhe willed him to do it. This SYRIAN woman went firſt to ſpeake with the Senate about theſe matters, & did foretell and prognoſticate what ſhould follow. But the Senate would not heare her, and made her to be driuen away. Whereupon ſhe went vnto the women, and made them ſee proofe of ſome things ſhe vaunted of, & ſpecially Marius wife, at whoſe feete ſhe was ſet one day in aſſembly of the common playes, to ſee the ſwordplayers fight for life and death: for ſhe told her certainly which of them ſhould ouercome. Whereupõ this Lady ſent her vnto her husband Marius, who made great reckning of her, and caried her euen in a litter with him whereſoeuer he went. She was alwayes at Marius ſacrifices, apparelled in a gowne of purple in graine, claſped to her with claſpes, and held a ſpeare in her hand wound all about with noſegayes, and garlands of flowers tyed on with laces. This manner of geſt made many doubt whether Marius ſhewed this woman openly, beleeuing indeede that ſhe had the gift of prophecy: or elſe that knowing the contrary, he made as though he did beleeue it, to helpe her fayning. But that which Alexander the MYNDIAN wrote touching Vultures, is a thing greatly to be wondred at. For he ſayd there were two of them followed Marius in his warres, and that they euer ſhewed themſelues & miſſed not, whẽ he ſhould winne any great battell, & that they did know them by latin collers they ware about their neckes, which the ſouldiers had tyed about them, and afterwardes let them go where they would: by reaſon whereof, they did know the ſouldiers againe, and it ſeemed alſo that they ſaluted them, and were very glad when they ſaw them, & perſwaded themſelues, that it was a ſigne & token of good lucke to follow. Many ſignes & tokens were ſeene before the battell: howbeit all the reſt were ordinary ſights, ſauing ſauing that which was reported to be ſeene at TVDERTVM, and AMERIA, two cities of ITALIE. For they ſay there were ſeene ſpeares and targets in the night, burning like fire in the element, which firſt were caried vp and downe here and there, & then met together euen as men moue and ſtur that fight one with an other: vntill at the length, the one giuing back, and the other following after, they all vaniſhed away, and conſumed towards the Weſt. About the ſelf ſame time alſo, there came from the citie of PESSINVNTA, Batabaces, the chiefe prieſt of the great mother of the gods, who brought newes, that the goddeſſe had ſpoken to him within her ſanctuarie, and told him that the victory of this warre ſhould fall out on the ROMAINES ſide. The Senate beleeued it, and ordained that they ſhould builde a temple vnto that goddeſſe, to giue her thankes for the victorie which ſhe did promiſe them. Batabaces alſo would haue preſented himſelfe vnto the people in open aſſemblie, to tell them as much. But there was one Aulus Pompeius a Tribune that would not ſuffer him to do it, calling him tumbler, or iugler, and violently thruſt him behinde the pulpit for orations: but the miſchance that fell vpon Pompeius afterwards, made them the more to beleeue Batabaces words. For Pompeius the Tribune no ſooner came home vnto his houſe, but a great vehement ague tooke him, wherof he died the ſeuenth day after, as all the world could witneſſe. Now the TEVTONS perceiuing that Marius ſtirred not at all out of his campe, they proued to aſſault him: howbeit they were ſo well receiued with ſhot and ſlings, that after they had loſt certaine of their men, they gaue it ouer, and determined to go further, perſwading themſelues that they might eaſily paſſe the Alpes without danger. Wherfore truſſing vp all their baggage, they paſſed by Marius campe: at which time it appeared more certainly then before, that they were a maruellous great multitude of people, by the length of time which they tooke to paſſe their way. For it is ſaid they were paſſing by his campe, ſixe dayes continually together. And as they came raking by the ROMAINS campe, they asked them in mockery, if they would write or ſend home any thing to their wiues, for they would be with them ere it were long. When they were all paſſed and gone, and that they continued on their iorney ſtill, Marius alſo raiſed his campe, and went and followed them faire and ſoftly foote by foote, and euer kept hard at their taile as neere as he could, alwaies fortifying his campe very well, and euer chooſing ſtrong places of ſituation & aduantage to lodge in, that they might be ſafe in the night time. Thus they marched on in this ſorte, vntill they came vnto the city of AIX, from whence they had not farre to go, but they entred ſtraight into the mountaines of the Alpes. Wherefore Marius prepared now to fight with them: and choſe out a place that was very ſtrong of ſituation to lodge his campe in, howbeit there lacked water. And they ſay he did it of purpoſe, to the ende to quicken his mens courage the more thereby. Many repined at it, and tolde him that they ſhould ſtand in great danger to abide maruellous thirſt if they lodged there. Whereunto he made anſwer: ſhewing them the riuer that ran hard by the enemies campe, ſaying withall, that they muſt go thither and buie drinke with their bloud. The ſouldiers replied againe: and why then doe yee not lead vs thither, whileſt our bloud is yet moiſte? he gently anſwered them againe: becauſe the firſt thing we do, we muſt fortifie our campe. The ſouldiers, though they were angrie with him, yet they obeyed him: but the ſlaues hauing neither drinke for themſelues, nor for their cattell, gathered together a great troope of them, and went towards the riuer: ſome of them carying axes, other hatchets, other ſwords and ſpeares, with their pots to cary water, determining to fight with the barbarous people, if otherwiſe they could not come by it. A few of the barbarous people at the firſt fought with them, becauſe the moſt part of their company were at dinner, after they had bathed, and others were ſtill in the bathe waſhing themſelues, finding in that place many ſprings of hot naturall bathes. Thus the ROMAINES found many of the barbarous people making merry, & taking their pleaſure about theſe bathes, for the great delight they tooke to conſider the pleaſantneſſe of the place: but when they heard the noiſe of them that fought, they began to runne one after an other vnto the place from whence the noiſe came. Wherfore it was a hard thing for Marius any longer to keep the ROMAINE ſouldiers in from going to their helpe, for that they feared their ſlaues ſhould haue bin ſlaine of the barbarous people: and moreouer, becauſe the valianteſt ſouldiers of their enemies called the AMERONS (who before had ouercome Manlius and Cæpio, two ROMAINE Captaines with their armies,and that made of themſelues thirty thouſand fighting men) ranne to armes,being very heauy of their bodies, as hauing filled their bellies well, but otherwiſe valiant and couragious fellowes,and more liuely then they were wont to be,by reaſon of the wine they had drunke. They ran not furiouſly to fight out of order, neither did they crie out confuſedly, but marching all together in good array, making a noiſe with their harneſſe all after one ſorte, they oft rehearſed their owne name AMBRONS, AMBRONS, AMBRONS: which was,either to call one an other of them,or elſe to feare the ROMAINS with their name only. The ITALIANS alſo on the other ſide,being the firſt that came downe to fight with thē, were the LIGVRIANS,dwelling vpon the coaſt of Genuoa, who hearing this noiſe and crie of theirs,plainly vnderſtanding them: anſwered them againe with the like noiſe and crie, LIGVRIANS, LIGVRIANS, LIGVRIANS, ſaying that it was the true ſurname of all their nation. And ſo before they ioyned together, this crie was redoubled many a time on either ſide: and the Captaines of both parts made their ſouldiers crie out all together, contending for enuie one againſt an other, who ſhould crie it out lowdeſt. This contention of crying, inflamed the ſouldiers courages the more.

Now the AMBRONS hauing the riuer to paſſe, were by this meanes put out of order, and before they could put themſelues in battell ray againe, after they had paſſed the riuer,the LIGVRIANS ran with great furie to ſet vpon the formoſt: and after them,(to aide the LIGVRIANS that had begun the charge) the ROMAINES themſelues fell alſo vpon the AMERONS, comming downe from the places of aduantage vpon theſe barbarous people,and compelled them by this meanes to turne their backes,and flie.

So the greateſt ſlaughter they made, fortuned vpon the bancke of the riuer, whereinto they thruſt one an other in ſuch ſorte, that all the riuer ran bloud, being filled with dead bodies. And they that could get ouer the riuer againe,and were on the other ſide,durſt not gather together any more to ſtand to defence: ſo as the ROMAINES ſlew them, and draue them into their campe, euen vnto their cariage.

Then their women came out againſt them with ſwordes and axes in their hands, grinding their teeth: and crying out for ſorrow and anger, they charged aſwell vpon their owne people that fled, as vpon them that chaſed them: the one as traitors, and the other as enemies. Furthermore, they thruſt themſelues amongeſt them that fought, and ſtroue by force to plucke the ROMAINES targets out of their hands, and tooke holde of their naked ſwords bare handed,abiding with an inuincible courage to be hacked & mangled with their ſwords. And thus was the firſt battell giuen (as they ſay) by the riuers ſide, rather by chance vnlooked for,then by any ſet purpoſe,or through the generals counſel. Now the ROMAINES, after they had ouercome the moſt parte of the AMBRONS, retiring back by reaſon the night had ouertaken them,did not (as they were wont after they had giuen ſuch an ouerthrow) ſing ſongs of victory and triumphe, nor make good cheere in their tents one with an other, and leaſt of all ſleepe: (which is the beſt and ſweeteſt refreſhing for men that haue fought happely) but contrarily,they watched all that night with great feare and trouble, becauſe their campe was not trenched and fortified, and becauſe they knew alſo that there remained almoſt innumerable thouſands of barbarous people, that had not yet fought: beſides alſo, that the AMBRONS that had fled and ſcaped from the ouerthrow,did howle out all night with lowd cries, which were nothing like mens lamentations and ſighes, but rather like wilde beaſts bellowing and roaring. So that the bellowing of ſuch a great multitude of beaſtly people, mingled together with threats and wailings, made the mountaines thereabouts and the running riuer to rebounde againe of the ſound and eccho of their cryes maruellouſlie: by reaſon whereof, all the valley that lay betweene both,thundered to heare the horrible and fearefull trembling. This made the ROMAINE ſouldiers afeard,and Marius himſelfe in ſome doubt: becauſe they looked to haue bene fought withall the ſame night, being altogether troubled and out of order. Notwithſtanding, the barbarous people did not aſſault them that night, nor the next day following,but only prepared themſelues vnto battell. And in the meane time Marius knowing that there was aboue the place where they were camped,certaine caues and little valleyes couered with wood: he ſecretly ſent Claudius Marcellus thither with three thouſand footmen well armed,and commanded him to keepe cloſe in ambuſh, vntill he ſawe that the barbarous people were fighting with him, and that then he ſhould come and ſet vpon their rerewarde.

The reſidue of his armie, they ſupped when time came, and after ſupper repoſed themſelues. The next morning at the breake of day, Marius brought his men into the fielde out of his forte: where he put them in order of battell, ſending his horſmen before to draw the enemies out to ſkirmiſh. The TEVTONS ſeeing them come, had not the patience to tary till the ROMAINES were come downe into the plaine field to fight without aduantage, but arming themſelues in haſt, and in a rage, ran vp the hill to the ROMAINES, where they ſtood in battell ray. Marius taking good regard to that they did, ſent here and there vnto the priuate Captaines, charging them they ſhould not ſtirre, and onely to temporiſe and forbeare, vntill the enemies came within a ſtones caſt of them: and that they ſhould then throw their dartes at them, and afterwards draw their ſwords, and repulſe the barbarous people with their ſhields. For he did foreſee before, that when they ſhould clime vp againſt the hill (vpon the hanging whereof the ROMAINES had ſet their battell) that their blowes would not be of great force, nor their order and ranckes could ſtand cloſe together to any effect or purpoſe: becauſe they could not haue ſure footing, nor marche aſſuredly, but would eaſily be throwne backward if they were neuer ſo litle repulſed, by reaſon of the hanging of the hill. Marius gaue this order vnto his folke, and therewithall was himſelfe the firſt man that put it in execution: for he was as trim a warriour, and as valiant a ſouldier, as any man in all his armie: beſides, not one amongſt them all would venture further, & be more bolde then himſelfe. So when the ROMAINES had reſiſted them, and ſtaied them ſodainly, going with fury to haue wonne the hill, perceiuing themſelues to be repulſed, they gaue back by litle and litle, vntill they came into the field: and then began the formoſt of them to gather together, and to put themſelues in battell raye vpon the plaine, when ſodainly they heard the noiſe and charging of them that were in the taile of their armie. For Claudius Marcellus failed not to take the occaſion when it was offred him, becauſe that the noiſe of the firſt charge comming vp againſt the hils thereabouts, vnder the which he lay in ambuſh, gaue him aduertiſement therof: wherupon he cauſed his men preſently to ſhew, and running with great cries, came to giue a charge vpon thoſe which were in the taile of the barbarous people, putting the hindmoſt to the ſword. They made their fellowes whoſe backs were next vnto them, to turne their faces, & ſo from man to man, till at the length in ſhort time all their battell began to wauer in diſorder: and they made no great reſiſtance, when they ſaw they were ſo charged before and behinde, but began ſtraight to flie for life. The ROMAINES following them hard at the heeles, killed and tooke priſoners aboue a hundred thouſand of them, and tooke moreouer their carts, their tents and all their cariage. Which the whole army by conſent agreed to preſent vnto Marius, excepting nothing, ſauing that which was imbeaceled and conueied away vnder hand. Now, though this was a maruellous honorable & right noble preſent, yet they thought it not a recompence ſufficient for that he had deſerued, for the valure he had ſhewed of a famous Captaine in leading of his armie, and for the good order he kept in this warre: ſo happy thought they themſelues to haue eſcaped ſo great a danger. Notwithſtanding, ſome writers do not agree, that the ſpoile of the barbarous people was giuen vnto Marius: nor that there were alſo ſo great a number of men ſlaine as we haue ſpoken of. But they ſay, that after this battell, the MARSILLIANS did incloſe their vines, with hedges made of dead mens bones: and that the bodies being rotten and conſumed vpon the fieldes through the great raine that fell vpon them the winter following, the ground waxed ſo fat, & did ſoke the greaſe ſo deepe in the ſame, that the ſummer following they did beare an vncredible quantitie of all ſorts of frutes. And by this meanes were Archilocus words proued true, that the arable land doth waxe fat with ſuch rottenneſſe or putrification. And it is ſaid alſo, that of ordinary after great battels, there falleth great ſtore of raine. Either it is by meane of ſome god that powring downe pure raine water doth purifie, waſh, and clenſe the ground, defiled & poluted with mans bloud: or elſe it happeneth by naturall cauſe. For that the ouerthrow of ſo many dead bodies, and of the bloud ſpilt, engendreth a moiſt, groſſe, and heauy vapoure, which doth thicken the aire (that by nature is changeable, and eaſie to alter) from a very ſmall or litle beginning, vnto an exceeding great change. After this battell, Marius cauſed the harneſſe and ſpoiles of the barbarous people to be laid aſide, that were left whole and faire to ſight, to beautifie and enrich the pompe of his triumph. Then he cauſed the reſt to be gathered together on a great heape, and laide vpon a ſtake of wood, to make a noble ſacrifice vnto the gods, all his armie being armed about him, crowned with garlands of triumphe, and himſelfe apparelled in a long gowne of purple, according to the cuſtome of the ROMAINES in ſuch a caſe, & holding a torche burning in both his hands, which he firſt lifted vp vnto heauen. And as he was turning downe the torch to put fire to the ſtake of wood, they ſaw ſome of his friends a good way off a horſeback, comming poſt vnto him: then ſodainly there was a great ſilence made of all the aſſembly, euery man deſirous to heare what good newes they had brought. When they were come & lighted off their horſes, they ran ſtraight to embrace Marius, and brought him newes that he was choſen Conſull the fifth time: and preſented him the letters ſent him from ROME confirming the ſame. And thus, this new ioy falling out beſides the victorie, the priuate ſouldiers did ſhew the great ioy and pleaſure they tooke in both, with great ſhoutes and beating vpon their harneſſe: and the Captaines alſo, they crowned Marius againe with new garlands of laurell which they put about his head, and that done, he put fire vnder the ſtake of wood, and ended his ſacrifice. But that which neuer ſuffereth men quietly to enioy the good hap of any victorie clearely, but in this mortall life doth euer mingle the ill with the good, be it either fortune or ſpight of fatall deſtenie, or elſe the neceſſitie of the naturall cauſes of earthly things: did ſhortly after this great ioy bring newes vnto Marius, of his companion Catulus Luctatius the other Conſull, who was like a cloude in a faire bright day, and brought the city of ROME againe into a new feare and trouble. For Catulus that went againſt the CIMBRES, thought it was not for him to keepe the ſtraights of the mountaines, in hope to let the barbarous people for paſſing: becauſe that in ſo doing, he had bene compelled to deuide his armie into many partes, and had weakened himſelfe very much if he had taken that courſe. Wherefore comming a litle on this ſide the Alpes towards ITALIE, he planted himſelfe vpon the riuer of Atheſis, and built a bridge vpon it to paſſe and repaſſe ouer his men when he would, and ſet vp at either end of the bridge two ſtrong fortes well fortified, that he might more commodiouſly helpe the places on the other ſide of the riuer, if the barbarous people by chance would offer to force them, after they had gotten out of the ſtraights of the mountaines. Now, theſe barbarous people had ſuch a glory in themſelues, and diſdained their enemies ſo much, that more to ſhew their force and boldneſſe, then of any neceſſity that compelled them, or for any benefit they got by it: they ſuffred it to ſnow vpon them being ſtarke naked, and did climbe vp to the top of the mountaines, through great heapes of Iſe and ſnow. And when they were at the very top of all, they laide their long broade targets vnder their bodies, and laye all along vpon them, ſliding downe the ſteepe high rockes, that had certaine hangings ouer of an infinite height. In the ende, they came to campe neere vnto the ROMAINES by the riuer ſide, and conſidered how they might paſſe it ouer: and began to fill it vp, tearing downe (like giants) great hilles of earth which they found thereabouts, brought thither great trees which they pulled vp whole by the roots, threw in great peeces of rockes which they brake, and whole towers of earth after them, to ſtop and breake the courſe of the riuer. But beſides all this, they threw great timber into the riuer, which being caried downe the ſtreame, came with ſuch a force, & hit againſt the poſtes of the bridge ſo violently, that they ſhaked the ROMAINES bridge maruellouſlie. Whereupon many of the ſouldiers of the great campe were afraide, and forſaking it, began to retire. But then did Catulus, like a perfit good Captaine ſhewe, that he made leſſe account of his owne priuate honour and eſtimation, then he did of the generall honor of all his ſouldiers. For, ſeeing that he could not perſwade his men by any reaſon to tary, and that in this feare they diſlodged in diſorder againſt his will: he himſelfe commanded the ſtanderd bearer of the Eagle to marche on, and ran to the formoſt that went their way, and marched himſelfe before them all, to the intent that the ſhame of this retire ſhould altogether light vpon him, and not vpon his countrie, and that it might appeare the ROMAINES did follow their captaine, & not flie away. The barbarous people therfore aſſaulting the forte at the end of the bridge of the riuer of Atheſis, tooke it, and all the men that were in it. And becauſe the ROMAINES defended it like valiant men, and had luſtily ventured their liues to the death for defence of their country: the barbarous people let them go vpon compoſition, which they ſware to keepe faithfully, by their bull of copper. This bull afterwards was taken when they loſt the battell,and caried(as they ſay)into Catulus Luctatius houſe,as the chiefeſt thing of the victory. Furthermore, the barbarous people finding the country open without any defence,ſcattered here and there,and deſtroyed all where they came. Wherupon the ROMAINES ſent for Marius to ROME to go againſt them: and after he was arriued,euerie man thought he ſhould haue entred in triumphe, becauſe alſo the Senate did graunt it him very willingly. But he would not do it,either becauſe he would not depriue his ſouldiers and the Captaines that had fought vnder him, of any part of the honour that was due vnto them, they being abſent: or becauſe that he would warrant the people from the preſent danger they were in,by laying aſide the glory of his former victories, into the handes of the good fortune of ROME,in certaine hope to take it againe afterwards,by a more honorable and perfit confirmation of the ſecond. Wherfore,after he had made an oration to the people,and Senate according to the time,he went his way immediatly towards Catulus Luctatius, whoſe comming did comfort him much: and ſent alſo for his armie that was yet in GAVLE beyond the mountaines. And after his army was come,he paſſed the riuer of PO, to keepe the barbarous people from hurting ITALIE on this ſide the PO. Now,the CIMBRES ſtill deferred to giue battell becauſe they looked for the TEVTONS, and ſaid: that they maruelled much what they ment to tary ſo long: either becauſe they knew not indeed of their ouerthrow, or elſe for that they would not ſeeme to know it, becauſe they handled them cruelly that brought the newes of their deaths. At the length,they ſent vnto Marius to aske him lands and townes ſufficient to keepe them and their brethren. Marius asked their Ambaſſadors what brethren they ment. They anſwered, that they were the TEVTONS. Whereat the ſtanders by began to laugh: and Marius finely mocked them,ſaying. Care not for thoſe brethren ſaid he, for we haue giuen them ground enough,which they will keep for euer. Theſe Ambaſſadors found his mock ſtraight, and began to reuile and threaten him,that the CIMBRES ſhould preſently make him repent it,and the TEVTONS ſo ſoone as they arriued. Why,ſaid Marius vnto them againe, they are come already: and there were no honeſty in you, if you could go your way and not ſalute them, ſince they are your brethren. And as he ſpake theſe wordes, he commanded his men to bring him the kings of the TEVTONS bound and chained,that had bene taken within the mountaines of the Alpes by the SEQVANI. The CIMBRES vnderſtanding this by reporte of their Ambaſſadors, preſently marched towards Marius, who ſtirred not at all, but only fortified and kept his campe. They ſay that it was for this battell that Marius firſt inuented the new deuiſe he brought in for the darte which the ROMAINES were wonte alwaies to throwe againſt the enemies at the firſt charge. For before, the ſtaffe of the darte was faſtened vnto the iron,and the iron vnto the ſtaffe, with two litle iron pinnes that paſſed through the wood: and then Marius left one of the iron pins as it was before, and taking away the other, put a little thin pinne of wood,eaſie to be broken,in place of the ſame,making it craftely,to the end that when the dart was throwne,and ſtuck in the enemies target, it ſhould not ſtand right forward, but bowe downwards towards the iron, that the wooden pinne being broken, the ſtaffe of the darte ſhould hang downewards, holding yet by the iron pinne running quite through at the point. So Bæorix king of the CIMBRES, comming neere to Marius campe with a ſmall number of horſemen,ſent him defiance,and willed him to appoint a day & place for battell,that they might trie it out,who ſhould be owners of the country. Whereunto Marius made aunſwer,that it was not the manner of the ROMAINES to counſell with their enemies, of the time and place when they ſhould giue battell: but neuertheleſſe, he would not ſtick to pleaſure the CIMBRES ſo much. And thus they agreed betweene them,that it ſhould be the third day following, in the plaine of Verſelles, which was very commodious for the horſemen of the ROMAINES: and alſo for the barbarous people to put out at will their great number of fighting men. So both armies failed not to meete according to appointment, but appeared ranged in battell,the one before the other. Catulus Luctatius the other Conſull, had in his campe twenty thouſand,and three hundred ſouldiers: and Marius had in his campe two and thirty thouſand fighting men,which he placed in the two wings of the battell,ſhutting in Catulus with his men in the middeſt. As Sylla writeth it,who was preſent at the ſame: ſaying, that Marius did it of malice, for the hope he had to ouerthrow his enemies with the two wings of the battell, to the end that the whole victory ſhould light vpon his two wings, and that Catulus and his men in the middeſt ſhould haue no part therof. For he could not ſo much as fronte the enemy, becauſe that commonly when the fronte of a battell is of ſuch a breadth, the two wings that euer ſtretched out before, and is made like the creſſant of a moone, where the middeſt is thickeſt and fartheſt in. And it is written alſo in other ſtories, that Catulus himſelfe accuſing the malice of Marius, becauſe he did ſo: ſpake it to excuſe his owne diſhonour.

As for the CIMBRES, the troupes of their footemen comming out of their fortes leaſurely, did put themſelues into a ſquadron, as broad as long, for in euery ſide they occupied almoſt thirty furlong: but their horſemen which were fifteene thouſand, marched before in ſumptuous furniture. For they had helmets on their heads faſhioned like wilde beaſts necks, and ſtrange beuers or buffes to the ſame, and ware on their helmets great high plumes of feathers, as they had bene wings: which to ſight made them appeare taller and bigger men then they were. Furthermore, they had good curaſes on their backes, and caried great white targets before them: and for weapons offenſiue, euery man had two dartes in his hand to beſtow a farre off, & when they came to hād ſtrokes, they had great heauy ſwords, which they fought withall neere hand. But at that time they did not marche directly in rancke againſt the army of the ROMAINES, but turned a litle on the right hand, meaning to incloſe the ROMAINES betwene them and their footmen that were on the left hand. The ROMAINE Captaines found their policie ſtraight, but they could not keepe their ſouldiers backe: for there was one that cried, the enemies fled, and immediatly all the reſt began to runne after. In the meane time, the footmen of the barbarous people that were like to a ſea before them, came forwards ſtill: and then Marius hauing waſhed his hands, and lifting them vp to heauen, promiſed, and vowed a ſolemne ſacrifice vnto the gods of a hundred oxen. Catulus alſo made a vowe, lifting vp his hands to heauen in like maner, that he would build a temple vnto fortune for that day: and it is reported, that Marius hauing ſacrificed, when they ſhewed him the intrailes of the beaſtes ſacrificed: he cried out aloude, the victorie is mine.

A duſt raiſed that neither army could ſee one an other.

But when they came to giue the charge, Marius had a great miſfortune happened him, powred vpon him by gods iuſtice, who turned his craft againſt himſelfe, as Sylla writeth: for there roſe very credibly ſo great a duſt, that both armies loſt the ſight one of another. And hereupon Marius being the firſt that ranne to begin the charge, and hauing placed his men about him, miſſed to meete with his enemies: and being paſſed beyonde their battell, wandred a great while vp and downe the field, whileſt the barbarous people fought againſt Catulus.

So that the greateſt fury of the battel was againſt Catulus and his army: in the which, Sylla writeth he was himſelfe, and ſaieth, that the heate and the ſun which was full in the CIMBRES faces, did the ROMAINES maruellous pleaſure at that time.

For the barbarous people being very hard, brought vp to away with colde (becauſe they were borne and bred in a cold country, ſhadowed altogether with woods and trees as we haue ſaid) were to the contrary very tender againſt the heate, and did melt with ſweating againſt the ſunne, and gaped ſtraight for breath, putting their targets before their faces: for it was alſo in the hart of ſummer, about the ſeauen and twentith day of the moneth of Iuly, that this battell was giuen, and this duſt alſo made the ROMAINES the bolder, and kept them that they could not ſee the innumerable multitude of their enemies farre from them. And euery man running to ſet vpon them that came againſt them, they were ioyned together in fight, before that the ſight of their enemies could make them afraide. And furthermore, they were ſo good ſouldiers, and ſo able to take paines, that how extreame ſoeuer the heate was, no man was ſene ſweate nor blow, though they ran at the firſt to ſet vpon them: and this hath Catulus Luctatius himſelfe left in writing vnto the praiſe of his ſouldiers. So were the moſt part of the barbarous people, & ſpecially of the beſt ſouldiers, ſlaine in the field. And becauſe they ſhould not open nor breake their rancks, the formoſt rancks were all tied and bound together with girdles, leather thongs, and long chaines of iron: and they that fled, were chaſed and followed into their campe by the ROMAINES, where they met with horrible and fearefull things to beholde.

For, their wiues being vpon the toppe of their cartes, apparelled all in blacke, ſlue all thoſe that fled, without regarde of perſons: ſome their fathers, other their husbands or their brethren, and ſtrangling the litle young babes with their owne hands, they caſt them vnder the cart wheeles, and betweene the horſe legges, and afterwards ſlue them ſelues. And they ſay, that there was a woman hanged at the end of a cart ladder, hauing hanged vp two of her children by the necks at her heeles. And that the men alſo, for lacke of a tree to hang them ſelues on, tied ſlipping halters about their neckes, vnto the horns and feete of the oxen, and that they did pricke them afterwardes with goades to make them fling and leape ſo long, that dragging them all about, and treading them vnder feete, at the length they killed them. Now, though numbers were ſlaine by this meanes, yet were there three ſcore thouſand of the taken priſoners, and the number of them that were ſlaine, came to twiſe as many moe. In this manner Marius ſouldiers ſpoiled the campe of the CIMBRES: but the ſpoiles of dead men that were ſlaine in the field, with their enſignes and trumpettes, were all brought (as it is ſaid) vnto Catulus campe, which was a plaine teſtimony to ſhew that Catulus and his ſouldiers had wonne the field. Strife riſing thus between the ſouldiers of both campes about it, that the matter might be tried friendly betweene them: they made the Ambaſſadors of PARMA their arbitrators, who were by chãce at that time in the army. Catulus Luctatius ſouldiers led the Ambaſſadors to the place where the ouerthrow was giuen, ſhewing them the enemies bodies pearſed through with their pikes, which were eaſie to be knowen, becauſe Catulus had made them graue his name vpon their pikes. For all this, Marius went away with the honor of this great victory, as well for the firſt battell he wanne alone, when he ouerthrew the TEVTONS and the AMBRONS: as for his great calling, hauing beene Conſull fiue times. And furthermore, the common people at ROME, called him the third founder of the city of ROME, thinking them ſelues now deliuered from as great a danger, as before time they had bene in from the ancient GAVLES. And euery man feaſting at home with his wife and children, offered the beſt diſhes of meat they had to ſupper, vnto the gods, and vnto Marius: and would needs haue him alone to triumphe for both victories. But he would not in any caſe, but triumphed into the city with Catulus Luctatius, meaning to ſhew him ſelfe curteous and moderate in ſo great proſperity: and peraduenture alſo fearing Catulus ſouldiers, who were in readineſſe and prepared (if Marius would haue depriued their Captaine of that honor) to let him alſo of his triumph. And thus you ſee how he paſſed his fifth Conſulſhippe. After that, he made more earneſt ſute for the ſixth Conſulſhip, then euer any other did for his firſt: ſeeking the peoples good willes by all the faire meanes he could to pleaſe them, humbling himſelfe vnto them, not onely more then became his eſtate and calling, but directly alſo againſt his owne nature, counterfeating a curteous populer manner, being cleane contrary to his diſpoſition. His ambition made him timerous to deale in matters of the ſtate concerning the city. For that courage and boldneſſe which he had in battell againſt the enemy, he loſt it quite when he was in an aſſembly of people in the city: and was eaſily put out of his biaſe, with the firſt blame or praiſe he heard giuen him. And though they report, that on a time when he mad a thouſand CAMERINES free of the city of ROME, becauſe they had done valiant ſeruice in the warres, that there were ſome that did accuſe him, ſaying, that it was a thing done againſt all law: he anſwered them, that for the noiſe of the armor, he could not heare the law. Notwithſtanding, it ſeemeth that in deede he was greatly afeard of the fury of the people in an aſſembly of the city. For in time of warres, he euer ſtood vpon his reputation and authority, knowing that they had neede of him: but in peace and ciuill gouernment, becauſe he would rather be the chiefeſt man then the honeſteſt man, he would creepe into the peoples boſomes to get their fauor and goodwil. And thus through his euil behauiour, he brought all the nobility generally to be his enemies. But he feared nor miſtruſted none ſo much, as hee did Metellus, for the great vnthankfull part he remembred he had playd him: and the rather alſo, becauſe he knew him to be a iuſt and true dealing man, and one that was euer againſt theſe people-pleaſers and flatterers. Marius therefore practiſed all the waies he could, to get Metellus to be baniſhed ROME. Wherefore, to cõpaſſe his intent, he fell in friendſhip with Glaucia and one Saturninus, two of the moſt boldeſt, moſt deſperate, and moſt harebraind young men that were in all ROME: who had all the rablement of rogues and beggers, and ſuch tumultuous people at their commaundement, by whoſe meanes he made new popular lawes, and cauſed the ſouldiers to be called home out of the wars, and mingled them with the people of the city in common aſſemblies, to trouble and vexe Metellus. Moreouer Rutilius, an honeſt and true writer, (howbeit an enemy vnto Marius) writeth, that he obtained his ſixth Conſulſhip by corruption of money, which he cauſed to be diſtributed amongſt the tribes of the people: and that he bought it for ready money to put by Metellus, and to haue Valerius Flaccus not for his fellow and companion in the Conſulſhippe, but rather for a miniſter of his will. There was neuer ROMAINE to whom the people graunted the Conſulſhippe ſixe times, except it were vnto Valerius Coruinus only. But for him, they ſay that there was fiue and forty yeares between his firſt Conſulſhip and the laſt. Where Marius ſince the firſt yeare of his Conſulſhippe, continued fiue yeares together by good fortune one after an other. But in his laſt Conſulſhip, he wanne him ſelfe great hate and malice, becauſe he did many foule faults to pleaſe Saturninus withall: as amongeſt others, when he bare with Saturninus, who murdered Nonius his competitor in the Tribuneſhip. Afterwardes when Saturninus was choſen Tribune of the people, he preferred a law for diſtribution of the landes among the common people, and vnto that law he had ſpecially added one article: that all the Lords of the Senate ſhould come openly to ſweare, that they ſhould keepe and obſerue from point to point that which the people by their voices ſhould decree, and ſhould not deny it in any iotte. But Marius in open Senate, made as though hee would withſtand this article, ſaying, that neither he nor any other wiſe man of iudgement would take this oth: for ſaid he, if the law be euill, then they ſhould doe the Senate open wrong to compell them by force to graunt it, and not of their owne good wils. But he ſpake not that, meaning to do as he ſaid: for it was but a baite he had layed for Metellus only, which he could hardly eſcape. For, imagining that to tel a fine lie, was a peece of vertue, and of a good wit: he was throughly reſolued with him ſelfe, not to paſſe for any thing he had ſpoken in the Senate. And to the contrary alſo, knowing well enough that Metellus was a graue wiſe man, who eſteemed that to be iuſt and true (as Pindarus ſaid) is the beginning and foundation of great vertue: he thought he would outreach him, making him affirme before the Senat that he would not ſweare, knowing alſo that the people would hate him deadly, if hee would refuſe afterwardes to ſweare. And ſo in deed it happened. For Metellus hauing aſſured them then that he would not ſweare, the Senate brake vp vppon it. And ſhortly after, Saturninus the Tribune calling the Senators vnto the pulpit for orations, to compell them to ſweare before the people: Marius went thither to offer him ſelfe to ſweare. Whereupon the people making ſilence, liſtned attentiuely to heare what he would ſay. But Marius not regarding his large promiſe and brags made before the Senate, ſayed then, his necke was not ſo long that he would preiudice the common wealth in a matter of ſo great importance: but that he would ſweare, and obey the law, if it were a law. This ſhifting ſubtilty he added to it, to cloke and couer his ſhame: and when hee had ſayd ſo, he tooke his oth. The people ſeeing him ſweare, were maruellous glad, and praiſed him with clapping of their handes: but the nobility hanging downe their heads were aſhamed of him, and were maruellous angry in their hearts with him, that he had ſo cowardly and ſhamefully gone from his word. Thereupon all the Senate tooke their othes, one after an other againſt their wils, becauſe they were afrayed of the people. Sauing Metellus, whom, neither parents nor friendes perſwaſion and intreaty could once moue to ſweare, for any puniſhment that Saturninus had impoſed vpon them, which refuſed to take the othe, but continued one man ſtill according to his nature, and would neuer yeelde vnto it, offering to abide any paine, rather then to be brought to conſent to a diſhoneſt matter vnbeſeeming his eſtate. And thereupon went out of the aſſembly, and talking with them that did accompany him, told them, that to do euill it was too eaſie a thing: and to doe good without daunger, it was alſo a common matter: but to do well with danger, that was the part of an honeſt and vertuous man. Saturninus then commaunded the Conſuls by edict of the people, that they ſhould baniſhe Metellus by ſound of trumpet, with ſpeciall commaundement, that no man ſhould let him haue fire nor water, nor lodge him priuatly nor openly. The common people, they were ready to haue fallen vpon him, and to haue killed him: but the noble men being offended for the iniury they had offred him, gathered together about him to ſaue him, if any would offer him violence. Metellus him ſelfe was ſo good a man, that he would not any ciuill diſſention ſhould riſe for his ſake: and therefore he abſented him ſelfe from ROME, wherein he did like a wiſe man.

man. For ſayd he, either things will amend, and the people then repenting them ſelues of the wrong they haue done me, will call me home againe: or elſe things ſtanding as they do now, it ſhall be beſt for me to be furtheſt off. But for his trauaile in his exile, how much he was beloued and honoured, and how ſweetely he paſſed his time ſtudying philoſophy in the city of RHODES, ſhall be declared more at large in his life. Now on the other ſide, Marius to recompence the pleaſure Saturninus had done him, being driuen to let him haue his will in all things: did not foreſee what an intollerable plague he brought vnto the common wealth, giuing the bridle to a deſperate man, who euery way, by force, by ſword and murder, plainely ſought to vſurpe tyrannicall power, with the vtter deſtruction and ſubuerſion of the whole common wealth. And ſo bearing reuerence on the one ſide vnto the nobility, and deſiring on the other ſide to gratifie the common people: he plaied a ſhamefull part, and ſhewed him ſelfe a double dealing man. For one night the nobility and chiefeſt citizens comming to his houſe, to perſwade him to bridle Saturninus inſolency and boldnes: at the ſelfe ſame time alſo Saturninus going thither to ſpeake with him, he cauſed him to be let in at a backe dore, the noble men not being priuy to his comming. And ſo Marius telling the nobility, and then Saturninus, that he was troubled with a loſenes of his body, vnder this pretence whipped vp & down, now to the one, then to the other, and did nothing elſe but ſet them further out one againſt an other, then they were before. Neuertheles, the Senat being maruellous angry with his naughty double dealing, and the order of knightes taking part with the Senate, Marius in the end was compelled to arme the people in the market place, to ſuppreſſe them that were vppe, and draue them into the Capitoll: where for lacke of water, they were compelled to yeelde them ſelues at the length, becauſe he had cut off the pipes and conduits by the which the water ranne vnto the Capitol. By reaſon whereof, they being vnable to continue any longer, called Marius vnto them, and yeelded them ſelues to him, vnder the aſſuraunce of the faith of the common people. But although Marius did what he could poſsible to his vttermoſt power to ſaue them, he could not preuaile, nor doe them pleaſure: for they were no ſooner come downe into the market place, but they were all put to death. Whereupon he hauing now purchaſed him ſelfe the ill will of the people and nobility both, when time came about that new Cenſors ſhould be choſen, euery man looked that he would haue bene one of the ſuters: howbeit he ſued not for it, for feare of repulſe, but ſuffered others to be choſen of farre leſſe dignity and calling then him ſelfe. Wherein notwithſtanding he gloried, ſaying that he would not ſue to be Cenſor, becauſe he would not haue the ill will of many, for examining too ſtraightly their liues and manners. Againe, a decree being preferred to repeale Metellus baniſhment, Marius did what he could poſsible by word and deed to hinder it: howbeit, ſeeing in the end he could not haue his will, he let it alone. The people hauing thus willingly reuoked Metellus baniſhment, Marius heart would not ſerue him to ſee Metellus returne againe, for the malice he bare him: wherefore he tooke the ſeas to goe into CAPPADOCIA and GALATIA, vnder colour to pay certaine ſacrifices to the mother of the gods, which he had vowed vnto her. But this was not the very cauſe that made him to vndertake this iourney, for he had an other ſecret meaning in it. For his nature not being framed to liue in peace, and to gouerne ciuil matters, and hauing attained to his greatnes by armes, and ſuppoſing that his glory and authority conſumed and decreaſed altogether liuing idlely in peace: he ſought to deuiſe new occaſion of warres, hoping if he could ſtirre vp the kinges of ASIA, and ſpecially Mithridates (who without his procurement was feared much, that one day he would make warres againſt the ROMAINES) that he ſhould then vndoubtedly without let of any man be choſen Generall to make wars with him, and withall alſo, that by that meanes he ſhould haue occaſion to fill the city of ROME with new triumphs, and his houſe with the ſpoiles of the great kingdome of PONTE, and with the riches of the king. Now Mithridates diſpoſing him ſelfe to entertaine Marius, with all the honor & curteſies he could poſsibly ſhew him: Marius in the end notwithſtãding would not once giue him a good looke, nor a curteous word again, but churliſhly ſayd vnto Mithridates at his departure from him. Thou muſt determi[illegible] one of theſe two, king Mithridates: either to make thy ſelfe ſtronger then the ROMAINES, [illegible] elſe to looke to doe what they commaund thee, without reſiſtance. fore that the ROMAINES would ſpeake their minds freely: howbeit he neuer ſaw nor proued it before, vntill that time. After Marius was returned vnto ROME, he built a houſe neare vnto the market place, becauſe he would not (as he ſaid him ſelf) that ſuch as came vnto him ſhould trouble them ſelues in going farre to bring him home to his houſe: or elſe for that he thought this would be an occaſion that diuerſe would come to ſalute him, as they did other Senators. Howbeit that was not the cauſe in deede, but the only cauſe was, for that hee had no naturall grace nor ciuility to entertaine men curteouſly that came vnto him, and that he lacked behauiour beſides to rule in a common wealth: and therefore in time of peace they made no more reckoning of him, then they did of an old ruſty harneſſe or implement that was good for nothing, but for the warres only. And for all other that profeſſed armes as him ſelfe did, no man grieued him ſo much to be called forward to office and ſtate before him ſelfe, as Sylla did. For he was ready to burſt for ſpite, to ſee that the noble men did all what they could to preferre Sylla, for the malice and ill will they bare him: and that Syllaes firſt riſing and preferment grew, by the quarrels and contentions he had with him. And ſpecially when Bocchus king of NVMIDIA was proclaimed by the Senate, a friend and confederate of the ROMAINE people: he offred vp ſtatues of victories, carying tokens of triumph, into the temple of the Capitoll: and placed neare vnto them alſo, an image of gold of king Iugurthe, which he deliuered by his own hands vnto Sylla.

And this made Marius ſtarke madde for ſpite and iealouſie, and could not abide that an other ſhould take vppon him the glory of his doings: inſomuch as he determined to plucke thoſe images downe, and to cary them away by force. Sylla on the other ſide ſtomached Marius, and would not ſuffer him to take thẽ out of the place where they were: ſo that this ciuill ſedition had taken preſent effect, had not the warres of their confederates fallen out betweene, and reſtrained them for a time. For the beſt ſouldiers and moſt warlike people of all ITALIE, and of greateſt power, they all together roſe againſt the ROMAINES, and had wellneare ouerthrowen their whole Empire.

For they were not onely of great force, and power, and well armed: but their Captaines alſo, for valiantnes and ſkill, did in manner equall the worthines of the ROMAINES. For this war fell out wonderfully, by reaſon of the calamity and miſfortune that happened in it: but it wanne Sylla as much fame and reputation, as it did Marius ſhame and diſhonor. For he ſhewed him ſelfe very could and ſlow in all his enterpriſes, ſtill delaying time, eyther becauſe age had mortified his actiue heate, and killed that quick ready diſpoſition of body that was wont to be in him, being then aboue three ſcore and fiue yeare olde: or elſe as he ſayd him ſelfe, becauſe he was waxen gouty, and had ache in his vaines and ſinewes, that he could not well ſtir his body, and that for ſhame, becauſe he would not tary behinde in this warre, he did more then his yeares could away withall. Notwithſtanding, as he was, yet he wanne a great battell, wherein were ſlaine ſixe thouſand of their enemies: and ſo long as the warres endured, he neuer gaue them aduantage of him, but patiently ſuffered them ſometime to intrench him, and to mocke him, and giue him vile wordes, chalenging him out to fight, and yet all this would not prouoke him. It is ſaid alſo, that Pompedius Silo, who was the chiefeſt Captaine of reputation & authority the enemies had, ſaid vnto Marius on a time: if thou be Marius, ſo great a Captaine as they ſay thou art, leaue thy campe, and come out to battell. Nay, ſaid Marius to him againe: if thou be a great Captaine, plucke mee out by the eares, and compell mee to come to battell.

An other time when the enemies gaue them occaſion to giue a great charge vpon them with aduantage: the ROMAINES were faynt hearted and durſt not ſet vpon them. Wherefore, after both the one and the other were retired, Marius cauſed his men to aſſemble, and ſpake vnto them in this ſort. I cannot tell which of the two I ſhould recken moſt cowards: you your ſelues, or your enemies: for they durſt not once ſee your backes, nor you them in the faces. In the end notwithſtanding, he was compelled to reſigne his charge, being able to ſerue no longer for the weakeneſſe and debilitie of his body. Now, all the rebels of ITALY being put downe, many at ROME (by the orators means) did ſue to haue the charge of the warres againſt Mithridates: and among them, a Tribune of the people called Sulpitius, (a very bold and raſh man) beyond all mens hope and opinion preferred Marius, and perſwaded them to giue him the charge of theſe wars, with title and authority of vice Conſull. The people thereupon were deuided in two partes: for the one ſide ſtoode for Marius, and the other would haue Sylla take the charge, ſaying, that Marius was to thinke now vppon the hotte bathes at Baies, to looke to cure his old body, brought lowe with rewme and age, as him ſelfe ſayd. For Marius had a goodly ſtately houſe in thoſe partes neare vnto the mount of Miſene, which was farre more fine and curiouſly furniſhed, then became a Captaine that had beene in ſo many foughten battels and dangers. They ſay that Cornelia afterwardes bought that fine houſe for the ſumme of ſeuen thouſand fiue hundred crownes, and ſhortly after alſo, Lucullus bought it againe for two hundred and fifty thouſand crownes: to ſo great exceſſe was vanity and curioſity growen in very ſhort time at ROME. Notwithſtanding all this, Marius too ambitiouſly ſtriuing like a paſſioned yong man againſt the weakenes and debility of his age, neuer miſſed day but he would be in the field of Mars to exerciſe him ſelfe among the young men, ſhewing his body diſpoſed and ready to handle all kinde of weapons, and to ride horſes: albeit that in his later time, he had no great health of body, becauſe he was very heauy and ſad. There were that liked that paſſing well in him, and went of purpoſe into the field to ſee what paines he tooke, ſtriuing to excell the reſt. Howbeit thoſe of the better ſort were very ſory to ſee his auarice and ambition, conſidering ſpecially, that being of a poore man become very rich, and of a right meane perſon a great eſtate, that he could not now containe his proſperity within reaſonable boundes, nor content him ſelfe to be eſteemed and honoured, quietly enioying all he had wonne, and which at that preſent he did poſſeſſe: but as if he had beene very poore and needy, after he had receiued ſuch great honor and triumphes, would yet cary out his age ſo ſtoutly, euen into CAPPADOCIA, and vnto the realme of PONT, to goe fight there againſt Archelaus, and Neoptolemus, Lieutenants of king Mithridates. In deede he alleaged ſome reaſons to excuſe him ſelfe, but they were altogether vaine: for he ſayd that he deſired in perſon to bring vp his ſonne in exerciſe of armes, and to teach him the diſcipline of warres. That diſcouered the ſecret hidden plague, which of long time hath lurked in ROME, Marius ſpecially hauing now met with a fit inſtrument, and miniſter to deſtroy the common wealth, which was, the inſolent and raſh Sulpitius: who altogether followed Saturninus doings, ſauing that he was found too cowardly and faint hearted in all his enterpriſes, and for that did Marius iuſtly reproue him. But Sulpitius, becauſe he would not dally nor delay time, had euer ſixe hundred young gentlemen of the order of knights, whom he vſed as his gard about him, and called them the gard againſt the Senate. And one day as the Conſuls kept their common aſſembly in the market place, Sulpitius comming in armed vpon them, made them both take their heeles, and get them packing: and as they fled, one of the Conſuls ſonnes being taken tardy, was ſlaine. Sylla being the other Conſull, and perceiuing that he was followed hard at hand vnto Marius houſe, ranne into the ſame againſt the opinion of all the world: whereof they that ranne after him not being aware, paſſed by the houſe. And it is reported that Marius him ſelfe conuayed Sylla ſafely out at a backe dore, and that he being ſcaped thus, went vnto his campe. Notwithſtanding, Sylla himſelfe in his commentaries doth not ſay, that he was ſaued in Marius houſe when he fled: but that he was brought thither to giue his conſent vnto a matter which Sulpitius would haue forced him vnto againſt his will, preſenting him naked ſwordes on euery ſide. And he writeth alſo, that being thus forcibly brought vnto Marius houſe, he was kept there in this feare, vntill ſuch time as returning into the market place, he was compelled to reuoke againe the adiornement of iuſtice, which he and his companion by edict had commaunded. This done, Sulpitius then being the ſtronger, cauſed the commiſſion and charge of this war againſt Mithridates to be aſſigned vnto Marius by the voice of the people. Therfore Marius giuing order for his departure, ſent two of his Colonels before to take the army of Sylla: who hauing won his ſouldiers hearts before, and ſtirred them vp againſt Marius, brought them on with him directly towardes ROME, being no leſſe then fiue and thirty thouſand fighting men: who ſetting vpon the Captaines Marius had ſent vnto them, ſlew them in the field. In reuenge whereof, Marius againe in ROME put many of Syllaes friends and followers to death, and proclamed open liberty by ſound of trumpet, to all ſlaues and bondmen that would take armes for him: but there were neuer but three only that offered them ſelues. Whereupon, hauing made a litle reſiſtaunce vnto Sylla when he came into ROME, he was ſoone after compelled to runne his way. Marius was no ſooner out of the city, but they that were in his company forſaking him, diſperſed them ſelues here and there being darke night: and Marius him ſelfe got to a houſe of his in the countrey, called Salonium, and ſent his ſonne to one of his father in law Mutius farmes not farre from thence, to make ſome prouiſion for victuals. But Marius in the meane time, went before to Ostia, where one of his friends Numerius had prepared him a ſhippe, in the which he imbarked immediatly, not tarying for his ſonne, and hoyſed ſaile, hauing onely Granius his wiues ſonne with him. In the meane time the yonger Marius being at his father in law Mutius farme, ſtaied ſo long in getting of prouiſion, in truſſing of it vp, and carying it away, that broad day light had like to haue diſcouered him: for the enemies had aduertiſement whither he was gone, whereupon certaine horſemen were ſent thither ſuppoſing to haue found him. But the keeper of the houſe hauing an inckling of their comming, and preuenting them alſo before they came, ſodainely yoked his oxen to the cart which hee loded with beanes, and hidde this younger Marius vnder the ſame. And pricking the oxen forward with his goade, ſet out, and met them as he went towards the city, and deliuered Marius in this ſort into his wiues houſe: and there taking ſuch thinges as hee needed, when the night following came, went towardes the ſea, and tooke ſhip, finding one croſſe ſailed, bound towards Africke. Marius the father ſayling on ſtill, had a very good winde to point alongeſt the coaſt of Italy: notwithſtanding, being afrayed of one Geminius, a chiefe man of Terracine, who hated him to the death, he gaue the mariners warning thereof betimes, and willed them to take heede of landing at Terracine. The mariners were very willing to obey him, but the winde ſtoode full againſt them comming from the maine, which raiſed a great ſtorme, and they feared much that their veſſell which was but a bote, would not brooke the ſeas, beſides that he him ſelfe was very ſicke in his ſtomacke, and ſore ſea beaten: notwithſtanding, at the lēgth with the greateſt difficulty that might be, they recouered the coaſt ouer againſt the city of Circees. In the meane time, the ſtorme increaſed ſtill, and their victuals failed them: whereupon they were compelled to land, and went wandring vp and downe not knowing what to doe, nor what way to take. But as it falleth out commonly in ſuch like caſes of extremity, they thought it alwaies the beſt ſafety for them, to flie from the place where they were, and to hope of that which they ſaw not: for if the ſea were their enemy, the land was ſo likewiſe. To meete with men, they were afrayed: and not to mette with them on the other ſide lacking victuals, was in deede the greater danger. Neuertheleſſe, in the end they met with heard men that could giue them nothing to eate, but knowing Marius, warned him to get him out of the way as ſoone as hee could poſſible, becauſe it was not long ſince that there paſſed by a great troupe of horſemen that ſought him al about. And thus being brought vnto ſuch perplexity, that he knew not where to beſtow him ſelfe, and ſpecially for that the poor men he had in his company were almoſt ſtarued for hunger: he got out of the high way notwithſtanding, and ſought out a very thicke wodde where he paſſed all that night in great ſorrow, and the next morning being compelled by neceſſity, determined yet to employ his body before all his ſtrength failed. Thus he wandered on alongeſt the ſea coaſt, ſtill comforting them that followed him the beſt he could, and praying them not to deſpaire, but to refer them ſelues to him, euen vntill the laſt hope, truſting in certaine prophecies which the Soothſayers had told him of long time before. For when hee was but very young, and dwelling in the countrey, he gathered vp in the lap of his gowne, the ayrie of an Eagle, in the which were ſeuen young Eagles: whereat his father and mother much wondering, asked the Soothſayers what that ment. They anſwered, that their ſonne one day ſhould be one of the greateſt men in the world, and that out of doubt hee ſhould obtaine ſeuen times in his life the chiefeſt office of dignity in his country. And for that matter, it is ſayed that ſo in deede it came to paſſe. Other holde opinion, that ſuch as were about Marius at that time, in that preſent place, and elſe where, during the time of his flying: they hearing him tell this tale, beleeued it, and afterwards put it downe in writing, as a true thing, although of troth it is both falſe and fayned. For, they ſay, that the Eagle neuer getteth but two young ones: by reaſon whereof it is maintayned alſo, that the Poet Muſæus hath lyed: in that which hee hath written in theſe verſes.

The Eagle layes three egges, and two ſhe hatcheth forth:
But yet ſhe bringeth vp but one, that any thing is worth.

How many egs the Eagle laieth.

Howſoeuer it was, it is certaine that Marius many times during the time of his flying ſaid, that he was aſſured he ſhould come vnto the ſeuenth Conſulſhip. When they were come nere now to the citie of MINTVRNES, about a two mile and a halfe from it, they might perceiue a troupe of horſemen comming by the ſea ſide, and two ſhippes on the ſea that fell vppon the coaſt by good happe. Wherefore they all beganne to runne (ſo long as they had breath and ſtrength) towardes the ſea, into the which they threwe themſelues, and got by ſwimming vnto one of the ſhippes where Granius was: and they croſſed ouer vnto the Ile that is right againſt it called ENARIA. Now for Marius, who was heauie and ſicke of bodie, two of his ſeruants holpe to holde him vp alwaies aboue water, with the greateſt paine and difficultie in the worlde: and at the laſt they laboured ſo throughly, that they put him into the other ſhippe at the ſelfe ſame preſent, when the horſemen came vnto the ſea ſide, who cried out aloude to the mariners to land againe, or elſe throwe Marius ouer borde, and then to goe where they would. Marius on the other ſide humbly beſought them with teares, not ſo to doe: whereby the maſters of the ſhip in a ſhort ſpace were in many mindes whether to doe it, or not to doe it. In the ende notwithſtanding, they anſwered the horſemen they would not throwe him ouer borde: ſo the horſemen went their way in a great rage. But as ſoone as they were gone, the maſters of the ſhippe changing minde, drewe towardes lande, and caſt ancker about the mouth of the riuer of Liris, where it leaueth her banckes, and maketh great mariſſes: & there they tolde Marius he ſhould do well to goe a land to eate ſomewhat, and refreſh his ſea ſicke bodie, till the winde ſerued them to make ſaile, which doubtleſſe ſaide they, will be at a certaine houre when the ſea winde falles and becomes calme, and that there riſeth a litle winde from the lande, ingendred by the vapours of the mariſſes, which will ſerue the turne very well to take ſeas againe. Marius following their counſell, and thinking they had ment good faith, was ſet a lande vpon the riuers bancke: and there laide him downe vpon the graſſe, nothing ſuſpecting that which happened after to him. For the mariners preſently taking their ſhippe againe, and hoyſing vp their anckers ſailed ſtraight away, and fled: iudging it no honeſtie for them to haue deliuered Marius into the handes of his enemies, nor ſafetie for themſelues to haue ſaued him. Marius finding himſelfe all alone, & forſaken of euery man, lay on the ground a great while, and ſaid neuer a word: yet at the length taking heart a litle to him, got vp once againe on his feete, and painefully wandred vp and downe, where was neither way nor path at all, ouerthwart deepe mariſſes and great ditches full of water and mudde, till he came at the length to a poore olde mans cotage, dwelling there in theſe mariſſes, and falling at his feete, beſought him to helpe to ſaue and ſuccour a poore afflicted man, with promiſe that one day he would giue him a better recompence then he looked for, if he might eſcape this preſent danger wherein he was. The olde man whether for that he had knowen Marius aforetime, or that ſeeing him (by coniecture only) iudged him to be ſome great perſonage, told him that if he ment but to lie downe and reſt himſelfe a litle, his poore cabine would ſerue that turne reaſonably well but if he ment to wander thus, to fly his enemies that followed him, he would then bring him into a more ſecret place, and farther off from noiſe. Marius praied him that he would do ſo much for him: and the good man brought him into the mariſh, vnto a lowe place by the riuers ſide, where he made him lie downe, and then couered him with a great deale of reede and bent, and other ſuch light things as could not hurt him. He had not long bene there, but he heard a great noyſe comming towardes the cabin of the poore old man: for Geminius of TERRACINE had ſent men all about to ſeeke for him, whereof ſome by chance came that way, and put the poore man in a feare, and threatned him that he had receiued and hidden an enemie of the ROMAINES. Marius hearing that, roſe out of the place where the old man had laide him, and ſtripping him ſelfe ſtarke naked, went into a part of the mariſh where the water was full of myre and mudde, and there was founde of thoſe that ſearched for him: who taking him out of the ſlime all naked as he was, caried him into the citie of MINTVRNES, and deliuered him there into the gouernours hands. Open proclamation was made by the Senate through all ITALIE, that they ſhould apprehend Marius, and kill him whereſoeuer they found him. Notwithſtanding, the gouernours and magiſtrates of MINTVRNES thought good firſt to conſult thereupon amongeſt themſelues, & in the meane time they deliuered him into the ſafe cuſtody of a woman called Fannia, whom they thought to haue bene a bitter enemie of his, for an old grudge ſhe had to him, which was this. Fannia ſometime had a husband called Tinnius, whom ſhe was willing to leaue for that they could not agree, and required her dower of him againe, which was very great. Her husband againe ſaide, ſhe had plaide the whore. The matter was brought before Marius in his ſixth Conſulſhip, who had giuen iudgement vpon it. Both parties being heard, and the law proſecuted on either ſide, it was found that this Fannia was a naughtie woman of her bodie, & that her husband knowing it well enough before he maried her, yet tooke her with her faultes, and long time liued with her. Wherefore Marius being angry with them both, gaue ſentence that the husband ſhould repay backe her dower, and that for her naughtie life, ſhe ſhould pay foure farthings. This notwithſtanding, when Fannia ſaw Marius, ſhe grudged him not for that, and leaſt of all had any reuenging minde in her towardes him, but contrarily did comfort and helpe him what ſhe could with that ſhe had. Marius thanked her maruelouſly for it, & bad her hope well: becauſe he met with good lucke as he was comming to her houſe, and in this manner. As they were leading of him, when he came neere to Fanniaes houſe, her dore being open, there came an aſſe running out to go drinke at a conduit not farre from thence: and meeting Marius by the way, looked vpon him with a liuely ioyfull countenance, firſt of all ſtopping ſodainly before him, and then beginning to bray out aloud, and to leape and skippe by him. Whereuppon Marius ſtraight coniecturing with himſelfe, ſaid, that the goddes did ſignifie vnto him, that he ſhould ſaue himſelfe ſooner by water then by lande: becauſe that the aſſe leauing him, ranne to drinke and cared not to eate. So when he had tolde Fannia this tale, he deſired to reſt, and praied them to let him alone, and to ſhut the chamber dore to him. But the magiſtrates of the citie hauing conſulted together about him, in the ende reſolued they muſt deferre no longer time, but diſpatch him out of the way preſently. Now when they were agreed vpon it, they could not finde a man in the citie that durſt take vpon him to kill him: but a man of armes of the GAVLES, or one of the CIMBRES (for we finde both the one and the other in writing) that went thither with his ſword drawen in his hand. Now, that place of the chamber wherein Marius lay was very darke, and as it is reported, the man of armes thought he ſaw two burning flames come out of Marius eyes, and heard a voice out of that darke corner, ſaying vnto him: O fellowe, thou, dareſt thou come to kill Caius Marius? The barbarous GAVLE hearing theſe wordes, ranne out of the chamber preſently, caſting his ſword in the middeſt of the flower, and crying out theſe wordes onely: I can not kill Caius Marius. This made the MINTVRNIANS afraide in the citie at the firſt, but afterwards it moued them to cōpaſſion. So they were angry with themſelues, and did repent them that they conuerted their counſell to ſo cruell and vnkinde a deede, againſt one that had preſerued all ITALIE: and to denie him aide in ſo extreame neceſſitie, it was too great a ſinne. Therefore let vs let him goe, ſaide they to themſelues, where he will, and ſuffer him take his fortune appointed him elſe where: and let vs pray to the goddes to pardon this offence of ours, to haue thruſt Marius naked & beggerly out of our citie. For theſe conſiderations, the MINTVRNIANS went all together to Marius where he was, and ſtoode about him, determining to ſee him ſafely conducted vnto the ſea ſide. Now though euery man was readie and willing to pleaſure him, ſome with one thing, ſome with an other, and that they did haſten him all they could poſſible, yet they were a good while a going thither: becauſe there was a wodde called Marica, that lay right in their way betwene their city & the ſea coaſt which they greatly reuerence, and thinke it a ſcriledge to carie any thing out of that wodde, that was once brought into it. On the other ſide, to leaue to goe through this wodde, and to compaſſe it rounde about, it would aske a maruellous long time. So they ſtanding all in doubt what they ſhould doe, one of the aunncienteſt men of the citie ſpake a loud vnto them, and ſaid: that there was no way forbidden them, that went about to ſaue Marius life. Then Marius himſelfe being the formoſt man, taking vp ſome of the fardels which they caried with him, to pleaſure him in the ſhip, went through the wodde. All other things neceſſary being thus readily prepared for him with like goodwil, and ſpecially the ſhippe which one Bellæus had ordained for him: he cauſed all this ſtorie to be painted in a table at large, which he gaue vnto the temple, out of the which he departed when he tooke ſhippe. After he was departed thence, the winde by good fortune caried him into the Ile of ENARIA, where he found Granius and ſome other of his friendes, with whom he tooke ſea againe, and pointed towardes AFRICKE. But lacking water, they were compelled to land in SICILIA, in the territorie of the citie of ERIX: where by chance there lay a ROMAINE Quæſtor, who kept that coaſt. Marius being landed there, ſcaped very narrowly that he was not taken of him: for he ſlew ſixteene of his men that came out with him to take water. So Marius getting him thence with all ſpeede, croſſed the ſeas, vntill he arriued in the Ile of MENYNGE, where he firſt vnderſtood that his ſonne was ſaued with Cethegus, and that they were both together gone to Hiempſall king of the NVMIDIANS to beſeech him of aide. This gaue him a litle courage, & made him bold to paſſe out of that Ile, into the coaſt of CARTHAGE. Now at that time, Sextilius a ROMAINE Prætor was gouernour of AFRICKE, vnto whom Marius had neuer done good nor hurt, and therefore he hoped, that for pity onely he might perhaps haue helpe at his hand. Howbeit he was no ſooner landed with a fewe of his men, but a ſergeant came ſtraight and ſaid vnto him: Sextilius, Prætor and gouernour of LIBYA, doth forbid thee to land in all this prouince: otherwiſe he telleth thee, that he will obey the Senates commandement, and purſue thee as an enemie of the ROMAINES. Marius hearing this commaundement, was ſo angrie and ſorie both, that he could not readily tell what anſwere to make him, and pauſed a good while, and ſaid neuer a word, ſtill eying the ſergeant with a grimme looke: vntill he asked him what anſwere he would make to the Prætors commandement. Marius then fetching a deepe ſigh from his heart, gaue him this anſwere. Thou ſhalt tell Sextilius, that thou haſt ſeene Caius Marius baniſhed out of his country, ſitting amongeſt the ruines of the citie of CARTHAGE. By this anſwere, he wiſely laide the example of the ruine and deſtruction of that great citie of CARTHAGE, before Sextilius eyes, and the change of his fortune: to warne Sextilius that the like might fall vppon him. In the meane time, Hiempſall king of the NVMIDIANS, not knowing how to reſolue, did honorably intreat young Marius and his companie. But when they were willing to goe their way, he alwaies found new occaſion to ſtay them, and was very glad to ſee that he ſtarted not for any oportunitie or good occaſion that was offered: notwithſtanding, there fortuned a happie meane vnto them, whereby they ſaued themſelues. And this it was. This Marius the younger being a faire complexioned young man, it pitied one of the kings concubines to ſee him ſo hardly dealt withal. This pitie of hers was a ſhadow to cloke the loue ſhe bare him: but Marius would not hearken at the firſt to her intiſementes, and refuſed her. Yet in the ende, perceiuing that there was no other way for him to eſcape thence, and conſidering that ſhe did all things for their auaile, more diligently and louingly then ſhe would haue done, if ſhe had not ment further matter vnto him, then onely to enioy the pleaſure of him: he then accepted her loue and kindneſſe, ſo as at the length ſhee taught him a way howe to flie, and ſaue himſelfe and his friendes. Hereupon he went to his father, and after they had imbraced and ſaluted ech other, going alongſt the ſea ſide, they found two ſcorpions fighting together. Marius tooke this for an ill ſigne: whereupon they quickly tooke a fiſher boat, & went into the Ile of CERCINA, which is no great diſtance off from firme lande. They had no ſooner hoiſed vp anker, but they ſaw the horſemen which king Hiempſall had ſent vnto the place from whence they were departed: and that was one of the greateſt dangers that Marius euer eſcaped. In the meane time there was newes at ROME, that Sylla made warre againſt king Mithridates Lieutenants: and furthermore, that the Conſuls being vp in armes the one againſt the other, Octauius wanne the battell, and being the ſtronger, had driuen out Cinna who ſought to haue vſurped tyrannicall power, and had made Cornelius Merula Conſull in his place: and that Cinna on the other ſide leauied men out of other partes of ITALIE, and made warres vpon them that were in ROME. Marius hearing of this diſſention, thought good to returne as ſoone as he could poſſible into ITALIE. And aſſembling certaine horſemen of the nation of the MAVRVSIANS in AFRICKE, and certaine ITALIANS that had ſaued themſelues there, vnto the number of a thouſand men in all: he tooke ſea, and landed in a hauen of THVSCANE called TELAMON, and being landed, proclaimed by ſound of trompet, libertie to all ſlaues and bondmen that would come to him. So the labourers, heardmen and neateheardes of all that march, for the onely name and reputation of Marius, ranne to the ſea ſide from all partes: of the which he hauing choſen out the ſtouteſt and luſtieſt of them, wanne them ſo by faire wordes, that hauing gathered a great companie together in fewe daies, he made fortie ſaile of them. Furthermore, knowing that Octauius was a maruellous honeſt man, that would haue no authoritie otherwiſe then law and reaſon would: and that Cinna to the contrarie was ſuſpected of Sylla, & that he ſought to bring in change and innouation to the common wealth, he determined to ioyne his force with Cinna. So Marius ſent firſt vnto Cinna, to let him vnderſtande that he would obey him as Conſull, and be readie to doe all that he ſhould commaund him.

Cinna receiued him, and gaue him the title and authoritie of Viceconſull, and ſent him ſergeants to carie axes and roddes before him, with all other ſignes of publicke authoritie. But Marius refuſed them, and ſaide, that pompe became not his miſerable fortune: for hee euer went in a poore threede-bare gowne, and had let his haire grow ſtill after he was baniſhed, being aboue threeſcore and tenne yeares olde, and had a ſober gate with him, to make men pitie him the more that ſaw him. But vnder all this counterfaite pitie of his, he neuer changed his naturall looke, which was euer more fearefull and terrible then otherwiſe. And where he ſpake but litle, and went very demurely and ſoberly, that ſhewed rather a cankered courage within him, then a mind humbled by his baniſhment. Thus when he had ſaluted Cinna, and ſpoken to the ſouldiers: he then beganne to ſet things abroach, and made a wonderfull change in fewe daies. For firſt of all, with his ſhips he cut off all the victuals by ſea, and robbed the marchants that caried corne and other victuals to ROME: ſo that in a ſhort ſpace he was maſter purueyer for all neceſſarie prouiſion and victuals. After this he went alongſt the coaſt, and tooke all the cities vpon the ſea ſide, and at the length wanne OSTIA alſo by treaſon, put the moſt part of them in the towne to the ſword, and ſpoyled all their goods: and afterwards making a bridge vpon the riuer of Tiber, tooke from his enemies all hope to haue any manner of prouiſion by ſea.

That done, he went directly towards ROME with his armie, where firſt he wanne the hill called Ianiculum through Octauius fault: who ouerthrewe himſelfe in his doinges, not ſo much for lacke of reaſonable skill of warres, as through his vnprofitable curioſitie and ſtrictnes in obſeruing the law. For when diuerſe did perſwade him to ſet the bondmen at liberty to take armes for defence of the common wealth: he anſwered, that he would neuer giue bondmen the law and priuiledge of a ROMAINE citizen, hauing driuen Caius Marius out of ROME, to maintaine the authoritie of the law. But when Cæcilius Metellus was come to ROME, the ſonne of that Metellus Numidicus, that hauing begunne the warres in LIBYA againſt King Iugurthe, was put out by Marius: the ſouldiers forſooke Octauius immediatly, and came vnto him, becauſe they tooke him to be a better Captaine, and deſired alſo to haue a leader that could tell how to commaund them to ſaue the citie, and the common wealth. For they promiſed to fight valiantly, and perſwaded themſelues that they ſhould ouercome their enemies, ſo that they had a ſkilfull and valiant Captaine that could order them. Metellus miſliking their offer, commanded them in anger to returne againe vnto the Conſull: but they for ſpight went vnto their enemies. Metellus on the other ſide, ſeeing no good order taken in the citie to reſiſt the enemies, got him out of ROME.

But Octauius being perſwaded by certaine Soothſaiers and CHALDEAN ſacrificers, who promiſed him all ſhould goe well with him, taried ſtill in ROME. For that man being otherwiſe, as wiſe as any ROMAINE of his time, and one that dealt as vprightly in his Conſulſhippe, not caried away with flattering tales, and one alſo that followed the auncient orders and cuſtomes as infallible rules and examples, neither breaking nor omitting any part therof: me thinkes yet had this imperfection, that he frequented the Soothſaiers, wiſemen, and aſtronomers, more then men ſkilfull in armes and gouernment.

Wherfore, before that Marius himſelfe came into the citie, Octauius was by force pluckt out of the pulpit for orations, and ſlaine preſently by Marius ſouldiers, whom he had ſent before into the citie. And it is ſaid alſo, that when he was ſlaine, they found a figure of a CHALDEAN prophecie in his boſome: and here is to be noted a great contrarietie in theſe two notable men, Octauius and Marius. The firſt loſt his life by truſting to ſoothſaying, and the ſecond proſpered, & roſe againe, becauſe he did not deſpiſe the arte of diuination. The ſtate of ROME ſtanding then in this manner, the Senate conſulting together, ſent Ambaſſadors vnto Cinna and Marius, to pray them to come peaceably into ROME, and not to embrue their hands with the bloud of their citizens. Cinna ſitting in his chaire as Conſull, gaue them audience, & made them a very reaſonable and courteous anſwere. Marius ſtanding by him ſpake neuer a word: but ſhewed by his ſower looke that he would ſtaight fill ROME with murder and bloud. So when the Ambaſſadors were gone, Cinna came into ROME enuironned with a great number of ſouldiers: but Marius ſtaied ſodainely at the gate, ſpeaking partly in anger, and partly in mockerie, that he was a baniſhed man, and driuen out of his country by law. And therefore if they would haue him come into ROME againe, they ſhould firſt by a contrary decree aboliſh and reuoke that of his baniſhment, as if he had bene a religious obſeruer of the lawes, and as though ROME had at that preſent enioyed their freedome and libertie. Thus he made the people aſſemble in the market place to proceede to the confirmation of his calling home againe. But before three or foure tribes had time to giue their voices, diſguiſing the matter no longer, and ſhewing plainely that he ment not to be lawfully called home againe from exile: he came into ROME with a guard about him, of the verieſt raſcals, & moſt ſhameleſſe ſlaues, called the BARDIOEIANS, who came to him from all parts: and they for the leaſt word he ſpake, or at the twinckling of his eye, or at a nodde of his head made to them, ſlew many men through his commaundement, and at the length ſlew Ancharius a Senator (that had bene Prætor) at Marius feete with their ſwordes, becauſe only that Marius did not ſalute him when he came one day to ſpeake with him. After this murther, they continued killing all them that Marius did not ſalute, and ſpeake vnto: for that was the verie ſigne he had giuen them, to kill them openly in the ſtreetes before euery man, ſo that his very friendes were afeard of being murthered, when they came to ſalute him. Thus being a great number of men ſlaine, Cinna in the end beganne to be ſatisfied, and to appeaſe his anger. But Marius anger and vnſatiable deſire of reuenge increaſed more and more, ſo that he ſpared not one if he ſuſpected him neuer ſo litle: and there was neither towne nor high way, that was not full of ſkoutes & ſpies to hunt them out that hid themſelues and fled. Then experience taught them, that no friende is faithfull, and to be truſted, if fortune eſpecially frowne neuer ſo litle: for there were very fewe that did not betray their friendes that fled to them for ſuccour. And therefore doe Cornutus ſeruants ſo much the more deſerue praiſe, who hauing ſecretly hidden their maſter in his houſe, did hang the dead body of ſome common perſon by the necke, and hauing put a golde ring on his finger, they ſhewed him to the BARDIOEIANS, Marius guard, and buried him in ſteede of their owne maſter, without ſuſpition of any man that it was a fained thing: and ſo Cornutus being hidden by his ſeruants, was ſafely conueyed into the country of GAVLE. Marke Anthony the Orator had alſo found out a faithfull friende, yet was he vnfortunate. This faithfull friend of his, was a poore ſimple man, who hauing receiued one of the chiefeſt men of ROME into his houſe to keepe him cloſe there: he being deſirous to make him the beſt chere he could with that litle he had, ſent one of his men to the next tauerne to fetch wine, and taſting the wine more curiouſly then he was wont to do, he called for better. The drawer aſked him why the new ordinarie wine would not ſerue him, but he muſt needes haue of the beſt and deareſt: the fooliſh fellow ſimply anſwered him (telling him as his familiar friend) that his maſter did feaſt Marke Anthony, who was hidden very ſecretly in his houſe. He was no ſooner gone with his wine, & his backe turned, but the vile traiterous drawer ranne vnto Marius, who was ſet at ſupper whē he came. The drawer being brought vnto him, promiſed him to deliuer Marke Anthonie into his handes. Marius hearing that, was ſo iocond, that he cried out and clapt his handes together for ioy: and would haue riſen from the borde, and gone thither himſelfe in perſon, had not his friendes kept him backe. But he ſent Annius one of his Captaines thither with a certaine number of ſouldiers, and commaunded them to bring him his heade quickely. So they went thither, and when they were come to the houſe which the drawer had brought them to, Annius taried beneath at the dore, and the ſouldiers went vp the ſtaiers into the chamber, and finding Anthony there, they beganne to encourage one an other to kill him, not one of them hauing the heart to lay handes vppon him. For Anthonies tongue was as ſweete as a Syrene, and had ſuch an excellent grace in ſpeaking, that when he began to ſpeake vnto the ſouldiers, and to pray them to ſaue his life: there was not one of them ſo hard harted, as once to touch him, no not onely to looke him in the face, but looking downewards, fell a weeping. Annius perceiuing they taried long, and came not downe, went himſelfe vp into the chamber, and found Anthonie talking to his ſouldiers, and them weeping, his ſweete eloquent tongue had ſo melted their heartes: but rating them, ranne furiouſly vpon him, and ſtrake off his head with his owne handes. And Catulus Luctatius alſo, that had bene Conſull with Marius, and had triumphed ouer the CIMBRES with him, ſeeing himſelfe in this perill, ſet men to intreat Marius for him: but his anſwere was euer, he muſt needes die. So Catulus locked himſelfe into a litle chamber, and made a great fire of charcole to be kindled, and with the ſmoke thereof choked himſelfe. Now after their heads were cut off, they threw out the naked bodies into the ſtreetes, and trodde them vnder their feete: the which was not onely a pitifull, but a fearefull ſight to all that ſawe them. But after all this yet, there was nothing that grieued the people ſo much, as the horrible leachery and abhominable crueltie of this guard of the BARDIÆIANS, who comming into mens houſes by force, after they had ſlaine the maſters, defiled their young children, and rauiſhed their wiues and maides, and no man would once reproue their crueltie, leacherie, and vnſatiable auarice: vntill Cinna and Sertorius in the end ſet vpon them as they ſlept in their campe, and ſlew them euery one. But in this extremitie, as if all things had bene reſtored vnto their firſt eſtate, newes came againe from all parts to ROME, that Sylla hauing ended his warre againſt king Mithridates, and recouered the prouinces which he had vſurped: returned into ITALY with a great power. This cauſed theſe euils and vnſpeakeable miſeries to ceaſe a litle, becauſe the wicked doers of the ſame, looked they ſhould haue warres on their backes ere it were long. Whereupon Marius was choſen Conſull the ſeuenth time. He going out of his houſe openly the firſt day of Ianuarie, being the beginning of the yeare, to take poſſeſſion of his Conſulſhippe: cauſed one Sextus Lucinus to be throwen downe headlong from the rock Tarpeian, which ſeemed to be a great ſigne and certaine token of the euils and miſeries, that fell out afterwardes the ſelfe ſame yeare vpon them of their faction, and vnto all the citie beſide. But Marius being ſore broken with his former troubles, and his minde oppreſſed with extreame ſorow and griefe, could not now at this laſt time of neede plucke vp his heart to him againe, when he came to thinke of this new toward warre that threatned him, and of the dangers, griefes, and troubles he ſhould enter into, more great and perilous then any he had paſſed before. For through the great experience he had in warres, he trembled for feare when he beganne to thinke of it, conſidering that he had to fight, not with Octauius, nor with Merula, Captaines of a companie of rebels gathered together: but with a noble Sylla, that had driuen him out of ROME before, and that came now from driuing the puiſant king Mithridates, vnto the furtheſt part of the realme of PONT, and of the ſea Euxinum. Thus, deepely waighing and conſidering the ſame, and ſpecially when he looked backe vpon his long time of baniſhment, how vacabondlike he wandered vp and downe in other countries, and remembred the great misfortunes he had paſſed, and the ſundry dangers he fell ſo often into, being purſued ſtill by ſea and by lande: it grieued him to the heart, and made him ſo vnquiet, that hee could not ſleepe in the night, or if he ſlept, had fearefull dreames that troubled him, and ſtill he thought he heard a voice buzzing in his eares,

A Lyons very denne, is dreadfull to behold,
Though he himſelfe be gone abroad, and be not there in hold.

Deuiſe to win ſleepe.

But fearing moſt of all that he ſhould no more ſleepe and take his reſt, he gaue himſelfe to make vnreaſonable banquets, and to drinke more then his yeares could beare, ſeeking to win ſleepe by this meanes, to auoide care the better. But at the length there came one from the ſea, that gaue him certaine intelligence of all: and that was an increaſe of a new feare vnto him. And thus he being now extreamely troubled, partly for feare of the thing to come, and partly alſo for the ouer heauie burden of his preſent ill, there needed but litle more aggrauation, to fall into the diſeaſe whereof he died, which was a pleuriſie: as Poſidonius the Philoſopher writeth, who ſaith plainely that he went into his chamber when he was ſicke, and ſpake vnto him about matters of his Ambaſſade, for the which he came to ROME. Yet an other hiſtoriographer Caius Piſo writeth, that Marius walking one day after ſupper with his friendes, fell in talke of his fortune from the beginning of his life, telling them at large how often fortune had turned with and againſt him: concluding, that it is no wiſe mans part to truſt her any more. So when he had done, he tooke his leaue of them, and layed him downe vpon his bed, where he lay ſicke ſeuen dayes together, and on the ſeuenth day dyed. Some write that his ambition appeared plainly, by a ſtrange rauing that tooke him in his head during his ſickeneſſe. For he thought that he made warres with Mithridates, & ſhewed in his bed all his geſtures and mouings of his body, as if he had bene in a battell, crying the ſelfe ſame cryes out aloud, which he was wont to crie whẽ he was in the extremeſt fight. The deſire he had to haue takẽ this charge in hand againſt Mithridates, was ſo deepely ſetled in his minde through extreme ambition & ielouſie that poſſeſt him: that being then three ſcore and ten yeare old, after he had bene the firſt man that euer was choſen ſeuen times Conſull in ROME, and alſo after that he had gotten a world of goods and richeſſe together that might haue ſufficed many kings: yet for all this he dyed for ſorrow, lamenting his hard fortune, as if he had dyed before his time, and before that he had done and ended that which he had deſired. But this was cleane contrary vnto that the wiſe Plato did, when he drew neare to his death. For he gaue God thankes for his fatall end & good fortune. Firſt, for that he had made him a reaſonable man, and no brute beaſt: ſecondly, a Greeke and no barbarous man: and furthermore, for that he was borne in Socrates time. It is reported alſo, that one Antipater of THARSIS, calling to minde a litle before his death the good fortune he had in his life time, did not forget among other things, to tell of the happy nauigation he made, comming from his country vnto ATHENS: which did witneſſe that he put vpon the fyle of his good accounts for a ſingular great grace, all fauour fortune had ſhewed him, and that he kept it in perpetuall memorie, being the only and moſt aſſured treaſure a man can haue, to keepe thoſe giftes that nature or fortune do beſtow vpon him. But contrariwiſe vnthankfull fooles vnto God and nature both, do forget with time the memory of their former benefites, and laying vp nothing, nor keeping it in perpetuall memory, are alwayes voyde of goodes and full of hope, gaping ſtill for things to come and leauing in the meane time the things preſent, though reaſon perſwades them the contrary. For fortune may eaſily let them of the thing to come, but ſhe can not take that from them which is already paſt: and yet they vtterly forget the certaine benefit of fortune, as a thing nothing belonging vnto them, and dreame alwayes of that which is vncertaine. And ſure it chaunceth to them by great reaſon. For, hauing gathered outward goods together, and locking them vp before they haue built & layd a ſure grounded foundation of reaſon through good learning: they can not afterwards fill nor quench their vnſatiable greedy couetous minde. Thus ended Marius his life, the ſeuenteenth day of his ſeuenth Conſulſhip, whereof all the citie of ROME was not a litle glad, and tooke hart againe vnto them, ſuppoſing they had then bene deliuered from a bloudy cruell tyranny. But within few dayes after they knew it to their coſt, that they had changed an old maiſter taken out of the world, for a younger that came but newly to them: ſuch extreme vnnaturall cruelties, & murthers did Marius the younger cõmit, after the death of his father Marius, murthering in manner all the chiefeſt noble men of ROME. At the firſt, they tooke him for a valiant and hardy young man, whereupon they named him the ſonne of Mars: but ſhortly after his deedes did ſhew the contrary, and then they called him the ſonne of Venus. In the end he was ſhut in, and beſieged by Sylla in the citie of PERVSIA, where he did what he could poſſible to ſaue his life, but all was in vaine: and laſtly, ſeeing no way to eſcape, the citie being taken, he ſlue himſelfe with his owne handes.

IN the treaſurie of the ACANTHIANS, which is in the temple of Apollo at DELPHES, there is this inſcription: Braſidas, and the ACANTHIANS, with the ſpoyle of the ATHENIANS. That inſcription maketh many men thinke, that the image of ſtone that ſtandeth within the chamber by the doore thereof, is the image of Braſidas : howbeit in truth it is the liuely image of Lyſander himſelf, made with a great buſh of haire, & a thicke long beard after the old ancient faſhion. And where ſome ſay that the ARGIVES, after they were ouercome and had loſt a great battell, did all of them ſhaue themſelues in token and ſigne of common ſorrow : and that the LACEDÆMONIANS on the other ſide to ſhew the ioy of their victory, did let all their haires grow, that is not true. No more then this is true which other do report of the BACCHIADES: who being fled frō CORINTHE vnto LACEDÆMON, the LACEDÆMONIANS found thē ſo illfauoredly diſguiſed & deformed, becauſe their heads were all ſhauen, that thereupon they had a deſire to let their haire and beardes grow. For that was one of the ordinaunces of Lycurgus, who ſayd that the long buſh of haire, maketh them that are naturally fayre, the pleaſanter to looke vpon: and thoſe that are ill fauored, more ougly and fearefull to ſee to. And furthermore, it is ſayd that Ariſtoclitus, the father of Lyſander, was not of the royall bloud of the kings of SPARTA, though he came of the race of the Heraclides: and that his ſonne Lyſander was very meanely and poorely brought vp, being as obedient to the lawes and ſtatutes of his country, as any other man was, ſhewing himſelfe alwayes very ſtrong and conſtant againſt all vanitie and pleaſure, ſauing onely in matters of honour and curteſie, which they offer vnto thoſe that deſerue well. For they thinke it no ſhame nor diſhoneſty in SPARTA, that the young men do ſuffer themſelues to be ouercome with that delight and pleaſure : but do bring vp their children, that from their youth they would haue them to haue ſome taſt and feeling of honour, delighting to be praiſed, and ſory to be diſcommēded. For they make no account of him that is not moued with the one nor the other, but take him to be of a baſe cowardly nature, that hath no manner of minde to do good. And therefore it is to be thought, that the ambition and ſtoutneſſe that was bred in Lyſander, proceeded of the LACONICALL diſcipline and education he had, and not ſo much of his owne nature. But indeede of his owne nature he was a right courtier, & could tell how to entertaine and flatter great ſtates & nobility, farre better then the common manner of the naturall SPARTIANS: & moreouer for his priuate benefit, he could eaſily beare with the ſtoutneſſe of greater men of authority then himſelfe, which ſome iudge to be a great point of wiſedome, to know how to deale in matters of ſtate. Ariſtotle in a place where he ſayth, that the greateſt wits commonly are ſubiect vnto melancholie, (as Socrates, Plato, and Hercules were) writeth, that Lyſander in his later age fell into the melancholie diſeaſe, but not in his youth. He had alſo this ſingular gift aboue all other, that in his pouerty he alwayes kept that honeſt modeſty with him, as he would neuer be ouercome nor corrupted with gold nor ſiluer: and yet he filled his country with riches and couetouſneſſe, which loſt him the reputation he had wonne, becauſe himſelfe made none account of riches nor getting. For bringing ſtore of gold & ſiluer into his country after he had ouercome the ATHENIANS, he reſerued not vnto himſelfe one Drachma onely. And furthermore, whē Dyoniſius the tyrāt of SYRACVSA had on a time ſent goodly rich gownes out of SICILIA to his daughters: he refuſed them, ſaying, that he was afrayed ſuch gownes would make them fowler. Neuertheleſſe, ſhortly after being ſent Ambaſſadour out of his country vnto the ſame tyrant, Dionyſius ſending him two gownes, praying him to chooſe which of the two he would cary to his daughter: he anſwered, that ſhe her ſelfe could beſt chooſe which was the fitter, and ſo caried both with him. But now to come to his doings in warlike cauſes: the warres of PELOPONNESVS fell out maruellous lōg. For after the ouerthrow of the army which the ATHENIANS had ſent into SICILIA, whē euery man thought they had vtterly loſt all their force by ſea, and that by all coniecture they ſhould ſoone after looſe all by land alſo: Alcibiades returning from his exile to deale againe in matters of the ſtate, made an exceeding great change and alteration. For he ſet the ATHENIANS a flote againe, and made them as ſtrong by ſea as the LACEDÆMONIANS: who thereupon began to quake for feare, and to looke eftſoones for a freſh warre, perceiuing that they ſtood in neede of a greater power, and of a better Captaine then euer they had before. Whereupon they made Lyſander their Admirall, who arriuing in the citie of EPHESVS, found them very well affected towardes him, & maruellous willing and ready to take the LACEDÆMONIANS part: howbeit otherwiſe in very poore ſtate, and ready almoſt to take vp all the barbarous maners and faſhions of the PERSIANS, becauſe they did continually frequent them, being enuironned round about with the coūtry of LYDIA, where the king of PERSIAES captaines were euer reſident. Wherefore, hauing planted his camp there, he brought thither marchants ſhippes out of all parts, and ſet vp an arſenall or ſtore houſe to build gallies in: ſo that in ſhort ſpace, by oft recourſe of marchants that began to trade thither, he quickened their hauens, and ſet vp their ſtaple againe for the trafficke of marchandiſe, and filled euery priuate artificers houſe with an honeſt trade to make them rich by, ſo that euer after it grew in continuall hope to come vnto that floriſhing ſtate and greatneſſe, in the which we ſee it at this preſent. Furthermore, Lyſander being aduertiſed that Cyrus, one of the great king of PERSIAES ſonnes, was come vnto the citie of SARDIS, he went thither to ſpeake with him, and to complaine of Tiſaphernes: who hauing commandement giuen him from the king to aide the LACEDÆMONIANS, and to helpe to expulſe the ATHENIANS, and to driue them from the ſea, ſeemed to deale but coldly and faintly againſt them, for the fauour he bare to Alcibiades. For, furniſhing the LACEDÆMONIANS very ſcantly with money, was an occaſiō that all their army by ſea went to wracke. Cyrus for his owne part was very glad that he heard complaints of Tiſaphernes, and that they ſpake againſt him: becauſe he was an ill man, and the rather for that he had himſelfe a litle odde grudge to him. Wherfore he loued Lyſander maruellous well, as well for the complaints he made of Tiſaphernes, as alſo for the pleaſure he tooke in his companie, becauſe he was a man that could wonderfully pleaſe and delight noble men: by which meanes hauing wonne the fauour of this yoūg Prince, he did perſwade, & alſo incourage him to follow this warre. And when Lyſander was vpon his departure to take his leaue of him, Cyrus feaſted him, and afterwardes prayed him not to refuſe the offer of his liberalitie, and that was: that he would freely aske him what he would, aſſuring him he ſhould not be denied any thing. Whereunto Lyſander anſwered him. Sithence I ſee (Cyrus) you are ſo willing to pleaſure vs, I beſeech you and do alſo counſell you then to encreaſe the ordinary pay of our mariners, one halfe penny a day: to the end that where now they haue but three halfe pence, they may thenceforth receaue two pence a day. Cyrus was glad to heare Lyſanders bounty, and the increaſe that he would make, and cauſed ten thouſand Darickes to be deliuered him: by meane whereof he added to the ordinary pay of the mariners, the increaſe of a halfe penny a day. This liberalitie, within few dayes after, emptied all their enemies gallies of their men. For, the moſt part of their mariners and gallie men went where they might haue the beſt pay: and ſuch as remained behind, became very dull, laſie, and ſeditious, daily troubling their Captaines & gouernours. Now though Lyſander had drawen his enemies men from them by this policie, and had done this great hurt, yet he durſt not fight it out by ſea, fearing the worthineſſe of Alcibiades: who was a valiant man, and had greater ſtore of ſhippes then he had, and beſides that, was neuer ouercome by land nor by ſea, in any battell where he was generall. So it chaunced, that Alcibiades went out of the Ile of SAMOS, vnto the citie of PHOCEA, which ſtandeth vpon firme land directly ouer againſt SAMOS, and leauing the whole charge of his fleete in his abſence, with Antiochus his pylot: he being more hardie then wiſe, in ſcorne and deriſion of Lyſander, went with two gallies only into the hauen of EPHESVS, and went by the arſenall (where all their ſhippes lay in docke) with great noyſe & laughing. This put Lyſander in ſuch a heate and chaſe, that firſt of all he put a few gallies to the ſea, and had him in chaſe with them. But afterwardes, perceiuing that the other Captaines of the ATHENIANS came out one after an other to the reſcue, he armed other gallies alſo: ſo that ſupplying ſtill with a few on either ſide, at length they came to a maine battell, which Lyſander wanne, and hauing taken fifteen of their gallies, he ſet vp a token of triumphe and victory. When the people at ATHENS heard the newes of this ouerthrow, they were ſo angry with Alcibiades, that they diſcharged him preſently of his charge: and the ſouldiers alſo that lay in camp in the Ile of SAMOS, began to miſlike him, and to ſpeake ill of him. Whereupon he preſently left his camp, and went into the country of CHERRONESSVS in THRACIA. This battell was more ſpoken of then there was cauſe, by reaſon of Alcibiades reputation. Furthermore, Lyſander cauſing the ſtouteſt and boldeſt men of euery citie, aboue the common ſort, to come to EPHESVS vnto him: layed there ſecret foundations of great change and alteration, which he ſtabliſhed afterwardes in the gouernementes of cities. For he perſwaded his priuate friendes to make tribes amongeſt themſelues to winne them friendes, and to practiſe to get the rule of their cities into their handes: promiſing them, that ſo ſoone as the ATHENIANS were ouerthrowen, they themſelues alſo ſhould be deliuered from ſubiection of their people, and euery one of them ſhould beare chiefe rule in their country. And thus he performed to them all, and made euery one of them proue his wordes true. For he preferred all them that had bene his old friendes, vnto the beſt offices and charges: not ſparing to do againſt all right and reaſon, ſo that they were aduaunced by it. And this by this meanes, euery man came to take his part, and they all ſought and deſired to gratifie and pleaſe him: hoping, that what great matter ſoeuer fell out, they aſſured themſelues in maner that they ſhould obtaine it of him, when he came to haue the gouernement in his own hands. And therefore they nothing reioyced at Callicratidas comming, who came to ſucceede him in the office of the Admirall: neither afterwardes alſo, when they ſaw by experience that he was as honeſt and iuſt a man as could be. Neither did they like his manner of gouerning which was plaine, and without any art or cunning. But they commended the perfection of his vertue, as they would haue done the image of ſome demy god made after the old faſhion, which had bene of ſingular beauty. But in the meane time, they wiſhed for Lyſander, as well for the tender loue and good will he bare to his friends and them, as alſo for the profit and commoditie they got by him. So when Lyſander tooke the ſeas to returne home againe, all they that were in the camp, were as ſory as could be poſsible, in ſomuch as the teares ſtood in their eyes: & he on the other ſide, ſtudied to make them worſe affected vnto Callicratidas. For amongeſt many other things, he ſent the reſt of the money backe againe to SARDIS, which Cyrus had giuen him to pay the mariners: ſaying, that Callicratidas ſhould go himſelfe to aske it, if he would haue it, and finde the meanes to entertaine his men. And laſtly, when he was ready to imbarke, he proteſted before all them that were preſent, that he did deliuer, leaue, and aſsigne ouer the armie into his handes, commanding all the ſea. But Callicratidas, to ouercome his falſe ambition, and fowle boaſting lye, aunſwered him againe, and ſayd. If that be true thou ſayeſt, come then and deliuer me the gallies in the citie of MILETVM, as thou goeſt by, before the Ile of SAMOS: for ſith thou commandeſt all the ſea, we ſhall not neede to feare our enemies that are in SAMOS. Lyſander thereto replied, that the armie was no more at his commandement, and that he had the charge ouer them: & ſo departed thence, taking his courſe directly vnto PELOPONNESVS, and left Callicratidas in great perplexitie. For he had brought no money out of his coũtry with him, neither would he compell the cities to furniſh him with any, ſeeing that they were at that time too much troubled already. Then had he no other way but to go to the Lieutenants of the king of PERSIA, to aske them money as Lyſander had done. But he was the vnmeeteſt man for it that could be poſsible: for he was of a noble and liberall nature, and thought it leſſe diſhonour and reproch vnto the GRECIANS, to be ouercome by other GRECIANS, then to go flatter the barbarous people, and ſeeke to them that had gold and ſiluer enough, but otherwiſe, no goodneſſe nor honeſty. In the end notwithſtãding, making vertue of neceſsity, he tooke his iourney towardes LYDIA, & went directly to Cyrus court: where at his firſt comming he willed them to let him vnderſtãd, that Callicratidas the Admirall of the LACEDÆMONIANS would ſpeake with him. One of the ſouldiers that warded at the gate, told him: my friend, ſir ſtranger, Cyrus is not at leaſure now, for he is ſet at dinner. Callicratidas aunſwered plainly againe: no force, I will tary here till he haue dined. The barbarous PERSIANS hearing this, tooke him for ſome plaine lout, and ſo he went his way the firſt time with a mocke at their handes. But the ſecond time when they would not let him come in at the gate, he fell in a rage, and returned backe (as he came) to the citie of EPHESVS, curſing & banning them that at the firſt had ſo much imbaſed themſelues, as to go ſue to the barbarous people, teaching them to be proude and ſtately for their goodes and riches: ſwearing before them all that were preſent, that ſo ſoone as he came to SPARTA againe, he would do all that he could poſsible to pacifie the GRECIANS, and ſet them at peace one with an other, to the end they might be fearefull to the barbarous people, and alſo that they ſhould medle with them no more, nor need their aide to deſtroy one an other. But Callicratidas hauing the noble hart of a SPARTAN, and being to be compared in iuſtice, valiancy, and greatneſſe of courage, with the moſt excellenteſt GRECIANS in his time, dyed ſhortly after in a battell by ſea, which he loſt vpon the Iles ARGINVSES. Wherefore, the confederates of the LACEDÆMONIANS ſeeing that their ſtate was in declining, they altogether ſent an Ambaſſade vnto SPARTA, by whom they made requeſt to the councell, that they would ſend Lyſander againe for their Admirall: promiſing that they would do all things with better courage and good will vnder his conduction, then they would vnder any other Captaine they could ſend thẽ. So much did Cyrus alſo write vnto them. But becauſe there was an expreſſe law forbidding that one man ſhould be twiſe Admirall, and beſides, they being willing to grant the requeſt of their confederates, made one Aracus their Admirall, but in effect gaue Lyſander the whole authoritie of all things. Who was maruellous welcome vnto them, and ſpecially vnto the heades and rulers of cities, which long before had wiſhed for his comming: becauſe that by his meanes they hoped to make their authority greater, and altogether to take away the authoritie from the people. But they that loued plaine dealing, and open magnanimitie in the manners of a gouernour and generall, when they came to compare Lyſander with Callicratidas, they found that Lyſander had a fine ſubtill head, and did more in warres with his policie and ſubtiltie, then by any other meanes. And moreouer, that he eſteemed iuſtice, when it fell out profitable: and tooke profit, for iuſtice and honeſtie, not thinking that plaine dealing was of better force then craft, but meaſuring the value of the one and the other, by the profit that came out of them, and mocking of them that ſayd that the race of Hercules ſhould not make warres with craft and ſubtiltie. For ſayd he, when the lyons skinne wil not ſerue, we muſt helpe it with the caſe of a foxe. And hereunto agreeth that, which they write he did in the citie of MILETVM. For his friends and familiars to whom he had promiſed aide for deſtruction of the peoples authoritie, and to driue their enemies out of the city:

The death of Callicratidas.

Lyſander craftie and deceitfull.

they hauing changed their mindes, and being reconciled vnto their aduerſaries, he openly made great ſhew of gladneſſe, and ſeemed as though he would helpe to agree them together: but ſecretly being alone, he tooke them vp ſharply, and told them that they were cowardes to do it, and did procure them to the contrary, to ſet vpon the people. And then when he vnderſtood that there was commotion among them in the citie, he ranne thither ſodainly as it were to appeaſe it. But when he was alſo come into the citie, the firſt he met with of them that would alter the ſtate of gouernement, and take the authoritie from the people: he fell out withall, aud gaue them rough wordes, commanding with extremitie that they ſhould follow him, as though he would haue done ſome great puniſhment. And againe, meeting with them on the contrary part, he willed them alſo that they ſhould not be afrayed, nor doubt that any man ſhould do them hurt where he was. This was a wicked and malitious practiſe of him, to ſtay the chiefeſt of them that were moſt affected to the popular faction, to the end that afterwardes he might put them all to death, as he did. For they that truſting to his wordes remained quiet in the citie were all put to death. Moreouer, Androclidas touching this matter, hath left in writing that which Lyſander was wont to ſay: by the which it appeareth, that he made very litle reckening to be periured. For he ſayd, that children ſhould be deceiued with the play of kayles, and men with othes of men, following therein Polycrates, the tyrant of SAMOS, but without reaſon: for he was a lawfull Captaine, and the other a violent vſurper of tyrannicall power. Furthermore, it was not done like a true LACONIAN, to behaue himſelfe towardes the gods none otherwiſe, then towardes men, but rather worſe, and more iniuriouſly. For he that deceiueth his enemy, and breaketh his oth to him: ſheweth plainly that he feareth him, but that he careth not for God. Cyrus therefore hauing ſent for Lyſander to come to SARDIS to him, gaue him money largely, and promiſed him more: and becauſe he would more honorably ſhew the good will he had to gratifie him, told him, that if the king his father would giue him nothing, yet he would giue him of his own. And furthermore, whẽ all other meanes fayled to helpe him with money, that rather then he ſhould lacke, he would melt his owne chaire to make money of (which he ſate in when he gaue audience in matters of iuſtice) being altogether of gold and ſiluer. And to be ſhort, when he was going into MEDIA to the king his father, he gaue Lyſander power to receiue the taxes and ordinary tributes of the cities vnder his gouernement, and made him Lieutenant of all his country. And laſtly, bidding him farewell, prayed him that he would not giue battell by ſea vnto the ATHENIANS, vntill he returned from the court: and that before his comming againe he would haue authoritie to leauie a great number of ſhippes, aſwell out of PHOENICIA, as out of CILICIA. Wherefore whileſt Cyrus was in his iourney, Lyſander not being able to fight with his enemies with like number of ſhippes, nor alſo to lye ſtill and do nothing with ſo good a number of gallies, went and ſcoured the ſeas, where he tooke certaine Ilandes, and robbed alſo ÆGINA and SALAMINA. From thence he went and landed on the firme land in the countrey of ATTICA, and did his duetie there vnto Agis king of LACEDÆMONIA, who came purpoſly from the fort of Decelea to the ſea ſide to ſee him, becauſe their army by land alſo ſhould ſee what power they had by ſea, and how it ruled more by ſea then they would. Neuertheleſſe, being aduertiſed that the fleete of the ATHENIANS followed hard after him, he tooke an other courſe to flye backe againe into ASIA by the Iles: and returning againe, found all the country of HELLESPONT without men of warre. So he layd ſiege before the citie of LAMPSACVS, and did aſſault it with his gallies by ſea: and Thorax being come thither alſo at the ſelfe ſame time in great haſt with his army by land, gaue the aſſault on his ſide. Thus was the citie taken by force, which Lyſander left to the ſpoyle of the ſouldiers. Now in the meane time the fleete of the ATHENIANS (which was a hundred and foure ſcore ſaile) came to an ancker before the citie of ELEVNTE, in the country of CHERRONESVS: and newes being brought them that the city of LAMPSACVS was takẽ, they came with all ſpeed poſſible vnto the city of SESTOS, where getting freſh cates and victuals, they coaſted all alongeſt the coaſt vnto a certaine place called the goates riuer, directly ouer againſt the fleete of their enemies, which lay yet at ancker before the citie of LAMPSACVS. Now there was a captaine of the ATHENIANS amongeſt other called Philocles, he that perſwaded the ATHENIANS to cut off the priſoners thumbes of their right hands that were taken in the warres, to the end they ſhould no more handle the pike, but only ſerue to pull the ower. Both the one and the other reſted that day, hoping to haue battell without faile the next morning. But Lyſander hauing an other meaning with him, commaunded the maiſters and mariners notwithſtanding, that they ſhould haue their galleyes ready to giue battell the next morning by breake of day, becauſe euery man ſhould get a borde betimes, and ſhould keepe themſelues in order of battell, making no noiſe at all, attending what he would command them: and further, made the armie by lande alſo to be ranged in battell ray, by the ſea ſide. The next morning at ſunne riſing, the Athenians began to row with all their gallies ſet in order of battell in a fronte. But Lyſander, though he had his ſhips in order to fight, the prores lying towards the enemies before day, rowed not for all that againſt them, but ſending out pinnaſies vnto the firſt galleys, commaunded them ſtraightly that they ſhould not ſtirre at all, but keepe themſelues in order, making no noiſe, nor rowing againſt the enemie. Though the Athenians alſo were retired in the night, he would not giue the ſouldiers leaue to come to lande out of the galleys, before he had ſent firſt two or three gallies to diſcrie the fleete of his enemies: who brought him word that they had ſeene the Athenians take lande. The next morning they did the like, the third day, and the fourth alſo all in one ſorte: ſo that the Athenians began to be bolde of themſelues, and to deſpiſe their enemies, imagining they lay thus cloſe for feare of them, and durſt not come forward. In the meane time, Alcibiades (who lay at that time in the country of Cherronesvs, in certaine places which he had conquered) came riding to the campe of the Athenians, to tell the Captaines and generals of the armie, the great faultes they committed. Firſt, for that they had caſt ancker, and kept their ſhips in an open place, where there was no manner of ſuccour, nor harbor to retire vnto vpon any ſtorme: and worſt of all, becauſe that they were to fetche their victuals farre off, at the citie of Sestos, vnto which hauen they ſhould rather draw themſelues vnto, conſidering that they had but a litle way to go, & alſo that they ſhould haue the citie to backe them, which would furniſh them with all things neceſſarie: and beſide that, they ſhould be further off from their enemies, which were gouerned by one generall onely that did commaund them all, and were ſo well trained, that at a whiſtle they were ready ſtraight to execute his commaundement. Alcibiades perſwaſions to theſe Captaines of the Athenians were not only miſliked, but furthermore there was one called Tydeus, that anſwered him very lewdly: that he had nothing to do to commaunde the armie, but other that had the charge of them. Alcibiades miſtruſting thereby ſome treaſon, quietly went his way. The fifth day, the Athenians hauing made the ſame countenance to preſent battell vnto their enemies, and retyring the ſame night as of cuſtome very negligently, and in ill order, as men that made no reckoning of their enemies: Lyſander ſent againe certaine galliots to diſcrie them, commanding the Captaines of the ſame, that when they perceiued the Athenians had left their galleys and taken land, they ſhould then returne backe with all poſſible ſpeede they could, and being mid way ouer the ſtraights, that they ſhould lift vp a copper target into the aire, vpon the top of a pike in the foredecke, for a ſigne to make all the whole fleete to row in battell. Now Lyſander himſelfe in the meane time went in perſon from galley to galley, perſwading and exhorting euery Captaine that they ſhould put their galliots, mariners, & ſouldiers in good readineſſe, to the end that when the ſigne ſhould be lifted vp, they ſhould row with all their might in battell againſt the enemies. Wherfore, ſo ſoone as the copper target was ſet vp in the aire, and that Lyſander had made his trumpet ſound out of the Admirall, for a token to hale out into the ſea: the galleys immediatly began to row for life in enuie one of an other, and the footemen that were vpon the land, ran with ſpeede alſo to the toppe of a high cliffe neere vnto the ſea, to ſee what would be the end of his fight, becauſe the diſtance from one ſide to the other in that place was not fully two miles, which they had ſoone cut ouer, and in a litle ſpace, through the great diligence and force of rowing with their owers. So Conon the chiefe Captaine of the Athenians perceiuing from the ſhore this great fleete comming with a full force to aſſault them: he then cried out to the ſouldiers that they ſhould runne to their ſhippes, and being in a rage to ſee things in this danger, called ſome by their names, others he intreated, and the reſt he compelled to take their galleys. But all his diligence was to no purpoſe, becauſe the ſouldiers were wholly ſcattered here and there. For ſo ſoone as they were ſet a lande out of their galleys at their returne, ſome went to buy prouiſion, other went a walking in the fieldes, ſome were ſet at ſupper in their cabines, and other were laide downe to ſleepe, nothing miſtruſting that which happened to them, through their Captaines ignorance and lack of experience. But when the enemies were ready to ioyne and fall vpon them with great cries and noiſe of owers, Conon hauing eight galleys, ſtale ſecretly out of the fleete, and flying vnto Euagoras, ſaued himſelfe in the Ile of CIPRVS. In the meane time, the PELOPONNESIANS falling vpon the other gallies, tooke ſome of them emptie, and brake the others as the ſouldiers began to come aboard vpon them. And as for the men, ſome were ſlaine by their ſhips as they ranne vnto them like naked men without weapon, and out of order, thinking to haue ſaued themſelues: other were killed in flying, becauſe the enemies landed and had them in chaſe. And there were taken aliue of them, three thouſand priſoners with the Captaines. Lyſander. moreouer tooke all the whole fleete of their ſhippes, the holy galley excepted called Paralos, and the eight that fled with Conon: and after he had deſtroyed all the campe of the ATHENIANS, he faſtned the galleys that were taken, vnto the keele of his galleys, and returned with ſongs of triumphe, with the ſound of flutes and hoboyes, towards the citie of LAMPSACVS, hauing wonne a great victory with little labour, and had cut off in a ſmall time, the long continuing and moſt diuerſe warre that euer was, and had brought forth ſo many ſundrie ſtrange euents of fortune, as are vncredible. For there had bene infinite battels fought both by ſea and land, and had altered many ſundry times, and there was ſlaine at that time moe Captaines, than in all the other warres of GRECE together: all which were at the length brought to end and determined, by the good wiſedome and conduction of one onely man. And therefore ſome thought, that this great ouerthrow was giuen by the gods, and ſaid: that at the departure of Lyſanders fleete out of the hauen of LAMPSACVS, to goe ſet vpon the fleete of the enemies, they perceiued ouer Lyſanders galley the two fires, which they call the ſtarres of Caſtor and Pollux: the one on the one ſide of the galley, and the other on the other ſide. They ſay alſo, that the fall of the ſtone was a token, that did ſignifie this great ouerthrow. For about that time, (as many hold opinion) there fell out of the aire a maruellous great ſtone, in the place they call the goates riuer, which ſtone is ſeene yet vnto this day, holden in great reuerence by the inhabitants of the citie of CHERRONESVS. It is ſaid alſo, that Anaxagoras did prognoſticate, that one of the bodies tyed vnto the vaulte of the heauen, ſhould be pluckt away, and ſhould fall to the ground by a ſliding and ſhaking that ſhould happen. For he ſaid, that the ſtarres were not in their proper place where they were firſt created, conſidering that they were heauy bodies, and of the nature of ſtone: howbeit that they did ſhine by reflection of the fire elementary, and had bin drawne vp thither by force, where they were kept by the great violence of the circular motion of the elemēt, euen as at the beginning of the world they had bin ſtaied and let from falling downe beneath, at that time when the ſeparation was made of the colde and heauy bodies, from the other ſubſtance of the vniuerſall world. There is an other opinion of certaine Philoſophers, where there is more likelyhood then in that. For they ſay, that thoſe which we call falling ſtarres, be no fluxions nor deriuations of the fire elementarie, which are put out in the aire, in a manner ſo ſoone as they be lighted: nor alſo an inflammation or combuſtion of any part of the aire, which by her too ouermuch quantity doth ſpread vpwards: but they are celeſtiall bodies, which by ſome ſlackneſſe of ſtrength, or falling from the ordinary courſe of heauen, are throwne and caſt downe here beneath, not alwaies in any part of the earth inhabited, but more often abroade in the great Ocean ſea, which is the cauſe that we do not ſee them. Notwithſtanding, Anaxagoras words are confirmed by Damachus, who writeth in his boke of religion, that the ſpace of three ſcore and fifteene yeares together, before that this ſtone did fall, they ſaw a great lumpe of fire continually in the aire like a clowd inflamed, the which taried not in any one place, but went and came with diuerſe broken remouings, by the driuing whereof there came out lightnings of fire that fell in many places, and gaue light in falling, as the ſtarres do that fall. In the end, when this great body of fire fell in that part of the earth, the inhabitants of the countrie, after that they were a litle boldened from their feare and wonder, came to the place to ſee what it was: and they found no manner of ſhew or apparance of fire; but onely a very great ſtone lying vpon the ground, but nothing in compariſon of the leaſt part of that which the compaſſe of this bodie of fire did ſhew, if we may ſo name it. Sure herein y Damachus words had neede of fauourable hearers. But againe if they be true, then he vtterly confuteth their arguments, that maintaine that it was a peece of a rocke, which the force of a boiſterous winde did teare from the toppe of a mountaine, and caried in the aire, ſo long as this hurle winde continued: but ſo ſoone as that was downe, and calme againe, the ſtone fell immediatly. Neither doe we ſay that this lightning bodie, which appeared ſo many daies in the element, was very fire indeed, which comming to diſſolue and to be put out, did beget this violent ſtorme and boyſterous winde in the element, that had the force to teare the ſtone in ſunder, and to caſt it downe. Neuertheleſſe, this matter requireth better diſcourſe in ſome other booke then this. But now to our ſtory. When the three thouſand ATHENIANS that were taken priſoners at that ouerthrow, were condemned by the counſell to be put to death: Lyſander calling Philocles, one of the Captaines of the ATHENIANS, asked him what paine he would iudge him worthy of, that gaue the citizens ſo cruell and wicked counſell. Philocles being nothing abaſhed to ſee himſelfe in that miſerie, aunſwered him. Accuſe not them that haue no iudge to heare their cauſe: but ſince the gods haue giuen thee grace to be conqueror, do with vs, as we would haue done with thee, if we had ouercome thee. When he had ſaid ſo, he went to waſh himſelfe, and then put on a faire cloake vpon him, as if he ſhould haue gone to ſome feaſt: and went luſtily the formoſt man to execution, leading his countrimẽ the way, as Theophraſtus writeth. After this done, Lyſander with all his fleete went by all the cities of the ſea coaſt, where he commanded ſo many ATHENIANS as he found, that they ſhould get them to ATHENS, letting them vnderſtand that he would not pardon a man of them, but put them all to death as many as he found out of their city. And this he did of policie to bring them all within the precinct of the walles of ATHENS, becauſe he might ſo much the ſooner famiſh them for lack of victuals: for otherwiſe they would haue troubled him ſore, if they had had wherewithall to haue maintained a long ſiege. But in all the cities as he paſſed by, if they were gouerned by the authoritie of the people, or if that there were any other kinde of gouernment, he left in euery one of them a LACEDÆMONIAN Captaine or gouernor, with a counſell of ten officers, of them that had bene before in league and amity with him: the which he did as well in the cities that had euer bene confederates and friends vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, as in them that not long before had bene their enemies. So he went ſayling all alongſt the coaſtes, faire and ſoftly making no haſt, ſtabliſhing in manner a generall principallity ouer all GRECE. For he did not make them officers that were the richeſt, the nobleſt, or honeſteſt men, but ſuch as were his friends, out of thoſe tribes which he had placed in euery city: & to them he gaue authority to puniſh, and rewarde ſuch as they liked of; and would be preſent himſelfe in perſon to helpe them to put thoſe to death, whom they would execute, or otherwiſe expulſe or baniſh their countrie. But this gaue the GRECIANS ſmall hope of good or gratious gouernment vnder the rule of the LACEDÆMONIANS. Wherefore, me thinkes that Theopompus the comicall Poet doted, when he compared the LACEDÆMONIANS, vnto tauerners wiues, ſaying: that they had giuen the GRECIANS a taſte of the ſweete drinke of libertie, and that afterwards they had mingled it with vineger. For, the taſte they gaue the GRECIANS of their gouernment from the beginning, was very ſharpe vnto them: becauſe Lyſander tooke the rule and authoritie of gouernment out of the peoples hands, and gaue it vnto a fewe of the boldeſt, and moſt ſeditious men in euery citie. Thus hauing ſpent a great time in this voyage; to make theſe alterations: he ſent newes before to LACEDÆMON, that he was comming with two hundred ſaile. He ſpake alſo with the kings Agis and Pauſanias, in the countrie of ATTICA, perſwading him ſelfe that he ſhould win the city of ATHENS at the firſt aſſault. But when he ſawe his expectation failed, and that the ATHENIANS did valiantly reſiſt him: he returned once againe with his fleete into ASIA, where he made an end of changing and altering the manner of gouernment through euery city in equall maner, ſtabliſhing a counſell of ten officers onely in euery one of them, and putting euery where many citizens to death, & baniſhing many alſo. Among others, he draue all the SAMIANS out of their country, and reſtored againe all them that had

bene baniſhed before: and the city of SESTOS alſo, being yet in the ATHENIANS hands, he tooke it from them. And furthermore, he would not ſuffer the naturall SESTIANS to dwell there, but draue them away, and gaue their citie, their houſes, and lands, vnto ſhip maiſters, officers of gallies, and galley ſlaues, that had bene in the warres with him. But therein the LACEDÆMONIANS were againſt him, and this was the firſt thing that they did forbid him: for they reſtored the SESTIANS, againſt his will, vnto their lands and goods againe. But as the GRECIANS were very much offended, to ſee the parts Lyſander plaied: ſo were they all very glad gaine, to ſee theſe others which he afterwards did. For he reſtored the ÆGINETES againe to their lands and houſes, who had bin put from them a long time. He reſtored alſo the MELIANS, and the SCIONÆIANS to their lands againe, which the ATHENIANS had gotten from them, and draue out the ATHENIANS. Furthermore, Lyſander being aduertiſed, that the citizens and inhabitants of ATHENS were pinched ſore for lacke of victuals, he returned againe, and came into the hauen of PIRÆA: by meanes whereof he kept the citie ſo ſtraight, that he made them yeelde vpon ſuch conditions as he himſelfe would. Howbeit there are certain LACEDÆMONIANS that ſay, Lyſander wrote vnto the EPHORES: the city of ATHENS is taken. And that the Ephori wrote againe vnto him: it is well that it is taken. But this is but a tale deuiſed to make the matter ſeeme better: for indeed the capitulations which the Ephori ſent vnto him, were theſe. The Lords of the councell of LACEDÆMON haue thus decreed: that ye do raſe the fortification of the hauen of PIRÆA. That ye doe ouerthrow alſo the long wall that ioyneth the hauen to the citie. That ye yeeld vp and redeliuer all the cities which ye do holde, and content your ſelues with your liues and country only. This doing, ye ſhall haue peace, ſo that yee performe our demaunds. That ye ſhall receiue thoſe which are baniſhed: and for the number of ſhips, yee ſhall diſpoſe of them as we ſhall will you. The ATHENIANS agreed vnto the articles contained in that bill, following the counſell of Theramenes, the ſonne of Agnon. Who when a young orator called Cleomenes, did openly aſke him in anger, if he were ſo bold to dare to do, or ſay, any thing contrary vnto that, which Themiſtocles had done before time, to aſſent vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, that the wall which he built in deſpight of them, ſhould by their commandement now be raſed: he anſwered him openly againe, young man, my friend, I do nothing contrary to Themiſtocles doings. For like as he heretofore did build the wall, for the ſafety and benefit of all the citizens and people that were in ATHENS at that time: euen ſo doe we that are here now, for the ſelfe ſame cauſe plucke it downe and raſe it. And if it be true that walles doe make cities happy, then it muſt needs follow that the city of SPARTA which neuer had any walles, ſhould be the vnfortunateſt of all other. So Lyſander hauing receiued all the ATHENIANS ſhips but twelue, and the wals of the city alſo to vſe them at his pleaſure: on the ſixteenth day of march (on which day in old time the ATHENIANS had wonne the battell by ſea, within the ſtraight of SALAMINA, againſt the king of PERSIA) he counſelled them ſtraight to change the forme of their gouernement. The people could not brooke that motion, and were maruellouſly offended withall. Whereupon Lyſander ſent to declare vnto them, that they had broken the articles of the peace made betweene them, for that their walles were yet ſtanding, the ten dayes being expired in which they had promiſed to ouerthrow them: and therefore that he would once againe referre it to the determination of the councell, how they ſhould be vſed, that had broken the articles and couenants of the firſt peace. Other ſay, that immediatly he referred it vnto the deliberation of the councell of their confederates, that is to ſay: whether they ſhould altogether deſtroy the city, and make the inhabitants thereof, ſlaues, and bondmen or no. In this councell, it is reported that there was a THEBAN called Erianthus, whoſe opinion was, that they ſhould vtterly raſe the city, and make the country a deſert: ſo that it ſhould neuer after ſerue for other thing, but for paſturage of beaſts. But during this diet and councell, there was a banket made, whereunto all the Captaines and chiefe officers of the army being bidden, there was a PHOCIAN, a ſinger of ſongs, that ſang the entry of the Chorus to the tragedy of Electra, made by the Poet Euripides, which began in this ſort.

A notable ſaying for the walles of cities.

Erianthus cruell aduiſe againſt the Athenians.

Electra noble Dame, and daughter to a king:
Euen Agamemnon, king of Greece, whoſe fame ſo wide did ring.

I come now to your courtes, which lie both wide and waſt,
By ſpoile of warres depopulate, deſtroyed, and diſgraſt.

Theſe words moued all the hearers with compaſſion, ſo that the moſt part of them thought it were too great a ſinne to deſtroy ſo noble a city, which brought forth ſo many famous wiſe men, and great perſons. Wherefore Lyſander, when the ATHENIANS had ſubmitted themſelues altogether to his wil, cauſed all the womē-plaiers of pipes or ſhalmes to come out of the city, and gathered all thoſe together which he had in his owne campe alſo, & with the ſound of their inſtruments he made the walles and fortifications of the city of ATHENS to be pulled downe to the very ground, and ſet all their gallies on fire, & burnt them in the preſence of the confederates of the LACEDÆMONIANS, who daunced and plaied in the meane ſeaſon with garlands of flowers on their heads, in token that that day was a beginning of their full and perfect liberty. Immediatly after he changed alſo the ſtate of the gouernment, eſtabliſhing a counſell of thirty Magiſtrates in the city, and other ten alſo in the hauen of PIRÆA, hauing all equall and like authoritie: and therewithall made Callibius a gentleman of SPARTA Captaine of the caſtell there, and left a good garriſon of the LACEDÆMONIANS with him. This Callibius one day lift vp his ſtaffe he had in his hand to ſtrike Autolycus withall, a ſtrong made man to wreſtle: whereupon Xenophon the Philoſopher made his booke in olde time, called Conuiuium. But Autolycus that was a cunning wreſtler, hauing all the ſleights of wreſtling, ſodainly tripped Callibius with his legge, and lifting him vp at the armes end, caſt him to the ground. Howbeit Lyſander was not angry with Autolycus for it, but reproued Callibius, telling him that he ſhould haue remembred (if he had bene wiſe) that he had the gouernment ouer free men, and not of bonde men. Notwithſtanding, ſhortly after the thirty gouernours of the city, to ſatisfie Callibius, put this Autolycus to death. When Lyſander had done all theſe things, he tooke ſea againe, and went into the country of THRACIA, and ſent by Gylippus before vnto SPARTA (who had bin Captaine and generall of the SYRACVSANS in SICILIA) all the gold and ſiluer that was left in his hands, with all the preſents beſides which had bene priuately giuen him, and with the crownes alſo that had bin preſented him: which were maruellous in number as it is to be thought, for that many came to preſent him, conſidering the great power he had, and that in manner he was chiefe and ſole prince of all GRECE. This Gylippus did rippe the ſeames of euery bagge in the bottome where the money was, and tooke a good ſumme out of euery of them: and afterwards ſowed them vp againe, not thinking that there had bin a border vpon euery bagge, vpon the which was declared, the number and kindes of gold and ſiluer that were therein. Now when he was come to SPARTA, he hid the money he had ſtolne vnder the houſe eauings, and went and deliuered the bags he had brought into the hands of the Ephori, ſhewing them Lyſanders ſeale, which he had ſet to euery one of them. The Ephori hauing opened the bags, and tolde the money, found that the ſumme agreed not with the borders of the contents: and yet could not tell where the faulte was. But a ſeruant of Gylippus told them in darke words, ſaying: that vnder the tiles of his maiſters houſe there lay a great number of owles. Now the greateſt part of the coine of golde and ſiluer which was currant through GRECE, was ſtamped with the marke of an owle, by reaſon of the ATHENIANS. Thus Gylippus after ſo many noble exploites done in warres, committing ſo ſhamefull and vile a deede, was baniſhed out of his countrie of LACEDÆMONIA. But the wiſeſt men of SPARTA, and of deepeſt iudgement, fearing the power of golde and ſiluer, and ſeeing by proofe of Gylippus doings, that it had ſuch power to make one of their chiefeſt men to fall through couetouſneſſe: they greatly blamed Lyſander for bringing of it into LACEDÆMON, beſeeching the Ephori that they would ſend all this golde & ſiluer out of SPARTA, as a plague, prouocation, and wicked baite, to make them do euill: declaring vnto them, that they ſhould vſe no other money, but their owne onely. Whereupon they referred all to the wiſedom and determination of the councell. Theopompus writeth, that Sciraphidas was he that did moue the coūcell of the Ephori in it. Howbeit Ephorus calleth him Phlogidas, who was the firſt that ſpake againſt it in the councell, that they ſhould not admit, nor receiue into the city of SPARTA, any money of golde or ſiluer: but ſhould onely content themſelues with their owne countrie iron coine, the which firſt of all, comming from the fire redde hotte, was quenched with vineger, to the end they ſhould be forged no more, nor emploied vnto any other vſe. For it was ſo eager and brittle by meanes of this temper, that they could no more conuert it to any other purpoſe: and beſide, it was very heauie and vnhandſome to remoue, conſidering that a great heape and quantitie of it, was but of ſmall value. And it ſeemeth they did vſe of olde time, certaine litle iron money, and in ſome places copper money, called Obeliſci, from whence the ſmall peeces of money now extant are called Oboli, whereof ſix make a Drachma, ſo termed, for that it was as much as the hand could gripe. Neuertheleſſe, at the earneſt ſute of Lyſanders friends that ſtood againſt it, and held hard with him: it was decreed in the councell, that the money ſhould remaine in the city, and ordained that it ſhould be currant onely but for the affaires of the commonwealth. And if it were found, that any priuate man did either locke vp, or keepe any money, that he ſhould ſuffer death for it: as if Lycurgus when he made his lawes, feared gold and ſiluer, and not the couetouſneſſe and auarice which the gold and ſiluer bringeth with it. The which was not taken away ſo much, prohibiting priuate men to haue it: as it was ingendred only by a common tolleration of getting it. For, the profit which they ſawe it brought withall, made it to be eſteemed and deſired. For it was vnpoſſible they ſhould deſpiſe a thing priuately for vnprofitable, which they ſaw reckoned of commonly, as a thing very neceſſary: & that they ſhould thinke it would not ſerue their turne priuately, ſeeing it ſo commonly eſteemed and deſired. But we are rather to thinke, that priuate mens manners are conformed according to the common vſes and cuſtomes of cities: then that the faults and vices of priuate men do fill cities and commonweales with ill qualities. And it is more likely, that the parts are marred and corrupted with an infection of the whole, when it falleth out ill: then that the parts corrupted ſhould drawe the whole vnto corruption. For to the contrary, the faults of a part deſtroied, which might be preiudiciall vnto the whole, are oftentimes redreſſed and corrected by the other parts, whole and entire. But they that tooke this reſolution in their councell at that time, to haue money in the commonwealth: made feare of puniſhment, and of the lawe, to be the outward watchmen of citizens houſes, to keepe that no money ſhould come into them. But all this while they made no inward prouiſion, to keepe the entry of their ſoules from all paſſion and greedy deſires of money: but to the contrary, they made them all to haue a couetous deſire to be rich, as if it were a great and honorable thing. But for that we haue heretofore in other places reproued the LACEDÆMONIANS. And moreouer Lyſander cauſed a ſtatue of braſſe to be made like himſelf of the ſpoile he had gotten of the enemies, to ſet it vp in the citie of DELPHES, and for euery priuate Captaine of the gallies in like caſe: and the two ſtars of Caſtor and Pollux in gold beſides, which vaniſhed away a litle before the battell of LEVCTRES, and no man knew what became of them. Againe, in the chamber of the treaſury of Braſidas, and of the ACANTHIANS, there was alſo a galley made of golde and iuory, of two cubits long, which Cyrus ſent vnto him after the victory he had wonne by ſea, of the ATHENIANS. And furthermore, Alexandrides the hiſtoriographer borne at DELPHES, writeth, that the ſelfe ſame Lyſander had left there to be kept ſafe, a tallent of ſiluer, two and fifty Minas, and eleuen peeces of gold called Stateres. But all this accordeth not with that which all the other hiſtoriographers write, agreeing of his pouerty. But Lyſander being aloft then, and of greater power then euer any GRECIAN was before him: caried a greater porte and countenance then became his hability. For, as Duris writeth, he was the firſt of the GRECIANS vnto whom they did euer erect any aulters, and offer ſacrifice vnto as a god, and in honour of whom they did firſt ſing any hymnes: and at this day there is yet good memory of one which began in this manner.

The SAMIANS by publicke decree ordained, that the feaſts of Iuno, which were called in their city Herœa, ſhould be called Lyſandria. Lyſander had euer one Chærilus a SPARTAN Poet about him, to write and ſet forth all his doings in verſe. An other Poet called Antilocus, one day made certaine verſes in his praiſe; which pleaſed him ſo well, that he gaue him his hatte full of ſiluer. There were two other Poets, Antimachus COLOPHORIAN, and Niceratus born at HERACLEA, which did both write verſes to honour him, ſtriuing whether of them ſhould do beſt. Lyſander iudged the crowne and victory vnto Niceratus: wherewith Antimachus was ſo angry, that he raſed out all that he had written of him. But Plato who at that time was yong, and loued Antimachus becauſe he was an excellent Poet, did comfort him, and told him that ignoraunce did blinde the vnderſtanding of the igorant, as blindneſſe doth the ſight of the blinde. Ariſtonus an excellent plaier of the citerne, and one that had ſixe times won the priſes of the Pythian games: to winne Lyſanders fauor, promiſed him, that if euer he wanne the priſe of his art againe, he would cauſe him ſelfe to be proclaimed Lyſanders ſlaue. This ambition of Lyſander was very odious and grieuous, onely vnto great perſons, and men of his eſtate: but beſides his ambition, in the end he became very proud and cruell, through the flatteries of his followers, and them that courted him: ſo that he exceeded in recompencing his friendes, as alſo in puniſhing of his enemies. For, to gratifie his friendes and familiars, he gaue them abſolute power and authority of life and death in their townes and cities: and to pacifie and appeaſe his anger where he once hated, there was no other way but death, without all poſſibility of pardon. And that he plainly ſhewed afterwards in the city of MILETVM, where, fearing leaſt they would flie that tooke part with the people, & becauſe he would haue them appeare that hid them ſelues: he gaue his word, and ſware that he would doe them no hurt at all. The poore men gaue credit to his word. But ſo ſoone as they came out, and did appeare, hee deliuered them all into the handes of their aduerſaries, (which were the chiefeſt of the nobility) to put them all to death: and they were no leſſe then eight hundred men one with an other. He cauſed great murders of people alſo to bee done in other cities: for he did not onely put them to death that had priuatly offended him, but numbers beſides, onely to ſatisfie and reuenge the priuate quarrels, enmities and couetouſnes of his friends, whom he had in euery place. And therefore was Eteocles LACEDÆMONIAN greatly commended for his ſaying: That GREECE could not abide two Lyſanders. Theophraſtus writeth alſo, that the very like was ſpoken of Alcibiades by Archeſtratus. Howbeit in Alcibiades there was nothing, but his inſolency, and vaine glory that men miſliked: but in Lyſander, a ſeuere nature, & ſharpe conditions, that made his power fearfull & intollerable. Neuertheleſſe, the LACEDÆMONIANS paſſed ouer all other complaintes exhibited againſt him: ſauing when they heard the complaints of Pharnabazus, who purpoſely ſent Ambaſſadors vnto them, to complaine of the wrongs and iniuries Lyſander had done him, ſpoiling and deſtroying the country vnder his gouernment. Then the Ephori being offended with him, clapped vp Thorax in priſon, one of his friendes and Captaines that had ſerued vnder him: and finding that he had both gold and ſiluer in his houſe contrary to the law, put him to death. And to him ſelfe they ſent immediatly that which they call Scytala, (as who would ſay, the ſcrolle written vppon a round ſtaffe) commaunding him that he ſhould returne immediatly vpon receite thereof. The Scytala is in this ſort. When the Ephori doe ſend a Generall, or an Admirall to the warres, they cauſe two litle round ſtaues to bee made of the like bigneſſe and length, of which the Ephori do keepe the one, and the other they giue to him whom they ſend to the warres. Theſe two litle ſtaues they call Scytales. Now when they will aduertiſe their Generall ſecretly of matters of importaunce, they take a ſcrolle of parchement, long and narrowe like a leather thong, and wreath it about the round ſtaffe, leauing no voide ſpace betweene the knottes of the ſcrowle. Afterwardes when they haue bound them faſt together, then they write vppon the parchement thus rolled what they will, and when they haue done writing, vnfolde it, and ſend it to their Generall, who can not elſe poſſibly read it to know what is written, (becauſe the letters are not ioyned together, nor follow in order, but are ſcattered here and there) vntill he take his litle rowle of wod which was giuen him at his departure. And then wreathing the ſcrowle of parchment about it which he receiueth, the folding and wreaths of the parchement falling iuſt into the ſelfe ſame place as they were firſt folded, the letters alſo come to ioyne one with an other, as they ought to doe. This litle ſcrowle of parchement alſo is called as the rowle of wodde, Scytala euen as we commonly ſee in many places that the thing meaſured, is alſo called by the name of the meaſure. When this parchement ſcrowle was brought vnto Lyſander, who was then in the country of HELLESPONT, he was maruellouſly troubled withall, fearing aboue all other things the accuſations of Pharnabazus: ſo he ſought meanes to ſpeake with him before he departed, hoping thereby to make his peace with him. When they were together, Lyſander prayed him he would write an other letter vnto the Lords of SPARTA, contrary to his firſt, how that he had done him no hurt at all, and that he had no cauſe to complaine of him: but he did not remember that he was a CRETAN, (as the common prouerbe ſayeth) that could deceiue an other CRETAN. For Pharnabazus hauing promiſed him that he would performe his deſire, wrote a letter openly, purporting the effect of Lyſanders requeſt: but behinde he had an other of contrary effect, ſo like on the out ſide vnto the other, that by ſight no man could diſcerne the one from the other. And when he came to put his ſeale, he changed the firſt with the laſt that was hidden, & gaue it him. When Lyſander came vnto SPARTA, he went as the maner is, ſtraight to the pallace where the Senate kept, and gaue his letters vnto the Ephores, thinking that by them he ſhould haue beene cleared from all daunger of the greateſt accuſations they could haue burdened him withall: becauſe that Pharnabazus was very well thought on of the Lords of LACEDÆMONIA, for that he did euer ſhew him ſelfe willing and ready to helpe them in all their warres, more then any other of the kings Lieutenants of PERSIA. The Ephori hauing red this letter, they ſhewed it vnto him. Then did Lyſander plainly ſee, that the common prouerbe was true.

That Vlyſſes was not ſubtill alone.

Thereupon he went home to his houſe maruellouſly troubled. But within few dayes after returning to the pallace againe to ſpeake with the Lords of the councell, he told them that he muſt needes make a voyage vnto the temple of Iupiter Ammon, to diſcharge certaine ſacrifices which he had vowed and promiſed to him before he had wonne the battels. Some ſay, that in deede Iupiter Ammon appeared to him in a dreame as he did beſiege the city of the APHYGÆIANS, in the countrey of THRACIA, and that by his commaundement he raiſed the ſiege, and charged them of the city, that they ſhould thanke Iupiter Ammon, and do ſacrifice vnto him: by reaſon whereof, they thinke that he ment good faith, when he ſued for licence to make this voyage into LIBYA, to performe the vowes which he had made. But the moſt part did certainely beleeue that he made ſute to go this iourney, for a cloke and colour only to abſent him ſelfe, becauſe he feared the Ephores, and that he could not endure the yoke and ſubiection which he muſt abide remaining at home, neither could like to be commanded. And this was the true cauſe of his ſute to go this voyage; much like vnto a horſe taken out of a freſh paſture and goodly medowes, to bring him into a ſtable, and make him to be iorneyed as he was before. Neuertheleſſe, Ephorus writeth an other cauſe, the which I will recite hereafter. In the end, Lyſander hauing hardly obtained licence, tooke ſhippe, and croſſed ſaile. But during his abſence, the kings of LACEDÆMON remembring that he kept all the cities at his commaundement, by meanes of the friends he had in euery city, whom he had made chiefe gouernours of the ſame, and that by their meanes he came in maner to be abſolute prince ouer all GREECE: they tooke vppon them to redeliuer the gouernment of the townes and cities againe into the handes of the people, and alſo to put downe his friendes whom he had ſtabliſhed there. And hereupon fell out great inſurrection againe. For firſt of all, they that were baniſhed from ATHENS, hauing ſurpriſed and taken the caſtell of Phyla, vpon the ſodaine did ſet vpon the thirty gouernors tyrants (whom Lyſander had placed there) and ouercame them in battell. Wherupon Lyſander ſtraight returned to SPARTA, and perſwaded the LACEDÆMONIANS to refer the gouernment to the number of a few, and to puniſh the inſolency of the people. So by his procurement, they ſent firſt a hundred talents vnto the thirty tyrants for an aide to maintaine this warre, and appointed Lyſander him ſelfe generall. But the two kings of SPARTA enuying him, and fearing leaſt he ſhould take the city of ATHENS againe: they determined that one of them would go. Whereupon Pauſanias went thither immediatly, who in apparance ſeemed to maintaine the tyrants againſt the people: but in effect, he did his indeuour to appeaſe this warre, for feare leaſt Lyſander by means of his friends and followers ſhould once againe come to haue the city of ATHENS in his power, the which he might eaſily doe. And thus hauing agreed the ATHENIANS againe one with an other, and pacified all faction and commotion among them, he pluckt vp the roote of Lyſanders ambition. But ſhortly after, the Athenians rebelling againe againſt the Lacedæmonians, Pauſanias him ſelf was reproued, becauſe he yeelded ſo much to the boldnes and inſolency of the people, which were bridled and reſtrained before, by the authority of the ſmall number of gouernours: and to the contrary, they gaue Lyſander the honor to be generall, who ruled not in this rebellion to pleaſe mens minds and to content them, neither with fond oſtentation of glory, but ſeuerely, for the profit and commodity of Sparta. It is true he would giue great words, and was terrible to them that reſiſted him. As he aunſwered the Argiues one day, who contended for their confines with the Lacedæmonians, and ſeemed to alledge the beſt reaſons. Euen they (ſayd he) that ſhall proue the ſtronger hereby (ſhewing them his ſword) ſhall bee they that ſhall plead their cauſe beſt for their confines. An other time, when a Megarian had told his mind boldly enough in open councell, he aunſwered him: thy wordes (good friend) had neede of a city, meaning thereby that he was of too meane a towne to vſe ſo great words. And to the Bœotians alſo, who were in doubt to profeſſe them ſelues friends or enemies: he ſent vnto them, to know if he ſhould paſſe through the countrey with his pikes vpwardes or downwardes. And when the Corinthians alſo were reuolted from their alliance, he brought his army hard vnto their walles: but when hee ſaw his men were afraide, and made curſey whether they ſhould go to the aſſault or not: by chaunce ſpying a hare comming out of the towne ditches, he ſayed vnto them: Are ye not aſhamed to be afraied to go & aſſault your enemies that are ſo cowardly and ſlothfull, as hares do keepe their formes at eaſe within the circuite of their walles? Now king Agis being deceaſed, he left behinde him his brother Ageſilaus, and his ſuppoſed ſon Leotychides. Wherefore, Lyſander that had loued Ageſilaus afore time, gaue him counſell to ſtand for the right of the crowne, as lawfull heire and next of the bloud, deſcending of the race of Hercules: becauſe it was ſuſpected that Leotychides was Alcibiades ſonne, who ſecretly had kept Timæa Agis wife, at what time he was baniſhed out of his countrey, and came then to remaine in Sparta. And Agis ſelfe alſo, concluding by reckoning of the time of his abſence, that his wife could not be with childe by him: made reckoning of Leotichides, (and had openly ſhewed it all the reſt of his life time) that he did not acknowledge him for his ſonne, vntill ſuch time as falling ſicke of that diſeaſe whereof he died, he was caried to the city of Heræa. And there lying in his death bedde, at the humble ſute of Leotychides him ſelfe, and partly at the inſtant requeſt of his friends who were importunate with him: he did acknowledge Leotychides for his ſonne in the preſence of diuerſe, whom he prayed to be witneſſes vnto the Lords of Lacedæmon, of his acceptation and acknowledging of him to be his ſon. Which they all did in fauour of Leotychides. For all that, Ageſilaus tooke it vpon him, by the ſupport & maintenance of Lyſanders fauour. Howbeit, Diopithes a wiſe man, and knowen to be skilfull in ancient prophecies, did great hurt to Ageſilaus ſide, by an auncient oracle which he alledged againſt a defect Ageſilaus had, which was his lameneſſe.

The death of king Agis. Lyſander depriueth Leotychides of his kingdome.

O Spartan people you, which beare high haughty hearts,
And looke a loft: take heede I ſay, looke well vnto your martes: Leaſt whiles you ſtand vpright, and guide your ſtate by grace,
Some halting kingdome priuily, come creeping in apace.
By that meanes might you moue, great troubles, carke and care,
And miſchiefes heape vpon your head, before you be aware.
And plunged should you be, euen ouer head and eares,
VVith waſt of warres, which here on earth doth perish many peeres.

Many by occaſion of this oracle, fell to take Leotychides part: but Lyſander declared vnto them, that Diopithes did not conſtue the meaning of the oracle well. For God, ſayed he, cared not whether he halted of one legge or no, that ſhould come to be king of Lacedæmon: but in deede, the crowne and kingdome ſhould halt and be lame, if baſtardes not lawfully begotten, ſhould come to raigne ouer the true naturall iſſue and right line of Hercules. By theſe perſwaſions, Lyſander with his great countenaunce and authority beſides, wanne all men to his opinion: ſo that Ageſilaus by this meanes, was praclaimed king of Lacedæmon. This done, Lyſander beganne ſtraight to counſell him to make warres in Asia, putting him in hope that

Through Lyſanders working, Ageſilaus was made king he ſhould deſtroy the kingdome of PERSIA, and ſhould come to be the greateſt man of the world. Moreouer, he wrote vnto his friends in the cities of ASIA, that they ſhould ſend vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS to require king Ageſilaus for their general, to make wars againſt the barbarous people. Which they did, and ſent Ambaſſadors purpoſely vnto SPARTA to ſue that they might haue him: the which was no leſſe honor procured vnto Ageſilaus by Lyſanders meanes, then that he did, in making him to be choſen king. But men ambitious by nature, being otherwiſe not vnapt nor vnfit to commaund, haue this imperfection: that through the iealouſie of glory, they doe commonly enuy their equalles, the which doth greatly hinder them for doing any notable things. For they take them for their enemies, enuying their vertue, whoſe ſeruice and meanes might helpe them to doe great matters. Thus Ageſilaus being choſen generall of this enterpriſe, tooke Lyſander with him in this iourney, amongſt the thirty counſellers which were giuen vnto him to aſſiſt him: and made ſpeciall choiſe of him, as by whoſe counſell he hoped moſt to be gouerned, and to haue him neareſt about him, as his chiefeſt friend. But when they were arriued in ASIA, they of the countrey hauing no acquaintaunce with Ageſilaus, ſeldome ſpake with him, or but litle: and to the contrary, hauing knowen Lyſander of long time, they followed him, and waited vppon him to his tent or lodging, ſome to honor him, becauſe they were his friends, others for feare, becauſe they did miſtruſt him. Euen much like as it falleth out oftentimes in the Theaters, when they play tragedies there: that he that ſhall play the perſon of ſome meſſenger or ſeruaunt, ſhall be the beſt player, and ſhall haue the beſt voice to be heard aboue all others: and to the contrary, that he which hath the royall band about his head, and the ſcepter in his hand, a man doth ſcant heare him ſpeake. Euen ſo it fell out then: for all the dignity due vnto him that commaundeth all, was ſhewed only vnto the counſeller: and there remained to the king no more, but the royall name only of a king, without any power. Therefore me thinkes that this vndiſcreete and importunate ambition of Lyſander, did well deſerue reproofe perhappes, to make him only to be contented with the ſecond place of honor next vnto the king. But for Ageſilaus again, through extreame couetouſnes and iealouſie of glory, to caſt Lyſander altogether off, and to ſet ſo light by his friend and benefactor, that ſurely became not him neither. For firſt of all, Ageſileus neuer gaue Lyſander occaſion to doe any thing, neither did commit any matter of weight vnto him, that might be honorable for him: but which is worſt of all, if he perceiued that he had taken any mens cauſes in hand, and that he did fauour them, he did alwaies ſend them backe againe into their countrey, denying their ſute, without that they could obtaine any thing they ſued for, leſſe then the meaneſt perſons that could haue come, extinguiſhing Lyſanders credit by litle and litle, and taking from him all authority by this meanes. Wherefore, Lyſander perceiuing how he was thus refuſed and reiected in all things, ſeeing that the countenaunce and fauor which he thought to ſhew vnto his friends, fell out hurtful vnto them: left off to ſolicite their matters any more, and prayed them to forbeare to come vnto him, or to follow him, but to go to the king, and vnto thoſe that could doe them better pleaſure then him ſelfe, and ſpecially thoſe that honored him. When they heard that, many deſiſted to trouble him any more in matters of importaunce, but not to doe him all the honor they could, and continued ſtill to accompany him, when he went out to walke, or otherwiſe to exerciſe him ſelfe: the which did aggrauate and increaſe Ageſilaus anger more againſt him, for the enuy he bare vnto his glory. And where he gaue very honorable charge and commiſſion in the wars, oftentimes vnto very meane ſouldiers to execute, or cities to gouerne: he appointed Lyſander ſurueyor generall of all the ordinary prouiſion of victuals, and diſtributer of fleſh. And then mocking the IONIANS that did honor him ſo much· let them go now, ſayd he, and honor my fleſh diſtributer. Wherefore, Lyſander ſeeing it high time to ſpeake. went vnto Ageſilaus, and told him in few wordes after the LACONIAN manner: Truely Ageſilaus, thou haſt learned well to abaſe thy friends. In deede ſayed he againe, ſo haue I, when they will be greater then my ſelfe: and to the contrary, they that maintaine and increaſe my honor and authority, it is reaſon that I eſteeme of them. Yea mary, ſayd Lyſander, but perhappes I haue not done as thou ſayeſt. Yet I pray thee giue me ſuch an office, as I may be leaſt hated, and moſt profitable for thee: though it be but in reſpect of ſtrangers eyes that looke vpon vs both. After this talke betweene them,

Ageſilaus ſent him his Lieutenaunt into the countrey of Hellespont, where Lyſander ſtill kept this anger ſecret in his heart againſt him, but for all that, did not leaue to doe all that hee could for the benefit of his maſters affairs. As amongſt many other things, he cauſed a Persian Captain called Spithridates, to rebel againſt his maſter, who was a valiant man of his hãds, and a great enemy of Pharnabazus, and had an army alſo which he brought with him vnto Ageſilaus. Now concerning this warre, this was all that he did in that iourney. Wherefore, he returned againe to Sparta not long after, with litle honor, being maruellouſly grieued & offended with Ageſilaus, and hating more then before, all the ſtate and gouernment of the city of Sparta: by reaſon whereof, he determined to put that in practiſe, which he had long time thought vppon, concerning the alteration of gouernment, and his enterpriſe was this. Amongſt the offpring and iſſue of Hercules, who were mingled with the Dorians, and returned againe into the country of Peloponnesus, the greateſt number and chiefeſt of them, dwelled in the city of Sparta: howbeit, all they that came of that race had no right of ſucceſſion to the crowne, ſauing two families only, the Eurytiontides, and the Agiades. The other families, albeit they were all for nobility of bloud deſcended out of one ſelfe houſe, yet had they no more right nor intereſt vnto the realme, then the reſidue of the people: for, the dignities that were attained vnto by vertue, were giuen vnto the inhabitantes that could deſerue them. Lyſander then being one of thoſe which was deſcended of the true race of Hercules, who notwithſtanding had no intereſt in the crowne: when he ſaw himſelfe aloft, and called to great honor through his famous actes and merites, and that he had wonne many friendes, and great credit and authority by dealing in matters of the ſtate: it grieued him much, to ſee that they which were no nobler then him ſelfe, ſhould be kings in that city, which hee had increaſed by his vertue, and that he could not haue ſo much power as to take from theſe two houſes, the Eurytiontides, and the Agiades the prerogatiue that the kings ſhould be choſen onely out of one of thoſe two houſes, and to caſt it vpon the offpring of Hercules. Some ſay againe, that he would not only haue enlarged that prerogatiue vnto the iſſue of Hercules, but vnto all the naturall Spartans alſo: becauſe that Hercules race ſhould not only deſire this reward of honor, but euen they alſo that followed his ſteps in vertue, which had made him equall with the gods in honor. For he doubted not, but if they would diſpoſe the crown in this ſort, that there was no man in the city of Sparta that ſhould ſooner be choſen king then him ſelfe: whereupon he attempted firſt to perſwade his citizens by very good reaſons, and to bring this about the better, he conned an oration without booke, penned by Cleon Halicarnaſſeus, made him for this purpoſe. But afterwardes waighing with him ſelfe, that ſo great and ſtrange a change as he would bring in, had neede of ſome better and ſtronger helpe: he beganne to frame a deuiſe as they ſay, to moue the people by, much after the manner they vſe in tragedies, framing engines to bring ſome god to come downe from heauen vnto them, and this was his fained inuention. He deuiſed certaine oracles & prophecies, thinking that all Cleons rethoricke would ſtand him in no ſteade, if firſt of all he did not fill the citizens hearts with ſome ſuperſtition and feare of the goddes, that he might bring them afterwardes more eaſily vnto reaſon. And Ephorus ſayeth, that he proued firſt to corrupt the Nunne with money, that giueth all the oracles and aunſwers in the temple of Apollo at Delphes: and that afterwardes, he would haue wonne the Nun alſo of the temple of Dodone with money, by Pherecles practiſe. And that he being reiected by them both, went laſtly vnto the temple of Iupiter Ammon: and that there he ſpake vnto the prieſtes, and offered them great ſtore of money for the ſame purpoſe. But they were ſo offended with Lyſander, that they ſent men of purpoſe to Sparta, to accuſe him, that he would haue corrupted them with money. The counſell clearing Lyſander of this accuſation, the Libyans his accuſers at their departing ſayd: we will one day iudge more iuſtly, then you my Lordes of Lacedæmon haue done now, when you ſhall come to dwell in our country of Libya: ſuppoſing there was an auncient prophecy that ſayd, the Lacedæmonians one day ſhould come to dwell in the country of Libya. But we ſhall doe better to write the whole ſtory at large of this practiſe, ſubtilty, and malicious deuiſe, which was no matter of ſmall importaunce, nor lightly grounded: but as in a mathematicall propoſition there were many great coniectures and preſuppoſitions, and many long circumſtances to bring it to con-cluſion, the which I will dilate from point to point, deliuering that which an hiſtoriographer and philoſopher both hath written. There was in the marches of the realme of Pont, a woman that ſayed ſhe was gotten with childe by Apollo, the which many (as it is to be thought) would not beleeue at all, and many alſo did beleeue it: ſo that ſhe being deliuered of a goodly ſonne, diuerſe noble men and of great eſtate were carefull to bring him vp, and to haue him taught. This childe, I know not whereupon, nor how, was named Silenus: and Lyſander fetching the plat of his deuiſe from thence, added to all the reſt of him ſelfe, to goe on with his practiſe. Now hee had many (and they no ſmall men) that made his way to frame this ieſt, giuing out a rumor of the birth of this childe, without any ſuſpition gathered out of the intent of this rumor. And forthermore, they brought other newes from Delphes, which they diſperſed abroad through the city of Sparta, to wit: that the prieſtes of the temple kept ſecret bookes of very auncient oracles, which they them ſelues durſt not touch nor handle, neither might any man read them, vnleſſe he were begotten of the ſeede of Apollo, who ſhould come after a long time, and make his birth appeare vnto the prieſtes that kept theſe papers, and that by ſome ſecret marke and token, which they had amongſt them: & thereby being knowen for Apolloes ſon, he might then take the bookes and read the auncient reuelations and prophecies of the ſame. Theſe things prepared in this ſort, there was order taken that Silenus ſhould come and aſke for theſe bookes as though he were the ſonne of Apollo: and that the prieſtes which were priuy to this practiſe, ſhould make as though they did diligently examine him of euery thing, and how he was borne. And that at the length, after they had ſeemed to know all, they ſhould deliuer theſe prophecies vnto him, as if he had bene in deede Apolloes ſonne: and that he ſhould openly read them in the preſence of many witneſſes. And among the reſt of the prophecies, that he ſhould read that ſpecially, for the which this long paltry fained drift was framed, touching the kingdome of Lacedæmonia: that it was better, and meetelier for the Spartans they ſhould chooſe them for their kinges, whom they found the meeteſt men of all their magiſtrates. But when Silenus was come of full age, and brought into Greece of purpoſe to performe this practiſe, all the miſtery was marde by the faint heart of one of the players and companions of Lyſander, who holpe him to countenaunce this deuiſe: who when the matter ſhould haue taken effect, ſhrunke for feare, and let the miſtery alone. This notwithſtanding, nothing was bewrayed in Lyſanders life time, till after his death.

For he died, before king Ageſilaus returned out of Asia, being fallen into warres with Boeotia before his death, or rather hauing him ſelfe made Greece to fall into warres. They doe report it eyther way, and ſome lay the fault vpon him, other vpon the Thebans, and other vpon them both: and they burden the Thebans withall, becauſe they did vtterly ouerthrow the common ſacrifices which Ageſilaus made in the city of Aulide.

And they ſay alſo, that Androclides and Amphitheus did raiſe this warre among the Grecians, being before corrupted with money by the king of Persia to bring warres vpon the Lacedæmonians in Greece: and began to inuade and deſtroy the country of the Phocians. Other ſay that Lyſander was very angry with the Thebans, becauſe they onely of all other their confederates did aſke the tenth part of all the ſpoile which was won in the war againſt the Athenians: and that they were not pleaſed that Lyſander had ſet the money away vnto Sparta.

But aboue al, Lyſander did malice thē moſt, becauſe they were the firſt that made way for the Athenians to be deliuered from the oppreſſion of thirty tyrants, whom he had ſtabliſhed gouernors in Athens, and in whoſe fauour (to make them to be dreaded the more) the Lacedæmonians had ordained by a common edict: that they that were baniſhed and did flee from Athens, might lawfully be taken and apprehended in what place ſoeuer they fled vnto, and that whoſoeuer ſhould reſiſt or let them to do it, they ſhould be proclaimed rebels, and open enemies vnto the Lacedæmonians.

Againe to contrary this edict, the Thebans made another very like, & meete for the glorious deedes of Bacchus and Hercules their anceſtors, for whom it was made: that euery houſe and city through the country of Boeotia, ſhould be open for the Athenians that would come thither, & that he that would not helpe a baniſhed mā from Athens, againſt him that would take him away by force, ſhould be fined and amerced at a talent. And alſo if there were any ſouldiers that went vnto Athens, through the countrey of Boeotia, that the THEBANS ſhould not ſee nor heare it. This was no diſſimulation to ſpeake of, that they ſhould ordaine things with ſo gentle wordes, and ſo meete for the people of GRECE, and then that the deedes ſhould not anſwere vnto their edicts and proclamations. For Thraſybulus, and his fellowes of the conſpiracie, who kept the caſtle of Phyla, they departed from THEBES, with armor and money, and the THEBANS did helpe them to beginne and practiſe their enterpriſe ſo ſecretly, that it was not diſcouered. Theſe were the cauſes why Lyſander was ſo earneſtly bent againſt the THEBANS, and his choller being ſo extreme, by reaſon of his melancholineſſe that grew daily vpon him more and more through his age, he ſolicited the EPHORES ſo, that he perſwaded them to ſende a garriſon thither: and himſelfe taking the charge of them, vndertooke the iorney ſtraight with his men. But afterwardes they ſent king Pauſanias alſo with an armie thither, who was to fetch a great compaſſe about to enter into the countrie of BOEOTIA, by mount Cithæron: and Lyſander ſhould goe to meete him through the coũtry of PHOCIDES, with a great company of ſouldiers beſides. Now as Lyſander went, he tooke the citie of the ORCHOMENIANS, who willingly yeelded thẽſelues to him as ſoone as he came thither. From thence he went to the citie of LEBADIA, which he ſpoyled: & from thence he wrote vnto king Pauſanias that departing from PLATEES, he ſhould march directly to the citie of ALIARTE, where he would no faile to meete him the next morning by breake of day at the towne walles. Theſe letters were intercepted by certaine skoutes of the THEBANS, who met with the meſſenger that caried them. Thus the THEBANS hauing intelligence of their purpoſe, left their citie in cuſtodie vnto the ATHENIANS who were come to aide them: and departed out of THEBES about midnight, and marched all night with great ſpeede, that they came to ALIARTE in the morning a litle before Lyſander, and put halfe their men into the citie. Now for Lyſander, he was determined at the firſt to keepe his men vpon a hill which is neere to the city, & there to tary the comming of king Pauſanias. But afterwards when he ſaw that the day was farre ſpent, and that he came not, he could tary no longer, but arming himſelfe, after he had made an oration vnto the confederates which he had brought with him, he marched on with his men in battell ray, longer then large, by the high way that went vnto the city. In the mean ſeaſon, the THEBANS that were left without the city, leauing ALIARTE on the left hand, did ſet vpon Lyſanders rerewarde of his armie againſt the fountaine called Ciſſuſa: where the Poets faine that the nurſes of Bacchus did waſhe him, when he came out of his mothers wombe, becauſe the water that commeth out of it (though it be very cleare and ſweet to drinke) hath notwithſtanding (I cannot tell by what meanes) a colour like wine: and not far from thence there grow great plenty of Styrap trees. The which the ALIARTIANS do alledge, to proue that Radamanthus heretofore dwelt in that part, & do ſhew his ſepulcher there yet to this day, which they call Alea. And hard by that alſo, there is the monument of Alcmena, which was buried (as they ſay) in that place, & was maried to Radamanthus, after the death of Amphitryon. But the THEBANS who were within the city with the ALIARTIANS, ſtirred not vntill they ſaw that Lyſander with the firſt of his troupe was neare vnto the towne wals: and then opening the gates on the ſodaine, they made a ſaly out vppon Lyſander, & ſlue him with his Soothſayer and a few other, becauſe the moſt part of the voward fled, into the ſtrength of the battell. Howbeit the THEBANS gaue them not ouer ſo, but followed them ſo valiantly, that they brake their order, & made them all flie through the mountains, after they had ſlaine three thouſand of them in the field: ſo were there three hundred THEBANS alſo ſlaine there, who followed their enemies ſo fiercely, till they recouered ſtraight narrow waies, of great ſtrength for them. Theſe three hundreth were in maner all thoſe that were ſuſpected in THEBES to fauor the LACEDÆMONIANS ſecretly: wherefore, for the deſire they had to take away this opinion from their citizens, they hazarded them ſelues to no purpoſe, & were caſt away in this chaſe. King Pauſanias heard newes of this ouerthrow, going from PLATEES vnto THESPIES, and went on further, marching ſtill in battell ray towards ALIARTE, where Thraſybulus alſo arriued at the ſelfe ſame time, bringing the aid of the ATHENIANS frõ THEBES. And when Pauſanias was purpoſed to ſend to aske licence of the enemies to take away the bodies of their men which they had ſlain, to the intent to bury them: the old SPARTANS that were in his army, miſliking it much, at the firſt were angry in them ſelues. But afterwards they went vnto the king himſelfe, to tell him that he diſhonoured SPARTA, to offer to take vp Lyſanders bodie by his enemies leaue and fauour, and that he ſhould valiantly recouer him by force of armes, and honorably burie him, after that he had ouercome their enemies: or elſe if it were their fortune to be ouerthrowen, that yet it ſhould be more honorable for them to lie dead in the field by their Captaine, then to aske leaue to take vp his bodie. But notwithſtanding all theſe words of the old men, king Pauſanias ſeeing that it was a hard matter to ouercome the THEBANS in battell, now that they had gotten the victory, and furthermore, that the bodie of Lyſander lay hard by the wals of ALIARTE, and that he could not come to take it away without great danger, although they ſhould winne the battell: he ſent a herauld to the enemies. And hauing made truce for certaine daies, he led his armie away, and tooke vp Lyſanders bodie with him, and buried him after they were out of the confines of BOEOTIA, within the teritorie of the PANOPEIANS: where vntill this day his tombe remaineth vpon the high way, going from DELPHES vnto the citie of CHÆRONEA. Thus Pauſanias campe being lodged there, it is ſaid there was a PHOCIAN, who reporting the battell vnto one that was not there, ſaid that the enemies came to giue a charge vpon them, as Lyſander had paſſed the Oplites. The other wondring at that, there was a SPARTAN a very friend of Lyſanders by, hauing heard all their talke, asked him what that was which he called Oplites: for that he had not heard that word named before. What? anſwered the PHOCIAN to him againe. Euen there it was where the enemies did ouerthrow the firſt of our men which were ſlaine in the fieldes: for the riuer that runneth by the walles of the city, is called Oplites. The SPARTAN hearing that, burſt out of weeping for ſorrow, ſaying: then I ſee it is vnpoſſible for a man to auoide his deſtinie. For Lyſander aforetime had an oracle that tolde him thus.

Lyſander, take good heede, come not I thee aduiſe: Neere Oplites that riuers banckes, in any kinde of wiſe.
Nor neere the Dragon he, which is the earth her ſonne,
VVho at the length will thee aſſault, and on thy back will runne.

Thliarus fl. Hoplia, Iſomantus. Neochorus ſlue Lyſander.

Howbeit ſome take it, that this riuer of Oplites is not that which paſſeth by the walles of ALIARTE, but it is the riuer that runneth neere vnto the city of CORONEA, and falleth into the riuer of Phliarus, hard by the city: and they ſay that in olde time it was called Hoplia, but now they call it Iſomantus. He that ſlue Lyſander, was an ALIARTIAN called Neochorus, who caried a Dragon painted vpon his target: and this was that which the oracle of likelyhood did ſignifie. They ſay alſo, that in the time of the warres of PELOPONNESVS, the THEBANS had an oracle from the temple of Apollo Iſmenias: which oracle did prophecie the battell which they wanne by the caſtell of DELIVM, and the battell of ALIARTE alſo, which was thirty yeares after that. The effect of that oracle was this:

VVhen thou thy nets ſhalt ſpread, the wolues for to intrap:
Beware thou come not neare vnto, a litle hill by happe,
Of Orchalide. Nor neare, to any his confines:
For there, the crafty foxes keepe their dennes and priuy mines.

He calleth the territory that is about DELIVM, the vttermoſt confines, becauſe BOEOTIA doth confine there with the country of ATTICA: and the hill Orchalide which is now called Alopecon (to ſay the fox denne) which lieth on that ſide of the city of ALIARTE, that looketh towardes mount Helicon. Lyſander being ſlaine, the SPARTANS tooke his death ſo ill, that they would haue condemned king Pauſanias of treaſon by law: who durſt not abide the triall, but fled vnto the city of TEGEA, where he ended the reſt of his life within the ſanctuary of the temple of Minerua. When Lyſander was dead, his pouerty appeared to the world which made his vertue far more famous, then when he liued. For then they ſaw, that for all the gold and ſiluer which had paſſed through his handes, for all his great authority and countenaunce that he had caried, and for all that ſo many cities and towns did come to honor him, & briefly, for all that he had ſo great and puiſſant a kingdom in manner in his hands: yet he did neuer enrich nor increaſe his houſe with ſo much as one farthing. So writeth Theopompus, whom we ſhould rather beleeue when he praiſeth, then when he diſcōmendeth: for commonly he taketh more delite to diſpraiſe, then to praiſe any. It fortuned not lōg after, as Ephorus writeth, that the LACEDEMONIANS and their confederates fell at variance together, wherupon Lyſanders letters were to be ſeene that were in his houſe. King Ageſilaus going thither to peruſe them, amongſt other writings, found the oration penned by Cleon Halicarnaſſeus which Lyſander had prepared to perſwade the SPARTANS to change their gouernement, and to declare vnto them that they ſhould reuoke the prerogatiue which the Eurytiontides and the Agiades had: that the kings of SPARTA could not be choſen but out of thoſe two families, and to leaue the prerogatiue at liberty, that the chiefeſt magiſtrates might be lawfully choſen kings of SPARTA. Ageſilaus ſtood indifferent to haue ſhewed this oration openly to the people, that the SPARTANS might ſee what manner a citizen Lyſander had bene in his heart. But Lacratidas, a graue wiſe man, and preſident at that time of the Councell of the Ephori, would not ſuffer him: ſaying, that he ſhould not digge Lyſander out of his graue againe, but rather bury his oration with him, that was ſo paſſingly well, & eloquently penned to perſwade. Yet notwithſtanding, they did him great honour after his death: and amongſt others, condemned two citizens in a great ſumme of money, that were made ſure to two of his daughters while he liued, and refuſed to marrie them when he was dead, ſeeing their father died ſo poore: becauſe they ſought to match in his houſe, ſuppoſing he had bene rich, and forſooke them afterwards for their fathers pouertie, when they ſaw he died a good and iuſt man. Thus we ſee, that at SPARTA there was a puniſhment for them that did not marrie, or that married too late, or that married ill: and vnto this puniſhment were they moſt ſubiect, that ſought great matches for couetouſneſſe of goods: This is all we haue to write of Lyſanders life and actes.

Sylla.

LVcius Cornelius Sylla was of the race of the Patricians, who be the noble men and gentlemen of ROME: and there was one of his anceſters called Rufinus, that obtained the dignity of Conſul. He notwithſtanding his Conſulſhip, wan more diſhonor by defame, then he obtained honour by dignity of Conſull. For they finding in his houſe aboue ten pounds worth of plate, contrary to the law at that time expreſly forbidding it: he was expulſed the Senat, & loſt his place there, after which diſhonour once receiued, his iſſue neuer roſe, nor yet recouered it. And Sylla him ſelfe had very litle left him by his father: ſo

That is, becauſe that ſylla in latine ſignifieth oker, which becommeth redde when it is put to the fire, and theref re ſyllaceus color in vitruuia, ſignifieth purple colour.

that in his youth he was faine to hire an other mans houſe, & ſat at a ſmall rent, as afterwards he was twitted in the teeth withal, when they ſaw him richer then they thought he had deſerued. For when he gloried & boaſted of the victory at his returne from the wars of AFRICKE, there was a noble man that ſaid vnto him: why, how is it poſſible thou ſhouldeſt be an honeſt man, that hauing nothing left thee by thy father, thou art now come to haue ſo much? Now, though ROME had left her ancient iuſtice and pureneſſe of life, wherwith ſhe brought vp her people in former times, and that their hearts were poiſoned with couetous deſire of vaine ſuperfluous delights: yet notwithſtanding it was as foule a reproch to them that did not maintaine themſelues in the pouertie of their fathers, as vnto them that did conſume their patrimony, and bring all to naught which their parents had left them. But afterwardes alſo when he caried the whole ſway in ROME, and that he had put ſo many men to death: a free man being borne of the ſlaues infranchiſed, & being ready to be throwen downe the rocke Tarpeian, becauſe he had ſaued and hidden one of the outlawes and men proclaimed to be put to death, whereſoeuer they were found: caſt it in Syllaes teeth, how that they had liued and dwelt together a long time in one ſelfe houſe, he hauing payed a thouſand Nummos for the rent of the vppermoſt roomes of the ſame houſe, & Sylla three thouſand for all the neathermoſt roomes beneath. So that betwene both their wealthes, there was but onely two thouſand and fiftie Drachmas of ATHENS difference. And this is that we finde in writing of his firſt wealth. As for his ſtature and perſon, that appeareth ſufficiently by the ſtatues and images that were made for him, which yet remaine. But for his eyes, they were like fire, and wonderfull redde: and the colour of his face withall, made them the more fearefull to beholde. For he was copper noſed, and that was full of white ſtreakes here and there: whereupon they ſay that the ſurname of a Sylla was giuen him, by reaſon of his colour. And there was a ieſter at ATHENS that finely mocked him in his verſe:

It is not amiſſe to ſearch out the naturall diſpoſition of this man by ſuch outward markes and tokens. It is ſaid alſo that he was ſo naturally giuen to mocke and ieſt, that being a young man vnknowne, he would neuer be out of the company of players, fooles, and tumblers, but ſtill eating and tippling with them in diſſolute manner. And afterwards alſo when he was in his chiefeſt authoritie, he would commonly eate and drinke with the moſt impudent ieſters and ſcoffers, and all ſuch rakehels, as made profeſsion of counterfeit mirth, and would ſtriue with the baddeſt of them to giue the fineſt mocks: wherein he did not only a thing vncomly for his yeares, & diſhonored the maieſty of his office & dignity, but therby alſo grew careleſſe and negligent in matters of great importance, whereunto he ſhould haue taken good regarde. For after he was once ſet at his table, he was not to be moued any more in matters of weight. Now, though from the table he was commonly found both very actiue, painefull, and ſeuere: yet falling into ſuch company by drinking, bowſing, and making good cheare, he ſodainly became an other maner of man. So that without all compaſſe of modeſty and iudgement, he was too familiar and conuerſant with plaiers, ieaſters, tumblers, and daunſers: who when they had him in that vaine, might doe what they would with him. Of this ryoting came (in mine opinion) his vice of lechery, whereunto hee was greatly giuen, and eaſily drawen after loue and pleaſure: in ſuch ſort, as his gray haires could not reſtraine his voluptuous life. His vnlawfull luſting loue beganne in his young yeares, with one Metrobius a common player, which ſtretched on encreaſing his amorous deſire vntill his latter age. For at the firſt he loued Nicopolis a rich curtiſan: and frequenting her company by oft acceſſe, and beſides that he ſpent the prime of his beauty and youth in feaſting her with great delight and paſſing pleaſure: ſhe afterwardes became in loue with him, ſo that when ſhee died, ſhe made Sylla her heire of all ſhe had. He was heire alſo vnto his mother in law, who loued him as her owne begotten ſonne: and by theſe two good happes he was ſtept vp to prety wealth. Afterwardes being choſen Quæſtor (to ſay treaſurer) the firſt time that Marius was Conſull, he imbarked with him in his iorney into AFRICKE, to warre with king Iugurthe. When he was arriued at the campe, he ſhewed him ſelfe a man of great ſeruice in all other things, but in this eſpecially, that he could wiſely vſe the benefit of any occaſion offered him, and thereby wanne Bocchus king of the NVMIDIANS to be his faſt and faithfull friend: whoſe Ambaſſadors, that ſcaped from a companie of NVMIDIAN theeues he courteouſly entertained, and hauing giuen them goodly preſents, ſent them backe againe with a ſafe conuoy. Now concerning King Bocchus, hee had of long time both hated and feared king Iugurthe his ſonne in law: inſomuch, that after he was ouercome in battell, and came to him for ſuccour, Bocchus practiſed treaſon againſt him and for this cauſe ſent ſecretly for Sylla, deſiring rather that Iugurthe ſhould be taken by Sylla, then by himſelfe. Sylla brake this matter vnto Marius, of whom hauing receiued a ſmall number of ſouldiers to accompanie him (without reſpect of perill or danger) went and committed himſelfe to the faith and fidelitie of one barbarous king, to take an other: conſidering alſo that the king whom he truſted was ſo vniuſt of his word, euen vnto his neereſt friends & confederates. Now Bocchus hauing Iugurthe and Sylla both in his power, and brought himſelfe to that pinch that of neceſſity he muſt betray the one or the other: after he had taken good breath to reſolue which of the two he ſhould deale withall, in the end went on with his firſt plot and deuiſe of treaſon, and ſo deliuered Iugurthe into Syllaes hands. In deede Marius triumphed for taking of King Iugurthe: but his euill willers, for the ſpight and grudge they bare him, did attribute the glory & honor of Iugurthes taking wholy vnto Sylla. That ſecretly went to Marius heart, and ſpecially for that Sylla being high minded by nature (comming then but newly from a baſe, obſcure, and vnknowen life to be knowen & well accepted of the people in ROME, and to taſte alſo what honor ment) became ſo ambitious and couetous of glory, that he cauſed the ſtory to be grauen in a ring, which he did euer after vſe to weare & ſeale withall. Where king Bocchus was deliuering of Iugurthe vnto Sylla, & Sylla alſo receiuing Iugurthe priſoner. Theſe things miſliked Marius much: but notwithſtanding, iudging that Sylla was not ſo much enuied as himſelfe, he tooke him with him vnto the warres. Marius in his ſecond Conſulſhip, made Sylla one of his Lieutenants: and in his third Conſulſhip, he had charge vnder him of a thouſand footmen, and did many notable and profitable exploites for him. When Sylla was his Lieutenant he tooke one Copillus, a generall of the GAVLES Tectoſages. And when he was Colonell of a thouſand footemen, he brought the MARSIANS (a maruellous great countrie of people in ITALIE) and perſwaded them to remaine good friends, and confederats of the ROMAINES. For this his good ſeruice, he found that Marius grew in great miſliking with him, becauſe from thenceforth he neuer gaue him any honorable charge, or occaſion to ſhew good ſeruice: but to the contrary, did what he could to hinder his riſing. Wherefore, Sylla afterwards tooke Catulus Luctatius part, who was companion with Marius in his Conſulſhip. This Catulus was a very honeſt man, but ſomwhat ſlacke and colde in martiall matters, which was the cauſe that indeed he did commit vnto Sylla all the ſpeciall ſeruice, and matters of weight in his charge: whereuppon he gaue him occaſion not onely to increaſe his eſtimation, but alſo his credit and power. For, by force of armes, he conquered the moſt parte of the barbarous people which inhabited the mountaines of the Alpes: and Catulus campe lacking victuals, hauing commiſſion, he made a maruellous great quantity of prouiſion to be brought thither, inſomuch as Catulus campe being plentifully victualed, they ſent their ſtore & ſurpluſage vnto Marius ſouldiers, the which Sylla him ſelfe writeth, did much miſlike Marius. And this is the firſt cauſe of their enmity. The which being grounded vpon ſo light occaſion, was followed with ciuill warres, great effuſion of bloud, and with incurable factions and diſſentions: that it ended at the length with a cruell tyranny, and confuſion of all the ROMAINE ſtate and Empire. This doth proue that Euripides the Poet was a wiſe man, and one that foreſaw the ruines of common weales, when he counſelled, and alſo commaunded gouernours to flie ambition, as a moſt peſtilent and mortall fury vnto them that are once infected withall. Now Sylla thinking that the reputation he had gotten already in the wars, would haue made his way open to preferre him to ſome honorable office in the city of ROME: he was no ſooner returned from the warres but he would needes proue the peoples good willes vnto him, and procured his name to be billed among them that ſued for the Prætorſhippe of the city (that is to ſay, the office of the ordinary iudge that miniſtreth iuſtice vnto the citizens) but he was reiected by the voice of the people. For the which he layed the fault vppon the meaner ſort, ſaying, that the communalty knew well enough the friendſhippe he had with king Bocchus, and that therefore they hoping that if he were made Ædilis before he came to be Prætor, hee would make them ſee noble huntings and great fightings of wilde beaſtes of LIBYA. And that therefore they did chooſe other Prætors, and put him by his ſute, in hope to compell him by this meanes to be firſt of all Ædilis. Howbeit it ſeemeth that he doth not confeſſe the truth of his refuſall, for his owne act doth condemne himſelfe: becauſe the next yeare following he was choſen Prætor, partly for that he wan the people with courteſie, and partly with money. So he falling out with Cæſar vppon that occaſion, in his anger threatned him that he would vſe the power and authoritie of his office vpon him. But Cæſar ſmiling, anſwered him: thou haſt reaſon to call it thine office, for indeede it is thine, becauſe thou haſt bought it. But after the time of his Prætorſhippe was expired, he was ſent with an armie into CAPPADOCIA, colouring his voiage thither with commiſſion to reſtore Ariobarzanes into his kingdom againe: howbeit the only cauſe of his iorney was indeede to ſuppreſſe king Mithridates a litle, who tooke too many things in hande, and increaſed his power and dominion with a new ſigniorie of no leſſe greatneſſe, then that which he had before. In truth he brought no great armie out of ITALIE with him, but he was faithfully holpen by the confederates of the ROMAINES in euery place, through whoſe aide he ouerthrew a great number of the CAPPADOCIANS, and afterwards alſo a greater number of the ARMENIANS, which came in like caſe to aide them: ſo that he expulſed Gordius king of PHRYGIA out of CAPPADOCIA, and reſtored Ariobarzanes to his realme againe. After which victory, Sylla remained by the riuer of Euphrates, and thither came vnto him one Orobazus a PARTHIAN, Ambaſſador of Arſaces, king of the PARTHIANS. Now theſe two nations, the ROMAINES, and the PARTHIANS, were neuer friends before: and that with other things ſhewed the great good fortune Sylla had, that the PARTHIANS came firſt to him by his meanes to ſeeke friendſhip with the ROMAINES. They ſay, that receiuing this Ambaſſador Orobazus, he made three chayres to be brought out, the one for king Ariobarzanes, the other for Orobazus the Ambaſſador, and the thirde for himſelfe, which he placed in the middeſt betwene them both, and ſitting downe in the ſame, gaue audience vnto the Ambaſſadour: for which cauſe the king of PARTHIA afterwardes put Orobazus to death. Some doe commend Sylla for this acte, for that he kept his ſtate in ſuch maieſtie among the barbarous people. Other do reproue his ambition in it, ſhewing himſelfe ſtately out of time, and to no purpoſe. We do reade that a ſoothſayer of CHALDEA being in Orobazus traine, hauing diligently viewed & condered the phyſiognomy of Sylla, and all his other mouings and geſtures of minde and body, to iudge not by the clymate of the country, but according to the rules of his arte what his nature ſhould be: all well conſidered of, he ſayde that Sylla one day muſt needes come to be a great man, and that he maruelled how he could ſuffer in that he was not euen then the chiefeſt man of the world. When Sylla was returned againe to ROME, one Cenſorinus accuſed him of extortion, that he had caried away a great ſumme of money with him, contrary to the law, out of one of their confederates countrey: howbeit he proſecuted not his accuſation, but gaue it ouer. In the meane time, the enmity begunne betwixt him and Marius, kindled againe vppon a new occaſion of king Bocchus ambition: who partly to creepe further into the peoples fauour of ROME, and partly alſo for to gratifie Sylla, gaue and dedicated certaine images of victory carying tokens of triumphe, vnto the temple of Iupiter Capitolin, & next vnto them alſo the image of Iugurthe, which he deliuered into the handes of Sylla, being all of pure golde. This did ſo offend Marius, that he attempted to take them away by force: but others did defend the cauſe of Sylla. So that for the quarrell of theſe two, the city of ROME taking armes, had like to haue brought all to ruine: had not the wars of the confederats of ITALY bene, which of long time did kindle and ſmoke, but at the length brake out into open flame and ſedition for that time. In this maruellous great war which fell out very dangerous, by ſundry miſfortunes and great loſſes to the ROMAINES, Marius did no notable exploite: whereby it appeareth, that the vertue of warlike diſcipline hath neede of a ſtrong, luſty, and able body. For Sylla to the contrary, hauing done notable ſeruice, and obtained many profitable victories, wan the fame and eſtimation among the ROMAINES, of a noble ſouldier, and worthy Captaine: and among the enemies them ſelues, of a moſt fortunate man. Notwithſtanding, Sylla did not as Timotheus ATHENIAN, the ſonne of Conon had done:

Who, when his aduerſaries & ill willers did attribute his noble deeds vnto the fauor of fortune, and did painte fortune in tables, that brought him all the cities taken and ſnared in nets whileſt he ſlept: he tooke it in very ill parte, and was maruellous angry with them that did it, ſaying, that they robbed him of the glory that iuſtly belonged vnto him. Wherfore one day when this Timotheus was returned from the warres with great victories, after he had openly acquainted the ATHENIANS with the whole diſcourſe of his doings in his voyage, he ſayed vnto them: my Lords of ATHENS, fortune hath had no part in all this which I haue told vnto you. Hereupon the gods it ſhould ſeeme were ſo angry with this fooliſh ambition of Timotheus, that he neuer afterwards did any worthy thing, but all went vtterly againſt the haire with him: vntill at the length he came to be ſo hated of the people, that in the end they baniſhed him from ATHENS. But Sylla to the contrary, did not only patiently abide their wordes, that ſayed, he was a happy man, and ſingularly beloued of fortune: but alſo increaſing this opinion, and glorying as at a ſpeciall grace of the gods, did attribute the honour of his doings vnto fortune, either for a vaine glory, or for that he had in fancie, that the gods did proſper him in all his doings. For he wrote himſelfe in his commentaries, that the enterpriſes which he hazarded moſt hottely according to the ſodaine occaſion offered, did better proſper with him, then thoſe which by good aduiſe he had determined of. Furthermore, when he ſayd that he was better borne vnto fortune, then to the warres: it ſeemeth that he confeſſed all his proſperitie came rather by fortune, then by his worthineſſe. And to conclude, it appeareth that he did wholly ſubmit himſelfe vnto fortune, acknowledging that he did altogether depend vpon her: conſidering that he did attribute it to the ſpeciall grace and fauour of the gods, that he neuer diſagreed with Metellus his father in law, who was a man of like dignitie and authoritie as himſelfe was. For where it was thought he would haue bene a great hinderer of his doings, he found him very curteous and gentle in his behalfe, in all that they had to deale in together, by reaſon of the ſocietie of their office. And furthermore, in his commentaries which he dedicated vnto Lucullus, he counſelled him to thinke nothing more certaine and aſſured, then that which the goddes ſhould reueale vnto him, and commaund him in his nightes dreame. He writeth alſo that when he was ſent with an army vnto the warres of the confederates, the earth ſodainly opened about LAVERNA, out of the which immediatly came a maruellous bright flame of fire that aſcended vp to the element. The wiſe men being asked their opinions about the ſame, made anſwer that a very honeſt man, and alſo a maruellous fayer man of complexion taking ſoueraine authority in his handes, ſhould pacifie all tumultes and ſedition which were at that time in ROME. Whereupon Sylla ſayed it was himſelfe whom the goddes ment, becauſe that amongſt other things he had that ſingular gift of beauty, that his haire was yealow as golde: and he was not aſhamed to name himſelfe an honeſt man, after he had wonne ſo many notable great victories. Thus haue we ſufficiently ſpoken of the truſt he had in the fauour of the goddes. And furthermore, he ſeemed to be very contrary in his manners, and vnlike to himſelfe. For if he tooke away much in one place, he gaue as much more alſo in another. Some he preferred without cauſe: and others he put down without reaſon. He would be very gentle vnto them, of whom he would haue ought: and vnto thoſe that ſought of him, he would ſtand much vpon his honor, and looke for great reuerence. Wherby men could hardly diſcern his nature, whether pride or flattery did more abound in him. And as for the inequality he vſed in puniſhing of them that had offended him: ſometimes he hanged vp men for very ſmall and light cauſes: Some other times againe to the contrary, he patiently abode the moſt grieuous offences in the worlde: and lightly pardoned and forgaue ſuch faultes as were in no wiſe to be forgiuen. And afterwards againe would puniſh right ſmall crimes, with murthers, effuſion of blood, and confiſcation of goods. This iudgment may be giuen of him: that by nature he had a malicious and a reuenging minde: yet notwithſtanding he qualified that naturall bitternes with reaſon, giuing place to neceſſity, and his benefit. For in this warre of the confederates, his ſouldiers ſlue Albinus one of his Lieutenantes, beating him to death with ſtaues and ſtones, being a man of good qualitie and one that had bene Prætor. This great offence he paſſed ouer with ſilence, vſing no manner of puniſhment, and turned it to a boaſt in the end, ſaying that his men were the more obedient and diligent in any peece of ſeruice that was to be done, and that he made them amend their faultes by worthy ſeruice. And furthermore, he did not regard them that did reproue him: but hauing determined with himſelfe to deſtroy Marius, and to procure that he might be choſen generall in the warres againſt king Mithridates, becauſe that this warre of the confederates was now ended: for this cauſe he flattered & curried fauor with his ſouldiers that ſerued vnder him. At his returne to ROME from theſe warres of the confederates, he was choſen Conſull with Q. Pompeius, being then fifty yeare olde, and maried with Cæcilia a noble Ladie, and Metellus daughter, who was then chiefe biſhop of ROME, for which mariage the common people ſang ſongs and ballades vp and downe ROME againſt him: and many of the noble men enuied him for it, thinking him vnworthy of ſo noble a Ladie, whom they thought worthy to be Conſul, as Titus Liuius ſayth. Now ſhe was not his only wife, for he had a yong wife before called Ilia, by whom he had a daughter. After he had maried AElia, then a thirde called Cælia, whom he put away becauſe ſhe brought him no children. But notwithſtanding ſhe went honorably away from him with very good words of her, beſides many other goodly rich giftes he gaue her: howbeit ſhortly after he maried Metella, which made the worlde ſuſpect that Cælia was put away for her naughtines. How ſoeuer it was, Sylla did euer honour and loue Metella: inſomuch as the people of ROME afterwardes making ſuite, that they that were baniſhed for Marius faction might be called home againe: and being denied, and refuſed by Sylla, they cryed out with open voice for Metella, praying her to helpe them to obtaine their requeſt. And it ſeemeth alſo that when he had taken the cittie of ATHENS, he delt more cruelly with them, becauſe that ſome of them had ſcoffed at Metella from the walles: howbeit that was afterwardes. So Sylla making his reckoning at that time that the Conſulſhip was a ſmall matter, in compariſon of that which he looked for in time to come: was maruellous deſirous to go againſt Mithridates. But therein Marius alſo, of a mad furious ambition and couetouſnes of glory ſtood againſt him, and ſued to goe that iorney in like manner, being ſubiect to thoſe paſſions, which neuer waxe olde, as we may dayly ſee by experience. For being now a heauie man, ſickly of body, and broken in ſeruice abroade in the wars, from the which he came but newly home, and bruſed moreouer with age: did notwithſtanding yet aſpire to haue the charge of the warres ſo farre off beyond the ſeas. Wherfore to obtaine his purpoſe, whileſt Sylla was gone a litle vnto the campe to giue order for certaine things that were to be done, he remaining in the city, did practiſe this peſtilent mortall ſedition, which alone did more hurt vnto the city of ROME, then all the enemies that ROME euer had: the which the goddes themſelues had foreſhewed by many ſignes and tokens. For fire tooke of it ſelfe in the ſtaues of the enſignes, which they had much adoe to quench. Three rauens brought their young ones into the high way, and did eate them vp in the ſight of many people, and afterwardes caried the garbage they left of them into their neaſtes. Rats alſo hauing gnawen ſome iewels of golde in a church, the ſextens ſetting a trap for them, a rat was taken full of young, and kendled fiue young rats in the trappe, of the which ſhee ate vp three. But more yet, on a fayre bright day when there was no cloude ſeene in the element at all, men heard ſuch a ſharp ſound of a trumpet, that they were almoſt all out of their wittes, for feare of ſo great a noyſe. Wherupon the wiſe men and ſoothſayers of THUSCAN being asked their opinions, tolde them: that this ſo ſtraunge and wonderfull ſigne did pronounce the change of the worlde, and the departure out of this into another life. For they hold opinion, that there ſhould be eight worldes, all contrary one vnto another, in manners and faſhions of life: vnto euery one of the which ſayed they, God hath determined a certaine time of continuance. Howbeit they all came to ende their courſe within the ſpace of the reuolution of the great yeare: and that when the one is ended, and the other ready to begin, there are ſeene ſuch wonderfull ſtrange ſignes on the earth, or in the element. And ſuch as haue ſtudied that ſcience, doe certainely know, as ſoone as men be borne, which are meere contary vnto the firſt in their liues and maners, and which are either more or leſſe acceptable vnto the goddes, then thoſe which liued in former age. For they ſay, that amongeſt great changes and alterations which are done in thoſe places from one age vnto another, the ſcience of diuination, and foretelling of things to come doth grow in reputation, and meeteth in their predictions, when it pleaſeth God to ſende moſt certaine and manifeſt ſignes, to know and foretell things to come. And in contrariwiſe alſo in another age it groweth to contempt, and loſeth her reputation, for that it is very raſh, and fayleth to meete with the moſt parte of her predictions, becauſe ſhe hath but obſcure meanes, and all her inſtruments defaced, to know what ſhould come. And theſe be the fables which the wiſeſt ſoothſayers of THVSCAN reported abroad, & they ſpecially who ſeemed to haue ſome ſingular ſpeculation aboue others. But as the Senate were talking with the ſoothſayers of theſe wonders, being aſſembled together within the temple of the goddeſſe Bellona, a ſparrow came flying into the church in ſight of them all, and caried a graſſehopper in her bill, and parted it in the middeſt, and left one part within the temple, and caried the other away with her. Whereupon the wiſe men and interpreters of ſuch wonders, ſayed, that they doubted a commotion and riſing of the country men againſt the cõmons of the city, becauſe the common people of the cittie doe crye out continually like graſſehoppers, and the husband-men do keepe themſelues vpon their lands in the country. Thus Marius grew great and very familiar with Sulpitius, one of the Tribunes of the people, who in all kindes of wickednes and miſchiefe that a man can reckon, would giue place to no liuing creature: ſo that a man need not to ſeeke or demaund any where for a worſe then he, but the queſtion is rather wherein he himſelfe was not the worſt of all others. For he was full repleat with all kindes of crueltie, auarice, and raſhneſſe, and that ſo extreamely, as he cared not what villainie and wickednes he openly committed, ſo that the ſame might turne to his profit. For he had ſet vp a table in the open market place, where he ſolde freedome, making ſlaues and ſtrangers denizens of ROME for their money: and for that purpoſe he entertained a gard of three thouſand about him, beſides a band of young gentlemen of the order of knightes that attended alwaies vpon his perſon readie at his commaundement, whom he called the garde againſt the Senate. And furthermore, himſelfe hauing paſſed a lawe by the voice of the people, that no Senator ſhould borrow nor owe aboue two thouſand Drachmas: it was found that at the houre of his death, he dyed three millions of Drachmas in debt. This man now like a furious raging beaſt, being left by Marius amongſt the people, turned all things topſie turuey, by force of armes and maine ſtrength. He made alſo many wicked lawes to paſſe by voice of the people, and amongſt others, that one ſpecially, wherby he gaue Marius commiſſion to make warres againſt king Mithridates. For which extreame oppreſſions and dealings of Sulpitius, the two Conſuls (Sylla and Quintus Pompeius) left off to heare publike cauſes, and ceaſed the common courſe of law and iuſtice. And as they were one day occupied about the adiornement of the law, in an open aſſembly in the market place, before the temple of Caſtor and Pollux: Sulpitius the tribune came vpon them with his ſouldiers, and ſlue many people, and among others, the Conſull Pompeius owne ſonne, and the father himſelfe being Conſull, had much a doe to ſaue his life by flying. And Sylla the other Conſul, was alſo purſued euen into Marius houſe, where he was compelled to promiſe before his departure, preſently to goe and reuoke the adiornement of the law which he had before commaunded. Thus Sulpitius hauing depriued Pompeius of his conſulſhippe, did not depoſe Sylla, but onely tooke from him the charge he had giuen him to make warres againſt Mithridates, and transferred that vnto Marius. And ſending colonels to the city of NOLA to receiue the army that laye there, and to bring them vnto Marius, Sylla preuented them, and fled to the campe before them, and told the ſouldiers all what had paſt, as it was indeede: who when they heard it, fell all to a tumult, and ſlue Marius collonels with ſtones. Marius on the other ſide put all Syllaes friends to death at ROME, and tooke the ſpoyle of their goodes and houſes: ſo was there nothing elſe but flying from the campe to ROME, and from ROME to the campe againe. The Senate were in manner beſide themſelues, not being able to gouerne as they would, but driuen to obey Marius & Sulpitius commandementes. Who being aduertiſed that Sylla was comming towards ROME, ſent ſtraight two Prætors vnto him, Brutus and Seruilius, to commund him as from the Senate, to approch no nearer. Theſe two Prætors ſpake a litle too boldly vnto Sylla: whereupon the ſouldiers fell to a mutinie, in ſuch ſort, that they ſtood indifferent whether to kill them preſently in the field or no: howbeit they brake their axes and bundels of roddes which were caried before them, and tooke their purple robes wherewith they were apparelled as magiſtrates, from them, and ſent them home thus ſhamefully handled and intreated. Vpon their returne now to Rome, their ſadde ſilence onely, and themſelues ſo ſtripped beſides of all their markes and tokens of Prætoriall dignitie, made all men then to iudge that they brought no other newes, but ſuch as were the worſt that poſſibly could be: and that there was no way then left to pacifie this ſedition, which was now altogether vncurable. Wherfore Marius and his followers began to make themſelues ſtrong by force: and Sylla with his companion Q. Pompeius, departed in the meane time from the city of Nola, and brought ſix entier legions on with him, who deſired no other thing but to make haſt to march to Rome ward. Howbeit Sylla ſtood in doubt with himſelfe what to doe, thinking of the great danger that might follow. Vntill ſuch time as his ſoothſayer Poſthumius hauing conſidered the ſignes & tokens of the ſacrifices, which Sylla had made vpon this determination, gaue him both his handes, and bad him bind them hard, and ſhut him vp faſt, vntill the day of battell ſhould be paſt: ſaying, that he was contented to ſuffer death, if he had not good ſucceſſe, and that out of hand, to his great honour. And it is ſayed alſo, that the ſame night there appeared vnto Sylla in a dreame the goddeſſe Bellona, whom the Romaines do greatly honor, following therein the Cappadocians: and I know not whether it be the moone, Minerua, or Enyo the goddeſſe of battels. So he thought, that ſhe comming to him did put lightning into his hand, commaunding him that he ſhould lighten vpon his enemies, naming them one after another by their proper names: and that they being ſtriken with his lightning, fell down dead before him, and no man knew what became of them. This viſion encoraged Sylla very much, and hauing reported the ſame to Pompeius, his fellow conſull & companion, the next morning he marched with his army to Rome. Whē he was at Picines, there came other ambaſſadors vnto him, to pray him in the name of the Senate that he would not come to Rome in this heate and fury, declaring therwithall that the Senate would graunt him all things that ſhould be meete and reaſonable. When Sylla had heard the meſſage, he anſwered them, that he would campe there: and ſo commaunded the martialls to deuide the ſquadrons according to their manner. The ambaſſadors beleuing that he would ſo haue done indeede, returned againe to Rome: howbeit their backes were no ſooner turned, but Sylla ſtraight ſent Lucius Baſillus, and Caius Mummius before to ſeaze one of the gates of Rome, and the wals which were on the ſide of mount Eſquilin, and he himſelfe alſo in perſon with all poſſible ſpeede marched after them. Baſillus entred Rome, and wanne the gate by force. But the common people vnarmed, got them vp ſtraight to the top of their houſes, and with tyles and ſtones ſtayed, and kept him, not onely for entring any further: but alſo draue him backe againe, euen to the very walles of the city. In this hurly burly came Sylla himſelfe to Rome, who ſeeing apparantly in what ſtate things ſtoode, cryed out to his men, and bad them ſet fire on the houſes: and himſelfe taking a torch light in his hande ſhewed them the way what they ſhould doe, appointing his archers and darters to hurle and beſtow their dartes, and other fierie inſtrumentes, to the tops of the houſes. Herein he was too much ouercome with vnreaſonable choller, paſſion, and diſire of reuenge. For ſeeking only to plague his enemies, he tooke no regard to friendes, to parents or confederates, neither had he yet any maner of remorſe or pitty: ſuch and ſo fiery was his anger then, that he put no kind of difference betwene thoſe that had offended, and them that had done him no hurt at all. By this meanes was Marius driuen into the city, vnto the temple of the Earth, where he made open proclamation by ſound of trumpet, that he would make free all the ſlaues that woulde come to his part. But forthwith came his enemies, ſet vpon him, and preſt him ſo neere, that he was conſtrained vtterly to flie and forſake the city. Then Sylla aſſembling the Senate, cauſed Marius, and certen others, together with Sulpitius Tribune of the people, to be condemned to death. Sulpitius was betrayed by a ſlaue of his owne, whom Sylla made free according to his promiſe paſt by publike edict: but whē he had made him free, he cauſed him to be throwen downe headlong from the rocke Tarpeian. And not contented with this, he proclaimed by promiſe a great ſumme of money to him that would kill Marius: a very ingrate and vnthankefull parte, conſidering that Marius not many dayes before hauing Sylla in his owne houſe, in his handes and cuſtody, deliuered him from perill, and ſet him in ſafety. Which if at that time he had not done, but had ſuffered Sulpitius to haue ſlaine him: himſelfe had bene ſouetaine Lord of the whole without all contradictiõ, and might haue ruled all things at his owne will and pleaſure. But Sylla ſhortly after vpon the like aduantage, vſed no ſuch manner of requitall or grauitie towardes him, which bred a ſecret miſliking amongſt the Senate: howbeit the common people made open ſhewe of the euill will they bare vnto Sylla, by reiecting one Nonius his nephew, and one Seruius, who vpon confidence of his fauor, preſented themſelues to ſue for certaine offices. And beſides the ſhame of this refuſall, to ſpighte him the more, they choſe others in their ſteades, whoſe honour and preferment they right well knew that Sylla would not onely miſlike, but be much offended withall. Howbeit he wiſely diſſembling the matter, ſeemed to be very glad, ſaying that by his meanes the people of ROME enioyed a full and perfect libertie, that in ſuch caſes of election they might freely doe what themſelues liſted. And to mitigate ſomewhat the peoples ill will towards him, he determined to chuſe Lucius Cinna Conſull, who was of a contrary faction to him: hauing firſt bound him by ſolemne oth and curſe to fauor his doings and whole procedings. Wherupon Cinna went vp to the Capitoll, and there holding a ſtone in his hand, did ſolemnly ſweare and promiſe, that he would be Syllaes faithfull friend: beſeeching the gods if he did the contrary, that he might be throwen out of ROME, euen as he threw that ſtone out of his hand: & with thoſe words, threw it to the ground before many people. But notwithſtanding all theſe curſes, Cinna was no ſooner entred into his conſulſhip, but preſently he beganne to change and alter all. For amongſt other things, he would needs haue Sylla accuſed: and procured Verginius, one of the Tribunes of the people, to be his accuſer. But Sylla left him with his iudges, and went to make warres againſt Mithridates. And it is ſayed, that about the time that Sylla tooke ſhip, and departed out of ITALIE: there fortuned many tokens and warnings of the gods vnto king Mithridates, who was at that preſent in the cittie of PERGAMVM, as amongſt others, that the PERGAMENIANS to honor Mithridates withall, hauing made an image of victory, carying a garland of triumph in her hand, which was let downe from aloft with engines: ſo ſoone as ſhe was ready to put the garland vpon his head, the image brake, and the crowne fell to the ground in the middeſt of the Theater, and burſt all to peeces. Wherby all the people that were preſent, were ſtricken with a maruellous feare, and Mithridates himſelfe began to miſlike this euill lucke: although all things at that time fell out more fortunately, then he looked for. For he had taken ASIA frõ the ROMAINES, and BITHYNIA and CAPPADOCIA, from the kings which he had driuen out: and at that time remained in the city of PERGAMVM, to deuide the riches and great territories among his friends. As touching his ſonnes: the eldeſt was of the realme of Pontus, and of BOSPHORVS, which he inherited from his predeceſſors, euen vnto the deſertes beyond the mariſſes of Mæotides, without trouble or moleſtation of any man. The other alſo, Ariarathes, was with a great army in conquering of THRACIA, and MACEDON. His Captaines and Lieutenantes moreouer, did many notable conqueſtes in diuerſe places, with a great power: amongſt the which, Archelaus being Lord and maſter of all the ſea, for the great number of ſhippes he had, conquered the Iles CYCLADES, and all thoſe beyond the hed of Malea, and ſpecially amongſt others the Ile of EVBOEA. And beginning at the city of ATHENS, had made all the nations of GRECE to rebell, euen vnto THESSALIE, ſauing that he receiued ſome loſſe by the city of CHÆRONEA. Where Brutius Sura, one of the Lieutenantes of Sentius gouernor of MACEDON (a man of great wiſdome and valiantneſſe) came againſt him, and ſtayed him for going any further, ouerrunning the whole countrie of BOEOTIA like a furious raging riuer. And ſetting vpon Archelaus by the city of CHÆRONEA, ouerthrewe him in three ſeuerall battels: repulſed, and enforced him to take the ſeaes againe. But as Brutius was following him in chaſe, Lucius Lucullus ſent him commandement to giue place vnto Sylla, to follow thoſe warres againſt Mithridates, according to the charge & commiſſiõ in that behalfe giuen him. Wherupon Brutius Sura went out of the country of BOEOTIA, and returned towards his generall Sentius: notwithſtanding his affaires proſpered better then he could haue wiſhed, and that all GRECE were very willing to reuolt, for the reputation of his wiſdom and goodnes. Howbeit the things that we before haue ſpoken of, were the moſt notable matters that Brutius did in thoſe partes. Sylla now vpon his arriuall, recouered immediatly all the other citties of GRECE: who being aduertiſed of his comming, ſent preſently to pray him to come to their aide, the city of ATHENS onely excepted, which was compelled by the tyrant Ariſtion, to take part with Mithridates. Sylla thereupon with all his power went thither, beſieged the hauen of Piræa round, cauſing it to be battered and aſſaulted on euery ſide, with all ſortes of engines and inſtrumentes of battery: whereas if he could haue had patience but a litle longer, he might haue had the high towne by famine, without putting himſelfe in any manner of daunger, the ſame being brought to ſuch extreame dearth and ſcarſity of all kind of victuals. But the haſt that he made to returne againe to ROME, for feare of the new chaunge which he heard of daily from thence, compelled him to hazard this warre in that ſorte with great danger, many battelles, and infinite charge: conſidering alſo, that beſides all other prouiſion and furniture, he had twenty thouſand mules and mulets laboring daily to furniſh his engines of battery. And when all other wood failed him, becauſe his engines were oftentimes marred after they were made, ſome breaking of themſelues by reaſon of their waight, others conſumed with fire throwen from the enemies: at the length he fell to the holy wood, and cut downe the trees of the Academia, being better ſtored and furniſhed, then any other parke of pleaſure in all the ſuburbes of the city, & feld down all the wood of the parke Lycæum. And ſtanding in neede of a great ſumme of money to entertaine this warres withall, he delt alſo with the holieſt temples of all GRECE, cauſing thē to bring him from the temples of EPIDAVRVM & OLYMPVS, all the richeſt & moſt pretious iewels they had. He wrote moreouer vnto the councell of the AMPHICTYONS holdē in the city of DELPHES, to bring him the ready money they had in the temple of Apollo, for that it ſhould be kept in better ſafety with him, thē if it ſtill remained there: promiſing beſides, that if he ſhould by occaſion be compelled to vſe it, he would reſtore as much againe vnto them: and for this purpoſe he ſent Caphis PHOCIAN, one of his very friends & familiars, and cōmanded him to wey all that he tooke. So Caphis went vnto DELPHES: but when he came thither, being afraid to touch the holy things, in preſence of the councell of the AMPHICTYONS, he wept, that the teares ran downe by his cheekes, as a man compelled to doe ſuch an act againſt his will. And when ſome that were preſent, told Caphis that they heard the ſound of Apolloes citheren in the temple: whether he beleued it was ſo indeed, or becauſe he would put this ſuperſtitious feare into Syllaes head, he wrote to him of it. But Sylla mocking him, ſent him word, that he marueled he could not conſider, that ſinging and playing on the citheren, were tokens rather of ioye then of anger: and therfore that he ſhould not faile to proceede farther, and bring him thoſe things which he commanded, for that (ſayed he) Apollo did giue them him. Now for the other iewels of the temple of Apollo, the cōmon people knew not that they were ſent vnto Sylla: but the ſiluer tunne, which only was that that remained of the offrings of the kings, the AMPHICTYONS were faine to breake that in peeces, becauſe it was ſo great & maſſie, that the beaſts of draught could not draw it whole as it was. This act made them to remember the other ancient ROMAINE captains, as Flaminius, Manius Acilius, and Paulus AEmilius: of the which, the one hauing driuen king Antiochus out of GRECE, and the reſt alſo hauing ouerthrowen the kings of MACEDON, they neuer once touched the gold and ſiluer of the temples of GRECE: but contrarily ſent their offerings thither, and had them all in great honor and reuerence But as to them, they were all Captaines lawfully choſen and ſent to their charges: their ſouldiers well trained, & obedient at commandement, void of rebellion, or any manner of mutiny. And for themſelues, were kings in greatnes of courage and magnanimitie of mind: but in expence of their perſons, very ſpare and ſcant, without any lauiſh, but needfull and neceſſary, proportioned by reaſon, and thinking more ſhame to flatter their ſouldiers, then feare their enemies. Now the Captaines contrarily in Syllaes time, ſought not their preferment in the common wealth by vertue, but by force, and hauing greater warres one with another, then with ſtrangers their enemies: were compelled to flatter their ſouldiers whom they ſhould commaund, and to buy their paines & ſeruice, feeding them ſtill with large & great expences, to pleaſe and content them. Wherein they did not conſider, that they brought their country into bondage, & made themſelues ſlaues of the vileſt people of the world, whilſt that in the meane time they ſought to commaund by all meanes poſſible thoſe, which in many reſpects were farre better then themſelues. And this was the cauſe that both draue Marius out of ROME, and made him alſo to returne againe againſt Sylla. This ſelfe ſame cauſe made Cinna to kill Octauius, and Fimbria to ſlay Flaccus: of which euils Sylla was the very firſt and only author, ſpending out of all reaſon, and giuing the ſouldiers largely that ſerued vnder him, to winne their good wils the more, and thereby alſo to allure them. By reaſon wherof, Sylla had neede of mountaines of money, and ſpecially at the ſiege where he was: both to make ſtrangers traitors, and beſides, to furniſh and ſatisfie his owne diſſolute ſouldiers. For he had ſuch an earneſt deſire to take the citie of ATHENS, that he could not poſſibly be diſſwaded from it. And either it was of a certain vaine ambition he had to fight againſt the auncient reputation of that citie, being then but a ſhadow to that it had bene: or elſe of a very anger, for the mockes & gibes which the tirant Ariſtion gaue in his ſpeeches frō the wals, againſt him & Metella, to ſpight him the more withal. This tirant Ariſtion was full of all cruelty & wickednes, hauing taken vp al the worſt qualities and greateſt imperfections of king Mithridates, & heaped them wholly together in himſelfe: by reaſon whereof the poore city of ATHENS which had eſcaped from ſo many warres, tyrannies, and ciuill diſſentions vntill that preſent time, was by him, as by an vncurable diſeaſe, brought vnto all extremitie. For a buſhell of wheate was worth a thouſande Drachmas, and men were driuen for famine to eate feuerfew that grew about the caſtle: and they cauſed olde ſhoes and old oyle pots to be ſodden, to deliuer ſome ſauor vnto that they did eate, whileſt the tyrant himſelfe did nothing all day long but cramme in meat, & drinke dronke, dance, maske, ſcoffe & flout at the enemies, ſuffering the holy lampe of Minerua in the meane ſeaſon to goe out for lacke of oyle. And when the Nunne of the ſame temple ſent vnto him for a quarter of a buſhell of wheate, he ſent her a quarter of a buſhell of pepper. And when the counſellers of the citie, the prieſts & religious came to the caſtle, holding vp their hands, and beſeeching him to take ſome pitie of the citie, and fall to compoſition with Sylla: he made them to be driuen away and ſcattered with ſlings. In the end, very late, and yet with great a do, he ſent two or three of his quaffing companions vnto Sylla, who when they were come to him, made no demaund of compoſition for the towne, but began to praiſe & magnifie the deeds of Theſeus, of Eumolpus, & of the ATHENIANS againſt the MEDES. Whereupon Sylla made thē this anſwere. My goodly orators, returne you againe with all your rethoricke: for the ROMAINES ſent me not hither to learne nor to ſtudie, but to ouercome & conquer thoſe that are rebelled againſt them. In the meane time there were certaine ſpies in the citie that heard old men talking together in a place called Ceramicus, blaming the tyrant becauſe he kept no better watch on that ſide of the wall that was directly ouer againſt the Heptachalcon, which was the onely place where the enemies might eaſilieſt get vp vpon the wals. Thoſe ſpies went ſtraight vntō Sylla, and told him what they had heard the old men ſay. Sylla tracted no time, but came to the place in the night to ſee it: and perceiuing that it was to be taken, ſet the matter ſtraight abroach. And himſelfe writes in his commentaries, that the firſt man that ſcaled the wals, was Marcus Teius: who finding a ſouldier readie to reſiſt him, gaue him ſuch a ſore blow with his ſword vpon his headpeece, that his ſworde brake in two, and yet notwithſtanding that he ſaw himſelfe naked and diſarmed of a ſword, did not for all that giue backe, but ſtood ſtill to it, & kept the place ſo long till through him the city was taken, and all vpon the talke of theſe old men. So Sylla cauſed the wall to be pulled down betwene the hauen of Piræa, & the holy hauen: & hauing before made the breach very plaine, entred into the citie about midnight with a wonderfull fearefull order, making a maruellous noiſe with a number of hornes, & ſounding of trumpets, & all his armie with him in order of battell, crying, to the ſacke, to the ſacke: kill, kill. For he had giuen them the towne in ſpoile, & to put all to the ſword. The ſouldiers therfore ran through the ſtreetes with their ſwords drawen, making an vncredible ſlaughter: ſo that to this day they be not acknowen, nor do not declare what number of perſons were ſlaine, but to ſhew the greatnes of the murther that there was committed, the place is yet extant to be ſeene where the bloud ran. For beſides them that were ſlaine through all the city, the bloud of them only that were ſlaine in the market ſteede, did wet all the ground of Ceramicus, euen vnto the very place called Dipylon: and ſome ſay alſo, that it ranne by the gates into the ſuburbes of the citie. But if the multitude of the people that were ſlaine in this ſort were great, much more (or ſo many at the leaſt) it is ſaid were thoſe that ſlew themſelues, for the ſorrow and compaſſion they had to ſee

their country in ſuch pitifull ſtate, ſuppoſing certainly that their citie was now come to vtter ruine and deſtruction. This opinion made the nobleſt men of the citie to deſpaire of their own ſafetie, and feared to liue any longer, becauſe they thought they ſhould finde no mercie, no moderation of crueltie in Sylla. Notwithſtanding, partly at the requeſtes of Midias and Calliphon, who were baniſhed men from Athens, & fell at Syllaes feete vpon their knees: and partly alſo at the requeſtes of the Romaine Senators that were in his campe, who prayed him to pardon the bodie of the citie, and the rather for that he had alreadie quenched the thirſt of his rauening minde ſufficiently well, after that he had ſomewhat ſaide in praiſe of the ancient Athenians, he concluded in the end, to giue the greater number vnto the ſmaller, and the liuing to the dead. Sylla writeth himſelfe in his commentaries, that he tooke the citie of Athens on the very ſelfe day of the calendes of march, which commeth to agree with the firſt day of the moneth that we call Antheſterion, on the which day by chance many things are done at Athens in memorie of Noes flood, and of the vniuerſall deſtruction of the whole world that was in olde time by rage of waters, falling out euen in that very moneth. When the citie was thus taken, the tyrant Ariſtion fled into the caſtle, where he was beſieged by Curia, whom Sylla left there of purpoſe about that matter. And after he had a great time kept it, at the laſt, conſtrained thereunto for lacke of water, yeelded. The caſtle was no ſooner giuen vp, but immediatly by goddes prouidence, the weather miraculouſly altered. For the ſelfe ſame day, and at the very ſelfe inſtant that Curio caried the tyrant Ariſtion out of the caſtle, the element being very faire and cleare, the cloudes ſodainly gathered together, and there fell ſuch a maruellous glut of raine, that all the caſtle was full of water. Shortly after alſo, Sylla hauing gotten the hauen of Piræa, burnt the greateſt part of the buildinges: amongeſt others was the arſenall and armorie, which Philo in olde time had cauſed to be built, being of a ſtrange and wonderfull edifice. In the meane time, Taxilles, one of the Lieutenants of king Mithridates, comming from Thracia & Macedon, with a hundred thouſand footemen, tenne thouſand horſemen, and foureſcore and tenne thouſand cartes of warre all armed with ſythes: ſent vnto Archelaus to ioyne with him, lying yet at ancker in the hauen of Munychia, and not willing to leaue the ſea, nor come to fight with the Romaines, but ſeeking rather to draw theſe warres out in length, & to cut off all victuals from his enemies. Sylla vnderſtanding this drift better then himſelfe, departed out of the country of Attica (a very barren ſoile, and in deede not able to keepe him in time of peace) and went into Boeotia: wherein moſt men thought he committed great error to leaue Attica, which is a very hard country for horſemen, and to go into Boeotia, a plaine champion: and ſo much the rather, becauſe he knew well enough that the chiefeſt ſtrength of the barbarous people conſiſted in their horſemen, and their armed cartes with ſythes. But to auoide famine, and lacke of victuals as we haue ſaid, he was compelled to ſeeke battell. Furthermore, hee had an other cauſe alſo that made him affraide, and compelled him to go: and that was Hortenſius a famous Captaine, and very valiant alſo, who brought him aide out of Theſſalie, & the barbarous people lay in waite for him in his way, in the ſtraight of Thermopyles. And theſe were the cauſes that made Sylla take his way into Boeotia. But in the mean time, Caphis that was our country man, deceiuing the barbarous people, guided Hortenſius an other way by mount Parnaſſus, and brought him vnder the citie of Tithora, which was not then ſo great a citie as now at this preſent it is, but was a caſtle only, ſituated vpon the point of a rocke, hewen all about: whither the Phocians in old time flying king Xerxes comming vpon them, retyred themſelues for their ſafetie. Hortenſius lodged there, and there did alſo both defend and repulſe his enemies, ſo long as dailight laſted: and when the night came on, got downe through very hard ſtony waies, vnto the city of Patronide, where he ioyned with Sylla, who came to meete him with al his power. Thus being ioyned together, they camped vpon a hill that ſtandeth about the middeſt of the plaine of Elatea: the ſoyle was very good, and well repleniſhed with great ſtore of trees and water at the foote of the ſame. The hill is called Philobæotus, the nature and ſituation whereof, Sylla doth maruellouſly commend. When they were camped, they ſeemed but a handfull in the eye of their enemies: and no more were they indeede, for they had not aboue fifteene hundred horſe, and leſſe then fifteene thouſand footemen. their enemies, againſt Archelaus minde, brought out their bandes into the field, and filled all the valley and plaine thereabouts with horſemen, with cartes, with ſhieldes and targets, ſo that the aire was euen cut a ſunder as it were with the violence of the noiſe and cries of ſo many ſundrie nations, which altogether did put themſelues in battell ray. The ſumptuouſnes of their furniture moreouer, was not altogether ſuperfluous and vnprofitable, but ſerued greatly to feare the beholders. For the gliſtering of their harneſſe, ſo richly trimmed and ſet foorth with gold and ſiluer, the colours of their arming coates vpon their curaces, after the faſhion of the MEDES and SCYTHIANS, mingled with the bright gliſtering ſteele and ſhining copper, gaue ſuch a ſhew as they went and remoued to and fro, that made a light as cleare as if all had bene on a very fire, a fearefull thing to looke vpon. Inſomuch as the ROMAINES durſt not ſo much as once goe out of the trenches of their campe, nor Sylla with all his perſwaſion could take away this great conceiued feare from them: wherefore, (and becauſe alſo he would not compell them to goe forth in this feare) he was driuen not to ſtirre, but cloſe to abide (though it grieued him greatly) to ſee the barbarous people ſo proudly and villainouſly laugh him and his men to ſcorne. Howbeit the diſdaine and ſcoffing of his enemies, ſtood him to great good purpoſe afterwards. For they making now none account of him, kept ſmall watch and ward, ſtraied vp and downe diſorderly beſides, though otherwiſe they were not very obedient vnto their Captaines, being many commaunders, and fewe good followers: by reaſon whereof, a ſmall number kept in the campe, and all the reſt of the great multitude intiſed with the game they made by ſpoyling and ſacking of townes thereabouts, diſperſed themſelues many daies iorney from their campe. For it is ſaide, that at that very time they deſtroyed the citie of PANOPÆIA, ſacked the citie of LEBADIA, and ſpoyled the temple without commaundement or licence of any of all their Captaines to doe it. In the meane while, Sylla ſeeing ſo many cities and townes ſpoyled and deſtroyed, tooke it both grieuouſly, and alſo angrily: howbeit he ſuffered not his men to lie idlely, but kept them in labour, to turne the courſe of the riuer of Cephiſus, and to caſt great trenches, not ſuffering any man to take eaſe or reſt, but contrarily with great ſeuerity puniſhed ſuch as went faintly and laſily to worke, to the ende that being wearied with the paine they tooke after ſo many workes, they would rather proue to hazard battell, as it fell out in deede. For the third day after they had begunne thus to labour, as Sylla paſſed by them, they cried out vnto him to lead them againſt their enemies. But his anſwere was vnto them againe: that thoſe were but cries of men wearied rather with labor, then deſirous to fight. Notwithſtanding, if it be ſo in deede, and that you haue ſo good a will to fight as you make ſhew of: then I will, ſaid he, that you arme your ſelues preſently, and get you to yonder place, ſhewing them therewithall where the caſtle of the PARAPOTAMIANS ſtood in old time, which then (the citie being deſtroyed) was no more but the toppe of a ſtonie mountaine cut all about, and ſeuered from the mount of Edylium by the breadth of the riuer of Aſſus that runneth betwixt, and which at the very foote of the ſame mountaine falleth into the riuer of Cephiſus, and both theſe riuers running in one, carying a ſwift ſtreame, doe make the knappe of the ſaid hill very ſtrong of ſituation to lodge a campe vpon. And therefore Sylla ſeeing the ſouldiers of his enemies campe, marching with their copper targets to take vp that place to lodge in: to preuent them, and to get it before them (as in deede he did) he marched thither in all haſt poſſible, & got it euen with the earneſt good will of all his ſouldiers. Archelaus being ſo repulſed from thence, turned his way towards the city of CHÆRONEA. Wereupon certaine of the CHÆRONEANS that were in Syllaes campe, beſought him that he would not forſake their citie, and leaue it to their enemy. Sylla deſiring to gratifie them therein, ſent one of his Colonels Gabinius with a legion, and therewithall gaue the CHÆRONEANS leaue to goe thither, who did what they could poſſible to get into the citie before Gabinius: but that they could not, ſuch was the diligence and honeſtie of the man, as he ſeemed more deſirous of their ſafetie, then they were themſelues. Neuertheleſſe, Iubas doth not call the Colonell that was ſent thither Gabinius, but Hircius. And thus was our citie of CHÆRONEA preſerued from the daunger it ſtood in at that time. In the meane time came very good newes to the ROMAINES, both of oracles & prophecies, which promiſed them victory from the temple of LEBADIA, and the caue of Trophonius: of which prophecies, thoſe country men make great mention. But Sylla in his tenth booke of his commentaries writeth, that Quintus Titius, a man of qualitie and name amongſt them that trafficked into the country of GRECE, came vnto him after he had won the battell of CHÆRONEA, to tell him that Trophonius gaue him to vnderſtand, that ſhortly after he ſhould haue a ſecond battell, and that he ſhould yet againe haue an other victory in the ſame place. After him an other man of warre called Saluenius, told him alſo what ſucceſſe he ſhould haue in the warres of ITALIE, ſaying, that he knew it by reuelation: and both theſe men agreed in the manner of the reuelation. For they ſaid, that they had ſeene a god, in maieſtie, beautie, and greatneſſe, like vnto the image of Iupiter Olympias. Sylla hauing paſſed the riuer of Aſſus, went to lodge at the foote of mount Edylium, hard by Archelaus, who had placed and fortified his campe betweene the two mountaines of Acontium, and of Edylium, ioyning to the citie of the ASSIANS. The place where Archelaus camped, beareth his owne name Archelaus vnto this day. One day after Sylla had changed his lodging, he left Muræna in his campe with a legion, and two cohortes, to keepe the enemies ſtill occupied that were in great trouble, and he himſelfe in the meane time went and ſacrificed by the riuer of Cephiſus. His ſacrifice being ended, he marched towards the citie of CHÆRONEA, to take the force he had there vnder Gabinius, & to know the mountaine alſo called Thurium, which the enemies had taken. It is a knappe of a mountaine very ſteepe and ſharpe of all ſides, with a narrow point like a pine apple, by reaſon whereof we doe call it Orthopagum. At the foote of the ſame runneth the riuer called Morion, and there is alſo the temple of Apollo ſurnamed Thurias: and they ſay that this ſurname of Thurias was giuen vnto him of the name of Thuros, who was mother of Chæron, the founder and builder of the citie of CHÆRONEA. Other thinke that the cow which was giuen to Cadmus for a guide, came to him in that place: which hath euer ſince kept the name, for that the PHENICIANS call a cow, Thor. Now when Sylla came neere vnto CHÆRONEA, the Colonell Gabinius whom he had ſent thither with a garriſon to defend the ſame, went to meete him with his men very wel armed, wearing a laurell garland: and Sylla after he had ſaluted him, and his ſouldiers, made an oration vnto them, exhorting them to do their dutie in fighting. And as he was in his oration, there came two citizens of CHÆRONEA to him, one his name was Omoloichus, and the other Anaxidamus, who promiſed him to driue the enemies from mount Thurium which they had taken, if he would but giue them ſome ſmal number of ſouldiers. For there was a litle path way, which the barbarous people miſtruſted not, beginning at a place called Petrochus, hard by the temple of the Muſes, by the which they might eaſily go to the toppe of this mountaine Thurium: ſo that following that pathe, it would bring them ouer the barbarous peoples heads, and they might eaſily kill them with ſtones, or at the leaſt they ſhould driue them mawgre their heads, downe into the valley. Gabinius aſſuring Sylla that they were both very valiant men, and ſuch as he might boldly truſt vnto, Sylla gaue them men, and commaunded them to execute their enterpriſe: and he himſelfe in the meane ſeaſon went and ſet his men in order of battell in the plaine, deuiding his horſemen on the wings, placed himſelfe in the right wing, appointing the left vnto Muræna. Galba and Hortenſius his Lieutenantes, were placed in the taile with certaine bandes of the reregard which they kept vpon the hils, to watch and let that the enemies ſhould not incloſe them behinde: becauſe they perceiued a farre off that the enemies put forth a great number of horſemen and footemen light armed in the wings, to the end that the points of their battell might the more eaſily bowe and enlarge themſelues, to compaſſe in the ROMAINES on the backe ſide. Now in the meane time, theſe two CHÆRONEIANS whom Sylla had ſent vnder Hircius their Captaine, hauing compaſſed about the mountaine Thurium, before the enemies were aware of them: ſodainely came to ſhew themſelues vpon the toppe of the mountaine, which did ſo feare the barbarous people, that they began immediatly to flie, one of them for the moſt part killing an other. There was no reſiſtance, but flying downe the mountaine, fell vpon the points of their owne partiſans and pikes, and one of them thruſting in an others necke, tumbled headlong downe the mountaine together, hauing their enemies beſides on their backes, which draue them from the hill, and ſtrake them behind where they lay open vnto them: ſo as they were ſlaine a three thouſand of them about this mountaine Thurium. And as for them that ſought to ſaue themſelues by flight, Muræna that was already alreadie ſet in battell ray, met with ſome, cut them off by the way, and ſlew them downe right. The other fled directly to their campe, and came in great companies, thruſting into the battell of their footemen, put the moſt part of them quite out of order, & maruellouſly troubled their Captaines before they could ſet them againe in order: which was one of the chiefeſt cauſes of their ouerthrowe. For Sylla went and gaue a charge vpon them in this trouble and diſorder, and had quickly wonne the ground that was betwene both armies, wherby he tooke away the force of all their armed cartes with ſythes, which are then of greateſt force, when they haue the longeſt courſe, to giue them a ſwift and violent ſtroke in their chaſe: whereas when their courſe is but ſhort, the blow is ſo much the weaker and of leſſe ſtrength, euen as arrowes are that a farre off enter not deepe into the thing they be ſhot at: as at that time it fell out with the barbarous people. For their firſt cartes ſet forth ſo faintly, and came on with ſo feeble a force, that the ROMAINES ſent them backe, & eaſily repulſed them, with great ſlaughter and clapping of handes one to an other, as they commonly vſe in the ordinarie games of horſe-running at ROME. When they had thus repulſed the cartes, the battell of Syllaes footemen beganne to charge the barbarous people, who baſing their pikes, ſtoode cloſe one to an other becauſe they would not be taken: and the ROMAINES on the other ſide beſtowed firſt their darts among them, and then ſodainely drewe out their ſwordes in the heat they were in, and put a ſide the enemies pikes, wherby they might come neerer to their bodies. There were fifteene thouſand ſlaues in the front of the battell of the barbarous people, whom Mithridates Lieutenant had made free by open proclamation, and had deuided them by bandes amongſt the other footemen. By occaſion whereof there was a ROMAINE Centurion ſpake pleaſantly at that time, ſaying, that he neuer ſaw ſlaues before haue libertie to ſpeake and doe like free men, but only at Saturnes feaſtes. Neuertheleſſe, they againſt the nature of ſlaues, were very valiant to abide the ſhocke, and the ROMAINE footemen could not ſo readily breake nor enter into them, nor make them giue backe, becauſe they ſtoode very cloſe one to an other, and their ranckes were of ſuch a length beſides: vntill ſuch time as the ROMAINES that were behinde the firſt ranckes, did ſo pelt them with their ſlings, hurling ſtones, beſtowing their darts and arrowes vpon them, that in the end they compelled them all to turne their backes, & flie a maine. And when Archelaus did firſt thruſt out the right wing of his armie, ſuppoſing to encloſe the ROMAINES behinde: Hortenſius ſtraightwaies cauſed the bands he had with him to run & charge vpon the flankes. Which Archelaus perceiuing, made the horſemen he had about him turne their faces forthwith, which were in number aboue two thouſand: inſomuch as Hortenſius being ſet vppon with all his troupe, was compelled to retire by litle and litle towardes the mountaine, perceiuing himſelfe farre from the battell of his footemen, and enuironned round about with his enemies. Sylla ſeeing that, being in the right wing of his battell, and hauing not yet fought, went ſtraight to the reſcue of Hortenſius. But Archelaus coniecturing by the duſt which the horſes raiſed, what the matter was: left Hortenſius there, and with ſpeede returned againe towardes the right wing of his enemies from whence Sylla was gone, hoping he had left it vnfurniſhed of a ſufficient Captaine to commaund them. Taxilles on the other ſide, cauſed his copper targets alſo to march againſt Muræna: ſo as the noiſe they made on both ſides, cauſed the mountains to ring againe, wherwithall Sylla ſtaied, ſtanding in doubt which way to take. At the laſt he reſolued to returne to the place frō whence he came, & ſent Hortenſius with foure enſignes to aide Muræna: and himſelfe with the fifth in great ſpeed went towards the right wing of his armie, the which was now already bickering, and ioyned with their enemies, fighting hand to hand with Archelaus. By reaſon whereof, when Sylla was come with his aide, they did eaſily diſtreſſe them: and after they had broken their array, they chaſed them flying for life to the riuer, & vnto the mountaine Acontium. But Sylla notwithſtanding forgate not Muræna, but went againe to his reliefe: and finding that he on his ſide had alſo put the enemies to flight, followed with him the chaſe of them that fled. There was a maruellous ſlaughter made in that field of the barbarous people, and many of them ſuppoſing to haue recouered their campe, were ſlaine by the way: ſo as of all that infinite multitude of fighting men, there eſcaped onely tenne thouſand, who ſaued themſelues by flying vnto the citie of CHALCIDE. Sylla for his part writeth, that he could make reckoning of no more but fourteene of his ſouldiers onely that were ſlaine, whereof there came two againe to him the ſame night. Wherefore in the markes of triumph which he ſet vp for tokens of that victory, he cauſed to be written on the toppe thereof, Mars, victorie, and Venus: ſignifying thereby, that he had ouercome in theſe warres as much by good fortune, as by force, policie, or martiall diſcipline. Theſe markes of triumph were ſet vp for the battell which he wanne in the plaine field, in that place where Archelaus beganne to flie, euen vnto the riuer of Molus. And he ſet vp an other alſo in the toppe of mount Thurium, where the barbarous people were ſet vpon behinde: and there is written in Greeke letters, that the valiant deedes of Omoloichus and Anaxidamus, gaue way to the winning of this victory. Sylla for the ioy of this great won battell, cauſed muſitians to play in the citie of THEBES, where he builded a ſtage for all the muſitians, neere vnto the fountaine OEdipus, and certaine noble GRECIANS were appointed iudges of that muſicke, whom he cauſed to be ſent for out of other cities, becauſe he mortally hated the THEBANS: inſomuch as he tooke from them halfe their lands, which he conſecrated vnto Apollo Pythias, and Iupiter Olympias, appointing that of the reuenue therof, they ſhould redeliuer and pay backe the money which he had taken and caried away from out of their temples. Sylla after this hauing intelligence that Flaccus, one of his enemies, was choſen Conſull at ROME, and had paſſed the ſea Ionium with an armie, vnder pretext to make warre againſt king Mithridates, but indeede to make warre with himſelfe: tooke his iorney towards THESSALIE to meete him. But when he was in the citie of MELITEA, there came newes to him out of all partes, that there was a new and ſecond armie of the kings arriued, no leſſe then the firſt, the which ſpoiled and deſtroyed all the country which he had left behind him. For Dorylaus, one of king Mithridates Lieutenants, was arriued in the citie of CHALCIDE with a great fleete of ſhips, hauing brought thither with him foure ſcore thouſande fighting men, the beſt trained, the beſt armed and appointed ſouldiers that were in all his kingdom of PONTVS in ASIA: and from thence went into BOEOTIA, had all that country at commandement, and ſought to fight with Sylla, notwithſtanding that Archelaus alleaged many reaſons to diſſwade him from it: and furthermore, gaue it out in euery place, that ſo many thouſandes of ſouldiers could not haue beene caſt away in the firſt battell, without ſome notable treaſon. Wherupon Sylla returned with all poſſible ſpeede, & made Dorylaus know before many daies paſſed ouer his head, that Archelaus was a wiſe man, and knew well enough the worthines & valiant courage of the ROMAINES. And Dorylaus hauing had but a litle proofe only in certain light skirmiſhes which he made againſt Sylla, about TILPHOSSION in THESSALY: himſelfe was the firſt that could ſay then, it was not for them to hazard battell, but rather to draw out the wars in length, and ſupplant the ROMAINES with charge and expence. And yet notwithſtanding, the cōmodity of the great large plaine that lieth all about ORCHOMENE, where they were encamped, gaue great encouragement to Archelaus, who iudged it a very fit place to giue battell in, ſpecially becauſe he was the ſtronger of horſemen in the field. For of all the plaines that are within the country of BOEOTIA, the greateſt & largeſt of thē, is the plaine neere to the citie of ORCHOMENE, which is altogether without trees, and runneth out in length vnto the mariſſes where the riuer of Melas diſperſeth it ſelfe abroad. The head of the ſame riuer is not farre from the city of ORCHOMENE, & that riuer only of all other riuers in GRECE from the very head whence it commeth, is nauigable: and hath beſides an other ſingular property, that it riſeth & ſwelleth euen in the longeſt ſommer daies, as the riuer of Nilus doth, and bringeth forth the ſelfe ſame plants and trees, ſauing that they beare no frute, neither are they ſo great as thoſe of Ægypt. This riuer hath no long courſe, becauſe that the moſt part of the water runneth into lakes and mariſſes, couered with brambles and briars, and there is but a very litle part of it that falleth into the riuer of Cephiſus, in the place where the reedes growe that they make good flutes withal. When they were camped one neere to another, Archelaus lay quietly & ſturred not. But Sylla preſently caſt great trenches from one ſide to another, to ſtoppe the way againſt their enemies, that they could not come into that great plaine where they might haue taken what ground they would for their men of armes, and haue driuen the ROMAINES into the mariſſes. The barbarous people not being able to endure that, ſo ſoone as their Captaines had giuen them liberty, diſcharged with ſuch a fury, that they did not only ſcatter them that wrought in Syllaes trenches, but put the moſt part of their gard alſo that ſtood in battell ray to defend them, in a maruellous feare, who alſo began to flie. Which Sylla perceiuing, lighted ſtraight from his horſe, and taking an enſigne in his hand, ran through the middeſt of his men that fled, vntill he came to his enemies, and crying out, ſayd vnto them: O my ROMAINE ſouldiers, mine honour commandeth me to dye here, and therefore when any man asketh you where you forſooke your Captaine, remēber that you anſwere, it was at ORCHOMENE. They were ſo aſhamed at theſe wordes, that he made them turne: beſides that, there came two cohortes vnto him from the right wing of his battell, who vnder his leading gaue ſuch a hot charge vpon their enemies, that they fled forthwith vpon it. That done, Sylla retired with his men, and made them dine: and thereupon by and by ſet them againe to the trenches to encloſe his enemies camp, who then came out in better order then they did before. There was Diogenes, Archelaus wiues ſonne ſlaine, fighting valiantly before them all in the right wing of their battell. And the bow-men being preſſed ſo neare by the ROMAINES, that their bowes would do no good: tooke their arrowes in their handes in ſtead of ſwordes, and ſtrake their enemies with them to force them to giue backe, vntill ſuch time as at the laſt they were all driuen into their camp, where they paſſed that night in great ſorrow, as well for the loſſe of them that were ſlaine, as alſo for the number of thoſe that were hurt. The next morning, Sylla leading his men againe towardes the camp of his enemies, went on ſtill continuing his trenches: & certaine of them being come out to skirmiſh with them, he ſet vpon them ſo luſtely, that at the firſt charge he put them to flight. That brought ſuch a feare to all the whole camp of the enemies, that not a man durſt abide any longer: ſo as Sylla valiantly following on his victory, ſhuffled in among them as they fled, and in the end tooke all together. Straight way all the mariſſes were filled with bloud, and the lake full of dead bodies: ſo that vntill this preſent day they finde there in that place many bowes of the barbarous people, moryans, peeces of taſſes, and ſwordes drowned in the mudde of the mariſſes, notwithſtanding that it is well neare two hundred yeares a go ſince this battell was ſtriken. And thus much for the warres about the cities of CHÆRONEA, & ORCHOMENE. Now the warres being paſt in this ſort in GRECE, Cinna, and Carbo delt very cruelly and vnnaturally at ROME with the noble men and greateſt perſons: by reaſon whereof, many flying their tyranny, went to Syllaes camp, as vnto the hauen of their health and fulneſſe of felicity, ſo that in ſhort time Sylla had an aſſembly of a ROMAINE Senate about him. Metella her ſelfe, his wife, hauing ſtollen away very hardly with her children, came to bring him newes that his houſes in the citie and country both, were all burnt & deſtroyed by his enemies: praying him that he would go and helpe them that yet remained at ROME. Sylla vpon hearing of theſe newes, fell in great perplexitie. For on the one ſide, it grieued him to ſee his country ſo miſerably afflicted: and on the other ſide, he knew not well how he might go, leauing ſo great an enterpriſe as that warre was, and ſpecially againſt a king of ſuch might and power as Mithridates ſhewed himſelfe to be. And being in theſe dumpes, there came one Archelaus a marchant to him, borne in the city of DELIVM, who brought him a ſecret meſſage from the other Archelaus, king Mithridates Lieutenant: the which pleaſed Sylla ſo well, that he deſired that Archelaus and himſelfe might meete and talke together. So at the length they met by the ſea ſide, neare vnto the city of DELIVM, where there is a temple of Apollo. Archelaus began to enter the talke with him, declaring vnto Sylla that he would wiſh him to leaue the conqueſt of ASIA, and of the realme of PONT, & to returne into his countrey to the ciuill warres at ROME: and in ſo doing, the king would furniſh him, not onely with as much money, but with as many ſhippes and men, as he himſelfe would deſire. Sylla vpon this motion told him againe. that he would wiſh him to forſake Mithridates ſeruice, and to make himſelfe king, offering to proclaime him a friend and confederate of the ROMAINES, ſo that he would deliuer him all his nauie which then he had in his hands. Archelaus ſeemed much to abhorre to heare him ſpeake of treaſon. But Sylla going on with his tale, replyed againe vnto him: why Archelaus, ſayd he, thou that art a CAPPADOCIAN, and ſeruant to a barbarous king, or his friend at the leaſt: haſt thou ſo good a hart with thee, that for all the benefites I offer thee, thou wilt not once commit an ill act? and Sylla? As if thou wert not he, that at the battell of CHÆRONEA dideſt ſaue thy ſelfe by flying, with a ſmall number left thee of ſix ſcore thouſand fighting men, which thou before haddeſt in thy camp: and that hid thy ſelfe two dayes together in the mariſſes of ORCHOMENI, leauing the fields of BOEOTIA with ſuch heapes of dead bodies, that no man could paſſe for them. After this reply, Archelaus altered his ſpeech, and falling downe at Syllaes feete, humbly beſought him to end this warre, and to make peace with Mithridates. Whereunto Sylla aunſwered, that he was very well contented withall. And therupon peace was concluded betweene them vnder conditions: that Mithridates ſhould depart from ASIA the leſſe, and from PAPHLAGONIA, that he ſhould reſtore BITHYNIA vnto Nicomedes, & CAPPADOCIA vnto Ariobarzanes, that he ſhould pay two thouſand talents to the ROMAINES, and giue them three ſcore & ten gallies, with all their furniture. And vpon this, Sylla would alſo aſſure him the reſt of his realme: and would cauſe him to be proclaimed a friend of the ROMAINES. Theſe articles being paſt by agreemẽt betwixt them, Sylla taking his iourney through THESSALIE, and MACEDON into the countrey of HELLESPONT, caried Archelaus with him, whõ he honorably intreated. For Archelaus falling dangerouſly ſicke of a diſeaſe in the city of LARISSA, he ſtayed there for him, and was very carefull to recouer him, as if he had bene one of his chiefeſt Captaines and companions. And this was the cauſe that made Archelaus to be blamed for the battell of CHÆRONIA, as if he had not faithfully fought it out, nor Sylla truly won it, but by treaſon. And againe, Archelaus was the more ſuſpected, becauſe Sylla redeliuered Mithridates all his ſeruants and friends which he had priſoners, ſauing the tyrant Ariſtion that kept ATHENS, whom he poyſoned, becauſe he was Archelaus enemie: but ſpecially, for the landes Sylla gaue vnto this CAPPADOCIAN. For he gaue him ten thouſand Iugera, (or acres of land) within the Ile of EVBOEA, and gaue him moreouer the title of a friend of the ROMAINES for euer. But Sylla denieth all theſe things in his commentaries. In the meane time, Ambaſſadours came from king Mithridates vnto Sylla, who told him that the king their maiſter did ratifie and accept all the articles of peace, ſauing that he onely prayed him he would not take the country of PAPHLAGONIA from him: & as for the gallies, he would not ſo much as once ſay he would promiſe them. Sylla being offended herewith, angerly anſwered them againe. Then Mithridates, as ye ſay, meaneth to keepe PAPHLAGONIA ſtill, and refuſeth to giue the ſhippes I demanded: where I looked that he would haue humbly thanked me on his knees, if I left him his right hand onely, with the which he put ſo many ROMANE citizens to death. But I hope to make him tell me an other tale, if I come once into ASIA: but now at PERGAMVM, he ſpeaketh his pleaſure of this warre which he hath not ſeene. The Ambaſſadours being afrayed of his words, replyed not againe. Whereupon Archelaus ſpake, and beſought him with teares in his eyes to be contented, and tooke him by the hand. By intreatie, in the end he obtained of Sylla to ſend him vnto Mithridates: promiſing that he would either bring him to agree to all the articles and conditions of peace that he demanded, or if he could not, he would kill himſelfe with his owne handes. Vpon this promiſe Sylla ſent him away, and in the meane while entred with his armie into the country of MEDICA: and after he had deſtroyed the moſt part thereof, returned backe againe into MACEDON, where Archelaus being returned from Mithridates, found him neare vnto the city of PHILIPPES, bringing him newes that all ſhould be well, howbeit that his maiſter Mithridates prayed him he might ſpeake with him in any caſe. Now, the matter that made Mithridates ſo earneſt to ſpeake with Sylla, was chiefly for Fimbria: who hauing ſlaine Flaccus the Conſull, being of the contrarie faction vnto Sylla, and certaine of Mithridates Lieutenants alſo, went himſelfe againſt him to fight with him. Mithridates fearing his comming, choſe rather to make himſelfe Syllaes friend. So Mithridates and Sylla met together in the country of TROADE, in the city of DARDANE: Mithridates being accompanied with a fleete of two hundred ſaile of ſhippes with ores at ſea, with twenty thouſand footemen, ſixe thouſand horſe, and a number of armed cartes with ſythes beſides by land, Sylla hauing onely but foure enſignes of footemen, and two hundred horſemen. Mithridates went to Sylla, and offering to take him by the hand: Sylla asked him firſt, if he did accept the peace with the conditions which Archelaus had agreed vnto. Mithridates made him no anſwere. Sylla following on his tale, ſayd vnto him. It is for ſuters to ſpeake firſt, that haue requeſt to make: and for conquerours, it is enough to hold their peace, and heare what they will ſay. Then began Mithridates to excuſe himſelfe, and to lay the occaſion of the warre, partly vpon the ordinaunce of the gods that ſo had appointed it, and partly alſo vpon the ROMAINES themſelues. Whereunto Sylla replyed, that he had heard of long time that Mithridates was an eloquent Prince, and that he knew it now by experience, ſeeing that he lacked no comely words, to cloke his fowle and ſhamefull deeds, but withall he ſharpely reproued him, and draue him to confeſſe the cruelties he had committed. And afterwardes asked him againe, if he did confirme that which Archelaus had done. Mithridates made anſwere that he did. Then Sylla ſaluted, embraced, and kiſſed him: and calling for the kings Nicomedes, and Ariobarzanes, reconciled them together, and made Mithridates their friend againe. In concluſion, after Mithridates had deliuered Sylla three ſcore and ten gallies, and fiue hundred bow-men, he returned by ſea into his realme of PONTVS. But Sylla hearing that his ſouldiers were angry with this peace made with Mithridates, becauſe they could not abide to behold that king, whom they accounted for their moſt cruell and mortall enemy, (hauing in one ſelfe day cauſed a hundred and fifty thouſand ROMANE citizens to be ſlaine, that were diſperſed abroad in diuers places of ASIA) ſo to depart, and go his way ſafe, with the riches and ſpoyles of the countrey, which he had bereft them of, and vſed at his pleaſure, the ſpace of forty yeares together: aunſwered them in excuſe of himſelfe, that he was not able to make wars with Mithridates, & Fimbria both, if once they were ioyned together againſt him. And ſo Sylla departing thence, went againſt Fimbria, who then was encamped neare to the citie of THYATIRA, and lodged himſelfe as neare vnto him as he conueniently might. Now whileſt he was compaſsing in his lodging with a trench, Fimbraes ſouldiers came out of their camp in their coates without any armour or weapon, to ſalute Syllaes ſouldiers, and holpe them very friendly to make vp their trench. Which Fimbria ſeeing, and perceiuing his ſouldiers mindes ſo changed, of an extreme feare which he had of Sylla, at whoſe handes he looked for no mercy; killed himſelfe in his owne camp. Sylla hereupon condemned the whole country of ASIA the leſſe, to pay the ſumme of twenty thouſand talents amongeſt them, and preſently alſo he vndid many poore houſholders through his inſolent ſouldiers, lying long vpon their charge, which he left in garriſon there. For he ordained that euery houſholder ſhould giue the ſouldier that lodged in his houſe, foure Tetradrachmas a day, and ſhould be bound to giue him and his friends (as many as he would bring with him) their ſupper alſo: and that euery Captaine ſhould haue fifty Drachmas a day, a night gowne for the houſe, and a garment to go abroad into the city when he thought good. When he had giuen this order, he departed from the city of EPHESVS with all his fleete, and in three dayes ſayling arriued in the hauen of Piræa at ATHENS, where he was receiued into the fraternity of the myſteries, and reſerued for himſelfe the Librarie of Apellicon Teian: in the which were the moſt part of Ariſtotle and Theophraſtus workes, not then thought meete to come in euery mans handes. And they ſay, that this Librarie being brought to ROME, Tyrannion the Grammarian found the meanes to extract a great part of them: and that Andronicus the RHODIAN hauing recouered the originals into his hands, put them in print, and wrote the ſummaries which we haue at this preſent. For the ancient Peripateticke Philoſophers were of themſelues very wiſe and learned men, but they had not all Ariſtotles workes, nor Theophraſtus amongeſt them, & yet thoſe few they had, were not by them ſeene all whole and perfect together: becauſe that the goods of Neleus SCEPSIAN (to whom Theophraſtus left all his bookes by will) came to fall into the hands of meane ignorant men, who knew not the vertue and eſtimation of them. And furthermore, Sylla being at ATHENS had ſuch a paine and numneſſe in his legges, and was ſo heauy withall, that Strabo calleth it a ſpice of the goute, that is to ſay, a feeling or entring therinto, which then began to roote and take hold of him. Vpon which occaſion he tooke the ſeas, and went vnto a place called ADIPSVM, where there are naturall hot bathes: and there remained a while ſolacing himſelfe all the day long with muſicke, ſeeing of playes, and entertaining ſuch kinde of people. Vpon a day as he was walking by the ſea ſide, certaine fiſher-men made him a preſent of fiſh, which pleaſed him maruellous well, & demanding of them whence they were: they anſwered him againe, that they were of the citie of ALES. Sylla went to the bathes at Adipſum for the goute in his legges.

ſayd he; is there any of them yet left aliue? ſpeaking it, becauſe that after the battell of ORCHOMENE when he followed the chaſe of his enemies, he had taken and deſtroyed three cities of BŒOTIA all at one ſelfe time, to wit ANTHEDON, LARYMNA, and ALES. The poore fiſher men were ſo amazed with theſe words, that they ſtood ſtill, & could not tell what to ſay. Sylla fell a laughing thereat, and bad them go their wayes a Gods name, and be not afrayed, for they brought no ſmall interceſſours with them, which were worth the reckening of. Whē Sylla had giuen them theſe wordes, the ALLEIANS went home with a merry hart, to gather themſelues together againe in the city. Sylla ſo paſsing through THESSALIA & MACEDON, came to the ſea ſide, intēding to go frō the city of DYRRACHIVM vnto BRVNDVSIVM, with twelue hundred ſaile. The city of APOLLONIA is hard by DYRRACHIVM, and there abouts is a parke conſecrated vnto the nymphes, where in a fayre goodly greene meadow in many places there commeth out great bubbles of fire that flame continually: and it is ſayd that there was a Satyre taken ſleeping, euen in the very ſelfe ſame forme the painters and image-grauers haue ſet him out. He was brought vnto Sylla, and being asked by all ſortes of interpreters what he was, he made no aunſwere that a man could vnderſtand: but onely put forth a ſharpe voyce like the neying of a horſe, or whynnying of a goate. Sylla wondering at it, abhorred him, and made him to be caried from him as a monſtrous thing. Furthermore, when Sylla had imbarked his men to paſſe the ſea, he was afrayed that ſo ſoone as they were landed in ITALIE, they would ſhrinke from him, and euery man go home to his owne. But they ſware and promiſed firſt of themſelues, that they would tary and keepe together, and by their willes would do no hurt in ITALIE. Moreouer, perceiuing that he ſtood in neede of money, they offred him of theirs, and euery man to lend him as his ability ſerued. But Sylla would none, yet thanked them for their good will: and after he had exhorted them to fight like valiant ſouldiers, he went againſt fifteen generals of armies of his enemies, who had foure hundred and fifty enſignes of footemen well armed, as he himſelfe writeth in his commentaries. But the gods promiſed him good fortune in his warres, by many ſundry apparant ſignes. For in a ſacrifice he made by TARENTVM, after he was come a land, the liuer of a certaine beaſt ſacrificed, was altogether faſhioned after the manner of a crown or garland of laurell, out of the which did hang two bands or rolles. And a litle before he went into CAMPANIA, neare vnto the mountaine Epheum, there appeared two great goates in the day time fighting together, euen as two men do when they fight: which neuertheleſſe was no matter of truth, but a viſion onely that appeared, and riſing from the earth diſperſed it ſelfe by litle and litle here and there in the ayre, and in the end vaniſhed quite away, as cloudes which come to nothing. Shortly after, in the ſelfe ſame place, Marius the younger, and Norbanus the Conſull, who brought two great armies againſt him, were ouerthrowen by him, before he had ſet his men in battell, or had appointed any man his place where he ſhould fight: and this proceeded onely vpon the courage and life of his ſouldiers, whoſe good will to ſerue againſt them was ſuch, as following this victory, he compelled the Couſull Norbanus after he had ſlaine ſix thouſand of his men, to take the citie of CAPVA for his refuge. This noble exploit, (as himſelfe reported) was the cauſe that his men kept ſo well together, that they neither went home to their houſes, nor made any reckening of their enemies, although they were many againſt one. And he ſayth furthermore, that in the city of SYLVIVM, there was a ſlaue of one P*ontius* a citizen, who being inſpired with a propheticall ſpirit, came to tell him from the goddeſſe Bellona, that he ſhould grow in ſtrength, and cary away the victory of theſe warres: howbeit that if he did not hye him the ſooner, the Capitoll at ROME ſhould be burnt. And ſo it fell out the ſame day according to his words, being the ſixteenth day of the month called Quintilis, & now Iuly. And furthermore alſo, Lucullus (one of Syllaes Captaines) being neare vnto the city of FIDENTIA with ſixteen enſignes onely, againſt fifty enſignes of his enemies, knowing his men to be very well affected to ſerue, becauſe the moſt part of them were naked and vnarmed, was afrayed to hazard the battell: & as he was euen bethinking himſelfe what was beſt to determine therof, there roſe a litle wind out of a goodly meadow that blew a wonderfull ſort of flowers vpon the ſouldiers on euery part of them. Theſe flowers ſtayed of themſelues as they fell, ſome vpon their targets, and others vpon their moryans, without falling to the ground: ſo that it ſeemed to their enemies a farre off, as if they had bene garlands of flowers vpon their heads. This made Lucullus ſouldiers more luſty a great deale then they were before, and with this good will they determined to giue a charge vpon their enemies: whom they ouerthrew, ſlue eighteen thouſand of them in the field, and tooke their camp. This Lucullus was brother vnto the other Lucullus, that afterwards ouerthrew the kings Mithridates, & Tigranes. Neuertheleſſe, Sylla perceiuing that his enemies lay round about him with many great puiſſant armies, thought good to vſe policy with force: & therefore practiſed with Scipio one of the Conſuls, to make peace with him. Scipio was willing to it: & therupon were oft meetings & aſſemblies of both ſides. Now Sylla draue off the concluſion of the peace as long as he could, ſtill ſeeking occaſion of delay, to the end that his ſouldiers which were throughly acquainted with craft and ſubtilty as well as himſelfe, might in the meane time corrupt Scipioes ſouldiers by repaire into his camp: for they comming into Scipioes camp, being very conuerſant with them, ſtraight corrupted ſome of them with ready money, other with promiſes, & other with fayre flattering wordes, and many goodly tales they told them. At the length, after this practiſe had continued a while, Sylla comming neare vnto Scipioes camp with twenty enſignes only: all his men ſaluted Scipioes ſouldiers, & they reſaluting them againe, yeelded themſelues vnto Sylla, ſo as Scipio was left poſt alone in his tente where he was taken, but they afterwardes let him go. So Sylla with his twenty enſignes, like vnto the fowlers, that by their ſtales draw other birdes into their nets, hauing gotten forty enſignes from his enemies by his craft, brought them away with him into his camp. There it was that Carbo ſayd of Sylla, that he had to fight with a foxe, and a lyon both: but that the foxe did him more hurt and miſchiefe then the lyon. After this, Marius the younger hauing foureſcore and fiue enſignes in his camp neare vnto the citie of SIGNIVM, preſented battell vnto Sylla: who hauing very good deſire to fight, and ſpecially on that day, becauſe the night before he had ſeene this viſion in his dreame, that he thought he ſaw Marius the father (who was deceaſed long before) warning his ſonne that he ſhould come to him. Sylla for this reſpect deſired maruellouſly to fight that day: and thereupon cauſed Dolobella to come vnto him, that was before lodged farre from him. But the enemies ſtept between him and home, and ſtopped his paſſage to keepe him from ioyning with Sylla. Syllaes ſouldiers to the contrary, fought to keepe the way open for him, with ſo great labour and paine, that they were all wearie and ouerharried. And furthermore, there fell a maruellous great ſhower of raine vpon them as they were buſie, opening the way, that troubled them more, then the labour they had in hand. Whereupon the priuate Captaines of the bandes went to make Sylla vnderſtand it, and to pray him to deferre the battell vntill an other day: ſhewing him how the ſouldiers wearied with labour, lay downe vpon their targets on the ground to take their eaſe. Sylla perceiuing this, was contented withall, though greatly indeede againſt his will. But when he had giuen the ſignall to lodge, and that they began to trench and fortifie their camp: Marius the yonger commeth a horſe backe marching brauely before all his companie, hoping to haue ſurpriſed his enemies in diſorder, & by that meanes to haue ouerthrowen them eaſily. But farre otherwiſe did fortune then performe the reuelation which Sylla had in his foreſayd dreame: for his men falling in a rage withall, left their worke in the trench where they wrought, ſtucke their dartes vpon the bancke, ranne vpon their enemies with their ſwordes drawen, and with a maruellous crie ſet vpon them ſo valiantly, that they were not able to reſiſt their furie, but ſodainly turned their backes and fled, where there was a great and notable ſlaughter made of them. Marius their Captaine fled to the citie of PRÆNESTE, where he found the gates ſhut: but they threw him downe a rope from the wall, which he tyed about his middle, and ſo was triced vp by it. Yet ſome writers ſay, and Feneſtella among other, that Marius neuer ſaw the battell: for being wearied with labour, and verie ſleepie, he lay vnder ſome tree in the ſhadow to reſt a litle, after he had giuen the ſignall and word of the battell, and ſlept ſo ſoundlie, that he could ſcant awake with the noyſe and fleeing of his men. Sylla himſelfe writeth, that he loſt at this battell but three and twentie men, ſlue twentie thouſand of his enemies, and tooke eight thouſand priſoners. His Lieutenants alſo had the like good ſucceſſe in other places, Pompeius, Craſſus, Metellus, and Seruilius: which without any loſſe of their men, or but with a very ſmall, ouerthrew many great mightie armies of their enemies. Inſomuch as Carbo, the head and chiefe of all the contrarie faction, and he that moſt maintained it, fled one night out of his camp, and went beyond the ſeas into Africke. The laſt battell that Sylla had, was againſt Theleſinus Samnyte, who comming like a freſh champion to ſet vpon him, when he was already wearied, and had fought many battels, had almoſt ſlaine him euen at Rome gates. For Theleſinus hauing gathered together a great number of ſouldiers with one Lamponius Lucanian, marched with all ſpeed towardes the city of Præneſte, to deliuer Marius the younger that was beſieged there. But vnderſtanding that Sylla on the one ſide, came in great haſt alſo to meete him, and that Pomponius came behind him on the other ſide, and perceiuing moreouer that the way was ſo ſhut vp, that he could neither go forward nor backeward being a valiant ſouldier, and one that had bene in many great foughten fieldes, moſt dangerouſly ventured to go ſtraight to Rome. And ſo ſtale away by night with all his whole power, and marching to Rome ward, had almoſt taken it at his firſt comming, for that there was neither watch nor ward kept: but he ſtayed happely ten furlonges from the gate Collina, bragging with him ſelfe, and beleeuing that he ſhould do wonders, for that he had mocked ſo many great Captaines. The next morning betimes came diuers young noble men and gentlemen out of the citie to ſkirmiſh with Theleſinus: who ſlue a great number of them, and among others one Appius Claudius a young gentleman of a noble houſe, and very honeſt. Whereupon (as you may eaſily imagine) the city trembled for feare, and ſpecially the women, who fell a ſhreeking, and running vp and downe, as if they had bene all taken. But in this great feare and trouble, Balbus (whom Sylla had ſent) came firſt with ſeuen hundred horſe vpon the ſpurre, and ſtaying but a litle to coole and giue them breath, bridled ſtraight againe, and went to ſet vpon the enemies thereby to ſtay them. Soone after him came Sylla alſo, who commanded his men that came firſt, quickly to eate ſomwhat, and that done, put them ſtraight in battell ray: notwithſtanding that Dolobella and Torquatus perſwaded him to the contrary, and beſought him not to put his ſouldiers wearied with their iourney, to ſo great and maniſeſt a danger, and the rather, becauſe they had not to fight with Carbo and Marius, but with the Samnytes and Lucanes, who were (both) warlike nations & good ſouldiers, and thoſe beſides that moſt deadly hated the Romaines. But for all that, Sylla draue them backe, and commanded his trompets to ſound the alarome, being almoſt within foure houres of night: and this battell was ſharper and more cruell, then any other that euer he fought before. The right wing where Craſſus was, had the better much: but the left wing was very ſore diſtreſſed, and ſtood in great perill. Sylla hearing thereof, and thinking to helpe it, got vp vpon a white courſer that was both ſwift, and very ſtrong. The enemies knew him, and there were two that lifted vp their armes to throw their dartes at him, whom he ſaw not: but his page gaue his horſe ſuch a laſh with his whippe, that he made him ſo to gird forward, as the very points of the dartes came hard by the horſe tayle, and ſtucke faſt in the ground. Some ſay that Sylla had a litle golden image of Apollo, which he brought from the city of Delphes, and in time of warres ware it alwayes in his boſome, which he then tooke in his hand, and kiſſing it, ſaid: O Apollo Pythius, haſt thou ſo highly exalted Cornelius Sylla, ſo fortunate hitherto through ſo many famous victories, and wilt thou now with ſhame ouerwhelme him wholly, euen at the very gates of his owne naturall city among his country men? And ſo crying out to Apollo for helpe, thruſt into the preaſe among his men, intreating ſome, threatning others, and laying vpon the reſt to ſtay them. But for all he could do, all the left wing of his armie was broken and ouerthrowen by his enemies: and himſelfe amongeſt them that fled, was compelled to recouer his camp with ſpeede, hauing loſt many of his friendes and familiars. There were moreouer many citizens ſlaine and troden vnder feete (both with horſe and men) that came onely to ſee the battell fought: ſo that they within the citie thought themſelues vtterly vndone. Lucretius Offella furthermore (he that Beſieged Marius in the citie of Præneſte) had almoſt raiſed his ſiege, vpon the wordes of them that fled and came thither from the battell, who wiſhed him to remoue with all ſpeed poſſible, for Sylla was ſlaine, and Theleſinus had taken Rome. Now about midnight came certaine ſouldiers from Craſſus to Syllaes camp, and asked for meate for Craſſus ſupper, and his mens, who hauing chaſed his flying enemies whom he had ouerthrowen, throwne, vnto the city of ANTEMNA (which they tooke for refuge) had lodged his campe there. Sylla vnderſtanding that, and being aduertiſed that the moſt parte of his enemies were ouerthrowne at this battell, went himſelf the next morning betimes vnto ANTEMNA, where three thouſand of his enemies ſent to know if he would receiue them to mercy, if they yeelded themſelues vnto him. His anſwer was, that he would pardon their liues, ſo as they would doe ſome miſchiefe to their fellowes before they came to him. Theſe three thouſand hereupon truſting to his promiſe, fell vpon their companions: and for the moſt part one of them killed another. Notwithſtanding, Sylla hauing gathered all thoſe together that remained of his enemies, as well the three thouſand, as the reſt, amounting in all to the number of ſix thouſand men, within the ſhew-place where they vſed to run their horſes: whileſt he himſelfe held a councell in the temple of the goddeſſe Bellona, and was making his oration there, he had appointed certaine to ſet vpon thoſe ſix thouſand, and put them to the ſword euery man. Great & terrible were the cries of ſuch a number of men ſlaine in ſo ſmall a roome, as many may eaſily coniecture: inſomuch as the Senators ſitting in councell heard them very eaſily, and maruelled what the matter was. But Sylla continuing on his oration which he had begun with a ſet ſteadie countenance, without changing of colour, willed them only to hearken what he ſaid, and not to trouble themſelues with any thing done abroade: for they were but certaine offenders and lewd perſons that were puniſhed by his commandement. This was enough to ſhew the ſimpleſt ROMAINE in ROME, that they had but only changed the tyrant, but not the tyranny. Now for Marius, that had bene euer of a churliſh and ſeuere nature euen from his childhood, he neuer changed for any authority, but did rather harden his naturall ſtubborneſſe. Where Sylla contrarily in the beginning, was very modeſt and ciuil in all his proſperity, & gaue great good hope that if he came to the authority of a prince, he would fauour nobility well, and yet loue notwithſtanding the benefit of the people. And being moreouer a man in his youth giuē all to pleaſure, delighting to laugh, ready to pity, and weepe for tender heart: in that he became after ſo cruell and bloudy, the great alteration gaue manifeſt cauſe to condemne the increaſe of honor and authority, as the onely meanes whereby mens manners continue not ſuch as they were at the firſt, but ſtill do change and vary, making ſome fooles, others vaine and fantaſticall, & others extreame cruell and vnnaturall. But whether that alteration of nature came by chāging his ſtate & condition, or that it was otherwiſe a violent breaking out of hidden malice, which then came to ſhew it ſelfe, when the way of liberty was laide open: this matter is to be decided in ſome other treatiſe. So it came to paſſe, that Sylla fel to ſhedding of bloud, & filled all ROME with infinite & vnſpeakable murthers: for diuers were killed for priuate quarrels, that had nothing to do with Sylla at any time, who ſuffred his friends & thoſe about him to worke their wicked wils. Vntill at the length there was a young man called Caius Metellus, that was ſo bold to aske Sylla in open Senate, when all theſe miſeries ſhould end, and when they ſhould know that all the miſchiefes were finiſhed, the which they daily ſaw. For ſaid he, we will not intreat you to pardon life, where you haue threatned death: but only to put them out of doubt whom you haue determined to ſaue. Wherunto Sylla made anſwer, that he was not reſolued whom he would ſaue. Metellus replied, then tell vs quoth he, who they are that ſhall die. Sylla anſwered he would. Howbeit ſome ſay it was not Metellus, but Aufidius one of his flatterers, that ſpake this laſt word vnto him. Wherefore Sylla immediatly without making any of the magiſtrats priuy, cauſed foureſcore mens names to be ſet vp vpon poſts, whom he would put to death. Euery mā being offended withall, the next day following he ſet vp 220 mens names more: and likewiſe the third day as many more. Hereupon, making an oration to the people, he told them openly that he had appointed all them to die, that he could call to remembrance: howbeit that hereafter he would appoint them that ſhould die by daies, as he did call them to minde. Whoſoeuer ſaued an outlaw in his houſe, for rewarde of his kindeneſſe, he himſelfe was condemned to die: not excepting them that had receiued their brothers, their ſonnes, their fathers, nor mothers. And the rewarde of euery homicide and murtherer that killed one of the outlawes, was two talents: though it were a ſlaue that had killed his maiſter, or the ſonne that had ſlaine the father. But the moſt wicked & vniuſt act of all was, that he depriued the ſons, and ſonnes ſonnes of them whom he had killed, of all credit & good name, & beſides that had taken all their goods as confiſcate. And this was not only done in ROME, but alſo in all the cities of ITALIE through out:& there was no temple of any god whatſoeuer, no aulter in any bodies houſe, no liberty of hoſpitall, nor fathers houſe, that was not embrued with bloud and horrible murther. For the husbands were ſlaine in their wiues armes, and the children on their mothers laps: and yet they which were ſlaine for priuate hatred & malice, were nothing in reſpect of thoſe that were murthered onely for their goods. And they that killed them might well ſay, his goodly great houſe made that man die, his goodly faire garden the other:& his hotte bathes an other. As amongſt others, Quintus Aurelius, a man that neuer medled with any thing, and leaſt looked that theſe euils ſhould light vpon him, and that only pitied thoſe which he ſaw ſo miſerably murthered: went one day into the market place, & reading the bill ſet vp of the outlawes names, found his owne name amongſt the reſt, and cried out aloude: alas the day that euer I was borne, my houſe of ALEA maketh me to be put to death. He went not farre from the market place, but met with one that killed him preſently. In the meane time, Marius the yonger ſeeing he could by no means eſcape if he were taken, ſlue himſelfe. And Sylla comming to PRÆNESTE, did firſt execute them by one and by one, keeping a certaine forme of iuſtice in putting them to death: but afterwards as if he had no longer leiſure to remaine there, he cauſed them all to be put in a place together, to the number of twelue thouſand men, whom he cauſed to be put to the ſword euery man, ſauing his hoaſt only, vnto whom he ſaid, that he ſhewed him ſpecially fauour to ſaue his life. But his hoaſt anſwered him ſtoutly againe, that he would not be beholding vnto him for his life, ſeeing he had ſlaine all the reſt of his countrimen: and ſo thruſting in amongſt the citizens, was willingly ſlaine with them. They thought the act of Lucius Catiline alſo very ſtrange, who had ſlaine his owne brother before the ciuill warre was ended: and then praied Sylla to put him in the number of the outlawes, as if his brother had bene aliue. Sylla performed his deſire. Catiline thereupon to ſhew his thankefulneſſe for the pleaſure Sylla had done him, went preſently, and ſlue Marcus Marius, who was of the contrary faction: and brought him his head for a preſent before all the people, in the middeſt of the market place where he was ſitting. When he had ſo done, he went & waſhed his hands all bloudied in the hallowed fonte of the temple of Apollo, that was hard by. But beſides ſo many murthers committed, yet were there other things alſo that grieued the people maruellouſly. For he proclaimed himſelfe Dictator, which office had not bene of ſixſcore yeares before in vſe, and made the Senate diſcharge him of all that was paſt, giuing him free liberty afterwards to kill whom he would, and to confiſcate their goods: to deſtroy cities, and to build vp new as he liſted: to take away kingdomes, and to giue them where he thought good. And furthermore, he openly ſolde the goods confiſcate, by the crier, ſitting ſo proudly and ſtately in his chaire of ſtate, that it grieued the people more to ſee thoſe goods packt vp by them, to whome he gaue and diſpoſed them, then to ſee them taken from thoſe that had forfeited them. For ſomtimes he would giue a whole country, or the whole reuenues of certaine cities, vnto women for their beauty, or vnto pleaſant ieſters, minſtrels, or wicked ſlaues made free: and vnto ſome, he would giue other mens wiues by force, and make them to be married againſt their willes. For he deſiring (howſoeuer it happened) to make alliance with Pompey the great, commaunded him to put away his wife he had maried: and taking Æmylia (the daughter of Æmylius Scaurus, & of Metella his wife) from the great Glabrio, cauſed him to mary her great with childe as ſhe was by Glabrio: but ſhe died in childbed, in Pompeyes houſe. Lucretius Offella alſo that had brought Marius the younger to that diſtreſſe at the city of PRÆNESTE: ſuing to be Conſull, Sylla commanded him to ceaſe his ſute. But he notwithſtanding that expreſſe commaundement, went one day into the market place, with a great traine of men following him that fauoured his cauſe. Whither Sylla ſent one of his Centurions that ſlue Offella before all the people: himſelfe ſitting in a chaire of eſtate in the temple of Caſtor and Pollux, and ſeeing from aboue the murther done. The people that were about Offella, laid hold of the murtherer ſtraight & brought him before Sylla. But Sylla bad them be quiet that brought the Centurion with tumult, and that they ſhould let him go, becauſe he commaunded him to do it. Furthermore as touching his triumphe, it was a ſumptuous ſight to behold, for the rareneſſe of the riches, and princely ſpoiles which were ſhewed at the ſame.

But yet was it ſo much the better ſet out, and worth the ſight, to ſee the baniſhed Romaines, who were the chiefeſt noble men of all the city of Rome, following his chariot triumphant wearing garlands of flowers on their heads, calling Sylla their father, and ſauiour: becauſe that by his meanes they returned to their countrie, and recouered their goods, wiues, & children. In the end of his triumphe, he made an oration in open aſſembly of the people of Rome, in the which he did not only declare vnto them (according to the cuſtome ( what things he had done, but did as carefully tell them alſo as well of his good fortune and ſucceſſe, as of his valiant deeds beſides: and to conclude his oration, tolde them that by reaſon of the great fauour fortune had ſhewed him, he would from thenceforth be called by them, Felix, to ſay, happy, or fortunate. And he himſelfe when he wrote vnto the Grecians, or that he had any thing to do with them: ſurnamed himſelfe Epaphroditus, as who would ſay, a pleaſant man, beloued and fououred of Venus. His tokens of triumphe which are yet in our countrie, haue this ſuperſcription. Lucius Cornelius Sylla Epaphroditus. And when his wife Metella had brought him two twinnes, a ſonne and a daughter: he named his ſonne Fauſtus, ſignifying fortunate, and his daughter Fauſta: becauſe the Romaines call Fauſtum that, which falleth out proſperouſly, and happely. To be ſhort, he truſted ſo much vnto his good fortune and doings, that notwithſtanding he had killed and put ſo many men to death, and had made ſo great a change and innouation in the commonwealth, yet of himſelfe he left off his office of Dictator, and reſtored the people to the authority of election of Conſuls againe, without his preſence at the election: and frequented the market place as a priuate man among the citizens, offering himſelfe to euery man that would aske him account of his doings paſt. It happened that a ſtoute and raſhe enemy of his was choſen Conſull againſt his will, called Marcus Lepidus, not for any deuotion the people had to Lepidus, but onely to gratifie Pompey, who gaue countenance and fauour vnto him. Sylla ſeeing Pompey come merry homewards from the election, & ioyfull that he had obtained his friends ſute from all other ſuters: tooke him a ſide, and told him. In deede thou haſt great cauſe to reioyce, youngman my friend, for thou haſt done a goodly acte: to chooſe Marcus Lepidus Conſull, the verieſt aſſe in all Rome, before Catulus the honeſteſt man. But I tell thee one thing, thou hadſt not neede to ſleepe: for thou haſt ſtrengthened an enemie, that will be thine owne deſtruction. And Sylla proued a true prophet: for Lepidus being bent to all cruelty immediatly after, flatly fell at defiance with Pompey. Now Sylla conſecrating the diſmes of all his goods vnto Hercules, made exceeding ſumptuous feaſts vnto the Romaines, the prouiſion whereof was ſo vnreaſonable great, that euery day they threw a great deale of meate into the riuer, and they dranke wine of forty yeares olde and aboue. During theſe feaſts which continued many dayes, his wife Metella ſickened, and died, and in her ſickeneſſe the Prieſts and Soothſaiers willed Sylla he ſhould not come neere her, nor ſuffer his houſe to be polluted and defiled with mourning for the dead. Whereupon Sylla was diuorced from her in her ſickneſſe, and cauſed her to be caried into an other houſe, whileſt ſhe liued. And thus did Sylla curiouſly obſerue the ſuperſtition and ordinance of the ſoothſayers: but yet he brake the law which he made himſelfe, touching the order of funerals, ſparing no coſt at Metellaes buriall. So did he alſo breake an other order himſelfe had made, touching the reformation of banckets: comforting his ſorrow with ordinary feaſts, full of all vanitie and laſciuiouſneſſe. Within a fewe moneths after, he had fenſers games at the ſharpe: and the roomes of the Theater being open and vnſeuered, men and women ſitting together, it fortuned that there was a faire Lady, and of a noble houſe, that ſat hard by Sylla, called Valeria: ſhe was the daughter of Meſſala, and ſiſter of Hortenſius the orator, and had bene diuorced not long before from her husband. This Lady paſſing by Sylla behinde him, did ſoftly put her hand on his ſhoulder, and tooke a haire from off his gowne, and ſo went on to her place, and ſat her downe. Sylla maruelling at this familiarity, looked earneſtly vpon her: it is nothing my Lord, (quoth ſhe) but that I deſire with others to be partaker a litle of your happineſſe. Her words miſliked not Sylla, but contrarily he ſhewed that ſhe had tickled him with them: for he ſent ſtraight to aske her name, and enquired of what houſe ſhe was, and how ſhe had liued. But after many ſlie lookes betweene them, they turned their faces one to another vpon euery occaſion, with prety ſmiling countenances: ſo that in the end, they came to promiſe and contract mariage together, for the which Valeria was not to be blamed. For though ſhe was as wiſe, as honeſt, and as vertuous a Lady as could be poſſible, yet the occaſion that made Sylla mary her, was neither good nor commendable, becauſe he was taken ſtraight with a looke and a fine tongue, as if he had bene but a young boy: which commonly ſhew forth the filthieſt paſſions of the minde, to be ſo caried, and with ſuch motions. Now, notwithſtanding he had this faire young Lady in his houſe, he left not the company of women minſtrels & tumblers, and to haue pleaſant ieſters and muſitians about him, with whom he would lie wallowing & drinking all the day long, vpon litle couches made for the nonce. For, his companions that were in greateſt eſtimation with him at that time, were theſe three: Roſcius a maker of common playes, Sorex a prince of ſcoffers, & one Metrobius a ſinging man, whom he was in loue withall while he liued, & yet did not diſſemble his loue, though he was paſt age to be beloued. This wicked life of his was cauſe of increaſing his diſeaſe, the originall cauſe whereof had light foundation at the firſt. For he liued a great time before he perceiued that he had an impoſtume in his body, the which by proceſſe of time came to corrupt his fleſh in ſuch ſort, that it turned all to lice: ſo that notwithſtanding he had many men about him, to ſhift him continually night and day, yet the lice they wiped away were nothing, in reſpect of them that multiplied ſtill vpon him. And there was neither apparell, linnen, bathes, waſhing, nor meate it ſelfe, but was preſently filled with ſwarmes of this vile vermine. For he went many times in the day into the bathe to waſhe and clenſe himſelfe of them, but all would not ſerue: for the changing of his fleſh into this putriture wan it ſtraight againe, that there was no clenſing, nor ſhifting of him, that could keepe ſuch a number of lice from him. Some ſay, that in olde time (amongſt the moſt ancienteſt men, whereof there is any memorie) Acaſtus the ſonne of Pelias, died of the lowſie euill: and long time after alſo, the Poet Alcman, and Pherecides the diuine: and ſo did Calliſthenes OLYNTHIAN in priſon, and Mutius a wiſe lawier. And if we ſhall make mention of thoſe that are famous men, although it be not in any good matter: we finde that a bonde man called Eunus, he that was the firſt procurer of the warres of the bondmen in SICILIA, being taken and caried to ROME, died alſo of the ſame diſeaſe. Furthermore, Sylla did not onely foreſee his death, but he wrote ſome thing of it alſo: for he made an end of writing the two & twentith booke of his commentaries, two daies before he died. In that booke he ſaith, that the wiſe men of CHALDEA had told him long before, that after he had liued honourably, he ſhould end his daies in the flower of all his proſperitie. And there he ſaieth alſo, that his ſonne (who departed a litle before his mother Metella) appeared to him in his ſleepe, apparelled in an ill fauoured gowne, and that comming vnto him, he prayed him he would go with him vnto Metella his mother, thenceforth to liue in peace and reſt with her. But for all his diſeaſe, he would not giue ouer to deale in matters of ſtate. For ten dayes before his death, he pacified a ſedition, and tumult, riſen among the inhabitants of the city of PVTEOLANVM (in Italian called POZZOLO) and there he gaue them lawes and ordinances, whereby they ſhould gouerne themſelues. And the day before he died, hearing that Granius who was in debt to the commonwealth, deferred paiment of his money looking for his death: he ſent for him, and made him come into his chamber, and there cauſed his men to compaſſe him about, and commanded them to ſtrangle him in his ſight. The paſſion of his anger was ſo vehement againſt him, that by the extreame ſtraining of himſelfe, he brake the impoſtume in his body, ſo as there guſhed out a wonderfull deale of bloud: by reaſon whereof his ſtrength failing him, he was full of paine and pangs that night, and ſo died, leauing the two litle children he had by Metella. For Valeria, was brought to bed of a daughter after his death, which was called Poſthumia, becauſe the ROMAINES call thoſe children that are borne after the death of their fathers, Poſthumi. Now when Sylla was dead, many gathered about the Conſull Lepidus to let that his body ſhould not be honorably buried, as they were accuſtomed to bury noblemen & men of quality. But Pompey, though he was angry with Sylla, becauſe he had giuen him nothing in his will, and had remembred all his other friends: yet he made ſome for loue, ſome by intreaty, and others with threatning to let it alone, and accompanying the corps into ROME, gaue both ſafety and honor vnto the performance of his funerals. And it is ſaid alſo, that the ROMAINE Ladies, amongſt other things, beſtowed ſuch a quantity of perfumes and odoriferous matter towards the ſame: that beſides thoſe which were brought in two hundred and ten great baskets, they made a great image to the likeneſſe of Sylla himſelfe, and an other of a ſergeant carying the axes before him, all of excellent incence and ſynamon. When the day of the funerals came, fearing leaſt it would raine in the forenoone, all the element being ſo cloudie, they deferred to cary forth the body to be burnt, vntill paſt three of the clocke in the afternoone. And then roſe there ſuch a ſodaine boiſterous winde, that it ſet all the ſtake of wood ſtraight a fire, that the body was burnt at a trice, and the fire going out, fell a great ſhower of raine that held on till night: ſo that it ſeemed good fortune following him euen to his ende, did alſo helpe his obſequies after his death. His tombe is to be ſeene in the fielde of Mars: and they ſay that he himſelfe made his owne epitaphe that is written vpon it, which was: that no man did euer paſſe him, neither in doing good to his friends, nor in doing miſchiefe to his enemies.

Sylla with Lyſander.

NOw that we haue at large alſo ſet forth the life of the ROMAINE, let vs come to compare them both together. In this they are both a like, that both of them grew to be great men, riſing of themſelues through their owne vertue: but this onely is proper to Lyſander, that all the offices and dignities which he attained vnto in the commonwealth, were laide vpon him through the peoples good wills and conſents. For he compelled them to nothing, neither vſurped he any extraordinarie authoritie vpon them, contrary to lawe: for, as the common ſaying is:

> VVhere partialitie, and diſcorde once do raigne:
> There wicked men are moſt eſteemde, and rule with greateſt gaine.

As at that time in ROME, the people being corrupted, and the ſtate of gouernment vtterly ſubuerted and brought to nought: to day there roſe vp one tyrant, to morow an other. And therfore we may not wonder if Sylla vſurped and ruled all, when ſuch fellowes as Glaucia and Saturninus, did both baniſh & driue out of ROME ſuch men as Metellus was: and where alſo in open aſſembly they ſlue Conſuls ſonnes in the market place, and where force of armes was bought & ſold for gold and ſiluer, with the which the ſoldiers were corrupted: & where they made new lawes with fire and ſword, and forced men to obey the ſame. Yet I ſpeake not this in reproache of him that in ſuch troubleſome times founde meanes to make himſelfe the greateſt man: but to ſhew that I meaſure not his honeſty by the dignity he grew vnto in ſo vnfortunate a city, although he became the chiefe. And as touching him that came frō SPARTA

(at what time it floriſhed moſt, and was the beſt gouerned commonweale) he in all great cauſes, and in moſt honourable offices, was reputed for the beſt of all beſts, and the chieſe of all chieſes. Wherefore it happened, that the one reſigned vp the authoritie to his countrimen, the citizens, which they had giuen him, who alſo reſtored it to him againe many and ſundry times: for the honour of his vertue did alwaies remaine, and made him iuſtly accounted for the worthieſt man. Where the other being once onely choſen generall of an armie, remained ten yeares continually in warres and hoſtilitie, making himſelfe by force, ſometime Conſull, ſometime vice Conſull, and ſometime Dictator, but alwayes continued a tyrant. In deede Lyſander attempted to change, and alter the ſtate of gouernment in his countrie, howbeit it was with greater lenity, & more lawfully then Sylla did. For he ſought it by reaſon, and good perſuaſion, not by the ſworde: neither would he make a change of the whole at one ſelfe time as Sylla did, but ſought only to reforme the election of kings. The which thing according to nature, doubtleſſe ſeemed very iuſt: that he which was the beſt amongſt good men, ſhould be choſen king of that citie, which was the chiefe ouer all GRECE, not for her nobilitie, but for her vertue onely. For like as a good hunter doth not ſeeke for the whelpe of a good dog, but for the good dogge himſelfe: nor a wiſe man of armes alſo, the colte that commeth of a good horſe, but the good horſe himſelfe. Euen ſo, he that taketh vpon him to ſtabliſh a ciuill gouernment, committeth a fowle fault, if he looke of whom his Prince ſhould be borne, and not what the Prince himſelfe ſhould be, conſidering that the LACEDÆMONIANS themſelues haue depriued diuerſe of their kings from their crowne and realme, becauſe they were not Princely, but vnprofitable, and good for nothing. Vice, although it be in a noble man, yet is it alwaies ill of it ſelfe: but vertue is honoured for her ſelfe alone, and not becauſe ſhe is placed with nobility. Nowe for the wrongs and iniuries they both committed, the one did worke onely to pleaſure his friends, and the other to offend them to whom he was bounden. For it is certaine that Lyſander did great wrongs to gratifie his familiars: and the moſt parte of them whom he put to death, was to eſtabliſh the tyrannicall power of certaine his friends. Where Sylla ſought for ſpight to take away his army from Pompey, and the Admiralty from Dolobella, which he himſelfe had giuen, & cauſed Lucretius Offella to be ſlaine openly in his owne ſight, becauſe he ſought to be Conſull, for recompence of the good ſeruice he had done: for which cruelty of his, cauſing his owne friends to be ſlaine in ſuch ſort, he made euery man afeard of him. Furthermore, their behauiours touching couetouſneſſe and pleaſure doth ſhew, that the intent of the one was the deſire of a good Prince, and the other, that of a tyrant. For we doe not finde that Lyſander, for all his great Princely authority, did euer vſe any inſolencie or laſciuiouſneſſe in his deedes, but alwaies auoided as much as a man might, the reproache of this common prouerbe: Lyons at home, and Foxes abroade: he led ſuch a true LACONIAN life, ſtraightly reformed in all points. Where Sylla could neuer moderate his vnlawfull luſts, neither for pouerty when he was young, nor yet for age, when it came vpon him. But whileſt he gaue lawes to the ROMAINES touching matrimoniall honeſtie and chaſtitie: himſelfe in the meane time did nothing but follow loue, and commit adulteries, as Saluſt writeth. By meanes whereof he ſo much impoueriſhed ROME, and left it ſo voide of golde and ſiluer: that for readie money he ſold abſolute freedome vnto the cities their confederats, yet was it his dayly ſtudie to confiſcate and take for forfeit, the richeſt and moſt wealthieſt houſes in all the whole citie of ROME. But all this ſpoile and hauock was nothing in compariſon of that which he daily caſt away vpon his ieſters and flatterers. What ſparing, or meaſure may we thinke he kept, in his gifts at priuate banckets: when openly in the day time (all the people of ROME being preſent, to ſee him ſell the goods which he had cauſed to be confiſcate) he made one of his friends and familiars, to truſſe vp a great deale of houſehold ſtuffe, for a very litle price? And when any other had out bidden his price, and that the crier had cried it out aloude: then was he angry, & ſaid: My friends, I haue great wrong done me here, not to ſuffer me ſell the ſpoile I haue gotten at mine owne pleaſure, and diſpoſe it as I liſt my ſelfe. Where Lyſander contrarily ſent to the commonwealth of SPARTA, with other money, the very preſents that were giuen to himſelfe. And yet I do not commend him in that deed. For, peraduenture he did more hurte to SPARTA, bringing thither that golde and ſiluer: then Sylla did to ROME, in waſting and conſuming that he conſumed. Howbeit I alledge this onely, for proofe and declaration that Lyſander was nothing couetous. They both haue done that vnto their city, which neuer any other but them ſelues did. For Sylla being a riotous and licentious man, brought his citizens notwithſtanding to good order and gouernment: and Lyſander contrarily filled his city with vice, yet not infected withall him ſelfe. Thus were they both offendors, the one for breaking the law he commaunded to be kept, and the other in making the citizens worſe then he was him ſelfe: for he taught the SPARTANS to deſire thoſe things, which he aboue all things had learned to deſpiſe. And thus much concerning peace and ciuill gouernment. Now for matters of warre and battels fought, there is no compariſon to be made of Lyſander to Sylla, neither in number of victories, nor in hazard of battell. For Lyſander wan onely but two battels by ſea, beſides the taking of the city of ATHENS: which (though I graunt him) being rightly conſidered, was no great exploite of war, howbeit it was a noble act, conſidering the fame he wanne by it. And as for things which happened to him in BOEOTIA, hard by the city of ALIARTE: a man might ſay peraduenture that he had ill lucke. But yet me thinks alſo there was a fault in him, for that he ſtaied not for king Pauſanias aide (the which came from PLATEES immediatly after his ouerthrow) and becauſe he went in a gaire in fury, and in a vaine ambition to runne his head againſt a wall: ſo that men of all ſortes making a deſperate ſaly out of ALIARTE vpon him, ſlue him there to no purpoſe. Farre vnlike to Cleombrotus that dyed at the battell of LEVCTRES, reſiſting his enemies that diſtreſſed his men: nor yet like Cyrus, nor Epaminondas, who to keepe his men from flying, and to giue them aſſured victory, receiued his deadly wound: for all theſe men died like noble kings, and valiant Captaines. Where Lyſander raſhly caſt him ſelfe away, to his great diſhonour, by too much venturing: prouing thereby, that the auncient SPARTANS did like wiſe men, to auoide the fight with walles. For the nobleſt and valianteſt man that is, or poſſible can be, may eaſily be ſo ſlaine, not onely by the firſt ſouldier that commeth, but by euery ſeely woman or childe. As they ſay that the worthy Achilles was killed by Paris within the very gates of TROIA. Now to the contrary again, the victories that Sylla wanne in ſet battels, and the thouſandes of enemies which he ſlue, are not eaſily to be numbred, beſides alſo that he tooke the city of ROME twiſe, and the hauen of ATHENS: not by famine as Lyſander did, but by force, after he had by many great battels driuen Archelaus out of firme land into the maine ſea. It is to be conſidered alſo, againſt what Captaines they made warres. For me thinkes it was but a paſtime, as a man might ſay, for Lyſander to fight with Antiochus, a pylot of Alcibiades, or to ſurpriſe and deceiue Philocles, a common orator at ATHENS:

Much worſe then two edged ſword, his buſie tongue did ſeeme:
VVhich pratled ſtill, and honeſty did neuer once eſteeme.

And whom Mithridates (in my opinion) would not vouchſafe to compare with his horſekeeper, nor Marius with one of his ſergeaunts or maſebearers. But to leaue a ſide the particular names of all other Princes, Lordes, Conſuls, Prætors, Captaines, and Gouernours that made wars with Sylla: what ROMAINE Captaine was there more to be feared, then Marius? what king liuing was there of ſuch power as king Mithridates? And of Generals and Lieutenauntes of armies in all ITALY, were there any euer more valiant, then Lamponius and Theleſinus: of the which Sylla draue the one away, and brought the other to obey him, and ſlue the two laſt? But the greateſt matter of all that we haue ſpoken of yet, in my opinion was, that Lyſander did all his noble actes, with the aide of his whole countrey: where Sylla to the contrary did his, (being baniſhed from his country) by his enemies. And at the ſelfe ſame time that they draue Syllaes wife out of ROME, that they ouerthrew his houſes, and ſlue his friendes alſo in ROME: he notwithſtanding made warres in the meane time with infinite thouſandes of fighting men in BOEOTIA, and ventred his perſon in manifold dangers, ſo that in the end he conquered thẽ all to the honor and benefit of his country. Furthermore, Sylla would neuer ſtoupe to king Mithridates, for any particular alliance he offred him, neither yeelde vnto him for any aide of men, or money, to warre againſt his enemies: but a thing moſt chiefly to be noted aboue the reſt, he would not vouchſafe to ſpeake to Mithridates, nor to take him by the hand onely, before he had ſpoken it with his owne mouth, and faithfully promiſed, that he would

forgoe Asia, deliuer him his gallies, and giue vp the realmes of Bithynia and Cappadocia vnto their naturall kings. This me thinkes was the goodlieſt act that euer Sylla did, and proceeded of the greateſt magnanimity, to haue preferred the benefite of the common wealth in that ſort, before his priuate commodity. For therein he was like vnto a good greyhound that firſt pincheth the Deare, and holdeth him faſt til he haue ouerthrowen him: & then afterwards followeth the recouery of his owne priuate quarrell. And laſtly, me thinkes it is eaſily iudged, what difference there was betweene their two natures, in that they did both towards the city of Athens. For Sylla hauing taken it, after the citizens had made fierce warres with him for the increaſe of king Mithridates greatnes: yet he left it free vnto them, enioying their owne lawes. Where Lyſander to the contrary, ſeeing ſuch a mighty ſtate and Empire as that ouerthrowen from the great rule it bare, had no pity of it at all, but tooke away the liberty of popular gouernment, whereby it had bene gouerned of long time before: and eſtabliſhed there very cruell and wicked tyrants. And therefore in mine opinion, we ſhall not much ſwarue from the troth, if we giue this iudgement: that Sylla did the greater acts, and Lyſander committed the fewer faultes. And that we giue to the one the honor of a continent and modeſt man: and to the other, the commendation of a valiant and ſkilfull ſouldier.

Plutarkes iudgement of Sylla and Lyſander.

THE LIFE OF Cimon.

Peripoltas the Soothſaier, he that brought king Opheltas out of Thessaly into the coũtry of Boeotia, with the people which were vnder his obedience: left a poſterity after him that long time floriſhed in that country, the more part of the which were euer reſident in the city of Chæronea, becauſe it was the firſt city that was conquered frõ the barbarous people whom they expulſed thence. Al they that came of that race, were commonly men of great courage, and naturally giuen to the warres: who were ſo forward and aduenturous in all dangers thereof (in the inuaſions of the Medes into Greece, and in the battels of the Gaules) that they were ſlaine all of them, but onely Damon (a litle childe left fatherleſſe and motherleſſe) ſurnamed Peripoltas that eſcaped, who for goodly perſonage and noble courage excelled all the luſty youthes of his time, though otherwiſe he was very rude, and of a ſeuere nature. Now it fortuned, that when Damon was growen of full age, a Romaine Captaine of an enſigne of footemen (lying in garriſon for the winter ſeaſon in the city of Chæronea) fell in great loue with Damon: and becauſe he could not reape the fruites of his diſhoneſt loue by no intreaty nor giftes, there appeared vehement preſumptions that by force he went about to abuſe him, for that Chæronea at that time (being my naturall city where I was borne) was a ſmall thing, and (being of no ſtrength nor power) litle regarded. Damon miſtruſting the Captains villainy, and deteſting his abhominable deſire, watched him a ſhrewd turne, and got certaine of his companions (not many in number, becauſe he might the more ſecretly compaſſe his enterpriſe) to bee a counſell with him, and take his part againſt the Captain. Now there were a ſixteene of them in conſort together, that one night blacked their faces all with ſoote, and the next morning after they had drunke together, by the breake of day ſet vpon this Romaine Captaine, that was making ſacrifice in the market place, and ſlue him with a good number of his men: and when they had done, fled out of the city, which was ſtraight in a great vprore for the murther committed. Thereuppon they called a councell, and in the market place condemned Damon and his confederates to ſuffer paines of death: hoping thereby to haue cleared their innocency for the fact done to the Romains. But the ſelfe ſame night, as all the magiſtrates and officers of the city were at ſupper together in the towne-houſe according to their cuſtome: Damon and his followers ſtale vpon them ſodainly, ſlue them all, and fled againe vpon it. It chaunced about that time, that Lucius Lucullus being ſent on ſome iourney, paſſed by the city of Chæronea with his army: and becauſe this murther was but newly done, he ſtaied there a few daies to examine the troth and originall thereof. And found that the commons of the city were in no fault, but that they themſelues alſo had receiued hurt: whereupon he tooke the ſouldiers of the Romains that remained of the garriſon, and caried them away with him. In the meane time, Damon deſtroied all the country thereabout, and ſtil houered neare to the city, inſomuch as the inhabitantes of the ſame were driuen in the end to ſend vnto him, and by gentle words & fauorable decrees handled him ſo, that they intiſed him to come againe into the city: and when they had him amongeſt them, they choſe him Gymnaſiarchus, to ſay, a maſter of exerciſes of youth. But ſhortly after, as they were rubbing of him with oile in his ſtoue or hotte houſe, ſtarke naked as he was, they ſlue him by treaſon. And becauſe that there appeared ſpirits of long time after in that place, and that there were heard gronings and ſighings as our fathers tolde vs, they cauſed the dore of the hot-houſe to be walled vp: yet for all that, there are viſions ſeene, and terrible voyces and cries heard in that ſelfe place vnto this preſent time, as the neighbours dwelling by doe teſtifie. Now they that were deſcended of this Damon (for there are yet of his race in the country of Phocides, near vnto the city of Stiris, who do only of all other both keepe the language and manners of the Ætolians) are called Asbolomeni, ſignifying blacke, and beſmered with ſoote: becauſe that Damon and his fellowes did blacke their faces with ſoote, when they ſlue the Romaine Captaine. But the Orchomenians being neare neighbors vnto the Chæroneians, and therefore their enemies, hiered an informer of Rome, a malicious accuſer, to accuſe the whole city, (as if it had bene one priuate perſon alone) for the murther of the Romaines, whom Damon and his companions had ſlaine. The inditement was drawen, and the caſe pleaded before the gouernor of Macedon, for that the Romaines did ſend no gouernors at that time into Greece: and the counſellers that pleaded for the city of Chæronea, relied vpon the teſtimony of Lucius Lucullus, referring them ſelues to his report, who knew the troth and how it was. Thereupon the gouernor wrote vnto him, and Lucullus in his letter of anſwer aduertiſed the very troth: ſo was our city cleared of the accuſation, which otherwiſe ſtoode in danger of vtter deſtruction. The inhabitants of the city of Chæronea, for that they had eſcaped the danger by teſtimony of Lucius Lucullus, to honor him withall, they ſet vp his image in ſtone in the market place, next vnto the image of Bacchus. And we alſo that be liuing at this preſent, though many yeares be gone and paſſed ſince, doe notwithſtanding reckon our ſelues partakers of his forepaſſed benefite. And becauſe we are perſwaded, that the image and portraiture that maketh vs acquainted with mens manners and conditions, is farre more excellent, then the picture that repreſenteth any mans perſon or ſhape onely: we will comprehend his life and doings according to the troth, in this volume of noble mens liues, where we do compare and ſort them one with an other. It ſhall be ſufficient for vs therefore, that we ſhew our ſelues thankfull for his benefit, and we thinke, that he him ſelfe would miſlike for reward of his true teſtimony, to be requited with a fauorable lie told in his behalfe. But like as when we will haue a paſſing faire face drawen, and liuely counterfeated, and that hath a excellent good grace withall, yet ſome manner of bleamiſh or imperfection in it: we will not allow the drawer to leaue it out altogether, nor yet too curiouſly to ſhew it, becauſe the one would deforme the counterfeate, and the other make it very vnlikely. Euen ſo, becauſe it is a hard thing (or to ſay better, peraduenture impoſſible) to deſcribe a man, whoſe life ſhould altogether be innocent, and perfect: we muſt firſt ſtudy to write his vertues at large, and thereby ſeeke perfectly to repreſent the troth, euen as the life it ſelfe. But where by chance we finde certaine faultes and errors in their doings, proceeding either of paſſion of the minde, by neceſsity of the time or ſtate of the common wealth: they are rather to be thought imperfections of vertue not altogether accompliſhed, then any purpoſed wickedneſſe proceeding of vice, or certaine malice. Which we ſhall not neede too curiouſly to expreſſe in our hiſtory, but rather to paſſe them lightly ouer, of reuerent ſhame to the meere frayIty of mans nature, which can not bring foorth a man of ſuch vertue and perfection, but there is euer ſome imperfection in him. And therefore, conſidering with my ſelfe vnto whom I might compare Lucullus, I thought it beſt to compare him with Cimon, becauſe they haue beene both valiant ſouldiers againſt their enemies, hauing both done notable exploites in warres againſt the barbarous people: and moreouer, they haue both bene curteous and mercifull vnto their citizens, and were both the onely men that pacified the ciuill wars and diſſention in their countrey, & both the one and the other of them wan notable victories of the barbarous people. For there was neuer GRECIAN Captaine before Cimon, nor ROMAINE Captaine before Lucullus, that had made wars ſo far off from their countrey leauing apart the deedes of Bacchus and of Hercules, and the deedes alſo of Perſeus, againſt the ÆTHIOPIANS, the MEDES, and the ARMENIANS, and the deedes of Iaſon alſo: if there remaine any monument extant ſince their time, worthy of credit in theſe our daies. Furthermore, herein they are to be likened together: that they neuer ended their warres, they onely ouerthrew their enemies, but neuer ouercame them altogether. Againe, they may note in them a great reſemblaunce of nature, for their honeſty, curteſie and humanity, which they ſhewed vnto ſtraungers in their countrey: and for the magnificence and ſumptuouſnes of their life and ordinary expence. It may be we doe leaue out ſome other ſimilitudes betweene them: howbeit in the diſcourſe of their liues they will eaſily appeare. Cimon was the ſon of Miltiades and of Hegeſipyle, a THRACIAN woman borne, and the daughter of king Olorus, as we finde written in certaine poetical verſes which Melanthius and Archelaus haue written of Cimon. The father of Thucydides the hiſtoriographer him ſelfe, who was of kinne alſo vnto Cimon, was called in like maner Olorus, ſhewing by the agreeing of the name, that this king Olorus was one of his aunceſters, and did alſo poſſeſſe mines of gold in the countrey of THRACIA. It is ſaied moreouer that he died in a certaine place called the ditchy forreſt, where he was ſlaine: howbeit that his aſhes and bones were caried into the country of ATTICA, where his tombe appeareth yet to this day, amongſt the tombes of them of the houſe and family of Cimon, neare vnto the tombe of Cimons owne ſiſter called Elpinice. Notwithſtanding, Thucydides was of the village of ALIMVS, and Miltiades of the village of LACIA. This Miltiades Cimons father, being condemned by the ſtate to pay the ſumme of fifty talents, was for non payment caſt into priſon, and there died: and left Cimon and his ſiſter Elpinice aliue, both Orphanes, and very young. Now, Cimon in his firſt young yeares had a very ill name and report in the city, being counted a riotous young man, and a great drinker, following his grandfather Cimons faſhions vp and downe, as he had alſo his name: ſaying that his grandfather for his beaſtlines was ſurnamed Coalemos, as much to ſay as foole. Steſimbrotus THASIAN, who was about Cimons time, writeth, that Cimon neuer learned muſicke, nor any other of the liberall ſciences accuſtomably taught to young noble mens ſonnes of GREECE, and

and that he had no ſharpe wit, nor good grace of ſpeaking, a vertue proper vnto children born in the countrey of ATTICA: howbeit that hee was of a noble minde, and plaine, without diſſimulation, ſo that he rather liued PELOPONNESIAN like, then like an ATHENIAN. For he was euen ſuch as the Poet Euripides deſcribed Hercules to be.

A ſimple man he was, and could not well diſguiſe:
As honeſt eke in things of weight, as wit could well deuiſe.

This ſerued fitly to be applied vnto Steſimbrotus wordes written of him: but notwithſtanding, in his firſt young yeares he was ſuſpected of incontinency with his ſiſter, who in deede otherwiſe had no very good name. For ſhe was very familiar with the painter Polygnotus, who painting the TROIAN Ladies priſoners vpon the wals of the gallery, called the Pleſianaction, and now Pæcile: (to ſay, ſet out and beautified with diuers pictures) he drue (as they ſay) LAODICES face vppon Elpinices picture. This painter Polygnotus was no common artificer nor hireling, that painted this gallery for moneies ſake, but gaue his labour franckely to the common wealth, as all the hiſtoriographers that wrote in that time doe witneſſe: and as the Poet Melanthius alſo reciteth in theſe verſes:

At his owne proper charge, great coſt he hath beſtowed,

He hath adornd the common place, with many a fine deuiſe:
Painting and ſetting forth, in ſtately ſhew to ſee,

Yet ſome ſay that Elpinice did not ſecretly company with her brother Cimon, but lay with him openly as his lawfull maried wife, becauſe ſhe could not for her pouerty haue a husband of like nobility and parentage to her ſelfe. Howbeit, that a certaine man called Callias, being one of the richeſt men of the city, did afterwardes fall in fanſie with her, and deſired to marie her, offering to pay her father Miltiades fine of fifty talents, wherein he ſtoode condemned a debter to the ſtate, ſo that he might haue her to his wife. Cimon was contented, and vppon that condition maried his ſiſter Elpinice vnto Callias. This notwithſtanding, it is certaine that Cimon was ſomewhat amorous, and giuen to loue women. For Melanthius the Poet in certaine of his elegies, maketh mention for his pleaſure of one Aſteria borne at SALAMINA, and of an other called Mneſtra, as if Cimon had bene in loue with them. But vndoubtedly, he loued his lawfull wife Iſodice maruellous well, the daughter of Euryptolemus, Megacles ſonne, and tooke her death very grieuouſly, as we may coniecture by the elegies that were written vnto him, to comfort him in his ſorrow. Panætius the Philoſopher is of opinion, that Archelaus the Phiſitian wrote thoſe elegies: and ſure it is not vnlikely, conſidering the time in which they were written. But furthermore, Cimons nature and conditions deſerued great commendation. For his valiantneſſe he gaue no place vnto Miltiades, and for his wiſedome and iudgement, he was not inferior vnto Themiſtocles: and it is out of all doubt that he was a iuſter and honeſter man, then either of them both. For he was equall with the beſt of either of both in the diſcipline of warres, and for the valiantneſſe of a noble Captaine: and he did much excell them both in the properties of a good gouernour, and in the adminiſtration of the affaires of a city, when he was but a young man, and had no experience of warres. For when Themiſtocles at the comming in of the MEDES counſelled the people of ATHENS to goe out of the city, to leaue their landes and countrey, and to ſhippe into gallies, and fight with the barbarous people by ſea in the ſtraight of SALAMINA: as euery man was wondering at his bolde and vertuous counſell, Cimon was the firſt man that went with a life and iolitie through the ſtreete Ceramicus, vnto the caſtell, accompanied with his young familiars and companions, carying a bitte of a bridle in his hand to conſecrate vnto the goddeſſe Minerua, ſignifying thereby, that the city had no neede of horſemen at that time, but of mariners and ſea men. And after hee had giuen vp his offering, hee tooke one of the targettes that hung vppon the wall of the temple, and hauing made his prayer vnto Minerua, came downe to the hauen, and was the firſt that made the moſt part of the citizens to take a good heart to them, and coragiouſly to leaue the land, and take the ſea. Beſides all this, he was a man of a goodly ſtature, as Ion the Poet teſtifieth, and had a faire curled haire and thicke, and fought ſo valiantly at the day of the battell, that he wanne immediatly great reputation, with the loue and good will of euery man. So that many were ſtill about him to encourage him to be liuely and valiant, and to thinke thenceforth to doe ſome actes worthy of the glory that his father had gotten at the battell of MARATHON. And afterwardes, ſo ſoone as he beganne to deale in matters of ſtate, the people were maruellous glad of him, and were wearied with Themiſtocles: by meanes whereof Cimon was preſently aduanced and preferred to the chiefeſt offices of honor in the city, being very well thought on of the common people, becauſe of his ſoft and plaine nature. Moreouer, Ariſtides alſo did greatly further his aduancement, becauſe he ſaw him of a good gentle nature, and for that he would vſe him as a counterpeaſe to control Themiſtocles craft & ſtoutnes. Wherefore after the MEDES were fled out of GREECE, Cimon being ſent for by the ATHENIANS for their generall by ſea, when the city of ATHENS had then no maner of rule nor commandement, but followed king Pauſanias and the LACEDÆMONIANS: he euer kept his countrey men and citizens in maruellous good order in all the voyages he made, and they were readier to doe good ſeruice, then any other nation in the whole army whatſoeuer. And when king Pauſanias had practiſed with the barbarous people to betray GREECE, had written alſo to the king of PERSIA about it, and in the meane time dealt very cruelly and ſtraightly with the confederates of his countrey, and committed many inſolent partes by reaſon of the great authority he had, and through his fooliſh pride whereof he was full: Cimon farre otherwiſe, gentlely entertained them whom Pauſanias iniured, and was willing to heare them. So that by this his curteous manner, the LACEDÆMONIANS hauing no eye to his doings, he ſtale away the rule and commaundement of all GREECE from them, and brought the ATHENIANS to be ſole Lordes of all, not by force and cruelty, but by his ſweete tongue, and gracious manner of vſing all men. For the moſt part of the confederates being no longer able to away with Pauſanias pride and cruelty, came willingly and ſubmitted thẽ ſelues vnder the protection of Cimon and Ariſtides: who did not onely receiue them, but wrote alſo to the councell of the Ephores at LACEDÆMON, that they ſhould call Pauſanias home, for that he diſhonored SPARTA, and put all GREECE to much trouble and warres. And for proofe hereof, they ſay that king Pauſanias being on a time in the city of BYZANCE, ſent for Cleonice, a yong maiden of a noble houſe, to take his pleaſure of her. Her parents durſt not keepe her from him, by reaſon of his cruelty, but ſuffered him to cary her away. The young gentlewoman prayed the groomes of Pauſanias chamber to take away the lightes, and thinking in the darke to come to Pauſanias bed that was a ſleepe, groping for the bed as ſoftly as ſhee could to make no noiſe, ſhee vnfortunately hit againſt the lampe, and ouerthrew it. The falling of the lampe made ſuch a noiſe, that it waked him on the ſodaine, and thought ſtraight therewithall that ſome of his enemies had beene come traiterouſly to kill him, whereupon he tooke his dagger lying vnder his beddes head, and ſo ſtabbed it in the young virgine, that ſhe died immediately vppon it. Howbeit ſhee neuer let Pauſanias take reſt after that, becauſe her ſpirit came euery night and appeared vnto him, as he would faine haue ſlept, and ſpake this angrily to him in verſe, as followeth.

Keepe thou thy ſelfe vpright, and iuſtice ſee thou feare,
For woe and ſhame be vnto him, that iuſtice downe doth beare.

This vile fact of his did ſo ſtirre vp all the confederates hearts againſt him, that they came to beſiege him in BIZANTIVM vnder the conduction of Cimon: from whõ notwithſtanding he eſcaped, and ſecretly ſaued him ſelfe. And becauſe that this maidens ſpirite would neuer let him reſt, but vexed him continually: he fled vnto the city of HERACLEA, where there was a temple that coniured dead ſpirites, and there was the ſpirite of Cleonice coniured to pray her to be contented. So ſhee appeared vnto him, and told him that he ſhould be deliuered of all his troubles ſo ſoone as he came to SPARTA: ſignifying thereby (in my opinion) the death which he ſhould ſuffer there. Diuers writers doe thus report it. Cimon being accompanied with the confederates of the GRECIANS, which were come to him to take his part: was aduertiſed that certaine great men of PERSIA, & allied to the king him ſelf, who kept the city of EIONE, vpon the riuer of Strymon in the country of THRACIA, did great hurt and damage vnto the GRECIANS inhabiting thereabouts. Vpon which intelligence he tooke the ſea with his armie, and went thither, where at his firſt comming he vanquiſhed and ouerthrew the barbarous people in battell: & hauing ouerthrowen them, draue all the reſt into the citie of EIONE. That done, he went to inuade the THRACIANS that dwelt on the other ſide of the riuer of Strymon, who did commonly victuall them of EIONE: and hauing driuen them to forſake the countrie, he kept it, and was Lord of the whole himſelfe. Whereupon he held them that were beſieged at EIONE ſo ſtraightly from victuals, that Butes the king of PERSIAES Lieutenant, diſpairing of the ſtate of the citie, ſet fire on the ſame, and burnt himſelfe, his friendes, and all the goods it in. By reaſon wherefore, the ſpoile taken in that citie was but ſmall, becauſe the barbarous people burnt all the beſt things in it with themſelues: howbeit he conquered the countrie thereabouts, and gaue it the ATHENIANS to inhabite, being a very pleaſant and fertile ſoyle. In memorie whereof, the people of ATHENS ſuffered him to conſecrate and ſet vp openly three Hermes of ſtone (which are foure ſquare pillers) vpon the tops of the which they ſet vp heades of Mercurie: vpon the firſt of the three pillers, this inſcription is grauen.

Now, though Cimons name be not compriſed in theſe inſcriptions, yet they thought that this was a ſingular honor to him at that time: for neither Miltiades nor Themiſtocles had euer the like. For when Miltiades requeſted the people one day that they would licence him to weare a garland of oliue boughes vpon his head: there was one Sochares, borne in the towne of DECELEA, that ſtanding vp in open aſſembly ſpake againſt him, and ſaid a thing that marueillouſly pleaſed the people, though indeede it was an vnthankfull recompence for the good ſeruice he had done to the common wealth. When you haue Miltiades (ſaid he) ouercome the barbarous people alone in battell, then aſke to be honoured alone alſo. But how was it then, that Cimons ſeruice was ſo acceptable to the ATHENIANS? It was in mine opinion,

becauſe they had with other Captaines fought to defend themſelues and their countrie onely: and that vnder the conduction of Cimon, they had aſſaulted and driuen their enemies home to their owne dores, where they conquered the cities of EIONE and of Amphipolis, which afterwards they did inhabite with their owne citizens, and wan there alſo the Ile of SCYROS, which Cimon tooke vppon this occaſion. The DOLOPIANS did inhabite it, who were idle people, and liued without labour or tillage, and had bene rouers of the ſea of a wonderfull long time, vſing piracie altogether to maintaine themſelues withall: ſo that in the end they ſpared not ſo much as the marchants & paſſengers that harbored in their hauens, but robbed certaine THESSALIANS that went thither to trafficke. And when they had taken their goods from them, yet would they caſt them in priſon beſides. Howbeit the priſoners found meanes to eſcape, and after they had ſaued themſelues, repaired to the parlament of the AMPHICTYONS, which is a generall councell of all the ſtates and people of GRECE. The AMPHICTYONS vnderſtanding the matter, condemned the city of the SCYRIANS to pay a great ſumme of money. The citizens refuſed to be contributaries to the payment of the fine, and bad them that robbed the marchantes and had the goods in their handes, pay it if they would. And therefore, becauſe there was no other likelihood, but that the theeues themſelues ſhould be driuen to anſwere the fine, they fearing it, wrote letters vnto Cimon, and willed him to come with his armie and they would deliuer their citie into his hands: the which was performed. And thus Cimon hauing cõquered this Iland, draue out the DOLOPIANS thence, & rid the ſea ÆGEVM of all pirates thereby. That done, remembring that the ancient Theſeus, the ſonne of AEgeus, flying from ATHENS came into that Iland of SCYROS, where king Lycomedes ſuſpecting his comming had traiterouſly ſlaine him: Cimon was maruellous carefull to ſeeke out his tombe, becauſe the ATHENIANS had an oracle and prophecie, that commaunded them to bring his aſhes and bones backe againe to ATHENS, and to honor him as a demy god. But they knew not where he was buried, for that the inhabitants of the Ilande would neuer before confeſſe where it was, nor ſuffer any man to ſeeke it out, till he at the laſt with much a doe founde the tombe, put his bones abord the Admirall galley ſumptuouſly decked and ſet foorth, and ſo brought them againe into his countrie, foure hundred yeares after Theſeus death. For this, the people thanked him maruellouſly, and therby he wanne exceedingly the ATHENIANS good willes: and in memorie of him they celebrated the iudgement of the tragicall playes of the Poets. For when Sophocles the Poet, being a young man had played his firſt tragedy, Aphepſion the preſident perceiuing there was great ſtriſe and contention amongſt the lookers on, would not drawe them by lottes that ſhould be iudges of this play, to giue the victorie vnto that Poet that had beſt deſerued: but when Cimon & the other Captaines were come into the Theater to ſee the ſame (after they had made their accuſtomed oblations vnto the god, in honor of whom theſe plaies were celebrated) he ſtaied, and made them to miniſter an othe vnto tenne, (which were of euery tribe of the people one) and the othe being giuen, he cauſed them to ſit as iudges to giue ſentence, which of the Poets ſhould carie away the priſe. This made all the Poets ſtriue and contend who beſt ſhould do, for the honour of the iudges: but Sophocles by their ſentence bare away the victorie. But AEſchilus (as they ſay) was ſo angry and grieued withall, that he taried not long after in ATHENS, and went for ſpight into SICILIA, where he died and was buried neere vnto the citie of GELA. Ion writeth that he being but a young boy, newly come from CHIO vnto ATHENS, ſupped one night with Cimon at Laomedons houſe, and that after ſupper when they had giuen the goddes thankes, Cimon was intreated by the company to ſing. And he did ſing with ſo good a grace, that euery man praiſed him that heard him, & ſaid he was more courteous then Themiſtocles farre: who being in like company, and requeſted alſo to play vpon the citherne, anſwered them, hee was neuer taught to ſing nor play vpon the citherne, howbeit he could make a poore village to become a rich and mighty citie. After that done, the company diſcourſing from one matter to an other, as it falleth out commonly in ſpeech, they entred in talke of Cimons doings: and hauing rehearſed the chiefeſt of them, he himſelfe tolde one, which was the notableſt and wiſeſt part of all the reſt that euer he plaied. For the ATHENIANS and their confederates together, hauing taken a great number of barbarous people priſoners, in the cities of SESTOS and of BIZANTIVM:

the confederates to honour him withall, gaue him the preheminence to diuide the ſpoyle amongſt them. Whereupon he made the diuiſion, and ſet out the bodies of the barbarous people all naked by themſelues, and laide the ſpoiles and their apparell by themſelues. The confederates found this diſtribution very vnequall: but neuertheleſſe Cimon gaue them the choice to chooſe which of the two they would, and that the ATHENIANS ſhould be contented with that which they left. So there was a SAMIAN Captaine called Herophytus, that gaue the confederates counſell rather to take the ſpoiles of the PERSIANS, then the PERSIANS themſelues, and ſo they did: for they tooke the ſpoile of the priſoners goods and apparell, and left the men vnto the ATHENIANS. Whereupon Cimon was thought at that time of the cōmon ſouldiers to be but an ill deuider of ſpoile, becauſe that the confederats caried away great ſtore of chains, karkanets, and bracelets of gold, and goodly rich purple apparell after the PERSIAN faſhion: and the ATHENIANS brought away naked bodies of men, very tender and vnacquainted with paine and labour. But ſhortly after, the parentes and friendes of theſe priſoners, came out of PHRYGIA & LYDIA, and redeemed euery man of them at a great ranſome: ſo that Cimon gathered ſuch a maſſe of readie money together by their ranſome, as he defraied the whole charges of all his gallies with the ſame for the ſpace of foure moneths after, and left a great ſumme of money beſides in the ſparing treaſure of ATHENS. Cimon by this meanes being now become rich, beſtowed the goods which he had thus honourably gotten from the barbarous people, more honorably againe, in relieuing his poore decaied citizens. For he brake vp all his hedges and incloſures, and laide them plaine and open, that trauellers paſſing by, and his owne poore citizens, might take as much frute thereof as they would, without any manner danger. And furthermore, kept a continuall table in his houſe, not furniſhed with many diſhes, but with meat ſufficient for many perſons, and where his poore country men were daily refreſhed, that would come vnto that ordinary: ſo as they needed not otherwiſe care to labor for their liuing, but might be the readier, & haue the more leaſure to ſerue the common wealth. Yet Ariſtotle the Philoſopher writeth, that it was not for al the ATHENIANS indifferently, that he kept this ordinarie table: but for his poore townes men only in the village of LACIA, where hee was borne. Furthermore, he had alwaies certaine young men waiting on him of his houſhold ſeruants well apparelled, and if he met by chance as he went vp and downe the citie, any old citizen poorely arrayed, he made one of theſe young men ſtrip himſelfe, and change apparell with the old man: and that was very well thought of, and they all honored him for it. Moreouer, theſe young men caried euer good ſtore of money about them: and when they met with any honeſt poore citizen in the market place, or elſe where, knowing his pouertie, they ſecretly gaue him money in his hand, and ſaid neuer a word. Which the Poet ſelfe Cratinus ſeemeth to ſpeake of, in a comedie of his intituled the Archiloches.

But the magnificence of Cimon, did farre exceede the auncient liberalitie, courteſie, and hoſpitalitie of the ATHENIANS: for they of all other were the firſt men that taught the

GRECIANS through out all GRECE, how they ſhould ſow corne, and gather it to maintaine themſelues withall, and alſo ſhewed them the vſe of wels, and how they ſhould light and keepe fire. But Cimon making an hoſpitall of his owne houſe, where all his poore citizens were fed and relieued, and permitting ſtrangers that trauelled by his groundes to gather ſuch frutes there, as the time and ſeaſon of the yere yeelded: he brought againe (as it were) into the world, the goods to be common amongſt them, as the Poets ſay they were in the olde time of Saturnes raigne. And now, where ſome accuſed this honeſt liberalitie of Cimon, obiecting that it was but to flatter the common people withall, and to winne their good wils by that meanes: the maner of life he led, accompanying his liberalitie, did vtterly confute and ouerthrow their opinions that way of him. For Cimon euer tooke part with the nobilitie, and liued after the LACEDEMONIANS manner, as it well appeared, in that he was alwaies againſt Themiſtocles, who without all compaſſe of reaſon encreaſed the authoritie and power of the people: and for this cauſe he ioyned with Ariſtides, and was againſt Ephialtes, who would for the peoples ſake haue put downe and aboliſhed Ariopagus court. And where all other gouernors in his time were extortioners and bribetakers: (Ariſtides and Ephialtes onely excepted) he to the contrarie led an vncorrupt life in adminiſtration of iuſtice, & euer had cleane hands, whatſoeuer he ſpake or did, for the ſtate and common wealth, and would therefore neuer take money of any man liuing. And for proofe hereof, we finde it written, that a noble man of PERSIA called Reſaces, being a traitor to his maſter the king of PERSIA, fled on a time vnto ATHENS: where being continually bayted and wearied, with the common accuſations of theſe tale bearers and picke thanks, that accuſed him to the people, he repaired at the length vnto Cimon, & brought him home to his owne dore two bowles, the one full of darickes of gold, and the other of darickes of ſiluer, which be peeces of money ſo called, becauſe that the name of Darius was written vpon them. Cimon ſeeing this offer, fell a laughing, and asked him whether of the two he would rather chooſe, to haue him his friend or his hireling. The barbarous noble man anſwered him, that he had rather haue him his friend. Then ſaid Cimon to him againe, away with thy gold and ſiluer, and get thee hence: for if I be thy friend, that gold and ſiluer ſhall euer be at my commaundement, to take and diſpoſe it as I haue neede. About that time beganne the confederates of the ATHENIANS to be weary of the warres againſt the barbarous people, deſiring thenceforth to liue quietly, and to haue leaſure to manure and husband their grounds, and to trafficke alſo, conſidering that they had driuen their enemies out of their countrie, and that now they did them no more hurt: by reaſon whereof they paied the money they were ſeſſed at, but they would furniſh no moe men nor ſhippes as they had done before. But the other Captaines of the ATHENIANS compelled them to it by all the meanes they could, and proſecuted law againſt them that failed paiment, condemning them in great fines, and that ſo cruelly, that they made the ſeigniorie and dominion of the ATHENIANS hatefull vnto their confederates. Howbeit Cimon tooke a contrary courſe to them: for he compelled no man, but was content to take money and voide ſhips of them that would not, or could not ſerue in their perſons, being very glad to ſuffer them to become ſlothfull mongrels in their houſes, by too much reſt, and to tranſpoſe themſelues from good ſouldiers which they had beene, to labourers, marchantes, and farmers, altogether altered from armes and warres, through the beaſtly ſlothfull deſire they had to liue pleaſantly at home. And contrarily, cauſing a great number of the ATHENIANS one after an other to ſerue in gallies, he ſo acquainted them with continuall paines in his viages: that he made them in ſhort ſpace become Lordes and maſters ouer them, that gaue them pay and entertainement. For they beganne by little and litle to flatter and feare the ATHENIANS, whom they ſaw trained continually in the warres, euer bearing armour, & carying their weapons in their hands, becomming expert ſouldiers at their charge, by reaſon of the pay they gaue them: ſo that in the ende, they became ſubiectes and contributaries as it were vnto them, where before they were their friends and companions. So as there neuer was GRECIAN Captaine that bridled more the crueltie and power of that mightie PERSIAN king, then Cimon did. For, after he had driuen him out of all GRECE, he left him not ſo, but following him foot hotte, as we cõmonly ſay, before the barbarous people could take breath, or giue wiſe and direct order for their doings: he made ſo great ſpeede, that he tooke ſome

of their cities from them by force, and other ſome by practiſe, cauſing them to rebell againſt the king, and turne to the GRECIANS ſide. Inſomuch as there was not a man of warre left for the king of PERSIA in all ASIA, from the country of IONIA, directly downe to PAMPHYLIA. And furthermore, being aduertiſed that the kings Captaines were vppon the coaſt of PAMPHYLIA with a great armie by ſea, becauſe he would feare them in ſuch ſort, that they ſhould not braue any more to ſhewe themſelues vppon the ſea, on this ſide of the Iles of the CHELIDONIANS: he departed from the Ile of GINDOS, and from the citie of TRIOPIVM, with two hundred gallies, the which at the firſt had beene excellently well made and deuiſed by Themiſtocles, as well for ſwift ſayling, as for eaſie turning. Howbeit Cimon made them to be enlarged, to the end they might cary the greater number of men of warre in battell, to aſſault the enemies. And ſo went firſt againſt the PHASELITES (who were GRECIANS borne, and yet notwithſtanding would neither take the GRECIANS part, nor receiue their armie into their hauens) landed there, deſtroyed all the country, and then came and camped with his armie hard at their wals. But the men of CHIO being auncient friends of the PHASELITES, and in Cimons armie at that iorney, did ſomewhat pacifie his anger, and gaue aduertiſement to them of the citie of their doings by letters, which they tyed to their arrowes, and ſhot ouer the walles. So as in the end they procured their peace with condition, that the PHASELITES ſhould pay tenne talents for a fine: and furthermore ſhould alſo follow the armie of the GRECIANS, and from thencefoorth fight with them, and for them, againſt the barbarous people. Now Ephorus ſaith, that the PERSIAN Captaine that had charge of the armie by ſea, was called Tithrauſtes, and the Captaine of the armie by lande, Pherendates. But Calliſthenes writeth, that Ariomandes the ſonne of Gobrias, was the kings Lieutenant, hauing chiefe authoritie ouer the whole armie that lay at ancker before the riuer of Eurymedon, and had no deſire to fight, becauſe they looked for a new ſupply of foureſcore ſaile of the PHENICIANS, that ſhould come to them from CYPRVS. But Cimon contrarily, ſought to fight before theſe gallies of the PHENICIANS came to ioyne with them, and put his gallies in order of battell, determining to giue a charge, and compell them to fight, would they, or would they not. Which the barbarous people perceiuing, drew neerer into the mouth of the riuer Eurymedon, becauſe they ſhould not compaſſe them in behinde, nor force them to come to battell againſt their willes. Which notwithſtanding when they ſaw the ATHENIANS come to ſet vpon them where they lay, they made out againſt them a fleete of ſixe hundred ſaile, as Phanodemus declareth: or as Ephorus writeth, three hundred and fiftie ſaile onely. But they did nothing worthie of ſo great a power, at the leaſt touching the fight by ſea, but turned their prores ſtraight to the riuer: where ſuch as could recouer the mouth thereof in time ſaued themſelues, flying to their armie by lande, which was not farre from that place ſet alſo in order of battell. But the reſt that were taken tardie by the way, they were ſlaine, and their gallies ſunke or taken: wherby we may know that there were a great number of them: for many were ſaued as it is likely, and many alſo were ſplitted to peeces, and yet the ATHENIANS tooke two hundred of them priſoners. In the meane ſeaſon, their armie by lande came neerer to the ſea ſide: which Cimon perceiuing, ſtood in ſome doubt whether he ſhould land his men or not, becauſe it ſeemed a hard and dangerous thing vnto him, to lande in ſpight of his enemies: and to put forth the GRECIANS alreadie wearied with the firſt battell againſt the barbarous people, who were altogether whole, freſh, and luſtie, and withall many in number againſt one. Neuertheleſſe, perceiuing that his men truſted in their force, beſides the courage which the firſt victorie gaue them, and that they deſired none other thing but to fight with the enemies: he put them a land while they were whotte yet with the firſt battell. And ſo with great furie and loud cries they ranne immediatly againſt the barbarous people, who ſtood ſtill and ſturred not, and receiued their firſt charge very valiantly: by reaſon whereof, the battell grew ſharpe and bloudy, inſomuch as there were ſlaine all the greateſt perſonages and men of beſt account of all the ATHENIANS armie. But the other fought it out ſo valiantly, that in the ende they wanne the field, and with maruellous difficultie made the barbarous people flie, whereof they ſlew a great number in the place, and tooke the reſt priſoners with all their tents & pauilions, which were full of all ſortes of riches. Thus Cimon like a valiant champion of the holy games, hauing in one ſelfe day wonne two victories, and hauing excelled the battell by ſea alſo which the Grecians had wonne within the channell of Salamina, with that which he wanne then vpon the land: and the battell which the Grecians wanne by land before the citie of Platees, with that which he wan the day before on the ſea: yet he was not contented with all this. For, after two ſo famous victories obteined, he would once againe fight for the honour of the tokens of triumph: and being aduertiſed that the foureſcore ſaile of the Phoenicians (comming too late to be preſent at the firſt battell by ſea) were arriued at the head of Hydra, he ſailed thither with all poſſible ſpeede. Now the Captaines of this fleete, knewe no certaintie of the ouerthrow of their chiefeſt armie, but ſtood in doubt of it, and would not be perſwaded that it was ouerthrowen in that ſort: and therefore were they ſo much the more affraide, when they deſcried a farre off the victorious armie of Cimon. To conclude, they loſt all their ſhips, and the greateſt part of their men, which were either drowned or ſlaine. This victorie againſt the Persians did ſo daunt and plucke downe the pride and loftie minde of the barbarous Persian king, as he made that condition of peace ſo much ſpoken of in auncient hiſtories, in the which he promiſed and ſware, that his armies thenceforth ſhould come no neerer to the Grecian ſea, then the carrere of a horſe, and that he would ſaile no farther forward, then the Iles Chelidonians, and Cyaneans, with any gallies or other ſhips of warre. Howbeit the hiſtoriographer Calliſthenes writeth, that it was no part of any article compriſed within the condition of peace, but that the king kept it for the feare he had of this ſo great an ouerthrowe: and that afterwardes he kept ſo farre from the Grecian ſea, that Pericles with fiftie ſaile, and Ephtaltes with thirtie only, did ſaile beyond the Iles Chelidoniæ, and no barbarous fleete euer came againſt them. Yet notwithſtanding all this, amongſt the common actes of Athens, which Craterus hath gathered together, the articles of this peace are found written at large, as a thing that was true in deede. And it is ſaide, that for this occaſion the Athenians built an aulter of peace, and that they did Callias great honor, for that he was ſent Ambaſſador vnto the king of Persia to take his othe for cōfirmation of this peace. So when all theſe ſpoiles of the enemies were ſold to thē that would giue moſt, there was ſuch ſtore of gold and ſiluer in the ſparing coffers of their treaſurie, that there was enough to ſerue their turne for any ſeruice they would employ it to, & beſides that, they had ſufficient to build vp the ſide of the wall of the caſtle which looketh towardes the ſouth, this voyage and great ſpoyle did ſo enrich them. And it is ſaide moreouer, that the building of the long walles that ioyne to the citie with the hauen, which they call the legges, was built & finiſhed afterwards: howbeit the firſt foundations therof were built with the money Cimon gaue towardes it, for that the worke met with mooriſh and waterie places, by meane whereof they were driuen to fill vp the mariſſes, with force of flints and great logges, which they threw vnto the bottome. It was he alſo that firſt did beautifie and ſet forth the citie of Athens, with places of liberall exerciſe and honeſt paſtime, which ſhortly after were much eſteemed. For he cauſed plane trees to be ſet in the market place: and the Academie which before was very dry and naked, he made it now a pleaſant groue, and full of goodly ſprings which he brought into it, and made fine couered arbors to walke in, and goodly long ſmooth allies to runne a good courſe in. On a time he had newes brought him, that certaine Persians dwelling in Cherronesus (to ſay a demie Ile of the country of Thracia) would not be gotten out, but ſent to the people of high Thracia, to pray their aide to defende themſelues againſt Cimon: of whom they made but litle account, becauſe he was departed from Athens with a very fewe ſhippes, who ſet vpon them only with foure gallies, and tooke thirteene of theirs. And ſo hauing driuen the Persians out of Cherronesus, and ſubdued the Thracians, he conquered all the country of Cherronesus, from Thracia vnto his own country. And departing from thence, went againſt them of the Ile of Thasos, that had rebelled againſt the Athenians: and hauing ouercome them in battell by ſea, he wanne three and thirtie of their ſhippes, and beſides that tooke their citie by ſiege, and wanne the mines of golde lying beyonde the ſame to the Athenians, with all the landes that belonged vnto them. This conqueſt made his way open into Macedon, and gaue him great oportunitie to haue taken the beſt part therof at that preſent time. But becauſe he let it alone, and followed not that oportunitie, he was ſuſpected to haue taken money, and to haue bene bribed by preſents of king Alexander: whereupon, his ſecret enemies layd their heades together, and accuſed him. But Cimon to cleare himſelfe before the iudges of this accuſation, ſayd vnto them: I haue practiſed friendſhip neither with the IONIANS, nor yet with the THESSALIANS, both which are very rich and wealthy people: neither haue I taken their matters in hand, as ſome other haue done, to receiue both honour and profit by them. But indeede I am a friend to the LACEDÆMONIANS, for I confeſſe I loue them, and deſire to follow their ſobrietie, and temperance of life, the which I preferre and eſteeme aboue any riches or treaſure: although I am very glad notwithſtanding to enrich our ſtate and common wealth with the ſpoyles of our enemies. Steſimbrotus reporteth this accuſation, and ſayth: that his ſiſter Elpinicè went to Pericles houſe, (who was the ſharpeſt and ſtraighteſt accuſer of his) to pray him not to deale ſo extremely with her brother: & that Pericles laughing on her, ſayd, alas, thou art too old, Elpinicè, thou, now to ouercome theſe matters. Yet for all that, when Cimons cauſe came to hearing, he was a more gentle aduerſarie, then any other of his accuſers, and roſe vp but once to ſpeake againſt him, and that for manners ſake onely: ſo that Cimon thereby eſcaped, and was cleared of this accuſation. And furthermore, ſo long as he was preſent in ATHENS, he alwayes kept the ſeditious people in obedience, who would euer croſſe and thwart the authoritie of the nobilitie, becauſe they would haue all the ſway and rule in their owne handes. But when Cimon was ſent abroad any whither to the warres, then the common people hauing no body to gaineſay them, turned, and altered the gouernement of the citie topſie turuey, and confounded all the ancient lawes and cuſtomes which they had obſerued of long time, and that by the procurement and ſetting on of Ephialtes. For they tooke away all hearing of cauſes in manner from the court of * Areopagus, and put all authoritie of matters iudiciall into the hands of the people, & brought the ſtate of the citie into a pure Democratia, to ſay, a common weale ruled by the ſole and abſolute power of the people, Pericles being then in great credit, who altogether fauoured the peoples faction. Wherefore Cimon at his returne, finding the authority of the Senate and councell ſo ſhamefully defaced & troden vnder foote, was marueilouſly offended withall, & ſought to reſtore the ancient ſtate of iudgement againe as it was before, and ſet vp the gouernement of the nobilitie (called Optimatia) that was eſtabliſhed in the time of Cliſthenes. But thē began his enemies againe with open mouth to cry out vpon him, reuiuing the old former naughtie rumour that ranne of him before, that he kept his owne ſiſter: and furthermore accuſing him, that he did fauour the LACEDÆMONIANS. And amongſt other things there ranne in the peoples mouthes the verſes of the Poët Eupolis, which were made againſt Cimon.

And if it be ſo, that being thus negligent and giuen to wine, he haue gotten ſo many cities, and wonne ſuch ſundry great battels: it is out of doubt then that if he had bene ſober and carefull, there had neuer bene before him nor ſince any GRECIAN Captaine, that had paſſed him in glory of the warres. Indeede it is true, that from the beginning he euer loued the manner of the LACEDÆMONIANS: for of two twynnes which he had by his wife Clitoria, he named the one of them Lacedæmonius, and the other Eleus, as Steſimbrotus writeth, ſaying that for that cauſe Pericles did euer twit them in the teeth with their mothers ſtocke. Howbeit Diodorus the Geographer writeth, that both thoſe two, and an other third called Theſſalus, were borne of Iſodice, the daughter of Euryptolemus, the ſonne of Megacles. Howſoeuer it was, it is certaine that Cimons credit grew the greater, by the fauour and contenaunce which the LACEDÆMONIANS gaue him, who had hated Themiſtocles of long time, and for the malice they bare him, were glad that Cimon being but a yoũg man, did beare more ſway in ATHENS thē he. Which the ATHENIANS perceiued well enough, and were not offended withall at the beginning: becauſe the good will of the LACEDÆMONIANS towardes him, did bring them great commodity. For when the ATHENIANS began to grow of great power, and to practiſe ſecretly that the confederats of the GRECIANS ſhould forſake the LACEDÆMONIANS to ioyne with them: the LACEDÆMONIANS were not angry withall, for the honour and loue they bare vnto Cimon, who did alone in manner manage all the affaires of GRECE at that time, becauſe he was very curteous vnto the confederates, and alſo thankefull vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS. But afterwardes when the ATHENIANS were aloft and of great power, and that they ſaw Cimon ſtucke not for a litle matter with the LACEDÆMONIANS, but loued them more thē they would haue had him: they began then to enuie him, becauſe in all his matters he had to do, he euer highly praiſed and extolled the LACEDÆMONIANS before them. But ſpecially, when he would reproue them of any fault they had committed, or that he would perſwade them to do any thing: the LACEDÆMONIANS, ſayd he, I warrant ye do not ſo. That, as Steſimbrotus ſayth, made him maruellouſly to be maliced of the people. But the chiefeſt thing they accuſed him of, and that moſt did hurt him, fell out vpon this occaſion. The fourth yeare of the raigne of Archidamus, the ſonne of Zeuxidamus king of SPARTA, there fortuned the wonderfulleſt and moſt fearefull earthquake in the citie of LACEDÆMON, and there abouts, that euer was heard of. For the earth in many places of the country opened, and fell as into a bottomleſſe pit. The mountaine Taygetum ſhooke ſo terribly, that points of rockes fell downe from it. All the citie was layed on the ground and ouerthrowen, fiue houſes onely excepted, the reſt being wholly deſtroyed. And it is ſayd alſo, that a litle before this earthquake came, the young men of that citie were playing with the young boyes exerciſing thēſelues ſtarke naked vnder a great galery couered ouer: and as they were ſporting together, there ſtarted vp a hare hard by thē. The young men ſpying her, ranne after the hare ſtarke naked and oyled as they were, with great laughter. They were no ſooner gone thence, but the top of the gallery fell down vpō the boyes that were left, and ſquaſhed them all to death. And in memorie of the ſame, the tombe where they were afterwardes buried, is called vnto this day Siſmatias, as much to ſay, as the tombe of thoſe which the earthquake had ſlaine. But king Archidamus foreſeeing ſtraight vpō the ſodaine the danger that was to come, by that he ſaw preſent, perceiuing his citizens buſie in ſauing their houſhold ſtuffe, and that they were running out of their houſes: made the trumpetters to ſound a hot alarome vpon it, as if their enemies had come ſtealingly vpon them to take the citie, to the end that all the inhabitants ſhould preſently repayre vnto him (ſetting all buſineſſe apart) with armour and weapon. That ſodaine alarome doubtleſſe ſaued the citie of SPARTA at that time: for the ILOTÆ, which are their ſlaues and bondmen in the country of LACONIA, and the country clownes of litle villages there abouts, came running armed out of all parts, to ſpoyle and robbe them vpon the ſodaine, that were eſcaped from this earthquake. But when they found them well armed in order of battell, they returned backe againe as they came: and then began afterwardes to make open warres vpon them, when they had drawen certaine of their neighbours vnto their confederacie, and ſpecially the MESSENIANS, who made hot warres vpon the SPARTANS. Whereupon the LACEDÆMONIANS ſent Periclidas vnto ATHENS to demande ayde: whom Ariſtophanes the Poët mocking, ſayd.

VVith viſage pale and wanne, he on the aulter ſate,
In ſkarlet gowne requiring ayde, to ſuccour their eſtate.

Againſt whom Ephialtes alſo ſpake very much, proteſting that they ſhould not aide nor relieue a city that was an enemy vnto ATHENS, but rather ſuffer it to fall to the ground, and to ſpurne the pride and arrogancy of SPARTA vnder their feete. But Cimon (as Cricias ſayth) being more carefull for the benefit of SPARTA, then for the enlarging & encreaſing of his country: brought it to paſſe by his perſwaſion, that the ATHENIANS ſent him thither with a great power to helpe them. And furthermore Ion rehearſeth the very ſelfe wordes that Cimon ſpake to moue the people to graunt his requeſt. For he beſought them that they would not ſuffer GRECE to halt, as if LACEDÆMON had bene one of her feete, and ATHENS the other: not to ſuffer their citie to loſe an other citie their friend, and ſubiect to the yoke and defence of GRECE. Hauing therfore obteined ayde, to lead vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, he went with his army through the CORINTHIANS country: wherewith Lachartus a Captaine of CORINTHE was maruellouſly offended, ſaying, that he ſhould not haue entred into their country with an army, before he had asked licence of thē of the citie. For ſayd he, when one knocketh at a mans doore or gate, yet he commeth not in, before the maiſter of the houſe commandeth

him. But ye CORINTHIANS (ſayd Cimon to him againe) haue not knocked at the gates of the CLEONÆIANS, nor of the MEGARIANS, to come in, but haue broken them open, and entred by force of armes, thinking that all ſhould be open vnto them that are the ſtronger. Thus did Cimon ſtoutly aunſwere the CORINTHIAN Captaine againe, becauſe it ſtood him vpon, and ſo went on with his army through the country of CORINTHE. Afterwardes the LACEDÆMONIANS ſent againe vnto the ATHENIANS, to require ayde againſt the MESSENIANS and the ILOTES, (which are their ſlaues) who had wonne the citie of ITHOME. But when the ATHENIANS were come, the LACEDÆMONIANS were afrayd of the great power they had brought, and of their boldneſſe beſides: wherefore they ſent them backe againe, and would not imploy them of all other their confederats that came to their ſuccour, becauſe they knew them to be men very tickle, deſiring change and alterations. The ATHENIANS returned home, miſliking much that they were ſent backe againe, in ſomuch as euer after they hated thē that fauoured the LACEDÆMONIANS in any thing. And for the LACEDÆMONIANS ſake therefore, taking a ſmall occaſion of offence againſt Cimon, they baniſhed him out of their country for ten yeares: which was the full terme appointed and limited vnto them that were baniſhed with the Oſtraciſmon baniſhment. Now within the terme of theſe ten yeares, the LACEDÆMONIANS fortuned to vndertake the deliuery of the city of DELPHES, from the ſeruitude and bondage of the PHOCIANS, and to put them from the cuſtodie and keeping of the temple of Apollo, which is in the ſayd city. Wherfore, to obtaine their deſire and purpoſe, they came to plant their camp neare vnto the citie of TANAGRE in PHOCIDE, where the ATHENIANS went to fight with them. Cimon vnderſtanding this, although he was in exile, came to the ATHENIANS camp armed, with intent to do his duety to fight with his country men againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS, and ſo went into the bandes of the tribe Oeneide, of the which he was himſelfe. But his owne country enemies cried out againſt him, and ſayd, that he was come to none other end, but to trouble the order of their battell, of intent that he might afterwardes bring them to the citie ſelfe of ATHENS. Whereupon the great councell of the fiue hundred men were afrayed, and ſent to the Captaines to commaund them they ſhould not receiue him into the battell: ſo that Cimon was compelled to depart the camp. But before he went, he prayed Euthippus ANAPHLYSTIAN, and his other friends that were ſuſpected as himſelfe was to fauour the LACEDÆMONIANS doings: that they ſhould do their beſt endeuour to fight valiantly againſt their enemies, to the intent their good ſeruice at that battell might purge their innocencie towardes their country men: and ſo they did. For the ATHENIANS keeping the ſouldiers Cimon had brought with him, which were a hundred in all, they ſet them apart by themſelues in a ſquadron, and fought it ſo valiantly and deſperatly, that they were ſlaine euery man of them in the field, leauing the ATHENIANS maruellous ſory for them, & repenting thē that they had ſo vniuſtly miſtruſted them as traitours to their country. Wherefore they kept not their malice long againſt Cimon, partly as I am perſwaded, becauſe they called his former good ſeruice to minde which he had done to their country aforetime, and partly alſo, becauſe the neceſsitie of the time ſo required it. For the ATHENIANS hauing loſt a great battell before TANAGRE, looked for no other about the ſpring of the yeare, but that the PELOPONNESIANS would inuade them with a great power: wherefore they reuoked Cimons baniſhmēt by decree, wherof Pericles ſelf was the onely authour & procurer. So ciuill and temperat were mens enmities at that time, regarding the common benefit of their publicke ſtate and weale: and ſo much did their ambition (being the moſt vehement paſsion of all other, & that moſt troubleth mens mindes) giue place, and yeeld to the neceſsities & affaires of the common weale. Now when Cimon was againe returned to ATHENS, he ſtraight pacified the warre, and reconciled both cities together. And when he ſaw that the ATHENIANS could not liue in peace, but would be doing ſtill, and enlarge their dominions by warre, for lucres ſake: to preuent them that they ſhould not fall out with any of the GRECIANS, nor by ſcouring and coaſting vp & downe the country of PELOPONNESVS, and the Iles of GRECE, with ſo great a nauie, ſhould moue occaſion of ciuill warres amongſt the GRECIANS, or of complaints vnto their confederates againſt them: he rigged & armed out two hundred gallies to go againe to make warre in CYPRVS, and in EGYPT, becauſe he would acquaint the ATHENIANS with the warres of the barbarous people, and thereby make them lawfull gainers by the ſpoyles of thoſe their naturall borne enemies. But when all things were in readineſſe to depart, and the army preſt to ſhip & ſayle away: Cimon dreaming in the night had this viſion. It ſeemed vnto him that he ſaw a bitch angry with him, and barking earneſtly at him, and that in the middeſt of her barking, ſhe ſpake with a mans voyce, and ſayd vnto him:

Come hardely, ſpare not for if thou come by me,
My whelpes, and I which here do ſtand, will quickely welcome thee.

Cimons death kept verie ſecret.

This viſion being very hard to interpret, Aſtyphilus borne in the citie of POSIDONIA, a man expert in ſuch coniectures, and Cimons familiar friend, told him that this viſion did betoken his death, expounding it in this ſort. The dogge commonly is an enemie to him he barketh at. Againe, nothing gladdeth our enemie more, then to heare of our death. Furthermore, the mingling of a mans voyce with the barking of a bitch, ſignifieth nothing elſe, but an enemie of the MEDES: becauſe the armie of the MEDES is mingled with the barbarous people and the GRECIANS together. Beſides this viſion, as he did ſacrifice to the god Bacchus, the Prieſt opening the beaſt after it was ſacrificed, about the bloud that fell to the ground, there aſſembled a ſwarme of antes, which caried the congealed bloud off from the ground by litle and litle, and layed it all about Cimons great toe, a great while together before any man marked it: Cimon at the laſt ſpyed it by chance, and as he was looking on them to marke what they did, the miniſter of the ſacrifice brought the beaſtes liuer that was ſacrificed, to ſhew him, whereof the biggeſt end that they call the head was lacking, and this they iudged for a very ill token. Notwithſtanding, hauing all things ready for preparation of this iourney, ſo as he could not well go backe, he launched into the ſea, and hoyſed ſayle, and ſending threeſcore of his gallies into EGYPT, ſayled with the reſt vpon the coaſt of PAMPHYLIA. Where he wanne a battell by ſea of the king of PERSIA, ouercomming the gallies of the PHENICIANS and the CILICIANS, & conquered all the cities thereabouts, making the way very open to enter into EGYPT. For he had no ſmall thoughtes in his minde, but reached to high enterpriſes, and determined vtterly to deſtroy the whole Empire of the mighty king of PERSIA, and ſpecially for that he vnderſtood Themiſtocles was in maruellous credit and reputation amongſt the barbarous people, becauſe he had promiſed the king of PERSIA to lead his armie for him, and to do him notable ſeruice whenſoeuer he ſhould haue occaſion to warre with the GRECIANS. It is thought this was the chiefe cauſe that made Themiſtocles poyſon himſelfe, becauſe he deſpaired that he could not performe that ſeruice againſt GREC which he had promiſed: aſſuring himſelfe that it was no eaſie matter to vanquiſh Cimons courage and good fortune, who lay at that time with his army all alongſt the Ile of CYPRVS, promiſing himſelfe great matters at that inſtant. But in the meane ſeaſon, Cimon ſent certaine of his men vnto the oracle of Iuppiter Ammon, to aske him ſome ſecret queſtion: for no man euer knew neither then nor ſince, for what cauſe he had ſent them thither, neither did they alſo bring backe any aunſwere. For they were no ſooner come thither, but the oracle commanded them ſtraight to returne: ſaying vnto them, that Cimon was then comming to him. So Cimons men receiuing this anſwere, left the oracle, and tooke their iourney backe to the ſeawardes. Now when they were come againe to the GRECIANS camp, which at that preſent lay in EGYPT, they heard that Cimon was departed this world: and reckoning the dayes ſince his death, with the inſtant of their aunſwere receiued by the oracle, that Cimon was then comming vnto him: they knew ſtraight that darkely he had ſignified his death vnto them, and that, at that very time he was with the goddes. He dyed at the ſiege of the citie of CITIVM in CYPRVS, as ſome report, or elſe of a hurt he receiued at a skirmiſh, as other hold opinion. When he dyed, he commanded them that were vnder his charge, to returne into their country againe, and in no caſe to publiſh his death: which commaundement was ſo wiſely and cunningly handled, that they all came home ſafe, and not an enemie, nor any of their confederates that once vnderſtood any thing of it. So was the army of the GRECIANS gouerned and led by Cimon, though himſelfe was dead, the ſpace of thirtie dayes, as Phanodemus writeth: But after his death, there was no GRECIAN Captaine that did any notable thing worthy of fame againſt the barbarous people, becauſe the Oratours & gouernours of the chiefeſt cities of GRECE ſtirred them vp one againſt an other, and there was no man that would once ſtep in as a mediatour to make peace betweene them. And thus the GRECIANS now did one deſtroy and ſpoyle an other by ciuill warre amongſt themſelues: which happely gaue the king of PERSIA leaſure and time to reſtore himſelfe againe, and contrarily was cauſe of ſuch vtter ruine and deſtruction of the whole power and force of GRECE, as no toung can well expreſſe. Indeede a long time after, king Ageſilaus came with an armie of the GRECIANS into ASIA, and began a ſmall warre againſt the Lieutenants of the king of PERSIAES gouernours of the lower coũtryes of ASIA. But before he could do any notable exploit, he was called home againe by occaſion of new troubles and ciuill warres riſing among the GRECIANS, and compelled to returne into his country, leauing the treaſurers of the king of PERSIA, raiſing of ſubſidies and taxes vpon the cities of the GRECIANS in ASIA, although they were confederates of the LACEDÆMONIANS. Whereas in the time that Cimon gouerned, they neuer ſaw any of the kings ſergeants at armes, or commiſsioner, that brought any letters pattents or commaundement from the king, or any ſouldier that durſt come neare the ſea, by fortie furlongs. The tombes which they call vnto this preſent day Cimonia, do witneſſe that his aſhes and bones were brought vnto ATHENS. Neuertheleſſe, they of the citie of CITIVM do honour a certaine tombe, which they ſay is Cimons tombe: becauſe that in a great dearth and barennes of the earth, they had an oracle that commanded them, not to neglect Cimon, as the Oratour Nauſicrates writeth it, but to honour and reuerence him as a god. Such was the life of this GRECIAN Captaine.

Lucius Lucullus.

AS for Lucullus, his grandfather was a Conſull, & ſo was Metellus (ſurnamed Numidicus, becauſe of his cõqueſt of NVMIDIA) his vncle by the mothers ſide. His father notwithſtanding was conuict of fellony, for robbing the treaſure of the ſtate whileſt he was officer: and Cæcilia his mother was reported to haue led an vnchaſt life. But for Lucullus ſelfe, before he bare office, or rule in matters of ſtate: the firſt thing he touched and tooke in hand for the cauſe of his country was, the accuſation of Seruilius the ſoothſayer (who before had accuſed his father ) for that he alſo had dealt falſly in his office, and deceaued the common wealth. And this the ROMAINES thought very well handled of him, in ſomuch as a pretie while after there was no other talke in ROME but of that matter, as though it had bene a notable valiant act done by him. For otherwiſe, though priuatly they had no iuſt occaſion, yet they thought it a noble deede to accuſe the wicked, and it pleaſed them as much to ſee the young men put law-breakers in ſute, as to ſee a notable good courſe of a dogge at a hare. Howbeit there followed ſuch ſturre and banding vpon this ſute, that ſome were very ſore hurt, and other ſlaine in the market place: but in fine, Seruilius was cleared and quite diſmiſſed. Lucullus was very eloquent, well ſpoken, and excellently well learned in the Geeeke and Latin toung: in ſomuch as Sylla dedicated vnto him the commentaries of all his doings which himſelfe had collected, as to one that could better frame a whole hiſtorie thereof, and couche it more eloquently together in writing. For he had not onely a ready toung to vtter that he would ſpeake, and pleade his matters with great eloquence, as other be ſeene to do, hauing matters of ſute or open audience.

For Lucullus had ſtudied humanitie from his youth, and was well learned in all the liberall ſciences: but when he came to elder yeares, to refreſh his wit ( after great troubles) he fell to the ſtudy of Philoſophie, which quickened the contemplatiue part of his ſoule, and mortified, or at the leaſt betimes bridled the ambitious and actiue part, ſpecially after the diſſention betwixt him and Pompey. But to acquaint you better with his learning yet, it is ſayd, that when he was a young man, he layed a great wager with Hortenſius the Oratour, and Siſenna the hiſtoriographer (in ieſt as it were at the firſt, but afterwardes it fell to good earneſt,) that he would write the breuiary of the warres of MARSICVM in verſe or proſe, in the Latin or Greeke toung, which ſoeuer fell to his lot: and I thinke his hap was to do it in proſe in the Greeke toung, becauſe we finde a litle Greeke ſtorie extant of the warres of the ROMAINES againſt the MARSIANS. He dearely loued his brother Marcus Lucullus, as appeared by many manifeſt proofes: but the chiefeſt & moſt noted proofe among the ROMAINES was this. Himſelfe was elder then his brother Marcus, and yet for all that would neuer ſue to beare office in the common wealth, nor accept any before his brother, but taried alwayes till he ſhould be choſen, and let his own time paſſe ouer. This great curteſie to his brother ſo wanne the peoples harts, as Lucius being abſent, they choſe him Ædilis, and his brother Marcus with him for his ſake. He was in the flower of his youth in the time of the MARSIANS wars, wherein he did many wiſe and valiant deedes. The cauſe notwithſtanding that moued Sylla to make choice of him, was rather for his conſtancy, and good curteous nature, then for any other reſpect. For when Sylla had once wonne him, he euer after employed him continually in his moſt waightie cauſes: as in a commiſsion ſpecially, he gaue him to coyne money. For indeede part of the money that Sylla ſpent in the warres againſt king Mithridates, was coyned by Lucullus commandement within the country of PELOPONNESVS: whereupon they were called Lucullian peeces, and were currant a long time amongſt the ſouldiers, to buy ſuch things as they ſtood in neede of, and neuer refuſed by any. Sylla being afterwards at ATHENS, the ſtronger by land, but the weaker by ſea, ſo as his enemies cut off his victuals from him: ſent Lucullus into EGYPT and LYBIA to bring him ſuch ſhippes as he found in thoſe parts. It was in the deepe of winter, and yet he ſpared not to ſayle with three brigantines of GRECE, and as many galliots of the RHODIANS, putting himſelfe not onely to the danger of the ſea in ſo long a voyage, but of his enemies in like maner: who knowing themſelues to be the ſtronger, went ſayling euery where with a great nauie. But for all theſe dangers, he firſt arriued in the Ile of CRETA, & wanne their good wils. From thence went to the citie of CYRENE, where he found the inhabitants turmoyled with ciuill warres, and continuall oppreſsions of tyrants: from which troubles he deliuered them, and gaue them lawes to eſtabliſh gouernement amongſt them; putting them in remembrance of Platoes words ſpoken to their aunceſters in olde time, in the ſpirite of a prophecie. For when they praied Plato to write them lawes, and to appoint them ſome forme of gouernment for their commonwealth, he made them anſwere: it was a hard thing to giue lawes to ſo riche and fortunate people as they were. For to ſay truely, as nothing is harder to be ruled, then a rich man: ſo contrarily, nothing readier to receiue counſell and gouernment, then a man in aduerſitie. This leſſon framed the CYRENIANS at that time to be more ciuill and obedient to the lawes Lucullus gaue them. When he departed thence, he coaſted towardes EGYPT, where he loſt the more parte of his ſhips by pyrates: but for his owne perſon, ſcaping their hands, he was very honorably receiued in the citie of ALEXANDRIA. For all the kings armie came to meete him at ſea, gallantly trimmed and appointed, as they were wont to welcome home the king when he returned from any voyage by ſea: and king Ptolomy himſelfe being very young at that time, gaue him as honourable entertainment as he poſſible could. For amongſt other honours that he did him, he lodged him in his courte, and defraied his ordinarie diet, where neuer ſtrange Captaine was lodged before: and did not onely ſpend the ordinary allowance in feaſting of him which he vſed vnto others, but commanded foure times as much prouiſion more to be made as he had before. Notwithſtanding, Lucullus tooke no more then reaſonable was for his perſon: nor yet would he receiue any maner of gift, although the king had ſent him preſents to the value of foureſcore talents. And which more is, would not ſo much as go ſee the citie of MEMPHIS, nor any other of the famous monuments and wonderfull ſights in EGYPT, ſaying: that it was for a man that trauelled vp and downe for his pleaſure, and had leiſure withall, to ſee ſuch things, but not for him that had left his Captaine in the fielde, at the ſiege of the walles of his enemies. To conclude, this young king Ptolomy would in no caſe fall in friendſhip with Sylla, fearing leaſt he ſhould thereby put himſelfe into warres: but gaue him men and ſhips to bring him into CYPRVS. And as he was ready to imbarke, the king bidding him farewell, and embracing him, gaue him a goodly rich emerode ſet in golde, which Lucullus at the firſt refuſed, vntill the king ſhewed him his picture grauen in it: and then accepted the gift, fearing leaſt the vtter refuſall might cauſe the king thinke he went away diſcontented, and ſhould perhaps therefore lay an ambuſh by ſea for him. Thus hauing gotten a certaine number of ſhips together of the porte townes thereabouts, ouer and beſides ſuch as the Pyrates and ſea-rouers had hidden, being parte of their ſpoiles, and beſtowed with their receitors, went on with them into CYPRVS, where he vnderſtood that his enemies laye cloſe in certaine creekes vnder the foreland, watching to bourde him as he ſailed by. Whereupon he vnrigged and beſtowed his ſhips in docks, and ſent word to all the port townes thereabouts, that he was determined to winter there: and therefore willed them to prouide him victuals and other neceſſarie munition to be in readineſſe againſt the ſpring. But in the meane while, when he ſaw time conuenient, he put his whole fleete againe to the ſea with all poſſible ſpeede, went himſelfe away, and in the day time caried a lowe ſaile, but in the night packt on all the cloath he could for life: ſo that by this craftie fetche, he wanne RHODES, and loſt not one ſhip. The RHODIANS they alſo furniſhed him with ſhips: and beſides them, he ſo perſwaded the GNIDIANS and the inhabitants of the Ile of CO, that they forſooke king Mithridates, and went to make wars with him againſt them of the Ile of SAMOS. But Lucullus himſelfe alone draue king Mithridates men out of CHIO, reſtored the COLOPHONIANS againe to libertie: and tooke Epigonus the tyrant priſoner, who had kept them in bondage. Nowe about that time, Mithridates was compelled to forſake the citie of PERGAMVM, and to retire to the citie PITANE, within the which Fimbria kept him beſieged very ſtraightly by lande. Wherefore Mithridates hauing the ſea open vpon him, ſent for his force and Nauie out of all partes, not daring to hazard battell againſt Fimbria, who was very valiant, of a venturous nature, and at that time moreouer was himſelfe a conqueror. Fimbria perceiuing what Mithridates meant, and hauing no power by ſea of his owne, ſent ſtraight to Lucullus to requeſt him to come with his nauie into thoſe partes to his aide, for the ouercomming of this king, the greateſt and moſt cruell enemie that euer the ROMAINE people had. Becauſe that ſo notable a prey, which they followed with ſuch danger and trouble, ſhould not eſcape the ROMAINES, while they had him in their hands, and was come himſelfe within their daunger: and that therefore he ſhould ſo much the more hearken vnto it, becauſe that if it fortuned Mithridates to be taken, no man ſhould winne more honour and glory by his taking, then he that had ſtopped his paſſage, and laide hands on him, euen as he thought to haue fled. And thereby ſhould the praiſe of this noble victorie runne in equalitie betweene them both: the one that had driuen him from land, and the other that had ſtopped his paſſage by ſea. And furthermore, that the ROMAINES would nothing regarde all the famous battels and victories of Sylla in GRECE, which he had wonne before the cities of CHÆRONEA and ORCHOMENE: in compariſon of taking the king. This was the effect of Fimbriaes meſſage ſent vnto Lucullus, wherein there was nothing, in the which there was not great likelihood. For there is no man that can doubt of it, but if Lucullus would haue beleeued him at that time (& haue gone thither with his ſhips to ſtop the hauens mouth of the citie, in the which Mithridates was beſieged, conſidering alſo that he was ſo neere at hand) this warre had taken end there, and the worlde beſides had then bene deliuered of infinite troubles which fell out afterwards. But whether Lucullus preferred the conſideration and reſpect he had vnto Sylla, whoſe Lieutenant he was, before all other due regarde of priuate or common benefit: or that he deteſted and abhorred Fimbria as a curſed perſon, who not long before had through his wicked ambition imbrued his handes in the bloud of his Captaine: or elſe, that it was through the ſecret prouidence and permiſſion of the gods, that he ſpared Mithridates at that time, to the end he might be reſerued as a worthy enemy, againſt whom he might afterwardes ſhew his valure. Howſoeuer it was, it ſo fell out that he hearkened not vnto Fimbriaes meſſage, but gaue Mithridates time and leiſure to flie, and finally to ſcorne all Fimbriaes force and power. But Lucullus ſelfe alone afterwards ouercame the kings armie by ſea, once neere vnto the head of Lectum, which is on the coaſt of TROADE; and an other time neere vnto the Ile of TENEDOS, where Neoptolemus, Mithridates Lieutenant by ſea, lay in waite for him with a farre greater number of ſhippes then he had. And yet ſo ſoone as Lucullus had diſcried him, he ſailed before all his nauie being Admirall, in a galley of the RHODES, at fiue ores to a bancke, whereof one Demagoras was maiſter, a man well affected to the ſeruice of the ROMAINES, and very ſkilfull in battell by ſea. And when Neoptolemus on the other ſide rowed againſt him with great force, commanding his pylot that he ſhould ſo order his galley, that he might ſtemme him right in the prowe: Demagoras fearing the full meeting of the kings galley which was very ſtrong and heauie, and furthermore well armed with pointes and ſpurres of braſſe before, durſt not encounter her with his prowe, but nimbly made his galley to winde about, & turned his poupe towards him. Whereby the galley being low at that end, receiued the blowe without hurt, conſidering that they hit vppon the dead workes, and thoſe partes which are alwaies aboue water. In the meane time Lucullus other ſhips were come, who commanding his maiſter to turne the beakehead of his galley forward, did many famous actes: ſo that he made his enemies flie, and draue Neoptolemus away. And departing from thence, went to ſeeke out Sylla euen as he was ready to paſſe ouer the ſeas, about CHERRONESVS: holpe him to wafte his armie, and ſo paſſed him ouer with ſafetie. Afterwards when peace was concluded, and that king Mithridates was come into his realme and countries againe, which lie vpon the ſea Maior: Sylla condemned the prouince of ASIA to pay the ſumme of twenty thouſand talents for a fine, by reaſon of their rebellion. And for leauying of this fine, left Lucullus there with commiſſion to coine money: which was a great comforte and hearts eaſe vnto the cities of ASIA, conſidering the extremitie that Sylla had vſed towards them. For in ſo grieuous and odious a commiſſion vnto them all, as that was: Lucullus did not onely behaue himſelfe vprightly and iuſtly, but alſo very fauorably and courteouſly. For, as touching the MITYLENIANS that were opely in armes againſt him, he was very willing they ſhould know their fault, and that for ſatisfaction of the offence they had committed taking Marius part, they ſhould ſuffer ſome light puniſhment. And ſeeing that they were furiouſlie bent to continue in their naughtineſſe, he went againſt them, and hauing ouercome them in battell, compelled them to keepe within their walles, and laide ſiege vnto their citie, where he vſed this policie with them. At noone dayes he lanched into the ſea, in the view of all the MITYLENIANS, & ſailed towards the citie of ELEA: howbeit in the night time ſecretly returned backe, and making no noiſe, laide an ambuſh neere vnto the citie. The MITYLENIANS miſtruſting nothing, went out the next morning very raſhly without order, & without any maner watch or ward, to ſpoile the camp of the ROMAINES, ſuppoſing euery man had bene gone: but Lucullus comming ſodainly vpon them, tooke a great number priſoners, ſlue about fiue hundred ſuch as reſiſted, and wanne ſixe thouſand ſlaues, with an infinite quantitie of other ſpoile. Now did the goddes happely preſerue Lucullus, that he was no partaker at that time of the wonderfull miſeries and troubles, which Sylla and Marius made poore ITALIE ſuffer, euen then when he was occupied in the warres of ASIA: and yet notwithſtanding his abſence, he was in as good credit and fauor with Sylla, as any of his friends about him. For as we haue ſaid before, he dedicated his commentaries vnto him, for the goodwill he bare him, and by his laſt will and teſtament appointed him Tutor vnto his ſonne, leauing Pompey out: which ſeemeth to be the firſt occaſion of the quarrell and grudge that fell out afterwards betweene them, becauſe they were both young men, and vehemently deſirous of honour. Shortly after the death of Sylla, Lucullus was choſen Conſull with Marcus Cotta, about the three ſcore Olympiade: and then they began to reuiue the matter againe, that it was very needfull to make warres againſt Mithridates, and ſpecially Marcus Cotta, who gaue out that it was not ended, but only ſlept for a while. Wherefore, when the Conſuls came to drawe lots what prouinces they ſhould take charge of, Lucullus was maruellous ſorie that the prouince of GAVLE, lying betweene the Alpes and ITALIE, fell to his lot: becauſe he thought it no countrie wherein any great exploits were to be done: and againe, the glory of Pompey grieued him greatly, whoſe honor daily increaſed by the famous battels he wanne in SPAINE. So that it was moſt certaine, that ſo ſoone as Pompey had ended the warres there, they would haue choſen him general in the wars againſt Mithridates. Wherfore, when Pompey ſent to ROME in earneſt maner, to require money to make pay to his ſouldiers, writing to the Senate, that if they did not ſend him money the ſooner, he would leaue Sertorius there, SPAINE behinde him, and bring his army back into ITALIE: Lucullus made all the meanes he could to haue it quickly ſent him, fearing leaſt he ſhould returne into ITALIE vpon any occaſion, while he was Conſull. For he thought that if he returned againe to ROME with ſo great an armie, he would eaſily do what him liſt: and the rather, becauſe that Cethegus and he could not agree, who at that time bare all the ſwaye and rule at ROME, becauſe he ſpake and did all that pleaſed the common people, being a vitious liuer, and diſſolutely giuen, for which cauſe Lucullus hated him. But there was an other common Orator among the people called Lucius Quintius, and he would haue had all Syllaes doings reuoked and broken: a matter to alter euen the whole ſtate of the commonwealth, and to turmoile the citie of ROME againe with ciuill diſſention, which then liued quietly and in good peace. This Lucius Quintius Lucullus talked withall a part to perſwade him, and openly reproued him with ſuch words, that he was diſſwaded from his euill purpoſe, and by reaſon ruled his raſh ambition, handling it both wiſely and as cunningly as he could poſsble (for the ſafetie of the commonwealth) becauſe it was the beginning of a diſeaſe, from whence infinite troubles were like to growe. While theſe things were thus in hand, newes came that Octauius the gouernor of CILICIA was dead. Straight whereupon many put forward themſelues to ſue for this charge, and to court Cethegus, as the only man who aboue all other might make any man officer whom he thought good. Now for Lucullus he made no great reckning of the gouernment of CILICIA in reſpect of the countrie, but becauſe CAPPADOCIA was hard adioyning to it, and perſwading himſelfe that if he could obtaine the gouernment thereof, they would giue none other (but himſelfe) the authoritie to make wars with Mithridates: he determined to procure all the meanes he could, that none ſhould haue it but him ſelfe. And hauing prooued ſundry wayes, was compelled in the end, againſt his owne nature, to practiſe a meane neither comely nor honeſt, and yet the readieſt way he could poſſibly deuiſe to obtaine his deſire. There was a woman in ROME at that time called Pracia, very famous for her paſſing beauty, and alſo for her pleaſant grace in talke and diſcourſe, howbeit otherwiſe vnchaſte after curtiſan maner. But becauſe ſhe emploied the credit and fauor of them that frequented her companie, to the benefit and ſeruice of the commonwealth, and of them that loued her: ſhe wanne the reporte (beſides her other excellent commendable graces) to be a very louing woman, and ready to fauour and further any good enterpriſe, and it wanne her great fame and reputation. But after ſhe had once wonne Cethegus, (who ruled all the commonwealth at his pleaſure) and brought him to be ſo farre in fancie with her, that he could not be out of her ſight: then had ſhe all the whole power & authority of ROME in her hands, for the people did nothing but Cethegus preferred it, and Cethegus did what euer Pracia would will him to. Thus Lucullus ſought to come in fauour with her, ſending her many preſents, and vſing all other courteſies he could offer vnto her: beſides that it ſeemed a great reward for ſo proude and ambitious a woman as ſhe, to be ſued vnto by ſuch a man as Lucullus was, who by this meanes came to haue Cethegus at his commandement. For Cethegus did nothing but cōmend Lucullus in all aſſemblies of the people, to procure him the gouernment of CILICIA: who after it was once granted him, had then no neede of the helpe neither of Pracia, nor yet of Cethegus. For the people wholly of themſelues with one conſent did grant him the charge to make warre with Mithridates, becauſe he knew better how to ouercome him, then any other Captaine, and becauſe that Pompey was in the warres with Sertorius in SPAINE, and Metellus alſo growne too olde, both which two were the onely men that could deſeruedly haue contended for this office with him. Neuertheleſſe, Marcus Cotta his fellow Conſul, made ſuch ſute to the Senate, that they ſent him alſo with an armie by ſea, to keepe the coaſts of PROPONTIDE, and to defend the countrie of BITHYNIA. Thus, Lucullus hauing his commiſſion, went into ASIA with one legion only, the which he leauied a new at ROME: & when he was come thither, he tooke the reſt of the ſtrength he found there, which were men marred and corrupted altogether of long time, through couetouſneſſe and delicacie of the countrie. For amongſt others, were the bandes which they called the Fimbrian bandes; men giuen ouer to ſelfe will, and very ill to be ruled by martiall diſcipline, becauſe they had liued a long time at their owne libertie, without all obedience to any man. They were thoſe ſelfe ſouldiers that together with Fimbria, ſlue their generall Flaccus, Conſull of the ROMAINE people, and that afterwards betraied Fimbria himſelfe, and forſooke him, leauing him vnto Sylla, being mutiners, traitors, and wicked people: howbeit otherwiſe very valiant, well trained, and painefull ſouldiers. Notwithſtanding, Lucullus in ſhort time bridled their boldneſſe meetely well, and reformed the others alſo, who before had neuer proued (in my opinion) what the value of a good Captaine and Generall ment, that knew how to command: but were vſed to flattering leaders, that commaunded the ſouldiers no more then they themſelues liked of. Nowe concerning the ſtate of the enemies, thus it was with them. Mithridates that in the beginning was very braue and bolde (as theſe floriſhing Sophiſters commonly are) vndertaking warre againſt the ROMAINES, with a vaine vnprofitable armie, but paſſing freſh and ſumptuous to the eye: but after that he was once foiled and ouercome, with no leſſe ſhame then loſſe, when he came to make this ſecond warre, he cut off all ſuperfluous pompe, and brought his armie into a conuenient furniture to ſerue for warres at all aſſayes. For he put by the confuſed multitude of ſundry nations, the fierce threatnings of the barbarous people in ſo many ſundrie tongues, and clearely baniſht alſo the riche grauen armors with goldeſmiths worke, and ſet with pretious ſtones, as things that more enriched the enemies that wanne them, then gaue ſtrēgth or courage to thoſe that ware them. And contrariwiſe, cauſed long ſtiffe ſwords to be made after the ROMAIN faſhion, and great heauy ſhields, & brought to the field a maruellous number of horſe, more ready for ſeruice, then riche in furniture. Then he ioyned ſixe ſcore thouſand footmen together, appointed & ſet in order like vnto the battell of the ROMAINES, with ſixteene thouſand horſe of ſeruice, beſides thoſe that drue his armed cartes with ſiethes about, which were in all to the number of a hundred. And beſides all this land preparation, he brought alſo a great number of ſhippes and gallies together, which were not decked with goodly golden pauilions, as at the firſt, neither with ſtooues nor bathes, nor with chambers and cabbons, curiouſly hanged for Ladies and gentlewomen: but furniſhed full of armour, artillerie, and ſlings, and with money alſo to pay the ſouldiers. With all this armie and preparation, he went firſt to inuade BITHYNIA, where the cities receiued him very gladly, and not thoſe onely, but all the other cities of ASIA wholly: the which were fallen againe into their former miſeries and diſeaſes, by the crueltie of the ROMAINE farmers and vſurers, who raiſing taxes and impoſtes vppon them, made them abide vntollerable things. It is true that Lucullus draue them away afterwards, like the Harpyæ, which tooke the meate out of the poore mens mouthes: howbeit at that time he did no more, but brought them to be more reaſonable by the perſwaſions he vſed vnto them and qualified a litle the inclination of the people vnto rebellion, being euery one of them in manner willing to reuolt. Now Lucullus being buſie about theſe matters, Marcus Cotta the other Conſull (and his companion) ſuppoſing that the abſence of Lucullus was a fit occaſion offered him to doe notable ſeruice, prepared to fight with Mithridates. And although he had newes brought him from ſundrie places, that Lucullus was with his armie in PHRYGIA, and comming towards him: yet notwithſtanding, imagining that he had the honour of triumphe aſſured alreadie in his hands, and becauſe Lucullus ſhould be no partaker of it, he aduaunced forwardes to giue battell. But Mithridates ouercame him both by ſea and by lande: ſo that Cotta by ſea loſt three ſcore of his ſhips with all the men in them, foure thouſand footmen by lande, and was after with ſhame ſhut vp and beſieged in the citie of CHALCEDON, remaining there hopeleſſe to eſcape, but by Lucullus onely aide and meanes. Howbeit there were in Lucullus campe, that were very earneſt with him to leaue Cotta, and to go further, aſſuring him that he ſhould finde the realme of Mithridates both without men of warre, or any defence at all: ſo that he might eaſily be Lord of the whole. And theſe were the words of the ſouldiers that ſpighted Cotta, becauſe his fooliſh raſhneſſe and fonde imagination had not only brought thoſe men to the ſhambles to be ſlaine and caſt away, whom he had the leading of: but had let them alſo, that they could not ouercome him, and end this warre without blowes, for that they were driuen to go to his helpe. Howbeit Lucullus making an Oration vnto them, aunſwered, that he had rather ſaue the life of one ROMAINE citizen, then winne all that his enemies had in their power. And when Archelaus, (who had bene Mithridates Lieutenant in BOEOTIA in the firſt warres againſt Sylla, and now in this ſecond warre tooke part with the ROMAINES) aſſured him that ſo ſoone as they ſaw him in the realme of PONTVS, they would all riſe againſt Mithridates, and yeelde themſelues vnto him: Lucullus aunſwered him thus, that he would not ſhew himſelfe more fearefull, then the good hunters which neuer ſuffer the beaſt to recouer his denne. And when he had ſo ſaid, he marched with his armie towardes Mithridates, hauing in all his campe thirtie thouſand footmen, and two thouſand fiue hundred horſe. When he came ſo neere vnto his enemies, that he might eaſily at eye diſcerne all their hoaſt, he wondered at the great multitude of ſouldiers that were in their campe, and was in minde to giue battell, ſuppoſing yet that the better way was to prolong time, and drawe theſe warres out in length. But one Marius a ROMAINE captain, whom Sertorius had ſent out of SPAINE vnto Mithridates with a certaine number of ſouldiers, came forwards, and prouoked him to battell. Lucullus for his part did put his men alſo in a readineſſe to fight. But euen as both battels were prepared to ioyne, the element opened vpon the ſodaine, without any ſhewe of change of weather diſcerned before, and they plainly ſaw a great flake of fire fall betweene both armies, in forme and ſhape much like to a tunne, and of the colour of molten ſiluer. This celeſtiall ſigne put both the armies in ſuch a feare, as they both retired, and fought not a ſtroake: and this wonderfull ſight fortuned (as it appeared) in a place of PHRYGIA, called Otryes. Nowe Lucullus afterwards conſidering with himſelfe, that there was no riches nor prouiſion ſo great in the world, that could ſuffice to victuall ſo many thouſands of people as Mithridates had in his campe any long time together, hauing his enemies campe ſo lying before them: willed that one of the priſoners ſhould be brought into his tent, and firſt of all he enquired of him, how many of them lay together in a cabin, then what corne he had left in their cabbin. And when the priſoner had aunſwered to all his demandes, he returned him to priſon, and ſent for an other: then for a third, and queſtioned with them all as he had done with the firſt. Then comparing the ſtore of their corne, and other proportion of victuals they had, with the number of men the ſame ſhould maintaine: he found that all would be ſpent in three or foure daies at the vtmoſt. Whereupon he relied on his firſt determination, to delay time without hazard of battell. So he cauſed a maruellous deale of wheate to be brought into his campe out of euery quarter, that the ſame being throughly victualed, he might eaſily tary the occaſion which his enemies neceſſitie ſhould offer him. Mithridates in the meane time, ſought which way he might take the city of the CYZICENIANS, who had bene ouerthrowne before with Cotta at the battell of CHALCEDON, where they had loſt three thouſand men, and tenne of their ſhippes.

And becauſe that Lucullus ſhould not vnderſtand of his enterpriſe, Mithridates ſtale away by night after ſupper, taking the oportunity of a darke rainie night, and marched thitherwards with ſuch ſpeede, that he was before the city of CYZICVS by breake of day, and pitched his campe, where the temple of the goddeſſe Adraſtia ſtandeth, which is the goddeſſe of fatall deſtinie. Lucullus receiuing intelligence of Mithridates departure from his campe, followed him ſtraight wayes ſteppe by ſteppe, and being glad that he was not met withall of his enemies in diſorder, lodged his armie in a village called THRACIA, in a place of great aduantage for him, and commodiouſly ſeated alſo vppon the high wayes, and through-fare of the neighbours thereabouts, by the which they muſt come of neceſſitie to victuall Mithridates campe. Wherfore Lucullus wiſely foreſeeing what would follow: would not keep his purpoſe ſecret from his ſouldiers, but after he had well trenched and fortified his campe, called them to counſell, and there making an oration vnto them, told them openly by manifeſt demonſtration of aſſured hope, that ere many dayes paſſed, he would giue victorie into their hands, and that without loſſe of one droppe of bloud. In the meane ſeaſon, Mithridates enuironned the GRECIANS round about by land, hauing deuided his armie into tenne campes, and ſtopped vp the mouth of the arme of the ſea, which deuideth the citie from firme lande, with his ſhips from one ſide to another. Now the CYZICENIANS were valiant men, and determined to abide all extreamitie for the ROMAINES ſakes: but one thing onely troubled them much, that they knew not what was become of Lucullus, neither could they heare any newes of him, though his campe ſtood in ſuch a place, where they might eaſily diſcerne it from the citie.

But Mithridates ſouldiers deceiued them, for ſhewing them the ROMAINES campe that lay aboue hard by them, ſaid vnto them: do yee ſee yonder campe there? They are the MEDES, and the ARMENIANS, whom Tigranes hath ſent to the aide of Mithridates. Theſe wordes put the CYZICENIANS in a maruellous feare, ſeeing ſuch a multitude of enemies diſperſed round about them: that when Lucullus ſhould come to their aide, he could not well tell which way to paſſe. Yet at the length they heard of Lucullus approach, by one called Demonax, whom Archelaus ſent vnto them, but they would not beleeue him at the firſt, taking it for a tale, only to make them be of good courage, and valiantly abide the furie of the ſiege: vntill ſuch time as a litle boy of theirs, eſcaped from the enemies that before had taken him priſoner, was come againe vnto them. Of whome they inquired where Lucullus was: the boy laughed at them, thinking they ieſted to aske that queſtion of him. But when he ſaw they were in good earneſt, he ſhewed them the ROMAINES campe with his finger: then they beleeued it indeed, & were couragious againe. There is a lake neere vnto the citie of CYZICVS called Daſcylitide, & it is nauigable with conuenient bigge boates. Lucullus tooke one of the greateſt of them, put it in a carte, and ſo caried it to the ſea, and there put as many ſouldiers in her as ſhe could well cary, who by night entred into the citie, the skoute of the enemies neuer deſcrying them. This ſmall ſupply did maruellouſly comfort the beſieged CYZICENIANS: and it ſeemeth that the gods, delighting to ſee their noble courage, would further increaſe and aſſure the ſame, by manie manifeſt tokens which they ſent from heauen, and ſpecially by one which was this. The day of the feaſt of Proſerpina was at hand, and the citizens had neuer a black cowe to offer in ſolemne ſacrifice, as their ancient ceremonies required: ſo they made one of paſte, and brought it hard vnto the aulter.

A wonderfull token of a cowe that came to offer her ſelfe to the Cyzicenians to be ſacrificed.

Now, the cowe that was vowed to this ſacrifice, & which they reered vp of purpoſe to ſerue for that day, was feeding amongſt the heard of the citie in the fields, on the other ſide of the arme of the ſea. But that day ſhe kept alone from all the reſt of the heard, and ſwam ouer the arme of the ſea, and came into the citie: where ſhe went of her ſelfe vnto the place of the ſacrifice.

Furthermore, the goddeſſe Proſerpina her ſelfe appeared vnto Ariſtagoras in his dreame, ſecretary of the ſtate and commonwealth of the CYZICENIANS, and ſaid vnto him: I am come hither to bring the flute of LIBYA, againſt the trumpet of PONT, and therefore tell the citizens from me, that I will them to be of good courage. The next morning when the ſecretary had told them his viſion, the CYZICENIANS maruelled much at the goddeſſes words, and could not imagine what they ment. Howbeit at the breake of day there roſe a great whiſtling wind, that made the ſea billowes riſe very high: and the kings engines of battery which were brought to the walles of the city to plucke them downe (being wonderfull works that one Niconides a THESSALIAN enginer had made and deuiſed) began to make ſuch a noiſe, and to breake in peeces by the roughnes of the winde, that a man might eaſily iudge what would follow vpon it. Then all at one inſtant the ſouthwinde was become ſo vehement bigge, that in a moment it burſt all theſe engines a ſunder, and ſpecially a tower of wodde of the height of a hundred cubittes, which the winde ſhooke ſo vehemently, that it ouerthrew it to the ground. And it is ſayd furthermore, that in the city of ILIVM the goddeſſe Minerua appeared vnto diuerſe in their ſleepe, all in a ſweat, and ſhewing part of her vaile torne, as if ſhe had bene newly returned from giuing aide vnto the CYZICENIANS: in confirmation whereof, the inhabitants of ILIVM haue a piller yet vnto this day, whereupon this matter is written for a perpetuall memory. Now was Mithridates maruellous ſory for the breaking and loſſe of his engines, by meanes whereof, the CYZICENIANS had eſcaped the danger of aſſault, and of the ſiege in like maner, vntill he truely vnderſtood of the great famine that was in his campe, and the extreame dearth to be ſuch, as the ſouldiers were compelled to eate mans fleſh, which (his Captaines abuſing him) had for a time kept ſecret from his knowledge. But when he was enformed of the troth in deed, he left off his vaine ambition obſtinately to continue ſiege: knowing well that Lucullus made not warres with threats and brauery, but (as the common prouerbe ſayth) leapt on his belly with both his feete, that is to ſay, he did what he could poſſible to cut off all the victuals from him. And therefore one day when Lucullus was gone to aſſault a caſtell that troubled him very neare vnto his campe: Mithridates becauſe he would not loſe that oportunity, ſent the moſt part of his horſemen to get victuals in BITHYNIA, with all his cartes, and beaſtes of cariage, and his moſt vnprofitable footemen. Lucullus hearing thereof, returned againe the ſelfe ſame night vnto his campe, and the next morning betimes being in the winter ſeaſon, followed them by the tracke with ten enſignes of footemen only and all his horſemen. But the ſnow was ſo deepe, the cold ſo terrible ſharpe, and the weather ſo rough, that many of his ſouldiers not being able to abide it, dyed by the way. For all that he marched on ſtill, till he ouertooke his enemies about the riuer of Rindacus, where he gaue them ſuch an ouerthrow, that the very women came out of the city of APOLLONIA, and went to ſteale the victuals they had loden, and ſtrip the dead, which were a maruellous great number, as a man may iudge in ſuch a caſe: and neuertheleſſe there were taken ſixe thouſand horſe of ſeruice, an infinite number of beaſtes for cariage, and fifteene thouſand men beſides, all which ſpoile he brought to his campe, and paſſed hard by the campe of his enemies. But I wonder much at the hiſtoriographer Saluſt, who writing of this matter ſayth, that here was the firſt time that euer the ROMAINES ſaw any camels. Me thinks it ſtraunge how he ſhould thinke ſo, that they who long before had ouercome Antiochus the great vnder Scipio, and the others that a litle before had fought againſt Archelaus, neare vnto the cities of ORCHOMENE and CHÆRONEA, ſhould not haue ſeene camels. But to returne againe to our matter. Mithridates being feared with this ouerthrow, reſolued with him ſelfe immediatly to flie, with all the ſpeede he could poſſibly make: and to entertaine and ſtay Lucullus for a time behinde him, determined to ſend Ariſtonicus his Admirall with his army by ſea, into the ſea of GREECE. But as Ariſtonicus was ready to hoiſe ſaile, his own men betrayed him, and deliuered him into the handes of Lucullus, with tenne thouſand crownes which he caried with him, to corrupt if he could part of the ROMAINES army. Mithridates hearing of this, fled by ſea, leauing the reſt of his army by land in the handes of his Captaines, to bee brought away by them as well as they could. Lucullus followed vnto the riuer of Granicus, where he ſet vppon them, and after he had ſlaine twenty thouſand of them, tooke an infinite number priſoners. And they ſay there died in that warres, what ſouldiers, what ſlaues, what lackeis, and other ſtragglers that followed the campe, about the number of three hundred thouſand people. This done, Lucullus returned to the city of CYCICVS, where after hee had ſpent ſome daies, enioying the glory due vnto him, and receiued the honorable entertainment of the CYZICENIANS: he went to viſite the coaſt of HELLESPONT, to get ſhips together, and to prepare an army by ſea. Mithridates in great danger vpon the ſea by tempeſt.

Herewith he roſe incontinently out of his bed, being yet darke night, and calling his friends to him, told him the viſion he had in his dreame: and about that very time alſo there came ſome vnto him from the city of ILIVM, that brought him newes of fifteene gallies of king Mithridates, hauing fiue oares to euery banck, that were ſeen in the hauen of the ACHAIANS, and that ſailed towardes the Ile of LEMNOS. Whereupon Lucullus tooke ſhip ſtraight, went and tooke them euery one: for at his firſt comming he ſlue the Captaine called Iſidorus, and went afterwardes to the other mariners that lay at ancker on the coaſt ſide, who ſeeing him come, drew towardes land with their ſhippes, in purpoſe to runne them all a ſhore, and fighting aboue hatches, hurt many of Lucullus ſouldiers, becauſe they could not compaſſe them in behinde, and for that alſo the place where they had laied their ſhippes was ſuch, as there was no way to force them before, their gallies floting in the ſea as they did, and the others being faſtned to the land as they were. Lucullus with much a do all this notwithſtanding, found meanes in the end to put a ſhore certaine of the beſt ſouldiers he had about him, in a place of the Ile where they might eaſily land. Theſe ſouldiers went ſtraight and ſet vpon the enemies behinde, ſlue ſome of them euen at their firſt comming, and compelled the reſt to cut a ſunder the cables that faſtned the gallies to the banckes. But when they thought to flie from land, the gallies bruſed and brake one another: and that worſt of all was, ranne vpon the pointes and ſpurres of Lucullus gallies. And ſo many of them that ſtoode aboue hatches were ſlaine, the reſt taken priſoners: amongeſt whom, Marius the ROMAINE Captaine was brought vnto Lucullus, whom Sertorius had ſent out of SPAINE vnto Mithridates. He had but one eie, and Lucullus had commaunded his men before they fought, not to kill any of his enemies that had but one eie, becauſe Marius ſhould not die ſo happy a death, as to be ſlaine, but that hee ſhould die ſome ſhamefull death, and bee condemned by order of law. That done, Lucullus went in perſon with all the ſpeede he could poſſible to follow Mithridates, hoping to finde him yet vpon the coaſt of BITHYNIA, where Voconius ſhould haue ſtayed him: for he had ſent this Voconius before with a certaine number of ſhippes vnto the city of NICOMEDIA, to ſtop him from flying. But he taried ſo long in the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA ſacrificing to the goddes of the ſame, and to be receiued into the fraternity of their religion, that he could neuer after come neare Mithridates to ſtoppe him from flying: hauing already made ſayle with all the whole fleete, and haſting with all poſſible ſpeede to recouer the realme of PONTVS, before Lucullus could returne from whence he went. But in ſayling thitherwardes, he met with ſuch a terrible ſtorme, that caried part of his ſhippes ſo away, that they ranne ſtraggling to ſeeke their fortune, and part of them ſplitted and drowned outright: ſo that all the coaſts and riuers thereabouts, for many daies after, were full of dead bodies and ſhippewrackes caſt a ſhore by waues of the ſea. Now for Mithridates owne perſon, he was in a ſhip of great burden, the which for her greatneſſe could not ſaile neare the ſhore, nor recouer land, ſhee was alſo very euill to be guided by the pilots in ſo boiſterous a ſtorme: the mariners beſides were put out of all their ſkill and knowledge: and the ſhippe her ſelfe moreouer tooke in ſuch ſtore of water, and was ſo heauily charged withall, that they durſt no more put her out to the ſea. By reaſon whereof Mithridates was compelled to goe abord a litle pinaſe of pyrates, and to put him ſelfe and his life into their handes, by whoſe helpe in the end, (beyond all expectation, but not without great daunger) he got to land, and recouered the city of HERACLEA in the realme of PONTVS. Now here is to be noted, that the great brauery Lucullus ſhewed vnto the Senate of ROME, fell out according to his imagination by the fauour of the goddes. For when the Senate had appointed for ending of theſe warres to prepare a great nauy of ſhippes, and therewithall had giuen order alſo for three thouſand talents: Lucullus ſtayed them by letters that they ſhould not doe it, writing brauely vnto them, that without all this charge and great preparation he would be ſtrong enough to driue Mithridates from the ſea, with the onely ſhippes hee would borrow of their friends and confederates. And in deede, through the ſpeciall fauour of the goddes, he brought it ſo to paſſe: for they ſay, that this terrible ſtorme that deſtroied the army of Mithridates was raiſed vp by Diana, being offended with the men of the realme of PONTVS, becauſe they had deſtroyed her temple in the city of PRIAPOS, and had caried away her image. Now there were diuerſe that counſelled Lucullus to deferre the reſt of this warre, vntill an other ſeaſon: but notwithſtanding all their perſwaſions, he went through the country of GALATIA and BITHYNIA to inuade the realme of Mithridates. In the which voyage, at the firſt beginning he lacked victuals, ſo that there were thirty thouſand men of GALATIA following his campe, that caried euery one of them a buſhell of wheate on their ſhoulders: howbeit entring farther into the countrey, and conquering the whole, there was ſuch exceeding plenty of all things, that an Oxe was ſold in his campe but for a Drachma, and a ſlaue at foure times as much. And of all other ſpoile there was ſuch great ſtore, that either they made no reckonning of it, or elſe they made hauocke of it, becauſe there was no man to ſell it vnto, euery man hauing ſo much of his owne. For they ranne ouer all the countrey vnto the city of THEMISCYRA, and to the vallies that lay vpon the riuer of Thermodon, and ſtayed no where longer then they were a ſpoyling. Thereupon the ſouldiers beganne to murmur at Lucullus, becauſe he aſſured all the cities vpon compoſition, and neuer tooke any of them by force, nor gaue them any meanes to enrich them ſelues by ſpoile: and yet ſayd they, he would make vs now go farther, and leaue AMISVS a great rich city which we might eaſily take by force, if it were but a litle ſtraightly beſieged, and leade vs into the deſerts of the TIBARENIANS and the CHALDÆIANS to fight againſt Mithridates. Lucullus paſſed ouer all theſe complaints, and made no reckonning of them, becauſe he would neuer haue thought that they would haue fallen into ſuch mutiny and fury, as afterwardes they did: and contrarily excuſed him ſelfe the more carefully to them that blamed and reproued him, for his long tarying vpon townes and villages that were not worth the reckoning, and ſuffering Mithridates in the meane time to gather a new force and army together at his pleaſure. For, ſaid he, that is the marke I ſhotte at, and that maketh me linger time vp and downe as I doe, wiſhing nothing more, then that he might once againe make himſelfe ſtrong, and bring a ſecond army to the field, that might embolden him to come eftſoones to the fight with vs, and runne away no more. Doe you not ſee, ſayed he, that at his backe he hath an infinite number of deſert countries, where it is vnpoſſible euer to follow him by the tracke: and hard by him alſo the mount Caucaſus, and many other vnpaſſable places, which are ſufficient not onely to hide him alone, but infinite number of other princes and kings beſides that would flie battell, and not come to fight? Furthermore, it is but a litle way from the country of the CABIRENIANS vnto the realme of ARMENIA, where Tigranes the king of kings inhabiteth, whoſe power is ſo great, that he driueth the PARTHIANS out of ASIA, and carieth whole townes and cities of GREECE vnto the realme of MEDIA, who hath all SYRIA and PALÆSTINE in his handes, and hath ſlaine and rooted out the kings and ſucceſſors of the great Seleucus, and hath caried away their wiues and daughters priſoners by force. This great and mighty king is allied vnto Mithridates, for he maried Mithridates daughter: and it is not likely that when Mithridates ſhall come and intreate him to helpe him in his diſtreſſe, that Tigranes will refuſe him, but rather we muſt thinke certainely that he will make wars vpon vs in his defence. And thus, in making haſt to driue out Mithridates, we ſhall bring our ſelues into great daunger, to prouoke a new enemy, euen Tigranes againſt vs, who of long time hath lurked for a iuſt occaſion to make warres with vs: and he can haue no honeſter cauſe to take armes, then to defend and keepe a king his neighbour, and ſo neare a kinſeman, from vtter deſtruction, and one that is compelled to ſeeke vpon him for ſuccour. What neede we then to prouoke him to procure it, and teach Mithridates (which he purpoſeth not) to whom he ſhould repaire for aide, to make warres againſt our ſelues, and pricke him forward, or to ſay better, put him with our owne hands into the way to go ſeeke aide of Tigranes: which of him ſelfe he will neuer doe, (thinking it a diſhonor vnto him) vnleſſe we driue him to it for very neceſſity. Is it not better for vs to giue him leyſure and time, to gather a ſecond force againe of him ſelfe, and

„ and with ſuch other people whom we haue ſo many times ouercome: then
„ with the Medes and Armenians? With this determination Lucullus taried a great while before the city of Amisus, continuing this ſiege of purpoſe, without diſtreſſing them at all. Afterwardes when winter was paſt, he left Murena there to continue the ſiege, and him ſelfe with the reſt of his army went to meete Mithridates: who had planted his campe neare vnto the city of Cabira, determining to tary the Romaines comming, hauing gathered together againe a new army of forty thouſand footemen, and foure thouſand horſemen, in the which he put his moſt confidence and truſt, ſo that he paſſed ouer the riuer of Lycus, and went and preſented battell to the Romaines in the plaine field. There the horſemen skirmiſhed, & the Romains had the worſe: for there was one Pomponius a Romane taken, of great eſtimation, who was brought vnto king Mithridates hurt as he was. Mithridates asked him, if in ſauing his life, and healing his wounds, he would become his ſeruant and friend. Straight replied Pomponius, with all my heart quoth he, ſo that thou make peace with the Romaines: if not, I will euer be thine enemy. The king eſteemed his corage much, and would doe him no hurt. And as for Lucullus, he was afraied to come into the plaine, becauſe his enemy was the ſtronger of horſemen: and he doubted alſo on the other ſide to take his way by the mountain, becauſe it was very high, vneaſie to clime, and full of woddes and forreſtes. But as he ſtoode thus doubtfull, they tooke certaine Grecians by chaunce that were fled, and hidden in a caue hard by, among the which there was an old man called Artemidorus, who promiſed Lucullus if he would beleeue and follow him, he would bring him into a ſure ſtrōg place to lodge his campe, where was a caſtell aboue the city of Cabira. Lucullus beleeued the olde mans wordes, wherefore ſo ſoone as night came, he raiſed great fires in his campe, and went his way: and after they had paſſed certaine ſtraight and daungerous waies of the mountaines, he came in the morning vnto the place where Artemidorus had promiſed to bring him. Now the enemies were maruellouſly amazed when day light came, to ſee him there ouer them, in a place where if he liſt to fight, he might come vpon them with aduantage: and if he liked not to ſturre, it was vnpoſſible to compell him. For he ſtoode indifferent then to hazard battell or not. But in the meane ſeaſon, they ſay certaine of the kings campe by chaunce were a hunting the Hart. The Romains perceiuing that, fell vpon them to cut them off by the way: and they beganne by this meanes one to charge an other in ſuch ſort, reliefe growing ſtill on either ſide, as Mithridates, men grew the ſtronger. But the Romains ſeeing their men flie from the trenches of their campe aboue, were in ſuch a rage, that they all ranne in a choller to Lucullus to pray him he would leade them to battell, and giue them a ſignall to fight. Lucullus, becauſe he would ſhew them by experience how much the preſence and eie of a good wiſe captaine in time of neede was worth: commaunded them they ſhould not once ſturre, and he him ſelfe in perſon went downe into the valley, where he commaunded the firſt of his men he met withall flying, to ſtay, and returne to the fight againe with him. Which they preſently did, and all the other in like caſe: and thus gathering them together againe, did eaſily make their enemies returne, that before had them in chaſe, and draue them backe, fighting with them euen hard to their owne fort. Afterwardes vppon this returne againe to his campe, he ſette his ſouldiers that fled, vnto a certaine peece of worke to ſhame them withall, which the Romains are wont to vſe in ſuch a caſe: and that is, that he made them digge a ditch of twelue foote long, being in their ſhirtes, all vntruſſed, and their other companions preſent ſeeing them doe it. Now there was in king Mithridates campe, one Olthacus, prince of the Dardarians (which are certaine barbarous people dwelling vppon the mariſhes of Mæotin) a noble gentleman of his perſon, valiant, and skilfull in warres, and a man of very good iudgement to doe any great enterpriſe as any that was in all the army, and furthermore a prince of great good grace and entertainement in company, knowing how to faſhion him ſelfe with all men. This prince, being alwaies at ſtrife with other Lords of his countrey, and contending who ſhould haue the firſt place of honor and fauor about the king: went vnto Mithridates, and promiſed him that he would do him notable ſeruice, and that was, that he would kill Lucullus. The king was very glad of this promiſe, & praiſed him maruellouſly in ſecret: howbeit openly of purpoſe he did him many iniuries, becauſe he might haue ſome colour to counterfaite anger and diſpleaſure, and to giue way for him to goe yeelde him ſelfe vnto Lucullus as he did. Lucullus was maruellous glad of him, becauſe he was one of the chiefeſt men of name in all his campe, and to proue him withall, gaue him charge immediatly: in the which he behaued him ſelfe ſo well, that Lucullus greatly eſteemed his wiſedome, and commended his diligence, in ſuch ſort that he did him this honor, to call him ſometimes vnto the councell, and make him ſit at his borde. One day when this DARDARIAN prince Olthacus thought to haue found fit occaſion to execute his enterpriſe, he commaunded his footemen to be ready with his horſe out of the trenches of the campe: and at noone daies when the ſouldiers tooke reſt, and ſlept here and there in the came, he went vnto Lucullus tent, thinking to haue found no body there to keepe him from comming in, conſidering the familiarity Lucullus ſhewed him, ſaying alſo he had matters of great importance to talke with him of: and ſure he had gone in immediatly vnto him, if ſleepe that caſteth away ſo many other Captaines, had not at that time preſerued and ſaued Lucullus that ſlept. For one of the groomes of his chamber called Menedemus, who by good fortune kept the dore of the tent, told him that he came in very ill time, becauſe Lucullus being wearied with trauell and lacke of ſleepe, was but then newly layed downe to reſt. Olthacus whatſoeuer the other ſaid to him, would not be ſo anſwered, but told him he would come in whether he would or not, for he muſt needs ſpeake with him in a matter of great importaunce. Menedemus anſwered him againe, that nothing could be of greater importaunce, nor more neceſſary, then the preſeruation of his maiſters life and health, who had neede to take reſt: and with theſe words, he thruſt him backe with both his hands. Olthacus was afraied then, and withdrew him ſelfe ſecretly out of the trenches of the campe, tooke his horſe backe, and rode ſtraight to Mithridates campe without his purpoſe he came for, which was to kill Lucullus. And thus it plainly appeareth, that occaſion, and oportunity of time, euen in great matters deliuereth meanes, to ſaue or deſtroy the life of man, like as drugges and medicines giuen vnto the ſicke and diſeaſed perſons. Shortly after, Lucullus ſent one of his Captaines called Sornatius to get victuals, with tenne enſignes of footemen. Whereof Mithridates being aduertiſed, ſent preſently at his taile one of his Captaines alſo, called Menander, vnto whom Sornatius gaue battell, and ſlue him with great ſlaughter of his men beſide. And afterwardes Lucullus ſent an other of his Lieutenants called Adrianus with a great company of ſouldiers, to get victuals into his campe more then he ſhould neede. Mithridates did not let ſlippe this occaſion, but ſent after him two of his Captaines alſo called Menemachus and Myron, with a great number of men, as well footemen as horſemen: all which were ſlaine, two onely excepted, that brought newes backe to Mithridates campe: the which hee ſought to ſalue as well as he could, ſaying that the loſſe was much leſſe then it was thought for, and that it fortuned through the ignorance and raſhnes of his Lieutenaunts. But Adrianus at his returne, paſſed by Mithridates campe with great pompe and maieſty, carying a huge number of cartes loden with corne and ſpoiles he had wonne: which draue Mithridates ſelfe into ſo great a deſpaire, and all his people into ſuch a feare and trouble, that he preſently determined to remoue thence. Whereupon, the nobility and ſuch as had place of credit about him, beganne to ſend before, and ſecretly to conuay their ſtuffe out of the campe, but vtterly prohibiting others to doe the ſame. The reſt of the ſouldiers ſeeing the ſtoutneſſe of the kinges minions, beganne to ſet vpon them with open force, not ſuffering them on the other ſide once to iſſue out of the campe. This mutiny grew to ſuch a fury, that they ouerthrew their cariages and ſumpter moiles, and ſlue them preſently downe. Amongſt others there was ſlaine Dorylaus, one of the chiefeſt Captaines of all their campe, who had nothing about him but a purple gowne, for the which they killed him: and Hermaus the Prieſt of the ſacrifices was troden vnder foote, and ſmoothered at the campe gate, by reaſon of the multitude of thoſe that fled in ſo great diſorder. The king him ſelfe amongſt others fled, but hauing neuer a one of his guard about him, nor any of the quiries of his ſtable to bring him a horſe: Ptolomy, one of the groomes of his chamber, perceiuing him in the company of them that fled, lighted off his owne horſe, and gaue him the king, but euen in manner too late. For the ROMAINES that followed him were then euen hard at his taile: and it was not for lacke of ſpeede they miſſed the taking of him, for they were very neare him: but the couetouſnes of the ſouldiers was the loſſe of the prey they had ſo long ſought for, with ſo great paine and hazard of battels, and depriued Lucullus of the honor and reward of all his victories. For they were ſo neare vnto him, that if they had but followed Mithridates neuer ſo litle further, they had out of doubt ouertaken him, and his horſe that caried him away. But one of the moiles that caried his gold and ſiluer (whether by chaunce, or of pretended policy of Mithridates, as a matter purpoſely habandoned to them that purſued him) was found in the middeſt of the high way betwixt him that fled, & the ROMAINES that followed, who ſtayed there to rob the gold and ſiluer, fighting about it, that Mithridates by that meanes wanne ground ſo farre before them, as they could neuer after come neare him againe. And this loſſe was not all which the couetouſneſſe of the ſouldiers made Lucullus to loſe. For, one of the chiefeſt ſecretaries of the king being taken, called Calliſtratus, whom Lucullus commaunded to be brought vnto him to his campe: they that had the charge of him, hearing tell that he had fiue hundred crownes in a girdle about him, for greedineſſe of them, ſlue him by the way, and yet notwithſtanding Lucullus ſuffered them to ſpoile and deſtroy the whole campe of their enemies. After Mithridates flight, Lucullus tooke the city of CABIRA, and many other caſtels and ſtrong places, where he found great treaſure, and the priſons full of poore priſoners of the GRECIANS, and many Princes a kin vnto the king him ſelfe, which were thought to be dead long before: and then ſeeing them ſelues deliuered from this miſerable bondage, by the grace and benefite of Lucullus, thought with them ſelues they were not onely taken out of priſon, but reuiued and turned againe vnto a ſecond life. There was alſo taken one of king Mithridates ſiſters called Niſſa, whoſe taking fell out profitable for her: becauſe al Mithridates other wiues and ſiſters whom they placed fartheſt off, as out of all daunger (and ſent into a countrey of greateſt ſafety, neare vnto the city of PHARNACIA) died pittifully, and were miſerably ſlaine. For Mithridates ſent one of the groomes of his priuy chamber vnto them called Bacchides, to bring them word that they muſt all die. Amongeſt many other noble Ladies, there were two of the kings ſiſters, called Roxane and Statira, which were forty yeares old a peece, and yet had neuer bene maried: and two of his wiues alſo whom he had maried, both of the countrey of IONIA, the one called Berenice, borne in the Ile of CHIO, & the other Monime, in the city of MILETVM. Monime, ſhe was very famous amongſt the GRECIANS: for notwithſtanding king Mithridates importunate dealing, being farre in loue with her, inſomuch as he ſent her fifteen thouſand crowns at one time, yet ſhe would neuer giue eare vnto his ſute, vntill ſuch time as the mariage was agreede vppon betweene them, and that he had ſent her his Diademe or royall band, and called her by the name and title of Queene. This poore Lady after the mariage of this barbarous king, had long liued a woful life, bewailing continually her accurſed beauty, that in ſtead of a husband, had procured her a maiſter: and in ſteade of the matrimoniall company which a noble woman ſhould enioy, had gotten her a gard and garriſon of barbarous men, that kept her as a priſoner, farre from the ſweete countrey of GREECE: in change whereof, ſhe had but a dreame and ſhadow of the hoped goods ſhe looked for, hauing vnfortunatly left them within her own country ſhe happely enioyed before. Now when this Bacchides was come vnto them, and had commaunded them from the king to chuſe what maner of death they would, and which euery one of them thought moſt eaſieſt, and leaſt painfull: Monime pluckt off the royall band from her head, and tying it on a knot about her necke, hung her ſelfe, but the band not being ſtrong enough, brake incontinently. Whereupon ſhe cried out: O curſed and wicked tiſſue, wilt thou not yet ſerue me to end my ſorrowfull daies? And ſpeaking theſe words, caſt it on the ground and ſpit vppon it, and held out her throte to Bacchides to be cut a ſunder. The other, Berenice, ſhee tooke a cuppe full of poyſon her mother being preſent, who prayed her to let her haue halfe, the which ſhe did, and they dranke it off betweene them. The force of the poyſon was ſtrong enough to kill the old mother weake with age, but not ſo quickly to deſtroy the daughter: becauſe ſhe had not taken that proportion which would haue ſerued her turne, but drue out the pains of her death in length, vntill ſuch time as Bacchides haſting to diſpatch her, ſhe in the end did ſtrangle her ſelfe. As for the kings two ſiſters, Roxane and Statyra, which were virgines yet vnmaried, they ſay, that one of them alſo dranke poiſon, curſing & deteſting the cruelty of her brother: howbeit Statira gaue neuer an euill word, nor was faint hearted or ſorowfull to die, but contrarily did commend and thanke her brother highly, that ſeeing himſelfe in danger, had not yet forgotten them, but was carefull to cauſe them die, before they ſhould fall as ſlaues into the handes of their enemies, and before they could come to diſhonor them, or doe them villany. Theſe pitifull misfortunes went to Lucullus heart, who was courteous & gentle of nature: neuertheleſſe he went on farther, ſtill following Mithridates at the heeles, vnto the city of TALAVRA. And there vnderſtanding that he was fled foure daies before vnto Tigranes in ARMENIA, returned backe againe, hauing firſt ſubdued the CHALDEANS, and the TIBARENIANS, taken ARMENIA the leſſe, and brought the cities, caſtles, and ſtrong places vnto his obedience. That done, he ſent Appius Clodius vnto king Tigranes, to ſummon him to deliuer Mithridates vnto him: and himſelf tooke his iorney towards the city of AMISVS, which was yet beſieged. The cauſe why this ſiege continued long, was the ſufficiencie and great experience of the Captaine that kept it for the king, called Callimachus. who vnderſtood ſo well how all ſortes of engines of batterie were to be vſed, and was ſo ſubtill beſides in all inuentions that might ſerue to defende a place beſieged, as hee troubled the ROMAINES much in this attempt: but afterwardes he was not onely met withall, and payed home for all his labor, but alſo outreached by Lucullus for all his fineneſſe. For where before he had alwaies vſed to ſound the retreat at a certaine houre, and to call his men backe from the aſſault to reſt them: one day he brake that order on the ſodaine, and comming to aſſaulte the wall, at the firſt charge wanne a peece of it, before thoſe within could come in time to reſiſt them. Callimachus ſeeing that, and knowing it was now vnpoſſible to keepe the city any longer, forſooke it. But before his departing he ſet the citie a fire, either for the malice to the ROMAINES, becauſe he would not they ſhould enriche themſelues with the ſacke of ſo great a citie: or elſe for a policie of warre to haue the more leaſure to ſaue himſelfe, and flie. For no man gaue eye to them that fled by ſea, becauſe the flame was ſo great, that it diſperſed it ſelfe euen to the very wals, and the ROMAINE ſouldiers, they only prepared to ſpoile. Lucullus ſeeing the fire without, had compaſſion of the citie within, and would gladly haue holpen it, and for the purpoſe prayed the ſouldiers quickly to quench it: but not a man would hearken to him, euery one gaping after the ſpoile, making great noiſe with claſſhing of harneſſe, and being very loude beſides otherwiſe, till at the length enforced thereunto, he gaue the city wholly to ſpoile, hoping thereby to ſaue the houſes from fire, but it fell out cleane contrary. For the ſoldiers themſelues in ſeeking all about with torches and lincks lighted, to ſee if any thing were hidden: they ſet a number of houſes a fire. So as Lucullus comming into the citie the next morning, and ſeeing the great deſolation the fire had made, fell of weeping, ſaying vnto his familiar friends about him: he had oftentimes before thought Sylla happy, howbeit he neuer wondred more at his good fortune, then that day he did. For, Sylla ſaid he, deſiring to ſaue the citie of ATHENS, the goddes granted him that fauor that he might do it: but I that would faine follow him therein, and ſaue this city, fortune thwarting my deſire, hath brought me to the reputation of Mummius, that cauſed CORINTHE to be burnt. Neuertheleſſe he did his beſt endeuor at that time to helpe the poore city againe. For touching the fire, euen immediatly after it was taken, by Gods prouidence there fell a ſhower of raine as it was newly kindled, that quenched it: and Lucullus ſelfe before he left the city, made a great number of the houſes which were ſpoiled by fire, to be built vp againe, and curteouſly receiued all the inhabitauntes that were fled, beſides them he placed other GRECIANS there alſo, that were willing to dwell amongeſt them, and increaſed the boundes and confines of the city which he gaue them, one hundred and twenty furlongs into the countrey. This city was a colony of the ATHENIANS, who had built and founded it, in the time that their Empire floriſhed, and that they ruled the ſeas: by reaſon whereof, many flying the tyranny of Ariſtion, went to dwell there, and were made free of the city, as the naturall inhabitants of the ſame. This good happe fell vpon them, that forſaking their owne goodes, they went to poſſeſſe and enioy the goodes of other men: but the very citizens of ATHENS it ſelfe that had eſcaped from this great deſolation, Lucullus clothed them well, and gaue them two hundred Drachmas a peece, and ſent them againe into their countrey. Tyrannion the grammarian was taken at that time, whom Muræna begged of

Lucullus: and Lucullus hauing granted him vnto him, he made him free, wherein he dealt verie diſcourteouſly, and did much abuſe Lucullus liberality and gift vnto him. For in beſtowing this priſoner vpon him, who was a famous learned man, he did not meane Muræna ſhould take him for a bondman, whereby he ſhould neede afterwardes to make him free. For ſeeming to make him free, and reſtore him to libertie: was no more but to take that freedome and libertie from him, which he had from his birth. But in many other things, and not in that only, Muræna laide himſelfe open to the world, that he had not all the partes a worthy Captaine ſhould haue in him. When Lucullus departed from AMISVS, he went to viſite the cities of ASIA, to the end that whileſt he was not now occupied with warres, they might haue ſome refreſhing of lawes and iuſtice. For, by reaſon that law was not executed of long time in ASIA, the poore country was ſo afflicted, and oppreſſed with ſo many euils and miſeries: as no man liuing would ſcant beleeue, nor any tongue can well declare. For, the extreame and horrible couetouſnes of the farmers, cuſtomers, and ROMAINE vſurers did not only deuour it, but alſo kept it in ſuch bondage and thraldome, that particularly the poore fathers were driuen to ſell their goodly young ſonnes and daughters in mariage, to pay the intereſt and vſurie of the money which they had borrowed to diſcharge their fines withall: & publickly the tables dedicated vnto the temples, the ſtatues of their goddes, & other church iewels: and yet in the end, they themſelues were alſo iuged to be bondmen and ſlaues to their cruell creditors, to weare out their daies in miſerable ſeruitude. And yet the worſt of all was, the paine they put them to before they were ſo condemned: for they impriſoned them, ſet them on the rack, tormented them vpon a litle braſen horſe, ſet them in the ſtockes, made them ſtand naked in the greateſt heate of ſummer, and on the iſe in the deepeſt of winter, ſo as that bondage ſeemed vnto them a reliefe of their miſeries, and a reſt of their torments. Lucullus founde the cities of ASIA full of ſuch oppreſſions, but in a ſhort time after he deliuered them all that were wrongfully tormented. For firſt he tooke order, they ſhould account for the vſury that was payed monethly, the hundred part of the principall debt onely, and no more. Secondly he cut off all vſuries that paſſed the principall. Thirdly, which was the greateſt matter of all, he ordained that the creditor & vſurer ſhould enioy the fourth part of the profits and reuenues of his debter. And he that ioined vſury with the principall, that is to ſay, tooke vſury vpon vſury: ſhould loſe the whole. So that by this order, all debts were paide in leſſe then foure yeares, and the owners lands and reuenues ſet cleare of all maner paiments. This ſurcharge of vſuries, came of the twenty thouſand talents, wherein Sylla had condemned the countrie of ASIA: the which ſumme they had payed twiſe before vnto the farmers and collectors of the ROMAINS, who had raiſed it, ſtill heaping vſury vpon vſury, to the ſumme of ſixe ſcore thouſand talents. Wherefore theſe collectors and farmers ranne to ROME, and cried out vpon Lucullus, ſaying, that he did them the greateſt wrong that could be, and by meanes of money, they procured certaine of the common counſellers to ſpeake againſt him: which they might eaſily doe, becauſe they had diuerſe of their names in their bookes that dealt in the affaires of the common wealth at ROME. But Lucullus was not onely beloued of thoſe countries whõ he did good vnto, but was wiſhed for and deſired alſo of others, who thought the countries happy that might haue ſuch a gouernor. Now for Appius Clodius, whom Lucullus had ſent before from TALAVRA vnto king Tigranes in ARMENIA, and whoſe ſiſter at that time was Lucullus wife: he firſt tooke certaine of the kings men for guides, who of very malice guided him through the high country, making him fetch a great compaſſe about, by many daies iornies ſpent in vaine: vntill ſuch time as one of his infranchiſed bondmen that was borne in SYRIA, taught him the right way. Whereupon he diſcharged theſe barbarous guides, and leauing the wrong waies they had led him, within few daies paſt ouer the riuer of Euphrates, and arriued in the city of ANTIOCH, ſurnamed EPIDAPHNE. Where he had commaundement to abide Tigranes return, who was then in the country of PHENICIA, where he ſubdued certain cities, & had ſome other yet to conquer. Appius in the meane time wanne ſecretly diuers of the princes and noble men, that obeyed this ARMENIAN king but for feare, by force, and againſt their wils, amongſt whom was Zarbienus, king of the prouince of GORDIÆNA: and promiſed the aide of Lucullus alſo to many the cities that ſent vnto him, (which had not long before bene ſubdued and brought into bondage) to whom neuertheles he gaue in expreſſe charge, that for the time they ſhould not once ſturre, nor alter any thing. For, the rule of theſe ARMENIANS was intollerable to the GRECIANS, and ſpecially the pride and arrogancie of the king. Who, by reaſon of his great proſperitie, was growen to ſuch pride and preſumption, that whatſoeuer men did commonly eſteeme beſt, & make moſt reckoning of, he would not only haue it, and vſe it as his owne, but alſo tooke it that all was made for himſelfe whatſoeuer: and this great ouerwening grew, by reaſon of fortunes ſpeciall grace and fauour towards him. For at the beginning he had but very litle, and yet with this litle (which few made reckoning of) he conquered many great nations, and plucked downe the power of the PARTHIANS as much as any man that euer was before him. He repleniſhed the coũtry of MESOPOTAMIA with GRECIAN inhabitantes, which he brought by force out of CILICIA and CAPPADOCIA, compelling them to inhabite there. He made the ARABIANS change their maner of liuing, who are otherwiſe called the SCENITES, as much to ſay, as tent dwellers, becauſe they are vagarant people that dwell in no other houſes but tentes, which they euer vſe to carie with them, and brought them out of their naturall countrie, and made them followe him, vſing them for his commoditie in trade of marchandice. There were euer many kings in his court that waited on him: but amongeſt others, he had foure kings that waited continually on his perſon as his footemen: for when he rode abroade any whither, they ranne by his ſtirroppe in their ſhirtes. And when he was ſet in his chaire of ſtate to giue audience, they ſtood on their feete about his chaire holding their handes together, which countenance ſhewed the moſt maniſeſt confeſſion and tokens of bondage that they could doe vnto him: as if they had ſhewed thereby that they reſigned all their libertie, and offered their bodies vnto their Lord and maiſter, more ready to ſuffer, then any thing to do. Notwithſtanding, Appius Clodius being nothing abaſhed nor feared with all this tragicall pompe, when audience was giuen him: tolde king Tigranes boldly to his face, that he was come to carie king Mithridates away with him, who was due to the triumphe of Lucullus: & therefore did ſummon him to deliuer that king into his hands, or elſe that he proclaimed warres vpon himſelfe. They that were preſent at this ſummons, knew well enough that Tigranes (although he ſet a good countenance of the matter openly with a fainte counterfeit laughing) yet hearing theſe words ſo boldly and gallantly ſpoken out of this young mans mouth, was galled to the quicke, and hit at the heart. For Tigranes hauing reigned, (or to ſay better tyrannically gouerned) fiue and twenty yeares ſpace, had neuer heard any bolde or francke ſpeach but that. Notwithſtanding, he anſwered Appius, that he would not deliuer Mithridates: and if the ROMAINES made wars with him, that he would defend himſelfe. And being greatly offended that Lucullus in his letters gaue him not the title, king of kings, but onely king ſimply: in the letters he wrote backe to Lucullus againe, he did not ſo much as vouchſafe to call him Captaine onely. But when Appius tooke his leaue, he ſent him goodly rich preſentes which he refuſed. Whereupon the king ſent others againe vnto him, of the which Appius tooke a cuppe only, becauſe the king ſhould not thinke he refuſed ought of anger, or ill will: and ſo ſending all the reſt againe vnto him, made great haſt to returne to his Captaine Lucullus. Now Tigranes before that time woulde not once ſee king Mithridates his ſo neare kinſeman, who by fortune of wars had loſt ſo puiſant and great a kingdome, but proudly kept him vnder in fenny, mariſh, and vnholeſome grounds, without any honor giuen vnto him, as if he had bene a very priſoner in deede: howbeit then he ſent for him honorably, and receiued him with great curteſie. When they were neare together in the kings palace, they talked ſecretly one with an other, and excuſing themſelues, clearing all ſuſpitions conceiued betweene them, to the great hurt of their ſeruauntes and friends, whom they burdened with all the occaſion of vnkindnes between them: amongſt which number Metrodorus the SCEPSIAN was one, a man excellently well learned, eloquent in ſpeach, and one whom Mithridates ſo much loued and eſteemed, that they called him the kings father. Mithridates at the beginning of his warres had ſent him Ambaſſador vnto Tigranes, to pray aide of him againſt the ROMAINES. At which time Tigranes ſaid vnto him: but what ſaieſt thou to it Metrodorus: what aduiſe wilt thou giue me? Metrodorus eyther becauſe he had regard vnto Tigranes profite, or elſe becauſe he was loth Mithridates ſhould eſcape, anſwered him againe. As Ambaſſador, O king, I would wiſh you ſhould do it: but as a counſellor, that you ſhould not do it. Tigranes now reported this ſpeech vnto Mithridates, not thinking hee would haue hurt Metrodorus for it, though in deede he preſently put him to death vpon it. Whereat Tigranes was heartily ſorie, and repented him greatly to haue tolde him ſo much, although he was not altogether the occaſion of his caſting away, hauing but onely reuiued Mithridates euill will before conceiued againſt him. For he had borne him diſpleaſure of a long time, as appeared amongſt his ſecret papers and writings that were taken from him, where he had ordained that Metrodorus ſhould be put to death: but in recompence thereof Tigranes buried his body honorably, ſparing no coſt at all vnto the dead bodie of him, whom liuing he had betraied. There died in king Tigranes court alſo an Orator called Amphicrates, if he deſerue that mention ſhould be made of him, for the citie of ATHENS ſake wherein he was borne: for it is ſaid, that when he was baniſhed out of his country, he fled into the citie of SELEVCIA, which ſtandeth vpon the riuer of Tigris. Whē the inhabitants of the ſame praied him to teach them the Art of eloquence in their country, he would not vouchſafe it, but anſwered them proudly: that a platter was too litle to holde a Dolphine in, meaning that their citie was too ſmall a thing to containe it. From thence he went vnto Cleopatra, Mithridates daughter, and king Tigranes wife, where he was quickly ſuſpected & accuſed: ſo that he was forbidden to frequent the GRECIANS company any more, which grieued him ſo much, that he famiſhed himſelfe to death, and would eate no meate. And that man was alſo very honorably buried by the Queene Cleopatra, neere vnto a place called Sapha, as they call it in that countrie. Now when Lucullus had quieted all things in ASIA, and had eſtabliſhed good lawes among them, he was not careleſſe alſo of games and pleaſant paſtimes, but while he was at leiſure in the city of EPHESVS, he made many games, feaſts, wreſtlings, and fence playes at the ſharpe for ioy of his victorie, delighting all the cities of ASIA with them, the which in recompence therof did inſtitute a ſolemne feaſt alſo in the honor of him, which they called Lucullea, and did celebrate it with great ioy, ſhewing a true and no fained friendſhip and good will towards him, which pleaſed him better, and was more to his contentation, then all the honour they could deuiſe to giue him. But after that Appius Clodius was returned from his Ambaſſade, and had tolde Lucullus that he muſt make wars with Tigranes: Lucullus went back againe vnto the realme of PONTVS, where he tooke his armie which he had left in garriſon, and brought it before the city of SINOPE to lay ſiege vnto it, or rather to beſiege certaine CILICIANS that were gotten into the city in the behalfe of Mithridates. But when they ſaw Lucullus come againſt them, they ſlue a great number of the citizens, and ſetting fire on the citie, fled their way by night. Lucullus being aduertiſed of it, entred the citie, put eight thouſand of the CILICIANS to the ſword which he founde there, and reſtored the naturall citizens and inhabitants thereof to all that was theirs. But the originall cauſe that made him to be careſull to preſerue the city, was this viſion he had. He thought in his nights dreame that one came to him, and ſayd: go a litle farther Lucullus, for Autolycus commeth, who is deſirous to ſpeake with thee. This dreame awaked him, but being awake could not imagine what the viſion meant. It was the ſelfe ſame day on the which hee tooke the city of SINOPE, where following the CILICIANS that eſcaped by flying, he found an image lying on the ground vppon the ſea ſide, which the CILICIANS would haue caried away: but they were taken and followed ſo neare, that they had no leyſure to ſhip it. This ſtatue (as it is reported) was one of the goodlieſt and notableſt workes of Sthenis the Image grauer. And ſome ſay that it was the image of Autolycus who founded the city of SINOPE. For Autolycus was one of the princes that went out of THESSALIE with Hercules to go againſt the AMAZONES, and he was the ſon of Deimachus. And they report that at the returne from this voyage, the ſhippe in the which Autolycus was imbarked, with Demoleon and Phlogius, made ſhippewracke vppon a rocke on the coaſt of CHERRONONESVS, where he was caſt away: howbeit that he & his mē ſcaping with al their furniture, came to the city of SINOPE, which he tooke from certaine SYRIANS, who came (as they ſay) of one Syrus the ſonne of Apollo, and of the nimphe Sinope Aſopus daughter. Lucullus vnderſtanding this matter, called a ſaying of Sylla to minde, which he wrote in his commentaries: that nothing is more certaine, nor that we may giue more credite vnto, then that which is ſignified to vs by dreames. In the meane ſeaſon he was aduertiſed that Tigranes and Mithridates were ready to come downe into LYCAONIA, & CILICIA, becauſe they might firſt enter ASIA. Lucullus maruelled much at Tigranes counſell, that ſithence he was minded to warre with the ROMAINES, he did not vſe Mithridates aide in his warres at ſuch time, as when he was in his beſt ſtrength and force: and that he did not then ioine his power with Mithridates, rather then ſuffer him to be deſtroyed and ouerthrowen, and afterwards with a cold hope goe now to begin a new warre, hazarding himſelfe with thoſe that could not helpe themſelues. While theſe things paſſed in this ſort, Machares king Mithridates ſonne, that kept the realme of BOSPHORVS, ſent a crowne of golde vnto Lucullus, of the waight of a thouſand crownes, praying him that he would name him a friend and confederate of the ROMAINES.

Whereupon Lucullus thought he was then at the very laſt end of his firſt warre, and leauing Sornatius with ſixe thouſand men to keepe the realme of PONTVS, he departed with twelue thouſand footmen, and leſſe then three thouſand horſemen to goe to the ſecond warres.

And herein all the world condemned him, and thought it too raſh and light a part of him to goe with ſo ſmall a companie to fight with ſo many warlike nations, and to put himſelfe vnto the hazard of ſo many thouſands of horſemen, in a maruellous large country, and of a wonderfull length, enuironned round about with deepe riuers and mountaines, couered with ſnow all the yeare through: ſo that his ſouldiers, which otherwiſe were no ſpeciall well trained men, nor obedient to their Captaine, followed with an euill will, and did ſtubbornly diſobey him.

And on the other ſide the common counſellers at ROME cried out on him continually and openly proteſted before all the people, that out of one warre he ſowed an other, which the common wealth had nothing to doe withall, and that he looked after none other thing but ſtill to raiſe new occaſions of warres, to the end he might alwayes haue armies at his commaundement, & neuer leaue the warres, becauſe he would make himſelfe great with the coſt and perill of the commonwealth. Theſe crying counſellers in the end obtained their purpoſe, which was: to call home Lucullus againe, and to ſubſtitute Pompey in his place. But Lucullus for all that, marched on with his army with all the poſſible ſpeed he could, ſo that he came in few daies vnto the riuer of Euphrates, the which he found very high and rough by reaſon of the winter ſeaſon: which troubled him maruellouſly at that preſent, doubting leaſt it would holde him there a long time in finding out of boats, and making of poſts and plancks to build a bridge to paſſe ouer his armie.

But towardes night the water began to fall a litle, and in the night fell ſo much, that the next morning the riuer was come to her ordinary ſtreame: and moreouer, the countrymen themſelues diſcerning certaine litle Ilands that appeared vnto them in the middeſt of the water courſe, and the riuer very calme as a marriſh rounde about them, did honor Lucullus as a god, becauſe it was a thing they had neuer ſeene chance before, as though at his comming the riuer had ſodainly yeelded vnto him, and was become gentle to giue him ſafe and eaſie paſſage. And becauſe he would not looſe that oportunity, he paſſed ouer his army immediatly: and was no ſooner on the other ſide, but he mette with a happy token of good lucke, which was this.

On the other ſide of the riuer, there was a certaine number of kine conſecrated to Diana Perſica, whom the barbarous people inhabiting beyond the riuer of Euphrates, do reuerence and honor aboue all the other goddes: and theſe kine they employ to none other vſe, but onely to ſacrifice them vnto this goddeſſe. They wander all about the countrey where they will, without any maner of tying, or ſhacling otherwiſe, hauing only the marke of the goddeſſe, which is a lampe printed vpon their bodies, and they are not eaſie to be taken when one would haue them, but with great a doe.

Kine conſecrated to Diana Perſica.

One of theſe conſecrated kine, after that Lucullus army was paſſed ouer Euphrates, came to offer her ſelfe vppon a rocke which they ſuppoſe is hallowed or dedicate vnto this goddeſſe, bowing downe her head, and ſtretching out her necke, like thoſe that are tied ſhort, as if ſhe had come euen of purpoſe to preſent her ſelfe to Lucullus, to be ſacrificed as ſhe was.

A ſtraunge thing of a cow that came to offer her ſelfe to Lucullus to be ſacrificed.

And beſides her, he ſacrificed a bull alſo vnto the riuer Euphrates, in token of thankes for his ſafe paſſage ouer. Lucullus the firſt day did nothing but encampe him ſelfe only, on the other ſide of the riuer: but the next morning and the other daies following, he went farther into the countrey by the riuer of SOPHENE, hurting none that came and yeelded vnto him, or that willingly receiued his army. his men would haue had him to haue taken a caſtle by force, where they ſaid was great ſtore of gold and ſiluer: he ſhewed them mount Taurus a farre off, and told them it is that which we muſt rather go to take. As for the things which be in this caſtle, they be kept for them that vanquiſh: and going on ſtill with great iorneyes, paſſed ouer the riuer of Tigris, and ſo entred the realme of ARMENIA with a maine armie. Now for Tigranes, the firſt man that ventured to bring him newes of Lucullus comming, had no ioy of it: for he cut off his head for his labor. And therefore from thenceforth there durſt no man ſay any thing vnto him, vntill ſuch time as he was at the laſt enuironned round with fire, which Lucullus armie had raiſed about him, before he could heare any thing thereof. For he was ſporting and gauding with his familiars, hearing their flattering tales, that Lucullus, in deede were a noble Captaine, if he durſt but tary Tigranes comming downe in the citie of EPHESVS onely, and how he would ſtraight flie out of ASIA, ſo ſoone as he might but heare tell of his comming againſt him with ſo triumphing an armie of ſo many thouſand men. And thus may we ſee, that like as all bodies and braines, are not a like ſtrong nor able to carie much wine: ſo in like caſe, all wits be not reſolute and conſtant, neuer to doe amiſſe, nor to ſwarue from reaſons bands in great proſperitie. Howbeit in the end, Mithrobarzanes, one of Tigranes familiars, was the next man that enterpriſed to tell him the truth: whoſe boldnes had litle better reward for his newes, then the firſt that was beheaded. For Tigranes ſent him immediatly with three thouſand horſe, and a good number of footemen, commaunding him that he ſhould bring Lucullus aliue vnto him, and that furthermore, he ſhould marche vpon the bellies of his men. Now was Lucullus alreadie camped with part of his armie, and the other part comming after, when his skoutes brought him newes of the barbarous Captaines approache: which at the firſt put him in feare, that if the enemy ſhould come and aſſaile them thus ſcattered in companies, and not ranged in battell, and ready to fight, he might ouerthrow them whiles they were in diſorder. And therefore he remained within his campe to fortifie the ſame, and ſent Sextilius one of his Lieutenants, with a thouſand ſixe hundred horſe, and as many footmen (or a fewe more) as well naked as armed: commaunding him to approach as neere to his enemie as he could without fighting, only to ſtay him there, vntill ſuch time as he heard news that all his army was come together into his campe. Sextilius went to doe his commaundement, but he was compelled to fight, (though againſt his will) Mithrobarzanes came ſo brauely & luſtily to aſſaile him. So was the battell ſtriken betweene them, in the which Mithrobarzanes was ſlaine valiantly fighting, and all his men either broken or killed, few excepted, that onely by flying ſaued themſelues. After this ouerthrow, Tigranes forſooke his great roiall citie of TIGRANOCERTA that he built himſelf, & went to mount Taurus, where he aſſembled a great number of men out of all parts. But Lucullus would giue him no leiſure to prepare himſelfe, but ſent Muræna on the one ſide to cut them off by the way, and to ouerthrow thoſe that were aſſembled about him: and on the other ſide Sextilius to ſtoppe a great company of the ARABIANS that were comming to Tigranes, whom Sextilius ſet vpon as they were ready to lodge, and ouerthrew them in maner euery man. And Muræna following king Tigranes at the heeles, ſpied an occaſion to giue the charge as he paſſed a long and narrow vally, in the bottome whereof the way was very ill, and ſpecially for an army of ſuch a length: and taking the oportunity, ſet vpon the rereward, which Tigranes perceiuing, fled ſtraight vppon it, making all his cariage to be throwen downe in the way before the enemies to ſtay them. There were a great number of the ARMENIANS ſlaine in this ouerthrow, and moe taken. Thoſe things hauing this ſucceſſe, Lucullus went to the city of TIGRANOCERTA, the which he beſieged round. In that city were a maruellous nūber of GRECIANS that had bene brought thither by force out of CILICIA, and many of the barbarous people alſo whom they had vſed in the like forcible maner, as they had done the ADIABENIANS, the ASSYRIANS, the GORDIÆNIANS, and the CAPPADOCIANS, whoſe towns and cities Tigranes had deſtroyed, and compelled them to come and inhabite there. By reaſon whereof, this city of TIGRANOCERTA was full of golde and ſiluer, of mettels, ſtatues, tables and pictures, becauſe euery man (as well priuate, as Princes and Lordes) ſtudied to pleaſe the king, to enrich and beautifie this city, with all kindes of furniture and ornamentes fit for the ſame. And hereuppon Lucullus ſtraighted the ſiege as much as he could, perſwading him ſelfe that Tigranes would neuer ſuffer, that it ſhould be taken, but (though he had otherwiſe determined) yet for very anger would preſent him battell, thereby to enforce him to raiſe his ſiege. And ſurely he geſſed right, had it not bene that Mithridates had diſſwaded him by expreſſe letters and meſſengers that he ſhould in no caſe hazard battell, and perſwaded him rather to cut off the victuals on all ſides from the ROMAINES with his horſmen. The ſelfe ſame counſell and aduiſe did Taxiles (the Captaine whom Mithridates ſent) giue him in his campe, & prayed him very earneſtly, that he would not proue the inuincible force of the ROMAINS. Tigranes patiently harkened to their reaſons at the firſt; but when the ARMENIANS were come, and all the force of the country beſides, and the GORDIÆNIANS, and that the kings of the MEDES and of the ADIABENIANS were come alſo with all their power, and that on the other ſide there came a maruellous great hoſt of the ARABIANS that dwel vpon the ſea of BABYLON, & a multitude of the ALBANIANS from the CASPIAN ſea, and of the IBERIANS their neighbors, beſides a great company of free people liuing without a king, that dwell by the riuer of Araxes, ſome comming freely to doe him pleaſure, other for their penſions and pay which he gaue them: then was there none other talke neither at his table, nor in councell, but of aſſured hope of victory, and of great bragges and barbarous threatnings, ſo that Taxiles was in great danger of himſelfe, becauſe he was againſt the determination taken in councell for giuing of the battell. Now was it thought that Mithridates did enuie the glory of king Tigranes, and therfore did thus diſſwade him from battell. For which reſpect Tigranes would not ſo much as tarry for him, and becauſe alſo Mithridates ſhould haue no part of the honour of his victory: but went into the fielde with all his great armie, vaunting amongſt his familiars as they report, that nothing grieued him but one, that he ſhould fight with Lucullus alone, and not with all the other ROMAINE Captains. Now this brauery was not ſo fond, nor ſo farre out of ſquare, but that there was great likelyhood of it when he ſaw ſo many ſundrie nations about him, ſo many kings that followed him, ſo many battelles of armed footmen, and ſo many thouſand of horſemen. For he had in his army of bow-men and ſlings onely, twenty thouſand: fiue and fifty thouſand horſe-men, whereof ſeuenteene thouſand men of armes, armed from toppe to toe, as Lucullus himſelfe wrote vnto the Senate: and a hundreth and fifty thouſand armed foot-men, deuided by enſignes and ſquadrons: of pyoners, carpenters, maſons, and ſuch other kind of handy-craftes men, to plaine wayes, to make bridges to paſſe ouer riuers, to ſtoppe ſtreames, to cut wood, and to make ſuch kind of workes, of this ſort of people, the number of fiue and thirty thouſand, who followed in battel ray in the rereward of the army, making their campe ſeeme farre greater, & by ſo much the more ſtronger. When Tigranes ſhewed on the toppe of mount Taurus, and that they might plainely ſee his whole army from the city, and that himſelfe alſo might eaſily diſcerne Lucullus army that beſieged TIGRANOCERTA: the barbarous people that were within the city were ſo glad of this ſight, that they made wonderfull ſhouts of ioy, and great clapping of hands, threatning the ROMAINS from their wals, and ſhewing them the army of the ARMENIANS. Lucullus in the meane time ſate in councell to conſider what was to be done: wherein ſome were of opinion that he ſhould raiſe his ſiege, and goe with his whole armie vndeuided againſt Tigranes. But others liked not that he ſhould leaue ſo great a number of enemies at his backe, neither that he ſhould raiſe his ſiege. Lucullus made them aunſwere, that neither of them both did counſell him well, but both together did counſell him right. Whereupon he deuided his armie, and left Muræna at the ſiege of TIGRANOCERTA with ſixe thouſand men: and he with foure and twenty cohortes (in the which were not aboue tenne thouſand armed foot-men) and all his horſe-men, with a thouſand bow-men, and ſlings or thereabouts, went towards Tigranes, and camped in a goodly broade field by the riuers ſide. The ROMAINES ſeemed but a handful to Tigranes campe, ſo that for a while Tigranes paraſites made but a Maye-game of thē to ſporte withall. For ſome mocked them to ſcorne, other drewe lottes, and played away their parte of the ſpoyles, as if they had already wonne the field: and euery one of the kings and Captaines came and offered themſelues to Tigranes, and beſought him euery man for himſelfe, that he would giue him the honor alone to leade this battell, & that it would pleaſe him to ſit by in ſome place to ſee the ſporte. Tigranes then, becauſe he would ſhewe that he could be as pleaſant as the reſt, ſpake a thing knowen to euery man. If they come as Ambaſſadours quoth he, they are very many: but if they come as enemies, they be but fewe. And thus they played vpon the ROMAINS, and tooke their pleaſure of them at that time: but the next morning by breake of day, Lucullus brought all his men armed into the field, and put them in order of battel. Now the camp of the barbarous people lay on the other ſide of the riuer toward the Eaſt, and by chance the ſtreame of the riuer turned ſodainely towards the Weſt, where there was a better ford to paſſe ouer. Wherfore Lucullus marching with his army by the riuers ſide, following the ſtreame to meet with ſome forde, caſting to get ouer, Tigranes thought he had marched away, and called for Taxiles, and ſayed vnto him, laughing. Doeſt thou ſee Taxiles thoſe goodly ROMAINE legions, whom thou praiſeſt to be men ſo inuincible, how they flie away now? Taxiles anſwered the king againe. I would your good fortune (O king) might worke ſome miracle this day: for doubtles it were a ſtrange thing that the ROMAINS ſhould flie. They are not wont to weare their braue coates and furniture vpon their armour, when they meane onely but to march in the fieldes: neither doe they carry their ſhieldes and targets vncaſed, nor their burganets bare on their heades, as they doe at this preſent, hauing throwen awaye their leather caſes and couerings. But out of doubt, this goodly furniture we ſee ſo bright and gliſtering in our faces, is a manifeſt ſigne that they intend to fight, and that they march towardes vs. Taxiles had no ſooner ſpoken theſe words, but Lucullus in the view of his enemies, made his enſigne bearer turne ſodainly that caried the firſt Eagle, & the bands tooke their places to paſſe the riuer in order of battell. Then Tigranes ſecretly come to himſelfe, as out of drunkennes: cried out aloude twiſe, or thrice, come they then to vs? But then was there no ſmall ſturre and tumult, to put ſuch a world of people into battell. The king Tigranes himſelfe vndertooke to leade the middle battell, gaue the left wing vnto the king of the ADIABENIANS, & the right vnto the king of the MEDES: in the which were the moſt part of the compleat armed men, who made the firſt front of al the battel. But as Lucullus was ready to paſſe the riuer, there were certaine of his Captaines that came vnto him, to wiſh him to take heede that he fought not that day, becauſe it was one of thoſe which the ROMAINES thought vnfortunate, and call them Atri, as to ſay, blacke: for vpon one of thoſe dayes, one Capio was ouerthrown in a ſet battell with all his army by the CIMBRES. But Lucullus gaue thẽ a prety anſwer againe, which is not forgotten to this day: I will make this a happy day (ſayed he) for the ROMAINES. It was the ſixteenth day of the month of October. And ſo with thoſe wordes encouraging his men, paſſed ouer the riuer, and went himſelfe the foremoſt man, and marched directly towardes his enemy, armed with an anima of ſteele, made with ſcalloppe ſhelles, ſhining like the ſunne, and vpon that an arming coate fringed round about, holding his ſword drawn in his hand: to let his men vnderſtand, that they muſt ſodainly ioyne with their enemies, and fight at the ſwords poynte, that were not acquainted to fight but a farre off with ſhotte and ſlings, and that he would ſo quickely winne the diſtance of grounde they had to marche ere they could ioyne, that they ſhould haue no leaſure to ſhoote. And furthermore, perceiuing that the ſtrength of their men of armes (whereof they made ſo great account) was ranged in battell vnder a hill, the top whereof was very plaine and euen, and the way vp the hill not paſſing foure furlongs trauell, and not very hard nor ſteepe to clime: he ſent thither certaine horſemen of the THRACIANS and GAVLES which he had in pay, and commanded them to giue a charge on the flanck to diſorder them, and aſſay to cut their launces, with their ſwordes. For all the ſtrength of theſe men of armes conſiſteth in their launces, and they canne do nothing for themſelues, nor againſt their enemies, they are ſo heauily armed and loden: ſo as it ſeemeth they are locked vp in their armor, as in an iron priſon. And he himſelfe therewithall taking two enſignes of footmen, ſtroue alſo to gaine the toppe of the hill, his ſouldiers following him hard at the heels with a notable corage, becauſe they ſaw him the formoſt man trauelling a foote, and digging againſt the height of the hill. When he had gotten vp to the top, he ſtayed a litle in the higheſt place he could finde, and then cryed out with a loude voyce: oh companions, the victory is ours. And as he ſpake thoſe wordes, he ledde them againſt theſe men of armes, commaunding them they ſhould not meddle with throwing of their darts, but taking their ſwords in their hands they ſhould ſtrike at their thighes and legs, becauſe they haue no other partes of their bodies naked. Howbeit there was no neede of ſuch fight, for they taried not the Romains, but with great crying out turned their horſe heades immediately, and ranne cowardly ( themſelues and their horſes, heauie armed as they were ) through the middeſt of the bandes of their footemen, before they had ſtricken a ſtroke. And thus were ſo many thouſands of men broken without any ſtroke ſtriken, or any man hurt, or one droppe of blood ſeene to be ſpilt. But the greate ſlaughter was, when they began to flie, or (to ſay better) when they thought to flie: for they could not flie, they ranne ſo one vpon anothers necke by reaſon of the maruellous length and bredth of their battelles. Tigranes amongſt the reſt was one of the firſt that diſlodged with a ſmall company, and ſeing his ſonne running the ſame fortune, flying as himſelfe did, tooke off his diademe or royall bande from his head, and gaue it him weeping, commaunding him to ſaue himſelfe as well as he could by ſome other way. But the young prince durſt not put it on his head, but gaue it to one of his truſty ſeruauntes to keepe, who by chaunce was taken and brought vnto Lucullus: ſo that amongſt the other ſpoyle and priſoners, there was taken Tigranes diademe. It is thought that there were ſlaine at this ouerthrow, aboue a hundreth thouſand footmen, and very few of all the horſmem ſaued. On the Romains ſide, there were about a hundreth hurt, and fiue ſlaine. Antiochus the Philoſopher ſpeaking of this battell in a treatiſe he made of the gods, writeth that the ſunne neuer ſawe the like ouerthrow. And Strabo another Philoſopher in a certaine abridgement he made of ſtories ſayed, that the Romaines were aſhamed and laughed at thē ſelues that they had drawen their ſwordes againſt ſuch daſtardly ſlaues. And Titus Liuius declareth alſo, that the Romaines were neuer in any battell with ſo ſmall a number of fighting men, againſt ſo great a multitude of enemies: for the conquerors were not in all the world the twentith part (nothing like) of thoſe that were ouercome. Wherefore the oldeſt and beſt experienced Captaines of the Romaines did highly commend Lucullus, becauſe he had ouercome two of the greateſt & moſt mighty princes of the world, by two ſundry cōtrary means: the one by tract and delay, and the other by ſpeed and ſwiftnes. For he vndermined and conſumed Mithridates, by holding backe, & delaying, at that time whē al his ſtrēgth was whole: and to the contrary he deſtroied Tigranes with great ſpeede and haſte. And thus did he that, which few Captaines could euer do: that is, vſed delay of time to execute, and valiant expedition to win the victory. This was the cauſe why Mithridates made no haſt to come to the battell, thinking ſtill that Lucullus had vſed his wōted policy, to delay and giue backe alwaies: and therfore he came by ſmall iornies vnto Tigranes campe. But meeting at the firſt with a few of the Armenians that fled as he came on his way, like men that had bene frayed, he ſtraight miſtruſted the ouerthrow: but afterwards meeting greater troupes of them naked, & ſore wounded, then he knew how the matter went. So he went to ſeeke out Tigranes, whom he found alone, forſaken of his men, & in very poore eſtate, yet did not he requite Tigranes in aduerſity with that pride & diſdaine he had vſed him before in his miſerie: but lighted off his horſe, to bewaile with him their common misfortune, and gaue him all his officers, & traine of a kings court that followed him to ſerue him, comforting him, & exhorting him to pluck vp his hart againe, and to be couragious thenceforth. Hereupon they both leauied a freſh the whole force & power they could from all the parts of their dominions. In the meane ſeaſon, there fell out great ſeditiō in the city of Tigranocerta, betwene the Grecians and the barbarous people: for the Grecians, they would haue yeelded vp the towne into Lucullus hands. Whereupon, Lucullus giuing an aſſault to the citie at that very inſtant, won it, and ſeazed vpon the kings treaſure there, leauing all the reſt to the ſpoile of the ſoldiers: in the which, beſides all other riches, there was eight thouſand talents in ready money. And yet beſides all that, he gaue of the ſpoile that was won vpō the enemies, eight hūdreth Drachmas vnto euery ſouldier. And vnderſtanding that there were diuerſe muſitians, common players, minſtrels, & ſuch kind of people meete for feaſtes and ſport, whom Tigranes had ſent for thither from all partes, to dedicate the Theater he had made in this city: he cauſed all thē to ſerue at the ſportes and feaſtes of this victory. After the ſolemnization whereof, he ſent the Grecians home againe vnto their country, and gaue them money to defray their charges by the way, and the barbarous people alſo that were brought thither by force from their natiue coūtries. And ſo

it fortuned,that by the deſolation and deſtruction of a city forſaken,many others were built againe,and ſtored with people: becauſe thoſe cities had therby recouered their naturall inhabitants againe,who euer after did loue and honor Lucullus,as their benefactor and founder. All other things proſpered alſo according to his vertue and merites. For Lucullus liked better the praiſe that came of bounty,of iuſtice, and of clemencie: then that that came by force of martiall prowes and cheualry. For in deedes of armes,he ſayed his army partly deſerued praiſe,& fortune alſo caried the beſt parte away: but the praiſe of the other, were onely due vnto himſelfe. Wherby he ſhewed the valure of an excellent good man, well taught and trained vp in vertue: and ſo reaped the frute of his worthy deſerts. For by thoſe good partes,he wanne the hartes of the barbarous people in ſuch ſorte, that the kings of the ARABIANS came of good will to put themſelues and their goods into his hands.So did the nation of the SOPHENIANS alſo yeeld themſelues vnto him.The GORDIÆNIANS, in like manner,they liked Lucullus ſo wel,that they would willingly haue forſakē their cities,houſes & cōutry, to follow him with their wines and children vpon this occaſion. Zarbienus king of theſe GORDIÆNIANS,as we haue recited before,had priuily entred amity with Lucullus,by meanes of Appius Clodius,who could no longer away with the tirāny of Tigranes.This practiſe was bewrayed vnto Tigranes who put Zarbienus,his wife & children to death,before the ROMAINS maine army came into the cōutry of ARMENIA. Howbeit Lucullus did not forget it,but paſſing through his realme, gaue him very roiall funerals, for hauing heaped vp a huge pile of wood, ſumptuouſly ſet out with cloth of gold and ſiluer, and other rich ſpoyles of Tigranes: he himſelfe in perſon,would needs ſet it a fire,and made the funerall effuſions & accuſtomed ſprinklings at burials, with his friendes and kinſmen, doing him this honor,as to call him friend and confederate of the ROMAINE people,& appointed alſo a great ſumme of money beſides to erect a ſumptuous tombe for him. For they found great ſtore of gold and ſiluer in the kings caſtell,and there was plenty of prouiſion alſo of three hundreth thouſand buſhels of wheate: the which did enrich his ſouldiers maruellouſly, and made Lucullus to be wondred at, that hauing receiued not one Drachma from the ſparing coffers at ROME,he had notwithſtanding made the warre entertaine it ſelfe. About the ſelfe ſame time alſo,the king of the PARTHIANS ſent Ambaſſadors vnto him to offer him his friendſhip and alliance: which Lucullus willingly accepted, and ſent Ambaſſadors frō him alſo of acceptation, who made report to Lucullus at their returne, that the king of the PARTHIANS ſtood doubtfull how to reſolue which part he ſhould take, and that ſecretly he ſent vnto Tigranes,to aske the realm of MESOPOTAMIA for his reward to aid him againſt the ROMAINS. Lucullus being truly enformed of the king of PARTHIAES double dealing, determined to leaue Tigranes & Mithridates, as two enemies wearied & ouercome, & a litle to proue the force & power of the PARTHIANS by making wars vpon thē,thinking it great honor vnto him, if he might diſcomfit & ouerthrow three ſo mighty kings one after an other, like a valiant conqueror that had ouercome three famous Captaines together, and had paſſed through the countries of three of the greateſt Princes vnder the ſunne, alwayes a conqueror, and neuer conquered. Hereupon he wrote immediatly vnto Sornatius and other of his Captaines which he had left to keepe the realme of PONTVS,that they ſhould repayre to him with all ſpeede with the bandes they had vnder their charge, for that he was determined to depart out of the country of GORDIÆNA, to go againſt the PARTHIANS: howbeit his purpoſe altered by occaſion. For his Lieutenantes that had many times before founde their ſouldiers mutinous,and rebelling at their commandements,knew plainely then their cancred ſtomaks & incorrigible diſobedience. For they could not poſſibly get them from thence, by any compulſion or perſwaſions they could vſe but contrarily they cryed out, and tolde them plainly,that they would no longer tary where they were, but would go hom to their cōutry, and leaue the realme of PONTVS without gard or garriſon at all. And farther, that worſt of al was,when theſe newes were brought to Lucullus campe,they gaue a full example of boldneſſe to his ſouldiers there,to mutiny in ſuch ſorte, hauing goodwill and diſpoſition thereunto of themſelues before. For their purſes being full,and they acquainted with finenes, were become ſo dull and laſie,that they could endure no paines nor hardnes of warres,but deſired to liue in all idlenes and eaſe. And hearing the reporte of their fellowes ſtoutneſſe, called them luſtie laddes, ſaying, they muſt needes take the like courſe, and doe as they taught them, vaunting of their good ſeruice of long time done, which well deſerued leaue now to departe home with ſafety, and thenceforth take their reſt. Lucullus hearing of this their talke, & many other their words worſe, & fuller of ſedition then theſe: brake off his enterpriſe againſt the PARTHIANS, and went againe in the middeſt of ſommer to meet with Tigranes But when he was come to the top of mount Taurus, it grieued him to ſee the fields ſo full of wheate yet ſtanding, which came by the ſeaſon of the yeare, and coldnes of the aier, being ſo ſlacke and ſlowe in all thoſe partes. Neuertheles, he came down into the valley, and at two or three skirmiſhes ouerthrew the ARMENIANS, that ventured to abide his comming downe. And ranne ouer all the valley, and deſtroied the whole country, without lette or ſtop of any man, taking away the prouiſion of corne that was made for Tigranes campe: wherby he ſtraighted his enemies vnto that need and neceſſity of victuals which himſelfe feared, & yet ceaſed not to prouoke them (by all other meanes) to come to battell. Sometime encloſing their campe with trēches about, as if he ment to famiſh them: ſometime againe deſtroying and ſpoyling the whole coūtry before their face. But becauſe they had ſo ofte bene diſcomfited, they would no more ſtirre, nor once moue againſt him. Lucullus perceiuing that, in the end raiſed his campe, & went and layed ſiege vnto ARTAXATA, the chief city of the kingdō of ARMENIA, in the which were Tigranes lawfull wiues and young children, hoping that Tigranes would rather hazard another battell, thē ſuffer that city to be loſt. It is ſayed that Hanniball of CARTHAGE (after king Antiochus was ouerthrown in battell by the ROMAINS) went vnto king Artaxes, whō he taught many neceſſary and profitable things for his realme: & amongſt others, conſidering that one of the goodlieſt and pleaſanteſt places of all his kingdome lay waſt, and no reckoning made of it, drewe a plot of a city, brought the king thither, and cauſed it to be built and inhabited. The king liked his deuiſe maruellous well, and prayed him to take the charge vpon him to ſee the worke finiſhed. And thus was this noble and famous city built, and called after the kings name, Artaxata: and held euer after the reputation of the chiefeſt place of the whole realme of ARMENIA. Tigranes being aduertiſed that Lucullus went to lay ſiege thereunto, could not endure it, but went with all his army to follow the ROMAINS, and the fourth day came & camped hard by them: inſomuch as there was but the riuer of Arſanias betwene them, which the ROMAINS of neceſſitie muſt paſſe ouer to goe to ARTAXATA. Lucullus hauing firſt ſacrificed vnto the gods, aſſuring himſelfe of the victorie, as if he had it already in his handes: made his armie paſſe ouer in order of battell, putting twelue cohortes in the fronte, and the other behinde, fearing leaſt the enemies hauing a great number of men of armes ſhould enuironne them at their backes. They had againſt them alſo the MARDIAN bowmen a horſebacke, & the IBERIANS with their lāces, in whom Tigranes truſted more then in any other, as in the beſt ſoldiers he had in pay: & yet for all that they did no notable ſeruice. For when they had skirmiſhed but a litle with the horſemen of the ROMAINES, they durſt not tarry the legionaries or footbandes that came behind them, but diſperſed themſelues, ſome flying one way, ſome an other, which intiſed the ROMAINE horſemen to follow the chaſe. But when the men of armes that were about Tigranes perſon, ſaw the horſemen ſo ſcattered abroad, they began ſtraight to breake vpon the footmen. Lucullus ſeeing the great multitude of them, and how paſſingly they were armed and appointed, being ſomewhat afrayed thereof: ſent in haſte to call in his horſmen that followed the chaſe, and in the meane time himſelfe marched foremoſt, againſt theſe Lordes and Satrapes, which were in the front before him with all the nobility of their hoaſt, whom he put in ſuch a feare, that before he could come to hand ſtrokes, they all turned taile and fled. There were three kings ranged in battell one hard by another, howbeit of the three, he that fled moſt ſhamefully and cowardly, was Mithridates king of PONTVS, who had not the hart ſo much as to abide the cries of the ROMAINES. The chaſe was very long: for it cōtinued all night vntil ſuch time as the ROMAINS were wearied with killing, taking of priſoners, and packing vp of all kindes of ſpoyles. Titus Liuius ſayeth, that there were ſlaine moe men in the firſt battell: but greater perſonages in the ſecond: and the chiefeſt of the enemies were all taken. After this battell Lucullus hart being bigge, and fearing nothing, determined to go farther into the country, euen vtterly to deſtroy this barbarous king. But in the time of the equinoctiall autumne, (whē the weather waxed more bitter then any man would in that ſeaſon haue thought) there fell out ſo great a cold, that for the moſt part, it did nothing but ſnow: and if the element did any thing cleere, then froſe it ſo hard, that the horſe could come by no water, the riuers were ſo extreamely congealed with iſe. And there could no man paſſe ouer by ford: for they did not ſo ſoone enter, but the iſe brake and cut the veines and ſinewes of the horſe legges aſunder, they were ſo hard and thicke withall. And furthermore the country being full of trees, woods and forreſts, and the wayes very narrowe, not being able to paſſe by the fields, they were through wet with ſnow that fell vpon them: and whē they came to their lodging, then it was worſe, for there they were conſtrained to lye in ſoft & moiſt places. And therefore the ſouldiers had followed but few dayes after this battell, but they refuſed to goe any farther. And firſt they ſent their Colonells and Captaines to intreate Lucullus to leaue off this iorney. Afterwards they gathered together more boldly in troupes, and in the night time beganne to murmur and groyne in their tentes (which is a certaine ſigne and token of a mutinous armie, that hath a minde to rebell againſt their Generall) although that Lucuuus vſed all gentle perſwaſions to winne them with patience to abide this iorney, at the leaſt, till time they might take the cittie of CARTHAGE in ARMENIA: to the end they might there deſtroy the worke & memory of the greateſt enemy that euer the ROMAINS had in the world, meaning Hanniball. But when he ſaw all this would not preuaile, he brought them backe againe, & paſſed ouer mount Taurus an other way, and came down into the country called MYGDONIA, a very hot and fertile ſoyle, where there is a great cittie, and maruellouſly repleniſhed with inhabitants: who call it NISIBIS, and the GRECIANS call it ANTIOCH, of MYGDONIA. In that city Gouras was Gouernor, who was Tigranes own brother: but for experiēce in engines of battery, and for ſufficiencie and skill in ſuch matters, there was Callimachus alſo, he that ſo maruellouſly troubled Lucullus before at the ſiege of the citie of AMISVS. Lucullus placing his campe before this citie beſieged the ſame by all ſuch meanes as might enforce it, and that ſo valiantly, that in very ſhort time he tooke it by aſſault. And as for Gouras, who ſubmitted him ſelfe to Lucullus mercie, he was very courteouſly intreated. But for Callimachus, he would not once heare him ſpeake, notwithſtãding that he promiſed, if they would ſaue his life, he would tell them of coffers full of great treaſure hidden, which no man knew but himſelfe onely. But Lucullus commanded them to bring him with gyues to receiue the puniſhment he had iuſtly deſerued, for ſetting the city of AMISVS on fire, and taking from him the meane to ſhewe the GRECIANS his goodnes, affection and liberalitie towards them. Vntill this preſent time, it might be truly ſayed, that good fortune euer fauored & followed Lucullus in all his enterpriſes and affayres: but from that time forwards, it was quickly ſeene that the fauorable blaſt of fortune failed him, he did all his things with ſo great paine, and all that he did, fell out contrarie vnto him, and to very ill purpoſe. Indeede he did euer ſhew the valiancie, patience, and great courage that ſhould be in a valiant Generall, or Lieutenant of an army. But his exploites and doings had neuer after that eaſie grace, nor ſhining glory they were wont to haue: but to the contrary, he was like to haue loſt all that he had wonne before, through the miſfortunes that fell vpon him, and for the brawles & vaine contention he had with his people to no purpoſe. But the worſt was, that they make himſelfe the only author of all theſe euils: becauſe he could not, or would not entertaine the good will of the multitude of his ſouldiers: thinking that whatſoeuer a generall, or any other officer of ſtate or calling doth to pleaſe and content them he hath vnder his charge, is to diſhonor himſelfe, and to giue cauſe vnto his ſouldiers to deſpiſe his authoritie. But that which made moſt againſt him was this: that he gaue no eſtimation to gentlemen, and men of like quality to himſelfe, but diſdained them, and thought them vnworthy to be equall with him. For theſe they ſay were his faultes and imperfections, but otherwiſe that he wanted no vertues, nor naturall giftes & good conditions that could be poſſibly wiſhed for, or deſired. For he was a tall gentleman, of goodly preſence, well ſpoken, wiſe and diſcreete, as well in matters of gouernment, as in warres: and as well to perſwade the people in peace, as to encourage his ſouldiers in war. Saluſt writeth of him, that his ſouldiers began to miſlike with him, euen from the firſt entry into theſe wars, becauſe he made them lye out two winters together in the field, one after another: the one before the city of CIZICVS, and the other before the citie of AMISVS. And euen as much did the other winters following vexe and trouble them. For either they lay in their enemies countrie, or elſe if they lay in their friendes, yet he made them campe abroad in the field, and ſhrowd themſelues in their tentes: for Lucullus neuer entred with his armie into any city or confederate towne of GRECE. Now if the ſouldiers of thẽſelues miſliked Lucullus, the counſellers at ROME that were his enemies, and enuied his proſperitie and glory, gaue them yet greater occaſions to mutine againſt him. For they continually accuſed him to the people in their orations, that he drew out this war in length, purpoſely becauſe he would alwaies haue occaſion to rule, & meanes to get, hauing in his hands in maner all CILICIA, ASIA, BITHYNIA, PAPHLAGONIA, GALATIA, PONTVS, ARMENIA, & all the prouinces & regions as farre as to the riuer of Phaſis: and yet he had not long before ſpoiled the Princely houſes of Tigranes, as if he had bene ſent thither only to ſacke and ſpoyle, and not to deſtroy & ouercome thoſe kings. And they ſay that it was Lucius Quintius, one of the Prætors that ſpake theſe wordes. It was he alſo that moſt moued the people to take order that Lucullus ſhould be called home, & other ſent to ſucceede him in the charge and gouernmẽt of the countries he had ſubdued. By the ſelfe ſame meane, it was alſo ordained: that diuers which were vnder his charge, ſhould be diſpenſed withall for their othes, and licenced to leaue the warres when they thought good. But beſides thoſe & ſuch like great cauſes, there was yet another more dangerous plague, and that moſt ouerthrew Lucullus proceedings, paſſing all the other euils being put together: and that was Publius Clodius, a wicked, licentious, and a hatebrainde man. He was Lucullus wiues brother, and ſhe was ſo light of her bodie, that Clodius her brother was accuſed of incontinencie with her. This Clodius being at that time in Lucullus campe, caried not that eſtimation and credit he thought himſelfe worthy of. For he tooke himſelfe equall with the beſt, and would needes haue bene holden for chiefe: when in deede there were many of farre better deſert, he being noted both for a vitious and ill diſpoſed perſon. Whereupon he beganne for ſpight to ſuborne the bands called FIMBRIANS, and to ſtirre them vp againſt Lucullus, ſowing ſweete and pleaſant wordes amongſt the ſouldiers, which being wonted therunto, looked ſtil to be flattered. For they were thoſe whom Fimbria had procured to kill the Conſull Flaccus, and chooſe him in his ſteede for their Captaine. By reaſon whereof they gaue good eare to Clodius words, and called him a noble Captaine, and a louer of ſouldiers. For when he ſpake vnto them, he made as though he had pittied them, for that they ſhould neuer ſee an end of their great paines and warres, but ſhould miſerably conſume their daies in fighting continually, ſometime with one nation, and ſometime with another: and that they wandered through all the countries of the world, receiuing no worthy reward of ſo long and painefull ſeruice, ſeruing only to gard Lucullus carts & camels loden with plate and veſſell of golde and ſiluer, and other pretious ſtones. Where the ſouldiers that had ſerued vnder Pompey, tooke now their eaſe at home in their country with their wiues and children, and were landed men, dwelling in goodly faire cities, as rich burgeſes and wealthy citizens: and yet they had not driuen Mithridates and Tigranes out of their kingdomes, into deſert places vnhabitable, nor had deſtroyed the Princely houſes of ASIA, but only made a litle warre in SPAYNE againſt thoſe that were baniſhed, & in ITALIE againſt fugitiue ſlaues. Shall we then, ſaid he, carie harneſſe on our backes all the daies of our life? Is it not better that we which are eſcaped vntill this preſent, reſerue our ſelues, our bodies & liues for that noble Captaine, who eſteemeth the greateſt honor and glory he can atchieue vnto, is to make his ſouldiers rich that ſerue vnder him? Lucullus armie was ſo ſeduced and corrupted with theſe mutinous and ſeditious accuſations, that the ſouldiers would no longer follow him, neither againſt Tigranes, nor againſt Mithridates: who went preſently out of ARMENIA into his realme of PONTVS, and began to conquer it againe, whileſt the ROMAINE ſouldiers mutining againſt their General, remained idle in the prouince of GORDIÆNA, excuſing themſelues by the winter ſeaſon, and tarying vntill Pompey or ſome other Captaine ſhould quickly come to raiſe the ſiege, and ſucceede Lucullus. Notwithſtanding, when they vnderſtoode that Mithridates had ouerthrowen Fabius, one of Lucullus Lieutenants, and that he went againſt Sornatius & Triarius: they were then aſhamed of themſelues, and became contented to be led by Lucullus. But Triarius in a brauery, when he heard that Lucullus drew neere, made haſt to winne the victory, as if it had beene cocke ſure before Lucullus came: and was himſelfe ouerthrowen in a great battell, where ſome ſay there died aboue ſeuen thouſand ROMAINES, amongſt the which were a hundred and fiftie centurions, & foure and twentie Captaines or Collonels of a thouſand men a peece, and yet beſides, Mithridates tooke their campe alſo. Shortly after this ouerthrow, Lucullus came thither, who hid Triarius, whom the ſouldiers ſought in their anger by all the meanes they could to kill. Now when Lucullus was come, he proued ſundry meanes to procure Mithridates to battell: but Mithridates would not once ſturre abroad, becauſe he looked for Tigranes that came downe with a mightie power. Whereupon he determined againe to goe againſt Tigranes to fight with him, before Mithridates and he ioyned forces together. But as he was in his iorney towardes him, the FIMBRIAN bandes beganne to rebell anew, and would not follow his enſignes, ſaying, and alleaging of themſelues, that by decree of the people they had leaue to depart, and were diſcharged from their othe: and furthermore that Lucullus had no more to do to commaund them, conſidering that the gouernment of the prouinces which he had, was giuen vnto others. Lucullus perceiuing this, did ſo humble himſelfe vnto them, ſuppoſing that way to winne them, as there was no kind of vncomely humilitie but he ſubmitted himſelfe vnto it: inſomuch as he went into their tentes to pray and intreate them one after an other, with water in his eyes, and with ſo great lowlineſſe, as euen to ſhake handes with them. But they fiercely reiected all his courteſies & faire intreaties, caſting their penniles purſes before him, and angrily bad him fight with his enemies alone, ſince he had with the ſpoile of them all ſo well enriched himſelfe alone. Neuertheleſſe, at the interceſſion and earneſt requeſt of the other ſouldiers, theſe FIMBRIAN bands were compelled to promiſe, that they would yet tarry all that ſommer, ſo that if no man in the meane time offred the battell, at the end of the tearme, they might goe where they would. Lucullus was forced to accept this condition, or els to remaine alone, & conſequently to forſake the country of the barbarous people. With much a doe thus he kept them together, but in ſuch ſort, as he durſt no more venter to compell them to come to battell, contenting himſelfe that they were willing onely to ſtay with him, being forced to ſuffer Tigranes in the meane time to deſtroy and ouerrun the country of CAPPADOCIA, & Mithridates alſo to bragge againe, of whom he had before written to the Senate that he had vtterly ouercome him: inſomuch as there came commiſſioners & deputies from ROME by his owne procurement, to order the ſtate of the realme of PONTVS with him, as of a kingdom already won to the ROMAINE Empire. But whē they were come, they found him not maſter of himſelfe, and that his owne ſouldiers flouted him, and did him all the ſpight and iniury they could. For they were ſo vnruly towards their Captaine, and did ſo much diſdaine him, that when the end of the ſommer was come, they armed themſelues with armor and weapon, and drawing out their ſwordes in mockery, challenged their enemies to battell which were gone out of the fielde: and after they had made the noyſe and cries accuſtomed when they ioyned battell, and made as though they fought, hurling and ſwinging their ſwords in the aire, they went from the campe, declaring openly that their time was expired, which they promiſed Lucullus to tary. On the other ſide Pompey had written vnto the other ſouldiers that were yet in campe, to come vnto him: for through the peoples fauor at ROME, the practiſes and flatteries of the common counſellers there, he was ſubſtituted Generall in Lucullus place. Which much miſliked the Senate and nobilitie: for they thought Lucullus greatly wronged to haue a ſucceſſour ſent, not to ſucceede him in troubles and dangers, but in honour and glory of triumph. And that they ſhould compell him not onely to reſigne vp the office of a Generall to an other, but (for the good ſeruice he long time had done) the reward of his honour due for the ſame: and this alſo more miſliked them that were then about him. That ſo ſoone as Pompey was arriued in ASIA, he tooke all power & authority from Lucullus, to puniſh or reward any man for good or ill ſeruice done to the common wealth in thoſe warres, & did moreouer prohibite by publicke bils ſet vp in euery common place, that they ſhould no more repaire vnto him, nor obey ought that he, or any of the ten cōmiſſioners ſent to diſpoſe of the ſtate of the prouinces wonne by him, ſhould commaund or ordaine: and becauſe Pompey came with a greater power and armie then his, he was in ſome feare of him. Lucullus triumph.

tinently,in a village of GALATIA,where at their firſt meeting they ſaluted ech other very curteouſly,reioycing together of the noble victories that either had wonne. Lucullus was the elder man,but P*ompey* of greater dignity,becauſe he had bene Generall of the ROMAINE people in many warres,& had alreadie triumphed twiſe. The bundels of roddes which the ſergeants caried before them, were wreathed about with laurell branches for the victories they had both atcheiued: but P*ompeys* bundels were withered away, becauſe they had come a long iorney through hotte and dry countries. Lucullus officers ſeeing theirs withered, courteouſly gaue them of theirs freſh and new gathered: which Pompeys friendes tooke for a ſigne of good lucke. For to ſay truely, the things that Lucullus did in the time of his charge, were cauſe of the honor that P*ompey* afterwards wanne. Howbeit in the end for all their talke,they were no whit the better friends: but departed the one from the other more ſtrange then they met. For Pompey by a plaine edict, brake, reuoked and diſanulled all Lucullus ordinances, and taking from him al his other ſouldiers, left him but only ſixteene hundred to accompany his triumph, and yet they followed him with vnwilling minds: ſuch was Lucullus imperfection & mayme, either by nature or frowardnes of fortune, that he lacked the chiefeſt thing a Generall ſhould haue, which was, to be beloued of his ſouldiers. For if he had attained to that perfection, amongſt many other his excellent vertues, and magnanimitie,wiſedom, iudgement,& iuſtice: the riuer of Euphrates had not bene the vttermoſt confines of the Empire of ROME on ASIA ſide,but it had extended as farre as the ſea Hyrcane,yea euē vnto the vtmoſt part of the world. For king Tigranes had already conquered the other nations that lie beyond that, ſauing the countrie of PARTHIA, which then was not ſo great nor ſtrong, as it appeared afterwards in Craſſus time: nor ſo ioyned and knit together, but ( what through ciuill diſſentions amongſt them at home, and forreine warres of their neigbours abroad ) was ſo weake, that with great difficulty they could defend themſelues from the ARMENIANS, that continually harried them out of their ſkinnes. But to take things rightly as they be in deede, me thinkes that Lucullus did more hurt vnto his country by other, then he did benefit the ſame by himſelfe. For the tokens of triumph and victories which he wanne in ARMENIA ſo neere vnto the PARTHIANS, the cities of TIGRANOCERTA and of NISIBIS which he had ſacked and ſpoyled, the great treaſure that he brought to ROME, and the Diademe alſo of Tigranes, which was ſhewed in triumph as a priſoner with the reſt: moued Craſſus with ſuch a maruellous deſire to paſſe into ASIA, as if all the barbarous people had bene nothing but an aſſured ſpoyle, and a purpoſed prey vnto all thoſe that would come to take them. But Craſſus farre otherwiſe, finding him ſelfe gauled and troubled with the arrowes of the PARTHIANS, knew then by proofe, that Lucullus had not ſo much ouercome his enemies for that they wanted skill, or were a cowardly people, as he had done through his wiſedome and valiantnes. But that ſhall be ſeene hereafter. Furthermore, Lucullus being now returned to ROME, found firſt of all his brother Marcus accuſed by one Gaius Memmius, for that he had done in his office of treaſurer in Syllaes time, and by his commaundement, whereof he was cleared by ſentence of the iudges. But Memmius of ſpight turned his anger againſt Lucullus ſelfe, ſtirring vp the people againſt him, and letting them vnderſtand that Lucullus had kept backe and robbed much part of the treaſure, which ſhould haue come to the common wealth, and that to worke his feate the better, had prolonged theſe warres as he did: wherefore he perſwaded them flatly to deny him the honor of his triumph. And truely Lucullus was in great danger to haue loſt it vtterly: but that the noble men of the citie, and they that were of greateſt authoritie, intermedled themſelues with the tribes when they came to paſſe it by voices of the people, whom they intreated ſo much through ſute and perſwaſion, that in the end, with much a doe, the people ſuffered him to enter the citie in triumph. So Lucullus made a triumphant entry, not terrible nor troubleſome for the long ſhewe or ſight thereof, nor for the multitude of things that he brought thither with him, as many other Captaines had done before him. For hee cauſed the ſhewe-place (which they call Circus Flaminius at ROME) to be ſet out and furniſhed chiefely with armour and weapons of the enemies to a maruellous number: and with the kings engines and inuentions of battering peeces, which was a pleaſant ſight to behold. And in this ſhew, there was a certaine number of his men of armes brauely armed, tenne cartes of warre armed with ſythes that paſſed by, and threeſcore of the chiefeſt friendes and Captaines of the two kings that were led priſoners through the citie. And there were alſo drawen after them, a hundred and tenne gallies all armed in the prores with ſtrong ſpurres of copper, and a ſtatue of Mithridates all of cleane gold, ſixe foote high, with a rich target ſet with pretious ſtones. Beſides all that, there were twenty cubberds as full of ſiluer plate as could be, and thirtie cubberds full alſo of golden veſſell, armor and coyne of gold, caried vpon mens ſhoulders. After them followed eight mules laden with golden beddes, and ſixe and fiftie other mules that caried ſiluer bullion, and a hundred & ſeuen other mules that caried ſiluer coyne, amounting to the ſumme of two hundred threeſcore and tenne thouſande Seſtertios. Furthermore, there were bookes of account caried alſo, wherin were particularly written the ſummes of money which Lucullus had deliuered before vnto Pompey for the warre againſt pyrates on the ſea, & vnto the treaſurers and high treaſures, to put into the ſparing coffers of the common wealth at ROME. And afterwardes in an article by it ſelfe, that he had giuen nine hundred and fiftie Drachmas to euery ſouldier by the polle. After the ſhewe of this triumph was ended, hee made a generall feaſt, in the which he feaſted all the citie and villages thereabouts, which the ROMAINES call Vicos. And afterwardes forſooke his wife Clodia for her vnchaſt and wanton life, and maried Seruilia Catoes ſiſter: howbeit he wanne nothing by the exchange, for he ſped as euill with the ſecond as he did with the firſt. For, ſauing that ſhe was not ſlandered with the inceſt of her owne brethren, otherwiſe ſhe was as diſhoneſt and vnchaſt as Clodia: and yet he bare withall a while for her brothers ſake, but at the length grew wearie of her, and put her away as he had done Clodia. Now when he had filled the Senate with a maruellous hope and expectation of him (who thought they had now got one to encounter and withſtand Pompeys tyrannie, and to vphold and maintaine the authoritie of the nobility and Senate againſt the people, for that by his noble deedes he had atcheiued ſo great fame and reputation) he ſodainly gaue ouer all dealings in the affaires of the common wealth: either becauſe he ſawe it ſo beſt, being a hard thing now to keepe it from ruine: or elſe (as other ſaid) for that he felt himſelfe ſufficiently furniſhed with honour and wealth, and therefore determined from thenceforth to liue quietly all at his eaſe after ſo great paines, trauelles and troubles, the ende whereof fell not out ouer fortunately. And ſurely ſome were of his minde, and liked this great change of his maruellous well: becauſe he did not as Marius did, neither happened on the ill ſucceſſe and end that Marius had. For Marius after the notable victories which he brought from the CIMBRES, and after his valiant acts in warres which had won him great honor, yet would he not ſo leaue off, when he might haue bene chronicled to his wonderfull glory: but of an vnſatiable mind, and ambitious deſire to rule and beare ſway, (being withall a very old man) went and ſorted himſelfe amongſt young men deſirous of gouernment, who brought him not only to commit many outrages, but made himſelfe alſo to ſuffer greater cruelties. It is thought alſo that Cicero had ended his aged courſe more happily, if after he had quenched Catilines conſpiracy, he had then taken his eaſe. And ſo had Scipio in like caſe, if when he had ioyned NVMANTIA vnto CARTHAGE, he would then haue quieted himſelfe. And therfore, ſome ſay, that there is a certaine reuolution and time appointed, beyond the which no wiſe man ſhould medle any more with the affaires of the cōmon wealth: no more then a man whoſe youth & ſtrength is gone and decaied, is any more fit to iuſt, wraſtle, or enter into ſuch exerciſes of the bodie. But contrarily, Craſſus and Pompey mocked Lucullus, becauſe he gaue himſelfe ſo much to pleaſure and paſtime: as if to liue pleaſantly and delicately did not worſe become his age, then to command an army, or to gouerne the affaires of a common weale. And for my part, reading Lucullus life: me thinkes that I read an ancient comedie, the beginning whereof is tedious, and the latter end ioyfull. For at the beginning of his life, you find notable exploites done by him in warres, and great good gouernment alſo in peace: but in the end they all turned into feaſtes and banquets, and lacking litle of maskes and mummeries, dauncing with torches, and all other ſuch delightes fit for young men. For I bring within the compaſſe and reckoning of his fineneſſe and pleaſures, his ſumptuous buildings, his ſtately walles and galleries, his hotte-houſes and ſtoues, his tables and pictures, his ſtatues alſo: and the great workmanſhippe and curioſitie he had beſides of all other chattes by him, gotten together out of all partes to his infinite charge, charge, abuſing therein the world of goods and treaſure gotten and wonne in the warres, in time of his charge and office of Generall, and otherwiſe. Inſomuch, that notwithſtanding exceſſe and ſuperfluitie hath euer ſince increaſed vntill this preſent time, yet they reckon the gardens Lucullus made, to be the moſt ſumptuous and delicateſt places that the Emperors haue. And therfore Tubero the Stoike Philoſopher, hauing ſeene theſe ſtately works which Lucullus had cauſed to be made neere vnto NAPLES, by the ſea ſide (where there are mountaines cut through, light as day, and hanged vpon vaults) and great ditches caſt by force to make the ſea paſſe and runne through his houſes, to keepe fiſh therein, and lodgings alſo that he built in the ſea it ſelfe: he called Lucullus, Xerxes the gowneman, as if he would haue ſaide, Xerxes the ROMAINE. For euen ſo did Xerxes in old time cauſe the mountaine Atho to be cut in ſunder, and a channell to be digged there to paſſe his ſhippes through. He had alſo many other pleaſant places within the territories of ROME neere vnto THVSCVLVM, where there were great large haules ſet vpon tarraſſes to ſee round about farre off in the day time. And Pompey going thither ſometime to ſee him, reproued him greatly, telling him that he had built a maruellous faire ſommer houſe, but not to be dwelt in the winter ſeaſon. Lucullus laughing, anſwered him: do ye thinke me to haue leſſe wit & reaſon then ſtorkes or cranes, that I can not ſhift houſes according to the ſeaſon? An other time there was a Prætor of ROME, that making plaies to ſhewe the people paſtime, ſent vnto Lucullus to borrow certaine purple clokes to ſet forth his plaiers: Lucullus made him anſwere, that he would cauſe his folkes to looke if he had any. And the next morning demaunding of him how many he ſhould neede, the other anſwered, that a hundred would ſerue his turne. Wherupon Lucullus told him againe, he would furniſh him with two hundred, if his caſe ſo required. And therefore the Poet Horace writing this ſtory, addeth to a notable exclamation againſt ſuperfluity, ſaying: that men thinke that a poore houſe, where there is no more riches then neceſſary, and where there is not more then appeareth in ſight, and that the maſter knoweth of. He was a vaine man in his ordinarie ſeruice at his bord, not onely in that his beddes whereon he fedde, were couered with rich carpettes of purple, and himſelfe ſerued in gold and ſiluer veſſell ſet with precious ſtones, & that there was dauncing, muſicke, plaies, and other ſuch like paſtimes of ordinary: but alſo for that he was continually ſerued with all ſorts of fine daintie diſhes, with workes of paſtry, banqueting diſhes, and frute curiouſly wrought and prepared, which only made him to be wondered at of men of ſimple vnderſtanding and meane condition. Therefore was Pompey maruellouſly eſteemed, and ſpecially for a word he ſpake one day when he was ſicke, and that the Phiſitian had willed him to eate of a thruſh. For when his ſeruants tolde him they were hard to come by in ſommer, but at Lucullus houſe where they brought them vp all the yeare through: he would in no wiſe they ſhould aske any of him, but ſaide vnto his Phiſitian. What if Lucullus were not giuen to pleaſure, could not Pompey liue? And ſo willed them to get him ſome other ſuch thing, as they might more eaſily come by. Cato was Lucullus friend & kinſeman both, and yet he ſo much miſliked his maner of liuing and ordinary expence: that one day a young man making a long and tedious Oration in open Senate (out of time, and to no purpoſe) touching meane diet, ſobrietie, and temperance of life: Cato could no longer abide him, but roſe vp, and ſaid vnto him. What, wilt thou not leaue babbling to vs all day: thou that art rich as Craſſus, that liueſt as Lucullus, and ſpeakeſt as Cato? Other affirme that theſe words were ſpoken thus, but that it was not Cato that ſpake them: neuertheleſſe it is certaine, by the notable ſayings they haue gathered of Lucullus, he did not only delight to liue ſo delicately, but alſo he gloried in it. Some write that he feaſted certaine GRECIANS many daies together in his houſe, that were come out of GREECE to ROME: and that they being men brought vp with the ſobrietie and ſimplicitie of GRECE, after they had bene feaſted there diuers times, were aſhamed, & refuſed to goe thither any more, being afterwards intreated to come to Lucullus, ſuppoſing that he had made them this great cheere for their owne ſakes. Lucullus hearing of it, told them: my Lords, I pray you refuſe not to come to me for that. In deede I muſt needes grant that there is ſomewhat more then ordinarie to welcome you withall: but I tell you truely, the moſt part is for Lucullus ſake. An other time when he ſupped all alone, and his men had laide but one bord, and prepared but a reaſonable ſupper for him, he was very angry with them, and called for his ſteward to know why he was ſerued ſo: the ſteward anſwered him. My Lord, becauſe I ſawe you ſend for no bodie, I thought this ſupper ſufficient. What, ſaid he againe: knoweſt not thou that Lucullus ſhould ſuppe to night with himſelf? In fine, Lucullus fare was cõmonly knowen through ROME, that there was no talke but of Lucullus noble houſekeeping. Whervpon, Cicero and Pompey being deſirous to ſee the proofe thereof, came one day to him in the market place ſeeing him at pleaſure: (for Cicero was Lucullus very good friend, and Pompey alſo: and though there was ſome iarre betwene them for matters of warres, he did not let for that to come vnto him, and to ſpeake gently one to an other) and Cicero after he had ſaluted him, asked him if he would be contented they ſhould come and ſee him. Oh, ſaid he, with all my heart: I pray you come to me. Well then, ſaid Cicero, Pompey and I will come and ſuppe with you to night, with condition that you prouide no more then your ordinary. Lucullus told thẽ againe, they ſhould then fare but badly, and therefore it were better they taried till to morrow. But they would none of that, no nor ſuffer him to ſpeake with his men for feare he ſhould cõmaund them to prouide ſomewhat more then for himſelfe. Neuertheleſſe, at his deſire they ſuffered him onely in their preſence aloude to tell one of his men, that hee would ſuppe that night in Apollo: (for ſo was one of his moſt ſtately and ſumptuous haules of his houſe called) and with that word only he finely deceiued them both, and they neuer found him. For euery haule had his certaine ſumme and rate appointed for the charge and expence of euery ſupper they made in them, and the ordinary furniture and ſeruice for the ſame. So that when his ſeruantes had their watch worde but in what haule he would ſuppe, they knew ſtraight what charge he would be at for his ſupper, & what orders ſhould be obſerued therin. Now Lucullus manner was to ſpende when he made any feaſt in the haule of Apollo, fifty thouſand pence, and that ſelfe day the ſupper was prepared according to that value: inſomuch as Pompey marueled how it could be poſſible that a ſupper of ſo exceeding great charge could be ſo ſodainely prepared. In ſuch things therefore did Lucullus lauiſhly and riotouſly ſpende his goods, like ſpoyles in deede gotten of ſlaues and barbarous people. But that ſpecially which he beſtowed vppon bookes, was very commendable and honeſt expence. For he had gathered together a great number of notable hiſtories, the vſe wherof was more honor to him, then the hauing of them. For his librarie was euer open to all cõmers, and they ſuffred the GRECIANS to come into his goodly tarraſſes and faire walkes, or other pleaſant places thereabouts conuenient to ſit and reaſon together, and neuer ſhut dore againſt them: where learned men met commonly, and oftentimes ſpent the whole day in conference together, as in the houſe of the Muſes, being very glad when other matters were diſpatched, they had ſo much leaſure as but to goe thither. And Lucullus ſelfe would alſo many times be amongſt them, in thoſe tarraſſes and pleaſant walkes, delighting much to talke with them: and he did euer helpe to diſpatch them that had any buſineſſe with him, and granted the thing they requeſted of him. To conclude, his houſe was a common receite for all them that came from GRECE to ROME. He loued all maner of Philoſophy, and refuſed no ſect of the ſame. But from his youth vpward, he euer loued & eſteemed beſt the ACADEMICKE ſect, not that which they cal the new ACADEMICK (although it floriſhed at that time through Carneades workes, which Philo made ſuch eſtimation of) but the old ACADEMICKE, which the Philoſopher Antiochus of the citie of ASCALON did defende and maintaine at that time, being an eloquent rethoritian and well ſpoken, whom Lucullus ſought to win by all meanes to make him his friend, and to haue him in houſe with him: becauſe he might inuey againſt Philoes hearers & followers, whoſe ſcholler Cicero among the reſt was, that wrote a notable booke againſt this old ACADEMICKE ſect. And in the ſame he reciteth Lucullus, maintaining the opinion of the old ACADEMICKES: who hold, that a man may certainly know and comprehend ſomething, and called that Catalepſin: but Cicero defended the contrarie. The booke is intituled Lucullus: for they were (as we haue rehearſed before) very good friends, and had both one ſelfe deſire for gouernement in the common wealth. For Lucullus did not ſo withdrawe himſelfe from matters of ſtate, that he would no more medle at all, nor heare ſpeake of them: but he betimes gaue ouer all ambition & contention, as a thing of no ſmall danger, and breeding great reproach and diſhonour to Marcus Craſſus, and Cato, to be chiefe in authoritie. And theſe two were they that defended the Senate, and whom they raiſed vp to withſtand Pompeys greatneſſe, being afrayed of him, after that Lucullus had refuſed the chiefe place of authoritie. But otherwiſe, Lucullus would be in the market place at courts and common councels, to pleaſure his friends when they requeſted him: and would go to the Senate alſo, when there was occaſion to breake any new practiſe, or to ouerthrow P*ompeys* ambitious policie. For he ouerthrew all the orders and conſtitutions that P*ompey* had made, after he had ouercome the kings, Mithridates and Tigranes: and with the helpe of Cato hindered a diſtribution of money which Pompey had written for to ROME, to be beſtowed amongſt his ſouldiers. Whereupon P*ompey* fell in friendſhip, (or to ſpeake more plainly, in conſpiracie) with Craſſus and Cæſar, by whoſe helpe and aſsiſtaunce, he filled ROME with armes and ſouldiers: and made the people by force to paſſe and confirme what he would haue done, after he had violently expulſed Lucullus and Cato out of the market place. Whereat the noble men were much offended, and miſliking the great wrong they had offred Lucullus & Cato, P*ompeys* followers ſuborned a *BRVTIAN, & ſayd he was taken lying in wait to kill P*ompey*. Whereupon the ſaid BRVTIAN being examined by the Senate, named certaine: but when he came before the people, he named Lucullus, ſaying that he had hyered him to kill P*ompey*. But no man beleeued him. For they perceiued openly in the market place, that he was procured by themſelues falſly to accuſe Lucullus, and P*ompeys* other aduerſaries. And this was proued more plainly within few dayes after, whē they threw the body of this BRVTIAN dead in the middeſt of the ſtreet, out of the priſon: who they ſay dyed of himſelfe with ſickeneſſe. Howbeit the markes being plainly ſeene of the halter wherewith they had ſtrangled him, and the ſtripes appearing alſo which they had giuen him: did plainly ſhew that they themſelues did it, whom after they had ſuborned to accuſe L*ucullus*, they ſlue in this manner. This was the cauſe why L*ucullus* did more then before abſent himſelfe from medling in publicke cauſes: but after, when he ſaw that they had ſo wickedly exiled Cicero, and found meanes alſo to conuey Cato farre enough off, vnder pretenced colour to ſend him with charge into the Ile of CYPRVS: then he gaue vp altogether. Some write that a litle before his death, he was not perfit in his wits, decaying through age by litle and litle. Howbeit Cornelius Nepos ſayth, that it was not for age, nor ſickeneſſe, that his wits did alter: but through poyſon which one of his ſlaues had giuen him, whom he had made free, called Calliſthenes: who gaue it him, not of any euill intent, but becauſe his maiſter ſhould loue him the more, ſuppoſing that this poyſon had power to make him loue him. But he troubled his wits ſo much with this poyſon, that L*ucullus* while he liued was faine to haue his brother Marcus to ouerſee his goods. Notwithſtanding this, when he was dead, he was as much bewayled and lamented of all the people, as if he had dyed in his beſt credit, and greateſt proſperitie. For all the people ranne to honour his funerals, and his body was caried to the place, by the young noble men of the citie. The people would in any caſe haue buried him within the field of Mars, as they had before buried Sylla. But becauſe no man thought of it before, and alſo for that things neceſſary were not eaſily to be prouided for the place: his brother Marcus beſought the people they would be content his funerals might be at a towne of his owne, neare vnto the citie of THVSCVLVM, where his tombe was prepared, and he himſelfe liued not long time after. For as Lucullus both in age, and honour, had not left him farre behind him: ſo did he not much in his death. For as a brother that had alwayes dearely loued him, he could not then long liue, and ſuruiue him.

THE COMPARISON OF Lucullus with Cimon.

NOthing (in my opiniō) made Lucullus more happy, then to dye whē he did, before he ſaw the change and alteration of the cōmon weale, which the fatall deſtinies plagued the ROMAINES withall with ſedition & ciuill wars: & that he dyed in his country yet enioying her liberty, but beginning then to fall to decay. And in that he was likeſt vnto Cimō aboue all other things: who died whileſt the GRECIANS were in good loue & peace with other, & not in broyle of diſcorde and ciuill warres. Indeede Cimon dyed in his camp, being generall of his country, at the ſiege of the city of CITIVM in CYPRVS, not withdrawen to his home, as one wearied, liuing idlely, or leading a voluptuous life in feaſtes and banquets, making that the end and reward of his warres, victories and triumphs: but as Plato ſaid (when he wiſely blamed and reproued Orpheus, who promiſeth perpetuall drunkenneſſe in the world to come, for reward of their vertue, that liued well in this life) merily. And truly it is a great comfort & contentation of minde, for an old man feebled with age, & compelled by weakeneſſe, to withdraw himſelfe from the world, as well in matters of gouernemēt in peace, as in warres: and quietly to paſſe his time in ſtudy, where delight is ioyned with honeſt contemplation. But to finiſh his vertuous deedes, by referring them to pleaſure, as vnto their onely end, and moreouer, to grow old by pleaſure and vanity, ſolemnizing Venus feaſt al the reſt of his life, after he hath made ſuch warres, & commaunded ſuch armies: that me thinkes a thing vnworthy of an honeſt ACADEMICKE, and altogether vnmeete for one profeſsing old Xenocrates doctrine, but fit rather for a man giuen ouer altogether to Epicurus diſcipline. There is a wonderfull thing to be conſidered of in theſe two men, that the ones youth was altogether vitious and reprochfull, and the others to the contrary, honeſt and vertuous. But he is the better that chaungeth for the better: & that nature is alwayes more commendable, in whom vice decayeth, and vertue waxeth young: then that which by continuance of time ſheweth ſtill the contrary. And furthermore, they both grew rich by one ſelfe meane: but they did not both a like vſe their riches. For it were to no purpoſe to compare the buildings of the wall that ſtandeth South within the caſtell of ATHENS, which was built with the money Cimon brought thither: with the fine built chambers, & high raiſed turrets to gaſe a farre, & enuironned about with conduits of water, which Lucullus erected by NAPLES, with the ſpoyles of the barbarous people. Neither is Cimons table alſo of moderate fare & dyet, but yet open to euery man, comparable to Lucullus bord: which was ſumptuouſly furniſhed, and ſhewed the greatneſſe of his Lord. For Cimons bord fed many mouthes daily with a ſmall charge: and Lucullus table exceeded in expence, to feede a few, with ſuperfluous dainties. Vnleſſe they will ſay, that time cauſed this difference betweene them. But who can tell, if Cimon had bene at leaſure to haue withdrawen himſelfe to quiet in age from gouernement, and armes, he alſo would not haue led a more ſumptuous and diſſolute life, giuen to all pleaſure, then Lucullus did? For of his owne nature he loued wine, banquets, and playes, and was alſo giuen to women, as we haue told you before. But proſperitie, and fortunate ſucceſſe of things do bring ſuch delight to ambitious men of nature, and borne to great enterpriſes: that they make them forget to runne after their other voluptuous vaine deſires. And therefore had Lucullus dyed abroad in the warres, whileſt he commaunded armies: there had not bene that liuing man, how curious ſoeuer he had bene to reproue other mens faults, that could haue detected him of any reprochfull vice. And thus much for their manner of life. Now furthermore, touching the ſtate of their warres: no doubt both the one and the other were excellent Captaines, as well by ſea as by land. And like as in games of priſe and exerciſes of body which are ſhewed in GRECE, they that in one ſelfe day winne the games at wreſtling, and weapons both, are called by a ſtrange cuſtome, not conquerours onely, but victours alſo, to honour them withall: euen ſo me thinkes that Cimon in like caſe hauing in one ſelfe day crowned GRECE with two notable markes of triumph, for two battels he wanne, the one by ſea, and the other by land, deſerueth to haue ſome place and preferment before other Captaines. And moreouer, Lucullus receiued the authoritie to command, of his country and common wealth: but Cimon gaue his country both authoritie & abilitie to command. Lucullus found his country a commanding people to all their friends & confederates: through whoſe aide he ouercame his enemies. And Cimon contrarily, found his country marching vnder an others enſigne, & through his valiantneſſe did ſo behaue himſelfe, that he made his citie go before her confederates, and triumph ouer her enemies: compelling the PERSIANS by force to giue them the rule by ſea, & perſwading the LACEDÆMONIANS willingly to giue place vnto them by land. Now if the chiefeſt thing that can be in an excellent Captaine, is to make himſelfe to be beloued of his ſouldiers, that they may delight to obey him: then was Lucullus deſpiſed of his ſouldiers, and Cimon eſteemed and wondred at, euen of the confederates themſelues. For Lucullus was forſaken of his own men: and Cimon was followed by very ſtrangers, for the confederates did ioyne together with him. Lucullus returned home into his country, forſaken of thoſe he caried out with him. Cimon returned againe, commaunding them that were ſent out with him to obey others: and had at one time done for his country three notable things, and hard for them to haue compaſſed: to wit, made peace with the enemies, giuen them authoritie and rule of their confederates, and ioyned friendſhip with the LACEDÆMONIANS. Both of them vndertooke to deſtroy great Empires, and conquer all ASIA. But neither of them both could bring their enterpriſe to paſſe. The one by reaſon of his death, which cut him off on the ſodaine being generall, and when his affaires proſpered beſt. The other can hardly be excuſed, that there was not a great fault in him: either in that he could not, or becauſe he would not ſatisfie the complaints and griefes of his men, which cauſed them ſo much to hate and miſlike him. And yet it might be ſayd alſo, that in this fault he was like vnto Cimon: who was oftentimes accuſed by his citizens, and at the length baniſhed his country for the ſpace of ten yeares, becauſe that in ten yeares ſpace (as Plato ſayth) they ſhould no more heare him ſpeake. For to ſay truly, it ſeldome times happeneth, that the graue wits of noble men do pleaſe the multitude, neither are they acceptable vnto the common people: becauſe they ſtriuing continually to reforme them when they go awry, do grieue them as much, as ſurgeons do their patients when they binde vp their ſores with bandes to cure them. For though by that binding they reſtore & bring to their naturall places againe the broken bones or members out of ioynt: yet put they the patient to great paine and griefe. And therefore me thinkes neither the one nor the other is to be blamed. Furthermore, Lucullus wēt a great deale farther with his army, thē euer Cimon did. For he was the firſt ROMAINE Captaine that paſſed ouer mount Taurus, & the riuer of Tigris with an army. He tooke & burnt almoſt in ſight of both the kings, the royall cities of ASIA, TIGRANOCERTA, CABIRA, SINOPE, & NISIBIS. Towards the North, he went as far as the riuer of Phaſis towardes the Eaſt, into MEDIA: and Southward, euen to the red ſea, and vnto the realmes of ARABIA, ſubduing all vnto the ROMAINE Empire. And hauing ouerthrowen all the power of theſe two mightie kings, he tooke from them all, but their perſons onely: who fled and hid themſelues like wild beaſtes, in infinite deſerts and vnpaſſable forreſtes. Wherein is eaſily diſcerned the difference betwixt the doings of the one, and of the other. For the PERSIANS, as if they had had no hurt nor ouerthrow at all by Cimon, fought a battell immediatly after againſt the GRECIANS, & ouerthrew the greateſt part of their armie in EGYPT: where Mithridates and Tigranes, after Lucullus victories, did neuer any notable act. For the one finding himſelfe altogether pulled downe on his knees, and broken by the former battels: durſt neuer once onely ſhew his army vnto Pompey, out of the ſtrength of his camp, but fled into the realme of BOSPHORVS, where he dyed. And Tigranes, he went and humbled himſelfe on his knees, vnarmed, and without weapon, vnto Pompey: and taking his diademe off from his head, layed it at his feete, not flattering him for the victories he had won, but for thoſe which Lucullus had triumphed for. By reaſon wherof he ſcaped good cheape, & thought himſelfe happy, when Pompey gaue him onely the marke and title of a king, the which before had bene taken from him. He therefore is to be thought the more worthy Captaine, and ſtouteſt champion, that leaueth his enemy in weake eſtate for him that followeth, and ſhall fight afterwardes with him. And furthermore, Cimon found the power of the king of PERSIA ouerharried, the pride and fierceneſſe of the PERSIANS layed a ground, by many great battels they had loſt before vnto Themiſtocles, king Pauſanias, and Leotychides, who had ouerthrowen them: and going now againe to fight a freſh with them, it was an eaſie thing to ouercome the bodies of thoſe, whoſe harts were already vanquiſhed. Where Lucullus to the contrary, aſſailed Tigranes, that had neuer bene ouercome, but bare a maruellous loftie minde with him, for the many great battels and conqueſtes he had wonne. And for the multitude of enemies, there was no compariſon betweene thoſe that Cimon ouerthrew, & thoſe that were raunged in battell againſt Lucullus. So that all things weighed and conſidered, it were hard to iudge which of them two proued the worthieſt man: for that it ſeemeth, that the goddes did fauour both the one and the other, telling the one what he ſhould do, and the other what he ſhould not do. And thus it appeareth by teſtimonie of the goddes, they were both good men, and that they both obtained euerlaſting glorie.

Nicias.

I Haue reaſon (as I thinke) to compare Nicias with Craſſus, and the euents that happened to the one in PARTHIA, with thoſe that befell the other in SICYLE: yet am I to pray them that ſhall happen to read my writings, not to thinke me in entermedling with thoſe matters (in the deſcribing and reporting whereof, Thucydides hath gone beyond himſelfe, both for varietie and liuelineſſe of narration, as alſo in choice and excellent words) to haue the like intent and opinion, that Timæus the hiſtoriographer had. Who, hoping by the grauitie and life of his wordes & reports, to darken the glory of Thucydides, and make Philiſtus (in compariſon of himſelfe) appeare ignorant, and without any grace of hiſtoricall narration: hath in his hiſtory of purpoſe ſought occaſion to enter into the deſcribing of thoſe battels by ſea and by land, and the report of thoſe ſpeaches and orations, which are deliuered by them with great iudgement and eloquence. Wherein he commeth as neare them whom he contendes to paſſe, as doth the footeman to the LYDIAN coche, as ſayth Pindarus: and beſides ſheweth himſelfe fond and of ſmall iudgement, or as Diphilus ſayth.

A lubber laden with Sicylian greaſe.

And in diuers places, he falleth into Xenarchus follies. As where he ſayth, that he thinkes it was an euill token for the ATHENIANS, that Nicias the Captaine (whoſe name was deriued of this word Nice, ſignifying victorie) diſſwaded their attempts againſt SICYLE: and that by the throwing downe and mangling of the Hermes (to ſay, the images of Mercurie) it was foreſhewed that they ſhould receiue great ouerthrowes by the generall of the SYRACVSANS, called Hermocrates, the ſonne of Hermon. And further, that it was not vnlikely that Hercules did fauour the SYRACVSANS, by reaſon of the goddeſſe Proſerpina, (protectour and defendour of the citie of SYRACVSA) to requite her for that ſhe gaue him Cerberus the dogge, porter of hell: and that he did malice the ATHENIANS beſides, becauſe they tooke the ÆGESTÆANS partes: (who came of the TROYANS, whom he much hated) for breaking their promiſe and faith with him, whoſe city himſelfe had ouerthrowen in reuenge of the wrong that Laomedon king of TROY had offered him. Howbeit Timæus ſhewes as much wit and iudgement, in deliuering vs ſuch toyes in an hiſtory: as he doth in correcting the ſtile of Philiſtus, or in condemning and railing of Plato and Ariſtotle. But in my fanſie, this ambition and contention to write

or to ſpeake more clarkely then others, ſheweth alwayes a baſe enuious minde, like a ſcholler full of his ſchoole points. But when it ſtriueth with things that are paſt all chalenge and correcting, then is it extreme follie and madneſſe. Since therefore I may not paſſe ouer nor omit certaine things, which Thucydides and Philiſtus haue already ſet downe, and eſpecially thoſe wherein they lay open Nicias nature and qualities, which the varietie of his ſucceſſes and fortune did couer: I muſt lighdly touch them, and report ſo much as is neceſſary, and conuenient, leaſt men condemne me, for ſlouth and negligence. And in the reſt I haue endeuoured to gather and propound things not commonly marked and knowen, which I haue collected as well out of ſundry mens workes and ancient recordes, as out of many old antiquities: and of them all compiled a narration, which will ſerue (I doubt not) to decipher the man and his nature. Of Nicias therefore may be ſayd that which Ariſtotle hath written of him, that there were three famous citizens of ATHENS, very honeſt men, & which fauoured the cōmunaltie with a naturall fatherly loue: Nicias the ſonne of Niceratus, Thucydides the ſonne of Mileſius, and Theramenes the ſonne of Agnon. But of the three, this laſt was of ſmalleſt account: for he is flouted as a forrenner borne in the Ile of CEOS, and chalenged beſides for inconſtant and irreſolute in matters of ſtate and gouernement: and inclining ſometimes to one faction, ſometimes to an other, he was called Cothurnus, a kinde of buskin indifferently ſeruing for both legges, and in old time was vſed of common players of tragedies. Of the other two, Thucydides being the elder, did many good acts in fauour of the nobility againſt Pericles, who alwaies tooke part with the inferiour ſort. Nicias that was the younger, had reaſonable eſtimation in Pericles life time: for he was ioyned Captaine with him, and oftentimes alſo had charge by himſelfe alone without him. After Pericles death, the nobilitie raiſed him to great authoritie, to be as a ſtrong bulwarke for them, againſt Cleons inſolency & boldneſſe: and with all he had the loue of the people, to aduaunce and preferre him. Now this Cleon in troth could do much with the people, he did ſo flatter and dandle them, like an old man, ſtill feeding their humour with gaine: but yet they themſelues whom he thus flattered, knowing his extreme couetouſneſſe, impudency, and boldneſſe, preferred Nicias before him, becauſe his grauity was not ſeuere nor odious, but mingled with a kinde of modeſty, that he ſeemed to feare the preſence of the people, which made them thereby the more to loue and eſteeme him. For being (as he was) of a fearefull & miſtruſtfull nature & diſpoſition: in warres he cloked his feare with good fortune, which euer fauoured him alike in all his iourneys and exploits that he tooke in hand where he was Captaine. Now being much afrayed of accuſers, this timorous manner of his proceeding in the citie, was found to be popular, whereby he wanne him the good will of the people: and by meanes thereof roſe daily more and more, becauſe the people commonly feare thoſe that hate them, & aduaunce them that feare them. For the greateſt honour nobilitie can do to the communaltie, is to ſhew that they do not deſpiſe them. Now Pericles, who through his perfit vertue onely, & force of his great eloquence ruled the whole ſtate and common wealth of ATHENS, he needed no counterfeit colour, nor artificiall flattering of the people, to winne their fauour and good willes: but Nicias lacking that, and hauing wealth enough, ſought thereby to creepe into the peoples fauour. And where Cleon would entertaine the ATHENIANS with pleaſant toyes and deuiſes, and could feede the peoples humour that way: Nicias finding himſelfe no fit man to worke by ſuch encounter, crept into the peoples fauour with liberality, with charges of common playes, and with ſuch like ſumptuouſneſſe, exceeding in coſt and pleaſunt ſportes, not onely all thoſe that had bene before him, but ſuch alſo as were in his time. There yet remaine monuments of his conſecrating vnto the goddes: as the image of Pallas in the caſtle of ATHENS, the gilt being worne off: and the chappell which is vnder the feſtiuall table of Bacchus: for he many times had the chiefe priſe in Bacchus daunſes, and neuer went away without ſome game. And touching this matter, there goeth a report that at certaine playes whereof Nicias defrayed the charges, one of his men came forth vpon the players ſtage before the people, apparelled like Bacchus: & being a goodly tall young man, without any haire on his face, the ATHENIANS tooke ſuch pleaſure to ſee him ſo attired, that they made a clapping of their hands a long time together for ioy. There withall Nicias ſtood vp, and told them, that it were a ſhame for him to leaue the body of a man in bondage, that openly was eſteemed as a god: and thereupon forthwith made this young ſlaue a free man. Men write alſo of certaine ſumptuous and deuout acts he did in the Ile of Delos, where the dauncers and ſingers which the cities of Grece ſent thither to ſing rhimes and verſes in the honour of Apollo, were wonte before to arriue diſorderly: and the cauſe was, for the numbers of people that ran to ſee them, who made them ſing ſtraight without any order, and landing in haſt out of their ſhippes, they left their apparell, and put on ſuch veſtements as they ſhould weare in proceſſion, and their garlands of flowers on their heads, all at one preſent time. But Nicias, being commaunded to go thither to preſent the ſingers of Athens, landed firſt in the Ile of Renia, hard adioyning to the Ile of Delos, with his ſingers, his beaſts for ſacrifice, and with all the reſt of his traine, carying a bridge with him, which he had cauſed to be made at Athens, vppon meaſure taken of the channell, betwixt the one and the other Ile ſet out with pictures and tables, with gilding, with noſegaies and garlands of triumphe, and with excellent wrought tapiſtry: which in the night he ſet vp vpon the channell, being not very broade, and the next morning by breake of the day cauſed his ſingers to paſſe ouer vpon it, ſinging all the way as they went in his proceſſion ſo nobly ſet forth, euen vnto the very temple of Apollo. And when the ſacrifice, the feaſt, and games that were to be plaied were finiſhed, he gaue a goodly palme tree of copper, which he offered vp to Apollo, bought landes beſides that coſte him tenne thouſand Drachmas, which he conſecrated alſo vnto the god Patron of the Ile: and ordained, that the profites of the ſame ſhould be yearely beſtowed by the Delians, vppon an open ſacrifice and feaſt, in the which they ſhould pray to their god, for the health and proſperitie of Nicias: and ſo cauſed it to be written and grauen vpon a piller he left in Delos, as a perpetuall monument and keeper of his offering, and foundation. Afterwardes, this copper palme tree being broken by windes, it fell vpon the great image of the Naxians gift, and threw it downe to the ground. Surely in this ceremonie and acte of his, there was a maruellous pompe, and great ſhew of popular ambition: neuertheleſſe, he that ſhall conſider of his life and actions, may eaſily perſwade himſelfe that aboue all, he did it of very pure zeale and deuotion, and ſecondly, to giue pleaſure and paſtime to the people. For by Thucydides reporte of him, he was one that feared the gods with trembling, and was wholly giuen to religion. We finde written in one of the dialogues of Paſiphoon, that Nicias did ſacrifice dayly to the goddes, and kept a ſoothſayer continually in his houſe, giuing out abroade, that it was to counſell with him what ſhould happen about the affaires of the common wealth: but in troth it was to inquire of his owne buſineſſe, and ſpecially of his mines of ſiluer. For he had many great mines about Lavrion ſide, that were very profitable to him: but withall they digged with great daunger, and he was driuen continually to keepe a maruellous number of ſlaues at worke there. The moſt part of Nicias riches was in ready money, and thereby he had many crauers and hangers on him, whome he gaue money vnto: for he gaue as well vnto wicked people that might doe miſchiefe, as vnto them that deſerued rewarde, and were worthie of his liberalitie. Thus was his feare a rent to the wicked, as his liberalitie was alſo a reuenue to the good: and hereof the comicall Poets do deliuer vs auncient teſtimonie. For Teleclides ſpeaking of a certaine informer ſaith thus:

Nicias for feare gaue to the wicked.

Charicles did refuſe to giue one Mina for to ſtay,
The bruting of his ſecret birth, conueyed cloſe away:
But Nice, the ſonne of Nicerate, did willingly beſtow,
A brace of Minas double told. And though I well do know
The cauſe of his ſo doing, yet I will not him bewray:
For why? The man is my good friend, and wiſe I dare well ſay.

And he, whom Eupolis mocketh in his comedy intituled Maricas, bringing a plaine ſimple man vpon the ſtage, doth aske him:

The informer.

How long is it ago ſince thou didſt ſpeake with Nicias?

The plaine man.

The Authour.

O fooliſh folke, ſuppoſe ye that ſo good a man as he,
In any fault or ſhamefull fact will tardy taken be?

And Cleon threatning in the comedie of Ariſtophanes, intituled the Knightes, ſaith theſe wordes.

The Orators if by the throte I take,
Then ſure I am, that Nicias ſtraight will quake.

Phrynichus ſelfe alſo telleth vs glaunſingly, that he was ſo timorous and eaſie to be fraied, when he ſaid ſpeaking of an other man:

A good ſtout man (I know full well) he was,
And not a coward like to Nicias.

Nicias warineſſe to offend.

Now Nicias being thus timerous of nature, and fearing to giue any litle occaſion to the Orators to accuſe him: kept himſelfe ſo warily, that he neither durſt eate nor drinke with any man in the city, nor yet put foorth himſelfe in companie to talke, or paſſe the time amongſt them, but altogether auoided ſuch ſports and pleaſures. For when he was in office, he would neuer out of the counſell houſe, but ſtill buſied him ſelfe in diſpatching cauſes, from morning till night, and was euer the firſt that came, and laſt that went away. And when he had no matter of ſtate in hand, then was he very hardly to be ſpoken withall, and would ſuffer no acceſſe vnto him, but kept cloſe in his houſe: and ſome of his friends did euer aunſwere them that came to his gate, and praied them to pardon him, ſaying, that he was buſie then about affaires of the cõmonwealth. One Hieron, whom Nicias had brought vp in his houſe, & had himſelfe taught him both learning and muſicke, was his greateſt procurer and inſtrument to keepe him from ſpeech with any man, and brought him to this reputation of greatneſſe and grauity. This Hieron (as it is reported) was the ſonne of Dionyſius Chalcus, of whom they finde certaine Poeticall workes at this day: who being Captaine of a certaine number of men that were ſent to dwell in ITALIE, did build there the citie of THVRIES. Hieron I ſay did ſerue his turne, and holpe him ſecretly to enquire what he would vnderſtand of the Soothſaiers, and gaue out theſe wordes among the people: that Nicias led too miſerable and painefull a life, for the ouergreat care he tooke to ſerue the commonwealth: inſomuch, as though he were in his hotte houſe to waſh him, or at his table at meate, his minde ranne ſtill of ſome matters about the commonwealth, and to ſerue the ſtate, did neglect his owne priuate affaires: ſo that he ſcant began to ſleepe and take reſt, when others commonly had ſlept their firſt ſleepe, and that he looked like no body. Furthermore, that he was grown crabbed and vncourteous, euen to ſuch as before had bene his familiar friends. So that, ſaid he, he loſeth them together with his goods, and all for ſeruice of the commonwealth: where others grow riche, and win friends, by the credit they haue to be heard of the people, and can make merry among them, and ſporte with the matters of ſtate which they haue in their hands. Now in troth, ſuch was Nicias life, that he might truely ſay that which Agamemnon ſpake of himſelfe in the tragedie of Euripides, called Iphigenie in AVLIDE.

Dionyſius Chalcus founder of the city of Thuries.

Nicias life.

In outward ſhew of ſtately pompe, all others I exceede,
And yet the peoples vnderling I am in very deede.

And Nicias perceiuing that the people in ſome things did ſerue their turnes with the experience of them that were eloquent, and wiſer then others, although they yet miſtruſted their ſufficiencie, and had a ſpeciall eye to them, plucking downe their courage, by taking their authority from them: as for proofe the condemnation of Pericles, the baniſhment of Damon, and the miſtruſt they had of Antiphon RHAMNVSIAN, and moreouer by that they did vnto Paches (that tooke the Ile of LESBOS) who being brought before the iudges in open councel to giue vp an account of his charge, drew out his ſworde, and ſlue himſelfe in preſence of them all.

Nicias I ſay, remembring theſe examples, ſought euer to flie from theſe offices, which were either too great, or too ſmall, and when he accepted any, had ſpeciall regarde to worke ſurely, and to venture nothing. Whereby all his enterpriſes that he tooke in hand, as we may eaſily coniecture, proſpered maruellous well: but yet he imputed nothing to his owne wiſedom, nor yet to his vertue and ſufficiencie, but thanked fortune euer for all, and praying diligently to the gods, contented himſelfe to leſſen his glory, and that onely to auoide enuie: As the euent of things falling out euen in his time do ſufficiently witneſſe vnto vs. For the citie of ATHENS hauing ſuſteined many great loſſes and ouerthrowes, he was neuer a party, nor had ought to do in any of them. As once for example: the ATHENIANS were ouercome in THRACIA by the CHALCIDONIANS, howbeit it was vnder the leading of Calliades & Xenophon, who were their Captaines. An other time, the loſſe they had in ÆTOLIA vnder the charge of Demoſthenes. Moreouer at DELIVM, a city of BOEOTIA, where they loſt a thouſand men at one conflict, Hippocrates then being there Generall. And as touching the plague, the greateſt number laide the fault thereof to Pericles, who by reaſon of warres kept the men that came out of the countrie, within the walles of the citie of ATHENS: and ſo by changing of aire, and their wonted maner of life, they fell into it. Now with none of all theſe great troubles and misfortunes, was Nicias euer burthened: but contrariwiſe he being Captaine tooke the Ile of CYTHERA, which the LACEDÆMONIANS inhabited, being an excellent place for ſituation to moleſt and deſtroy the country of LACONIA. He wan diuers cities againe that had rebelled in THRACIA, and brought them once more vnder the obedience of ATHENS. At his firſt comming, hauing ſhut in the MEGARIANS within their walles, he tooke the Ile of MINOA: and at his departure thence, ſhortly after wanne the hauen of Niſea alſo. Furthermore, landing in the countrie of the CORINTHIANS, he ouercame them that offered him battell, and ſlue a great number, and among others Lycophron the Captaine. At this battell he chaunſed to forget to bury two of his men that were ſlaine, whoſe bodies could not be found in gathering vp of the reſt: howbeit, ſo ſoone as he heard of it, he cauſed all his fleete to ſtay, and ſent an Herauld to the enemies, to pray leaue to fetch away thoſe two bodies. Now, though by lawe of armes they that ſent to aske leaue to take away their dead to burie them, did thereby loſe the honor of their victory, & were barred to ſet vp any marke or token of triumph, becauſe it ſeemed by the ſute, that they which had them in their power were conquerors, and not the peticioners that made requeſt for them, which otherwiſe needed not to haue made demaund of them: Nicias notwithſtanding was contented rather to forſake the honor of his victory, then to leaue the bodies of two of his countrymen in the field without buriall. So, after he had deſtroied all the coaſt of LACONIA and had ouercome certaine LACEDÆMONIANS that came againſt him in battel: he tooke the city of THYREA, which the ÆGINETES kept at that time, whom he brought priſoners vnto ATHENS. And when the PELOPONNESIANS had prepared great armies both by ſea and by land to beſiege the fort of PYLE, the which Demoſthenes the Captaine had fortified: battell being giuen by ſea, it chanſed there remained foure hundred naturall citizens of SPARTA, within the Ile of SPACTERIA. Now the ATHENIANS thought it a noble exploite of them, (as in deed it was) to take thoſe foure hundred aliue: howbeit the ſiege was very ſore, becauſe they lacked water euen in the middeſt of ſummer, and were forced to fetch a maruellous compaſſe to bring victuals to their campe, which when winter ſhould be once come, would be very dangerous, and almoſt an impoſſible thing to do. Whereupon, they then became ſory, and repented them much that they had ſent away the Ambaſſadors of the LACEDÆMONIANS which came to them to treate of peace, and that they had (through Cleons procurement) ſuffred them to depart in that ſorte without reſolution taken: who was againſt them altogether, onely to do Nicias a deſpight, being his enemy, and did earneſtly ſolicite the matter the LACEDÆMONIANS requeſted. This was the cauſe why Cleon perſwaded the ATHENIANS, to refuſe their offer of peace. But when the people ſawe that this ſiege drew out in length, and that their campe ſuffered grieuous wantes and neceſſities: then fell they out with Cleon, and he againe burthened Nicias, ſaying that through his feare he would let the beſieged SPARTANS eſcape, and that if he had bene Captaine, they ſhould not haue holden out ſo long. Thereupon the ATHENIANS ſaide a loude to Cleon: and why doeſt not thou go thither yet to take them? Moreouer Nicias ſelfe alſo riſing vp, openly gaue him his authoritie to take this Pyle, and bad him leauy as many ſouldiers as he would to goe thither, and not to brag with ſuch impudent wordes where was no danger, but to do ſome notable ſeruice to the commonwealth, Cleon at the firſt ſhrunke back, being amazed withall, litle thinking they would haue taken him ſo ſodainly at his worde. But in the end, perceiuing the people vrged him to it, and that Nicias alſo was importunate with him: ambition ſo enflamed him, that he not onely tooke the charge vpon him, but in a brauerie ſaid, that within twentie daies after his departure he would either put all the SPARTANS to the ſword, or bring them priſoners vnto ATHENS. The ATHENIANS hearing Cleon ſay ſo, had more luſt to laugh a good, then to beleeue that he ſpake: for it was their maner euer to laugh at his anger & folly.

For it is reported of him, that the people on a time being ſolemnly aſſembled in councell early in the morning, to heare what Cleon would ſay, and hauing taried long for him: at the length he came with a garland on his head, and praied the aſſemblie to diſmiſſe the court till the next morning: for, quoth he, I ſhall not be at leiſure to day, becauſe I haue ſacrificed, and doe feaſt alſo certaine ſtrangers my friends that are come to ſee me. So the people burſt out in a laughing, and brake vp the aſſembly.

This notwithſtanding, fortune fauored him at that time, and he handled himſelfe ſo well in this charge with Demoſthenes, that he tooke all the SPARTANS that they beſieged, within the time he had appointed, ſauing ſuch as were ſlaine: and hauing made them yeelde, brought them priſoners to ATHENS. This fell out greatly to Nicias ſhame and reproache. For it appeared not only a caſting away of his ſhield, but worſe then that, a voluntary forſaking of his prouince vpon a baſe timerous minde, giuing his enemy occaſion thereby to do ſome noble exploite, depriuing himſelfe of his honorable charge. Wherfore Ariſtophanes mocketh him againe, in his comedie of birdes, ſaying:

It is no time to ſleepe and linger ſtill,
As Nicias doth: without good cauſe or ſkill.

Alſo in an other place of his comedy of plowmen he ſaith:

I faine would follow husbandrie. VVho lets thee? Mary you.
A thouſand Drachmaes I will giue to be diſcharged now
Of office in the commonweale. Content, ſo ſhall we haue
Two thouſand Drachmaes iuſt, with thoſe that Nicias lately gaue.

The immoderate liberty of Cleon.

Cleons lewd & light ieſtures in his Orations.

But herein Nicias did great hurt to the commonwealth, ſuffring Cleon in that ſort to grow to credit and eſtimation. For after that victory, Cleon grew to ſo haughtie a minde and pride of himſelfe, that he was not to be dealt withall: whereupon fell out the occaſion of the great miſeries that happened to the city of ATHENS, which moſt grieued Nicias of all other. For Cleon amongſt other things tooke away the modeſty and reuerence vſed before in publicke Orations to the people: he of all other was the firſt that cried out in his Orations, that clapped his hand on his thigh, threw open his gowne, and flung vp and downe the pulpit as he ſpake. Of which example afterwards followed all licentiouſneſſe, and contempt of honeſty, the which all the Orators and counſellers fell into, that dealt in matters of ſtate and commonwealth, and was in the end the ouerthrow of all together. In that very time began Alcibiades to growe to credit, by practiſe in the ſtate, who was not altogether ſo corrupt, neither ſimply euill: but as they ſay of the land of EGYPT, that for the fatneſſe and luſtineſſe of the ſoile,

It bringeth forth both holſome herbes, and alſo noiſome weeds.

Euen ſo Alcibiades wit excelling either in good or ill, was the cauſe and beginning of great change and alteration. For, it fell out, that after Nicias was ridde of Cleon, he could not yet bring the citie of ATHENS againe to peace and quietneſſe. For when the commonwealth began to grow to ſome reſt and reaſonable good order, then was it againe brought into warres, through Alcibiades extreame furie of ambition. And thus it began.

Cleon & Braſidas the two peacebreakers generally of all Grece.

The onely peacebreakers and diſturbers of common quiet generally throughout GRECE, were theſe two perſons, Cleon and Braſidas: for warre cloked the wickedneſſe of the one, and aduanced the valiantnes of the other, giuing to either occaſion to do great miſchiefe, and alſo oportunitie to worke many noble exploites. Now Cleon and Braſidas being both ſlaine together at a battell fought by Amphipolis, Nicias ſtraight perceiuing the SPARTANS had long deſired peace, and that the

ATHENIANS were no more ſo hotly giuen to the warres, but that both the one and the other had their hands full, and were willing to be quiet: deuiſed what meanes he might vſe to bring SPARTA and ATHENS to reconciliation againe, and to rid all the cities of GRECE alſo from broile and miſerie of warre, that thenceforth they might all together enioy a peaceable and happy life. The riche men, the olde men, and the husbandmen, he found very willing to hearken to peace: and talking priuately alſo with diuerſe others, he had ſo perſwaded them, that he cooled them for being deſirous of warres. Whereupon, putting the SPARTANS in good hope that all were inclined to peace, if they ſought it: the SPARTANS beleeued him, not onely for that they had found him at other times very ſoft and courteous, but alſo becauſe he was carefull to ſee that their priſoners of SPARTA, (who had bene taken at the forte of Pyle) were gentlely intreated, and had made their miſerable captiuitie more tollerable. So, peace was concluded betweene the SPARTANS and the ATHENIANS for a yeare, during which abſtinence, they frequenting one an other againe, and beginning to taſte the ſweetneſſe and pleaſures of peace, and the ſafety of free acceſſe one to ſee an others friends that were ſtrangers: began then to wiſhe that they might ſtill continue in peace and amitie together, without effuſion of bloud of either partie, and tooke great delight in their daunces, to heare them ſing ſuch ſongs:

They did alſo with great ioy & gladneſſe remember him which ſaid, that in peace no ſound of trumpet, but the crowing of the cock doth wake them that be a ſleepe: and on the other ſide they curſed and tooke on with them that ſaid it was predeſtined, the warre ſhould continue thriſe nine yeares. And ſo, vpon a meeting together to talke of many matters, they made an vniuerſall peace throughout all GRECE. Now moſt men thought that ſurely all their ſorrowes and miſeries were come to an end, and there was no talke of any man but of Nicias, ſaying: that he was a man beloued of the goddes, who for his deuotion towards them, had this ſpeciall gift giuen him, that the greateſt bleſſing that could come vnto the world, was called after his name. For to confeſſe a troth, euery man was certainly perſwaded that this peace was Nicias worke, as the warre was Pericles procurement, who vpon light cauſes perſwaded the GRECIANS to runne headlong into moſt grieuous calamities: and Nicias on the other ſide had brought them to become friends, and to forget the great hurtes the one had receiued of the other in former wars. And euen to this preſent day, that peace is called Nicium, as who would ſay, Nicias peace. The capitulations of the peace were thus agreed vpon: that of either ſide they ſhould alike deliuer vp the cities, and landes, which each had taken from other in time of warres, together with the priſoners alſo: and that they ſhould firſt make reſtitution, whoſe lot it was to begin. Nicias (according to Theophraſtus report) for ready money ſecretlie bought the lot, that the LACEDÆMONIANS might be the firſt that ſhould make reſtitution. And when the CORINTHIANS and BOEOTIANS that diſliked of this peace, ſought by the complaintes they made, to renue the warre againe: Nicias then perſwaded both the ATHENIANS and LACEDÆMONIANS, that they ſhould adde for ſtrength vnto their country, the alliance and peace offenſiue and defenſiue made betweene them, for a more ſure knot of friendſhip, whereby they might be the better aſſured the one of the other, and alſo the more dreadfull to their enemies that ſhould rebell againſt them. Theſe things went cleane againſt Alcibiades minde: who beſides that he was ill borne for peace, was enemy alſo vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, for that they ſought to Nicias, & made none account of him, but deſpiſed him. Here was the occaſion that cauſed Alcibiades to proue from the beginning what he could do to hinder this peace, wherein he preuailed nothing. Yet ſhortly after, Alcibiades perceiuing that the ATHENIANS liked not ſo well of the LACEDÆMONIANS, as they did before, & that they thought thēſelues iniured by them, becauſe they had lately made league with the BOEOTIANS without their priuity, and had not wholly rendred vp the cities of PANACTUM and AMPHIPOLIS according to the conditions articled betwene them: began then to enlarge & aggrauate the peoples complaints, and to make them offended with euery one of them. And furthermore he procured Ambaſſadors from the city, of ARGOS to come to ATHENS, and ſo handled the matter, that the ATHENIANS made league offenſiue and defenſiue with them.

Alcibiades craft & deceit.

The earthquake holpe Nicias.

The vſe of the Oſtraciſmon.

While theſe matters were thus in hand, there came to Athens alſo Ambaſſadors from Lacedæmon, with full power and authoritie to ſet all things at ſtay, and to compound all controuerſies: who hauing firſt ſpoken with the Senate, propounded things vnto them both verie honeſt and reaſonable. Whereupon, Alcibiades being affraide that they letting the people vnderſtand ſo much, ſhould thereby bring them to yeelde to what they deſired: he finely deceiued the poore Ambaſſadors by this deuiſe. He promiſed vpon his othe to helpe them in that they went about, ſo farre foorth as they would not confeſſe themſelues to haue abſolute power from the Ephores: making them to beleeue it was the only way to bring their matters to paſſe. The Ambaſſadors giuing credit to his words, relied vpon him, and ſo forſooke Nicias. Whereupon Alcibiades brought them before the people being ſet in councell, and there demanded openly of them, whether they had full power and authoritie to accorde all matters yea or no. Whereunto they made him aunſwere with a loude voice, that they had not. Thereupon Alcibiades, contrarie both to their expectation, and his owne othe and promiſe made vnto them: began to call the councell to witneſſe, whether they did not in open Senate ſay the contrary. and ſo aduiſed the people not to truſt nor giue credit vnto ſuch men, as were openly taken with ſo manifeſt a lie, & that in one ſelfe matter would one while ſay one thing, another while an other. It bootes not to aske whether the Ambaſſadors were much amazed to heare Alcibiades words: for Nicias himſelfe wiſt not what to ſay to the matter, the ſuddenneſſe of the cauſe did ſo confuſe and grieue him, being a thing he leaſt looked for. Nowe the people they were ſo moued beſides, that they became indifferent whether to haue ſent for the Ambaſſadors of Argos preſently to haue made league with them or not: but there fell out an earthquake vpon this matter, that greatly ſerued Nicias turne, and brake vp the aſſemblie. The people meeting againe in councell the next morning, Nicias with all that he could doe, or ſay, could ſcant withhold them from making league with the Argives: and to get leaue in the meane time to go to the Lacedæmonians, promiſing he would make all wel again. Thereupon, Nicias going to Sparta, was receiued and honored there like a noble man, and as one whom they thought wel affected towards them: but for the reſt, he preuailed nothing, and being ouercome by thoſe that fauored the Boeotians, returned againe to Athens as he departed thence. Where he was not onely ill welcomed home, and worſe eſteemed, but was alſo in danger of his perſon, through the fury of the people, that at his requeſt and counſell had redeliuered ſuch men priſoners, and ſo great a number of them. For indeed, the priſoners which Cleon had brought to Athens from the forte of Pyle, were all of the chiefeſt houſes of Sparta, and their kinſmen and friends were the nobleſt men of the city. Notwithſtanding, the people in the end did none other violence to him, ſauing that they choſe Alcibiades their Captaine, and made league with the Elians, and Mantinians (which had reuolted from the Lacedæmonians) and with the Argives alſo: and ſent pirats to the fort of Pyle, to ſpoile the country of Laconia. Vpon theſe occaſions the Athenians fell again into warres. Now when the quarrell and controuerſie was greateſt betwene Nicias and Alcibiades, the Oſtraciſmon (to wit, the baniſhment for a time) came in, by the which the people baniſhed for ten yeares any ſuch of their citizens as they thought either of too great authoritie, or that was moſt enuied for his wealth and ſubſtance. Alcibiades and Nicias were then not a litle perplexed, conſidering their preſent danger, being ſure that the one of them two ſhould not faile but be baniſhed by this next baniſhment. For the people hated Alcibiades life, & were afraide of his valiantneſſe: as we haue more amply declared in the deſcription of his life. And for Nicias, his wealth made him to be enuied, beſides they miſliked his ſtrange maner of dealing, being no more familiar nor conuerſant with the people than he was, and counted him too ſtately: moreouer they hated him alſo, becauſe in many matters he had ſpoken directly againſt the thing the people deſired, and had enforced them againſt their willes to agree to that which was profitable for themſelues. In fine to ſpeake more plainly, there fell out great ſtrife betwene the young men that would haue warres, and the olde men that coueted peace, ſome deſirous to baniſh Nicias, and ſome others Alcibiades: but

VVhere diſcorde reignes in realme or towne,
The wicked win the chiefe renowne.

And ſo fell it out then. For the Athenians being deuided in two factions, gaue authority to certaine of the moſt impudent and inſolent perſons that were in all the city: and among them was one Hyperbolus of the towne of Perithvs, a man of no hauior nor value, why he ſhould be bold: but yet one that grew to ſome credit and power, diſhonoring his countrey, by the honor they gaue him. Now Hyperbolus thinking him ſelfe free at that time from any daunger of baniſhment, (hauing rather deſerued the gallowes) hoping that if one of them two were baniſhed, he ſhould match him well enough that remained behinde: ſhewed openly that hee was glad of their diſcord and variance, and buſily ſtirred vp the people againſt them both. Nicias and Alcibiades being acquainted with his wicked practiſes, hauing ſecretly talked together, ioyned both their factions in one: whereby they brought it ſo to paſſe, that neither of them were baniſhed, but Hyperbolus ſelfe for tenne yeares. Which matter for the preſent time made the people very mery, though afterwardes it grieued them much, ſeeing their ordinaunce of the Oſtraciſmon blemiſhed by the vnworthines of the perſon: which puniſhment was an honor vnto him. For this baniſhment was thought a meete puniſhment for Thucydides, Ariſtides, and ſuch like men of accompt as they, or their like: but for Hyperbolus, it was thought too great an honor, and too manifeſt an occaſion of glory to be giuen to him, that for his wickednes had the ſelfe ſame puniſhment, which was to be inflicted vpō the chiefeſt eſtates for their greatnes. And the comicall Poet Plato him ſelfe ſaieth in a place.

Hyperbolus baniſhed for tenne yeares.

Although his lewd behauiour did deſerue as much or more,
Yet was not that the puniſhment he ſhould haue had therefore.
The Oſtracie deuiſed was for men of noble fame,
And not for varlets, whoſe lewd life deſerued open ſhame.

After this Hyperbolus, there was neuer man baniſhed with the Oſtraciſmon. For him ſelfe was the laſt, as Hipparchus Cholargian, & neareſt kinſman to the tyrant was the firſt. Sure fortune is a very vncertaine thing, and without conceit of reaſon. For had Nicias franckly put himſelfe to the hazard of this baniſhmēt againſt Alcibiades, one of theſe two things muſt needs haue happened him: either to haue remained in the city with victory, his aduerſary being baniſhed: or being conuict by his baniſhment to haue ſcaped thoſe extreame miſeries and calamities the which he afterwardes fell into, beſides the fame he had wonne of a wiſe Captaine, though he had bene ouercome. I know notwithſtanding that Theophraſtus writeth, how Hyperbolus not Nicias, was baniſhed through the diſſention that fell betwixt Phæax and Alcibiades: albeit moſt writers agree with that I haue told you before. Now the Ambaſſadors of the Egestans and Leontines being come to Athens, to perſwade the Athenians to attempt the conqueſt of Sicilia: Nicias being againſt it, was ouercome by Alcibiades craft & ambition. For he, before they were called to councell, had already through falſe ſurmiſes filled the peoples heads with a vaine hope and perſwaſion of conqueſt. Inſomuch as the young men meeting in places of exerciſe, and the old men alſo in artificers ſhoppes, and in their compaſſed chaires, or halfe circles where they ſate talking together, were euery one occupied about drawing the platforme of Sicile, telling the nature of the Sicilian ſea, and reckoning vp the hauens and places looking towards Africke. For they made not their accompt that Sicile ſhould be the end of their warres, but rather the ſtore-houſe and armory for all their munition and martiall prouiſion to make warre againſt the Carthaginians, and to conquer all Africke, and conſequently all the Africke ſeas, euen to Hercules pillers. Now all their mindes being bent to warres, when Nicias ſpake againſt it, hee found very few men of quality to ſtand by him. For the rich, fearing leaſt the people would thinke they did it to auoide charge, and the coſt they ſhould be at about theſe warres, they held their peace, though in deede not contented withall: yet would not Nicias leaue ſtill to counſel thē to the contrary. But when they had paſt the decree in councel for the enterpriſe of Sicile, and that the people had choſen him chiefe Captaine, with Alcibiades and Lamachus, to follow the ſame: at the next ſeſſion of the councell holden in the city, Nicias roſe vp againe, to ſee if hee could turne the people from this iourney with all the proteſtations he could poſſibly make, burdening Alcibiades, that for his owne ambition and priuate commodity, he brought the common wealth into ſo farre and daungerous a warre. But all his wordes preuailed not. Him ſelfe before all others was thought the meeteſt man for this charge, partly becauſe of his experience, but chiefly for that they knew he would handle their matters with greater ſafetie, when his timerous foreſight ſhould be ioined with Alcibiades valiantnes, and with Lamachus ſoftnes, which in deede moſt confirmed the election. Now after the matter thus debated, Demoſtratus one of the Orators that moſt procured the Athenians to vndertake this enterpriſe ſtepped foorth, and ſayd. It were good that Nicias left off, and ſet aſide all theſe excuſes and deuiſes, and preferred a decree, that the people ſhould throughly authoriſe the Captaines that were choſen, to ſet forward and execute what they thought good, as well here as there, and ſo perſwaded the people to paſſe and authoriſe it. Yet it is ſayd that the Prieſtes obiected many things to hinder the iourney. But Alcibiades alſo hauing ſuborned certaine Soothſayers, alleaged in like caſe ſome auncient Oracles that ſayd, the Athenians ſhould haue great honour from Sicile: and further had entiſed certaine pilgrimes, who ſayed they were but newly come from the Oracle of Iupiter Ammon, and had brought this Oracle thence, That the Athenians should take all the Syracuſans. But worſt of all, if any knew of contrary ſignes or tokens to come, they held their peace, leaſt it ſhould ſeeme they entermedled to prognoſticate euill for affections ſake, ſeeing that the ſignes them ſelues, which were moſt plaine and notorious, could not remoue them from the enterpriſe of this iourney. As for example, the hacking and cutting of the Hermes, and images of Mercury, which in one night were all to be mangled, ſauing one image onely called the Hermes of Andocides, which was giuen and conſecrated in old time by the tribe of the Ægeides, and was ſet vppe directly ouer againſt a citizens houſe called Andocides. Furthermore, the chaunce that happened by the aulter of the twelue gods: where a man leaping ſodainely vpon it, after he had gone round about it, cut off his genitories with a ſtone. And in a temple alſo in the city of Delphes, where was a litle image of Minerua of gold, ſet vpon a palme tree of copper, which the city of Athens had giuen of the ſpoiles won of the Medes. Vppon that palme tree ſate certaine crowes many daies together, and neuer left pecking and iobbing at the fruite of it which was all of gold, vntill they made the ſame to fall from the tree. But the Athenians ſayd, that the Delphians (whom the Syracvsans had ſubdued) had finely fained this deuiſe. There was a prophecy alſo that commanded them to bring one of Mineruaes Nuns to Athens, that was in the city of Clazomenes. So they ſent for this Nun called Heſychia, which is, reſt: and it ſeemeth it was that which the goddes by this prophecy did counſell them vnto, that for that time they ſhould be quiet. Meton the Aſtronomer hauing charge in the army leauied for the war of Sicile, being afraied of this prophecy, or otherwiſe miſliking the celeſtiall ſignes, and ſucceſſe of the iourney: fained him ſelfe mad, and ſet his houſe a fire. Others ſay he counterfeited not madnes, but did one night in deede ſet his houſe a fire, and that the next morning looking ruefully on it, he went into the market place as a man brought to pittifull ſtate, to ſue to the people, that in conſideration of his great misfortune happened him, they would diſcharge his ſonne of the voyage, who was to take charge of a gally at his owne coſt, and ready to make ſaile. Moreouer, the familiar ſpirite of wiſe Socrates that did vſe to tell him before what ſhould happen: told him then that this iorney would fall out to the deſtruction of Athens. Socrates tolde it to certaine of his very familiar friends: and from them the rumor became common. And this alſo troubled a number of them, for the vnlucky daies on the which they did imbarke. For they were the very daies on the which the women celebrated the feaſt and yeareday of Adonis death: and there were alſo in diuerſe partes of the city, images of dead men caried to buriall, and women following them, mourning & lamenting. So that ſuch as did put any confidence in thoſe ſignes, ſayed they miſliked it much, and that they were afraied leaſt the ſame ſignified, that all the goodly preparation of this army, (the which was ſet out with ſuch pompe and brauery) would come to nothing. Now for Nicias, that he ſpake againſt this war in open councell, whileſt they were deliberating vpon it, and that he was not caried away with any vaine hope, nor puffed vp with the glory of ſo honorable a charge to make him chaunge his minde: therein ſurely he ſhewed him ſelfe an honeſt man, wiſe, and conſtant. But when he ſaw plainly that he could by no perſwaſions remoue the people from the enterpriſe of this warre, neyther yet by ſute nor intreaty get him ſelfe diſcharged from being a Captaine thereof, but that they would in any caſe make him one of the heades of the army: then was it out of time to be fearefull, and ſtill giuing backe, turning his head ſo oft like a childe to looke vpon his gally behinde him, and euer to be telling that no reaſon could be heard in determining of his iorney. For in deede this was enough to diſcorage his companions, and to mar all at their firſt ſetting out: where, to ſay truly, he ſhould ſodainly haue ſet vpon his enemies, and haue gone to it with a luſty corage, to haue aſſayed fortune. But he tooke a cleane contrary courſe. For when Lamachus thought good at their firſt comming to go ſtraight to SYRACVSA, and to giue them battell as neare the wals as might be, and that Alcibiades on the other ſide was of opinion firſt of all to goe about to winne the cities that were in league with the SYRACVSANS, and after that they had made them rebell, then to goe againſt the SYRACVSANS them ſelues. Nicias to the contrary ſpake in councell, and thought it better to goe on faire and ſoftly, deſcrying the coaſts of SICILE round about, to view their gallies and preparation, and ſo to returne ſtraight to ATHENS againe, leauing only a few of their men with the EGESTANS, to helpe to defend them. But this from the beginning maruellouſly cooled the corage of the ſouldiers, and quite diſcoraged them. Shortly after alſo, the ATHENIANS hauing ſent for Alcibiades to aunſwere to certaine accuſations, Nicias remaining Captaine with Lamachus (the other Captaine in ſight, but Nicias ſelfe in power and authority the Lieutenaunt generall of all the army) ſtill vſed delayes, running vp and downe, and ſpending time ſo long in conſultation, till the ſouldiers were left without both hope and corage: & the feare the enemy had of them at their firſt comming to ſee ſo great an army, was now in maner cleane gone. Yet Alcibiades being in the army, before he was ſent for from ATHENS, they went with three ſcore gallies to SYRACVSA, of the which they placed fifty in battell ray out of the hauen, and ſent the other ten into the hauen to diſcouer: which approaching neare the city, cauſed an Herauld to make open proclamation, that they were come thither to reſtore the LEONTINES to their lands and poſſeſſions, and tooke a ſhippe of the enemies, in the which among other things they found tables, wherein were written the names of al the inhabitants of SYRACVSA, according to their tribes and houſes. Theſe tables were kept farre from the city, in the temple of Iupiter Olympian, but at that time they had ſent for them to know the number of men of ſeruice, and of age to beare weapon. The ſame tables being taken by the ATHENIANS, and caried to the generals of the army, the Soothſayers ſeeing this long rolle of names, at the firſt miſliked it, fearing leaſt the prophecy had bene fulfilled, which promiſed them, that the ATHENIANS one day ſhould take all the SYRACVSANS. Howbeit it is reported this prophecy came to paſſe in an other exploit, when Calippus ATHENIAN hauing ſlaine Dion,, wanne alſo the city of SYRACVSA. Now when Alcibiades was gone from the campe, Nicias bare all the ſway and commaunded the whole army. For Lamachus, though otherwiſe he was a ſtout man, an honeſt man, and very valiant of his handes, and one that would not ſpare him ſelfe in time of neede: neuertheleſſe he was ſo poore and miſerable, that euen when he was in ſtate of a Generall, and gaue vp an accompt of his expences, he would not ſticke to put into his bookes, ſo much for a gowne, and ſo much for a paire of pantophles. Where Nicias authority and reputation contrariwiſe was of an other maner of cut, as well for other reſpects, as for his riches, and for the honour of many noble things which he had done before. As one namely which they tell of him, that on a time being a Captaine with others, and ſitting in councell with his companions in the councell houſe at ATHENS, about the diſpatch of certaine cauſes, he ſpake vnto Sophocles the Poet, then preſent amongeſt them, and bad him ſpeake firſt and ſay his opinion, being the oldeſt man of all the whole company. Sophocles aunſwered him againe: in deede I confeſſe I am the oldeſt man, but thou art the nobleſt man, and him whom euery man regardeth beſt. So hauing at that time Lamachus vnder him, a better Captaine and man of war then him ſelfe was, yet by being ſo ſlow to imploy the army vnder his charge by deferring off time ſtill, and houering about SICILE as farre from his enemies as he could: he firſt gaue the enemies time and leyſure to be bold without feare of him. And then going to beſiege HYBLA, being but a pelting litle towne, and raiſing the ſiege without taking of it: he fell into ſo great a contempt with euery man, that from thenceforth no man almoſt made any more reckonning of him. At laſt, he retired vnto CATANA with his army, without any other exploite done, ſauing that hee tooke HYCCARA, a baggage village of the barbarous people, and where it is ſayed Lais the courtiſan was borne, and that being then a young girle, ſhee was ſold among other priſoners, and afterwards caried into PELOPONNESVS. And in fine, the ſummer being farre ſpent, Nicias was informed that the SYRACVSANS had taken ſuch corage to them, that they would come and enterpriſe the charge vppon them firſt: and that their horſemen were approached already before his campe, to ſkirmiſh with them, aſking the ATHENIANS in mockery, if they were come into SICILE to dwell with the CATANIANS, or to reſtore the LEONTINES to their landes againe. Hereupon with much a do, Nicias determined to go to SYRACVSA and becauſe he would campe there in ſafety, and at eaſe without hazard: he ſent one of CATANA before to SYRACVSA, to tell them (as if he had bene a ſpie) that if they would ſodainely come and ſet vpon the campe of the ATHENIANS & take all their cariage, he wiſhed them to come with all their power to CATANA at a day certain which he would appoint them. For the ATHENIANS (ſaid he) for the moſt part are within the city, wherein there are certaine citizens, which fauoring the SYRACVSANS, haue determined ſo ſoone as they heare of their cōming, to keepe the gates of the city, and at the ſame time alſo to ſet the ATHENIANS ſhippes a fire: and how there were alſo a great number in the city of this confederacy, that did but looke euery hower for their comming. And this was the nobleſt ſtratageme of warre, that Nicias ſhewed all the time he was in SICILE. For by this deuiſe hee made the SYRACVSANS come into the field with all their power, ſo that they left their city without guard: and he him ſelfe departing in the meane time from CATANA with all his fleete, wanne the hauen of SYRACVSA at his eaſe, and choſe out a place to campe in, where his enemies could not hurt him: in the which he was both the ſtronger, & might without let or difficulty ſet vpon them with that, wherein he moſt truſted. The SYRACVSANS returning ſtraight from CATANA and offering him battell hard by the wals of SYRACVSA, he came out into the field, and ouerthrew them. There were not many of the SYRACVSANS ſlaine at this battell, becauſe their horſemen did hinder the chaſe: but Nicias breaking vp the bridges vpon the riuer, gaue Hermocrates occaſion to mock him. For, comforting and encoraging the SYRACVSANS, he told them Nicias deſerued to be laughed at, becauſe he did what he could that he might not fight, as if hee had not purpoſely come from ATHENS to SYRACVSA to fight. This notwithſtanding, he made the SYRACVSANS quake for feare: for where they had then fifteene Captaines, they choſe out three only, to whom the people were ſworne, that they would ſuffer them to haue full power and authority to command and take order for all things. The temple of Iupiter Olympian was hard by the ATHENIANS campe, which they would gladly haue taken, for that it was full of rich iewels and offerings of gold and ſiluer, giuen vnto the temple afore time. But Nicias of purpoſe ſtill draue off time, and delayed ſo long, till the SYRACVSANS at laſt ſent a good garriſon thither to keepe it ſafe: thinking with him ſelfe, that if his ſouldiers came to take and ſpoile the temple, his countrey ſhould be nothing the richer by it, and him ſelfe beſides ſhould beare all the blame of ſacrilege. So, hauing obtained victory without profite, (which ranne ſtraight through SICILE) within few dayes after he returned vnto the city of NAXOS, where he lay all the winter, conſuming a wonderfull maſſe of victuals with ſo great an army, for the doing of things of ſmall moment, vppon certaine SICILIANS that yeelded to him. The SYRACVSANS in the meane time being in hart againe, & coragious: returned to CATANA, where they ſpoiled and ouerranne all the countrey, and burnt the campe of the ATHENIANS. Herefore euery man blamed Nicias much, becauſe through his long delay, and protracting of time to make all things ſure, he let ſlippe ſundry occaſions of notable exploites, wherein good ſeruice might haue bene done. Yet when he would doe a thing in deede, he did it ſo thorowly as no man could take exception to his doings, for that he brought it to ſo good a paſſe: and once taking it in hand, he did execute it with all ſpeede, though he was both ſlow to determine and a coward to enterpriſe. Now whē he remoued his army to return to SYRACVSA, he brought it ſo orderly, and alſo with ſuch ſpeede and ſafety: that he was come by ſea to THAPSVS, had landed and taken the fort of Epipolis, before the SYRACVSANS had any intelligence of it, or could poſſibly helpe it. For the choiſe men of the SYRACVSANS being ſet out againſt him, hoping to haue ſtopped his paſſage: he ouerthrew them, tooke three hundred priſoners, and made their horſemen flie, which before were thought inuincible. But that which made the SYRACVSANS moſt afraied, and ſeemed moſt wonderſull alſo to the other GRECIANS, was this: that in a very ſhort ſpace he had almoſt enuironned SYRACVSA with a wall, which was as much in compaſſe about, as the wals of ATHENS, and worſe to performe, by reaſon of the woddy countrey, and for the ſea alſo that beateth vppon the wals, beſides that there were diuerſe mariſhes hard by it: and yet (ſicke as he was of the ſtone) hee had almoſt finiſhed it. And ſure good reaſon it is that we attribute the fault of the not finiſhing of it, vnto his ſickeneſſe. For mine owne part I wonder maruellouſly both of the care and diligence of the Captaine, and of the valiauntneſſe and dexterity of the ſouldiers, which appeareth by the notable feats they did. For Euripides after their ouerthrow and vtter ruine, made a funerall Epitaphe in verſe, and ſayeth thus.

Eight times our men did put the men of Syracuſa to flight,
So long as with indifferency the goddes did vſe their might.

But we finde it written, that the SYRACVSANS were not only eight times, but many times more ouerthrowen by them: a time at length there was in deede, that both the gods and fortune fought againſt them, euen when the ATHENIANS were of greateſt power. Now Nicias in his owne perſon was euer in the greateſt and moſt weighty affaires, ſtriuing with his ſickely body. Howbeit one day when his diſeaſe grew ſore vpon him, he was compelled to be lodged in his campe with a few of his men: and Lamachus in the meane time alone hauing charge of the whole army, fought with the SYRACVSANS, who then had brought a wall from the city, vnto the wall with the which the ATHENIANS had purpoſed to haue ſhutte them in, to keepe that they ſhould not compaſſe it rounde. And becauſe the ATHENIANS commonly were the ſtronger in theſe skirmiſhes, they many times ouer raſhly followed the chaſe of their enemies that fled. As it chaunced one day that Lamachus went ſo farre, that he was left alone to encounter a company of horſemen of the city, before whom Callicrates marched formoſt, a valiant man of his handes, who challenged Lamachus hand to hand. Lamachus abode him, and in the conflict was firſt hurt: but he gaue Callicrates alſo ſuch a wound therewithall, that they both fell downe dead preſently in the place. At that time the SYRACVSANS being the ſtronger ſide, tooke vp his body, and caried it away with them: but they ſpurred out for life to the ATHENIANS campe, where Nicias lay ſicke, without any gard or ſuccour at all: neuertheleſſe, Nicias roſe with ſpeede out of his bed, and perceiuing the daunger he was in, commaunded certaine of his friendes to ſet the wodde a fire which they had brought within the trenches of the campe, to make certaine deuiſes for battery, and the engines of timber alſo that were already made. That deuiſe onely ſtayed the SYRACVSANS, ſaued Nicias, and the ſtrength of their campe, together with all the ſiluer and cariage of the ATHENIANS. For the SYRACVSANS perceiuing a farre off, betwixt them and the ſtrength of their campe, ſuch a great flame as roſe vp in the aire: vpon ſight of it turned taile ſtraight, and made towardes their city. Things falling out thus, Nicias being left ſole Captaine of the army without anie companion, in great hope notwithſtanding to do ſome good: diuers cities of SICILE yeelded vnto him, ſhippes fraught with corne came out of euery quarter to his campe, and many ſubmitted them ſelues, for the good ſucceſſe he had in all his doings. Furthermore the SYRACVSANS alſo ſent to parle with him of peace, being out of hope that they were able to defend their city any longer againſt him. Gylippus alſo a Captaine of the LACEDÆMONIANS, comming to aide the SYRACVSANS, vnderſtanding by the way how the city of SYRACVSA was ſhut in with a wall round about, and in great diſtreſſe: held on his voyage notwithſtanding, not with any hope to defend SICILE (ſuppoſing the ATHENIANS had won the whole countrey) but with intent neuertheleſſe to helpe the cities of ITALY if he could poſſibly. For it was a common rumor abroade, that the ATHENIANS had wonne all, and that their Captaine for his wiſdome and good fortune was inuincible. Nicias him ſelfe now contrary to his wonted wiſdome and foreſight, truſting altogether to the good ſucceſſe which he ſaw to follow him, but ſpecially beleuing the reports that were told him of SYRACVSA, and the newes that were brought him thence by ſome of them ſelues, which came ſecretly vnto him, perſwading himſelfe that within few dayes he ſhould haue SYRACVSA by compoſition: took no care to withſtand Gylippus comming hither, neither ſent any men to keepe him from landing in SICILE. By which negligence, Gylippus landed in a paſſenger, without Nicias knowledge: ſo ſmall reckonning they made of him, and ſo much did they fondly deſpiſe him. Gylippus being thus landed farre from SYRACVSA, beganne to gather men of warre together, before the SYRACVSANS them ſelues knew of his landing, or looked for his comming: inſomuch as they had already appointed the aſſembly of a councell to determine the articles and capitulations of peace, which they ſhould conclude vpon with Nicias. Moreouer, there were ſome that perſwaded they ſhould doe well to make haſt to conclude the peace, before the incloſure of Nicias wall was altogether finiſhed, which then lacked not much to performe, hauing all the ſtuffe for the purpoſe brought euen ready to the place. But as theſe things were euen thus a doing, arriued one Gongylus at SYRACVSA, that came from CORINTHE with a gally. At whoſe landing, the people vppon the peere flocking about him, to heare what newes: he told them that Gylippus would be there before it were long, and that there came certaine other gallies after to their aide. The SYRACVSANS would hardly beleeue him, vntill there came an other meſſenger alſo ſent from Gylippus ſelfe of purpoſe, that willed them to arme, and come to him into the field. Thereupon the SYRACVSANS being maruellouſly reuiued, went all ſtraight & armed them ſelues. And Gylippus was no ſooner come into SYRACVSA, but hee preſently put his men in battell ray, to ſet vppon the ATHENIANS. Nicias for his part had likewiſe alſo ſet the ATHENIANS in order of battell, and ready to fight. When both the armies were now approached neare each to other, Gylippus threw downe his weapons, and ſent a Heraulde vnto Nicias to promiſe them life and baggage to depart ſafely out of SICILE. But Nicias would make the Herauld none aunſwere to that meſſage. Howbeit there were certaine of his ſouldiers that in mockery asked the Heraulde, if for the comming of a poore cape and wande of LACEDÆMON, the SYRACVSANS thought themſelues ſtrengthned ſo much, that they ſhould deſpiſe the ATHENIANS, which not long before kept three hũdred LACEDÆMONIANS priſoners in irons, farre ſtronger and more haire on their heades, then Gylippus had, and had alſo ſent them home to their citizens at LACEDÆMON. And Timæus writeth alſo, that the SICILIANS them ſelues, made no reckonning of Gylippus, neither then, nor at any time after. After, becauſe they ſaw his extreame couetouſneſſe and miſery: and then, for that he came ſo meanely apparelled, with a threede bare cape, and a long buſh of haire, which made them ſcorne him. Yet in an other place he ſayth, that ſo ſoone as Gylippus arriued in SICILE, many came to him out of euery quarter with very good will, like birds wondering at an owle. This ſecond report ſemeth truer then the firſt: for they ſwarmed about him, becauſe in this cape and wand they ſaw the tokens of the maieſty of the city and ſeigniory of SPARTA. Thucydides alſo ſaith, that it was Gylippus only that did al there. And much like doth Philiſtus ſelfe a SYRACVSAN confeſſe, who was preſent then in priſon and ſaw al things that were done. Notwithſtanding at the firſt battell the ATHENIANS had the vpper hand, & ſlue a nũber of the SYRACVSANS, among the which Gongylus the CORINTHIAN was one. But the next morning following, Gylippus made them know the skill and experience of a wiſe Captaine. For, with the ſelfe ſame weapons, with the ſame men, with the ſame horſes, and in the ſame places, chaunging only the order of his battell, he ouerthrew the ATHENIANS: and (fighting with them ſtil) hauing driuen them euen into their campe, he ſet the SYRACVSANS a worke to build vp a wall ouerthwart, (with the very ſelfe ſame ſtones and ſtuffe which the ATHENIANS had brought and layed there for the finiſhing of their incloſure) to cut off the other, and to keepe it from going forward, that it ioyned not together. So, all that the ATHENIANS had done before vntill that preſent, was vtterly to no purpoſe. Things ſtanding in theſe tearmes, the SYRACVSANS being couragious againe, beganne to arme gallies, and running vp and downe the fields with their horſemen and ſlaues, tooke many priſoners. Gylippus on the other ſide, went in perſon to and fro through the cities of SICILE, perſwading and exhorting the inhabitaunts in ſuch ſort, that they all willingly obeyed him, and tooke armes by his procurement. Nicias ſeeing things thus fall out, fell to his olde trade againe, and conſidering the chaunge of his ſtate and former good lucke, his heart beginning to faint: wrote ſtraight to the ATHENIANS to ſend an other army into SICILE, or rather to call that home which he had there, but in any caſe to giue him leaue to returne, and to diſcharge him of his office, for cauſe of his ſickeneſſe. The ATHENIANS were indifferent before he wrote, to ſend aid thither: howbeit the enuy the nobility bare vnto Nicias good fortune, did euer cauſe ſome delay that they ſent not vntil then, and then they determined to ſend with ſpeed. So Demoſthenes was named to be ſent away immediatly after winter, with a great nauie. In the middeſt of winter Eurymedon went to Nicias, and caried him both money & newes, that the people had choſen ſome of them for his companions in the charge, which were already in ſeruice with him, to wit, Euthydemus and Menander. Now Nicias in the meane time being ſodainly aſſailed by his enemies both by ſea and lande: though at the firſt he had fewer gallies in number then they, yet he budged diuerſe of theirs and ſuncke them. But by land againe, he could not aide his men in time, becauſe Gylippus at the firſt onſet had taken a fort; of his called Plemmyrion, within the which lay the ſtore and tackle for many gallies, and a great maſſe of ready money which was wholly loſt. Beſides, in the ſame conflict alſo were many men ſlaine, and many taken priſoners. Yet further, the greateſt matter of weight was, that thereby he tooke from Nicias the great commodity he had to bring his victuals ſafely by ſea to his campe. For while the ATHENIANS kept this fort, they might at their pleaſure bring victuals without danger to their camp, being couered with the ſame: but when they had loſt it, then it was hard for them ſo to do, becauſe they were euer driuen to fight with the enemies that lay at ancker before the fort. Furthermore the SYRACVSANS did not thinke that their armie by ſea was ouerthrowen, becauſe their enemies were the ſtronger, but for that their men had followed the ATHENIANS diſorderedly: and therfore were deſirous once againe to venture, in better ſort and order than before. But Nicias by no meanes would be brought to fight again: ſaying, that it were a madnes looking for ſuch a great nauy & a new ſupply as Demoſthenes was comming withall, raſhly to fight with a fewer number of ſhippes than they, and but poorely furniſhed. But contrarily, Menander and Euthydemus newly promoted to the ſtate of Captaines with Nicias, being pricked forwards with ambition againſt the two other Captaines (Nicias and Demoſthenes that was then comming) deſired to preuent Demoſthenes, in performing ſome notable ſeruice before his arriuall, & thereby alſo to excell Nicias doings. Howbeit the cloke they had to couer their ambition withall was, the honor & reputation of the city of ATHENS, the which (ſaid they) were ſhamed and diſhonored for euer, if they now ſhould ſhew thẽſelues afraid of the SYRACVSANS, who prouoked them to fight. Thus brought they Nicias againſt his will to battell, in the which the ATHENIANS were ſlaine and ouercome, by the good counſell of a CORINTHIAN Pilot called Ariſton. For the left wing of their battell (as Thucydides writeth) was clearely ouerthrowen, & they loſt a great number of their men. Whereupon Nicias was wonderfully perplexed, conſidering on the one ſide that he had taken maruellous paines, whileſt he was ſole Captaine of the whole army: and on the other ſide, for that he had committed a foule fault, when they had giuen him companions. But as Nicias was in this great deſpaire, they deſcried Demoſthenes vpon a pere of the hauen, with his fleete brauely ſet out and furniſhed, to terrifie the enemies. For he had threeſcore and thirteene gallies, and in them he brought fiue thouſande footemen well armed and appointed, and of darters, bowmen, and hurlers with ſlings about three thouſand, and the gallies trimmed and ſet foorth with goodly armors, numbers of enſignes, and with a world of trumpets, howboyes, and ſuch marine muſicke, and all ſet out in this triumphant ſhew, to feare the enemies the more. Now thought the SYRACVSANS themſelues againe in a pecke of troubles, perceiuing they ſtroue againſt the ſtreame, and conſumed themſelues to no purpoſe, when by that they ſaw there was no likelyhood to be deliuered frõ their troubles. And Nicias alſo reioyced, that ſo great aide was come, but his ioy helde not long. For ſo ſoone as he began to talke with Demoſthenes of the ſtate of things, hee found him bent forthwith to ſet vpon the SYRACVSANS, and to hazard all with ſpeed, that they might quickly take SYRACVSA, and ſo diſpatch away home againe. Nicias thought this more haſt then good ſpeede, and feared much this foolehardineſſe. Whereupon he praied him to attempt nothing raſhly, not deſperately: and perſwaded him that it was their beſt way to prolong the warre againſt the enemies, who were without money, and therefore would ſoone be forſaken of their confederates. And beſides, if they came once to be pinched for lacke of victuals: that they would then quickely ſeeke to him for peace, as they had done afore time. For there were many within Syracvsa that were Nicias friends, who wiſhed him to abide time: for they were weary of warre, and waxed angry alſo with Gylippus. So that if they were but ſtraighted a litle more with want of victuals, they would yeeld ſtraight. Nicias deliuering theſe perſwaſions ſomwhat darkly, & keeping ſomewhat alſo from vtterance, becauſe he would not ſpeake them openly: made his colleagues thinke he ſpake it for cowardlineſſe, and that he returned againe to his former delayes to keepe all in ſecurity, by which manner of proceeding he had from the beginning killed the hearts of his armie, for that he had not at his firſt comming ſet vpon the enemies, but had protracted time ſo long, till the courage of his ſouldiers was colde and done, and himſelfe alſo brought into contempt with his enemies. Whereupon the other Captaines (his colleagues and companions with him in the charge) Euthydemus and Menander, ſtucke to Demoſthenes opinion: wherunto Nicias was alſo forced againſt his will to yeeld. So Demoſthenes the ſelfe ſame night taking the footemen, went to aſſault the fort of Epipolis: where, before his enemies heard any thing of his comming, he ſlew many of them, and made the reſt flie that offered reſiſtance. But not content with this victory, he went farther, till hee fell vpon the Boeotians. They gathering themſelues together were the firſt that reſiſted the Athenians, baſing their pikes with ſuch fury and loude cries, that they cauſed the former to retire, and made all the reſt of the aſſailantes affraide and amaſed. For the formoſt flying backe, came full vpon their companions: who taking them for their enemies, and their flight for a charge, reſiſted them with all their force, & ſo miſtaking one another, both were wounded and ſlaine, and the hurt they ment vnto their enemies, did vnfortunately light vppon their owne fellowes. For this multitude meeting thus confuſedly together, what through their great feare, & what for that they could not diſcerne one an other in the night, the which was neither ſo darke that they could not ſee at all, nor yet ſo cleare, as they might certainely iudge by ſight what they were that met them: (for then the moone declined a pace, and the ſmall light it gaue was diffuſed with the number of men that ran to and fro) the feare they had of the euemie, made them miſtruſt their friendes. All theſe troubles and diſaduantages had the Athenians, and beſide, the moone on their backes, which cauſing the ſhadow to fall forward, did hide their number, and gliſtering of armour: and contrarily, the enemies targets glaring in their eyes by the reflection of the moone that ſhone vppon them, encreaſed their feare, and making them ſeeme a greater number and better appointed then they were in deede. At laſt, the enemies giuing a luſty charge vppon them on euery ſide, after they once beganne to giue backe and turne taile: ſome were ſlaine by their enemies, others by their owne company, and others alſo brake their neckes falling from the rockes. The reſt that were diſperſed abroade in the fieldes, were the next morning euery man of them put to the ſworde by the horſemen. So the account made, two thouſand Athenians were ſlaine, and very few of them eſcaped by flight, that brought their armors backe againe. Wherefore Nicias that alwaies miſtruſted it would thus come to paſſe, was maruellouſly offended with Demoſthenes, and condemned his raſhnes. But he excuſing himſelfe as well as he could, thought it beſt to imbarke in the morning betimes, and ſo to hoiſe ſaile homewardes. For, ſaide he, we muſt looke for no new aide from Athens, neither are we ſtrong enough with this army to ouercome our enemies: and though we were, yet muſt we of neceſſity auoide the place we are in, becauſe (as it is reported) it is alwaies vnholſome for an army to campe in, and then ſpecially moſt contagious, by reaſon of the autumne and ſeaſon of the yeare, as they might plainly ſee by experience. For many of their people were already ſicke, and all of them in maner had no minde to tary. Nicias in no caſe liked the motion of departing thence, becauſe he feared not the Syracvsans, but rather the Athenians, for their accuſations & condemnation. And therefore in open councell he tolde them, that as yet he ſaw no ſuch danger to remaine: and though there were, yet that he had rather die of his enemies hands, than to be put to death by his owne countrymen. Being therein of a contrary mind to Leo Bizantine, who after that ſaid to his citizens. I had rather ſuffer death by you, than to be ſlaine with you. And furthermore, as for remouing their campe to ſome other place, they ſhould haue leaſure enough to determine of that matter as they thought good. Now when Nicias had deliuered this opinion in councell, Demoſthenes hauing had ill lucke at his firſt comming,durſt not contrary it. And the reſidue alſo ſuppoſing that Nicias ſtucke not ſo hard againſt their departure, but that he relied vpon the truſt & confidence he had of ſome within the citie: they all agreed to Nicias. But when newes came that there was a new ſupply come vnto the Syracvsans, and that they ſaw the plague encreaſed more and more in their campe: then Nicias ſelfe thought it beſt to depart thence, and gaue notice to the ſouldiers to prepare themſelues to ſhippe away. Notwithſtanding, when they had put all things in readineſſe for their departure, without any knowledge of the enemy, or ſuſpition thereof: the moone beganne to eclipſe in the night, and ſodainly to loſe her light, to the great feare of Nicias and diuerſe others, who through ignorance and ſuperſtition quaked at ſuch ſightes. For,touching the eclipſe and darkening of the ſunne, which is euer at any coniunction of the moone, euery common perſon then knew the cauſe to be the darkneſſe of the bodie of the moone betwixt the ſunne and our ſight. But the eclipſe of the moone it ſelfe, to know what doth darken it in that ſort, and how being at the full it doth ſodainely loſe her light, and change into ſo many kinde of colours: that was aboue their knowledge, and therefore they thought it verie ſtrange, perſwading themſelues that it was a ſigne of ſome great miſchiefes the goddes did threaten vnto men. For Anaxagoras,the firſt that euer determined and deliuered any thing for certaine and aſſured, concerning the light and darkeneſſe of the moone: his doctrine was not then of any long continuance, neither had it the credit of antiquity,nor was generally knowen but only to a few,who durſt not talke of it but with feare euē to them they truſted beſt. And the reaſon was,for that the people could not at that time abide them that profeſſed the knowledge of naturall Philoſophy,& inquired of the cauſes of things: for them they called then Μετεωρολεσχης, as much to ſay, as curious inquirers, and tatlers of things aboue the reach of reaſon, done in heauen and in the aire. Becauſe the people thought they aſcribed that which was done by the goddes onely, vnto certaine naturall and neceſſarie cauſes, that worke their effectes not by prouidence nor will, but by force, and neceſſary conſequences. For theſe cauſes was Protagoras baniſhed from Athens, and Anaxagoras put in priſon: frõ whence Pericles had much a do to procure his deliuery. And Socrates alſo, though he did not medle with that part of Philoſophie, was notwithſtanding put to death for the ſuſpition thereof. In fine,the doctrine of Plato being receiued and liked, as well for his vertuous life, as alſo for that he ſubmitted the neceſſitie of naturall cauſes vnto the controlement and diſpoſition of diuine power, as vnto a more excellent and ſupreame cauſe: tooke away all the ill opinion which the people had of ſuch diſputations, and gaue open paſſage and free entry vnto the Mathematicall ſciences. And therefore Dion, one of Platoes ſchollers and friendes, an eclipſe of the moone chauncing euen at the very ſame time that he was weying vp his anckers to ſaile from Zacynthe, to make warre with the tyrant Dionyſius: being nothing affraid nor troubled therewithall,made ſaile notwithſtanding, and when he came to Syracvsa, draue out the tyrant. But then it fell out vnfortunately for Nicias, who had no expert nor skilfull ſoothſaier: for the party which he was wont to vſe for that purpoſe, and which tooke away much of his ſuperſtition,called Stilbides,was dead not long before.For this ſigne of the eclipſe of the moone (as Philochorus ſaith) was not hurtfull for men that would flie,but contrarily very good: for ſaid he, things that men doe in feare, would be hidden, and therefore light is an enemie vnto them.But this notwithſtanding,their cuſtome was not to keepe themſelues cloſe aboue three daies in ſuch eclipſes of the moone and ſunne, as Autoclides ſelfe preſcribeth in a booke he made of ſuch matters: where Nicias bare them then in hande, that they ſhould tary the whole and full reuolution of the courſe of the moone, as though he had not ſeene her ſtraight cleere againe, after ſhe had once paſſed the ſhadow and darkeneſſe of the earth. But all other things laide a ſide and forgotten, Nicias diſpoſed himſelfe to ſacrifice vnto the goddes: vntill ſuch time as the enemies came againe as well to beſiege their fortes, and all their campe by lande, as alſo to occupie the whole hauen by ſea. For they had not onely put men aborde into their gallies able to weare armor, but moreouer young boyes into fiſher botes and other light barkes, with the which they came to the Athenians, and ſhamefully reuiled them,to procure them to fight: among the which there was one of a noble houſe, called Heraclides whoſe bote being forwarder than his companions, was in danger of taking by a gallie of the

ATHENIANS, that rowed againſt him. Pollichus his vncle being afraid of it, lanched forward with tenne gallies of SYRACVSA for his reſcue, of the which himſelfe was Captaine. This made the ſouldiers of the ATHENIANS ſo affraid, that they beganne to crie out, it was no longer tarying there, and that there was none other way but to depart thence by land. For after the SYRACVSANS had wonne that battell, they had ſtraight ſhut vp the hauens mouth. Nicias could not conſent to ſuch a retire. For, ſaid he, it would be too great a ſhame for them to leaue their gallies and other ſhippes to the enemie, conſidering the number not to be much leſſe than two hundred: but he thought good rather to arme a hundred and tenne gallies with the beſt and valianteſt of their footmen, and darters, that were in the army, becauſe the other gallies had ſpent their owers. And for the reſt of the army, Nicias forſaking their great campe and walles (which reached as farre as the temple of Hercules) did ſet them in battell ray vpō the pere of the hauen. Inſomuch, that the SYRACVSANS which vntill that day could not performe their wonted ſacrifices vnto Hercules: did then ſende their Prieſtes and Captaines thither to do them. The ſouldiers being imbarked into the gallies, the Prieſtes and Soothſayers came and told the SYRACVSANS, that vndoubtedly the ſignes of the ſacrifices did promiſe them a noble victory, ſo that they gaue no charge, but onely ſtood vpon their defence: for ſo did Hercules euer ouercome, defending when he was aſſailed. With this good hope the SYRACVSANS rowed forward, and there was ſuch a hotte & cruell battell by ſea, as had not beene in all this warre before: the which was as dreadfull to them that ſtoode on the ſhore to behold it, as it was mortall vnto them that fought it, ſeeing the whole conflict, and what alteration fell out beyond all expectation. For the ATHENIANS did as much hurt themſelues by the order they kept in their fight, and by the ranckes of their ſhippes, as they were hurt by their enemies. For they had placed all their great ſhippes together, fighting with the heauie, againſt the enemies that were light and ſwift, which came on on euery ſide of them, hurling ſtones at them which were made ſharpe to wound how euer they lighted: whereas the ATHENIANS onely caſting their dartes, and vſing their bowes and ſlings, by meanes of their rowing vp and downe, could not lightly aime to hit with the head. That maner of fight, Ariſto a CORINTHIAN (an excellent ſhippe maſter) had taught the SYRACVSANS, who was himſelfe ſlaine valiantly fighting, when they were conquerers. The ATHENIANS thereupon being driuen to fight, hauing ſuſteined a maruellous ſlaughter & ouerthrow, (their way to flie by ſea being alſo clearely taken from them) and perceiuing moreouer that they could hardly ſaue themſelues by land: were then ſo diſcouraged, as they made no longer reſiſtance, when their enemies came hard by them and caried away their ſhippes, before their faces. Neither did they aske leaue to take vp their dead mens bodies to burie them, taking more pity to forſake their diſeaſed & ſore wounded companions, than to bury them that were already ſlaine. When they conſidered all theſe things, they thought their owne ſtate more miſerable than theirs, which were to end their liues with much more cruelty, than was their miſery preſent. So they being determined to depart thence in the night, Gylippus perceiuing the SYRACVSANS through all the citie diſpoſed themſelues to ſacrifice to the goddes, and to be merry, as well for the ioy of their victorie, as alſo for Hercules feaſt: thought it booteleſſe to perſwade them, and much leſſe to compell them to take armes vpon a ſodaine, to ſet vpon their enemies that were departing. Howbeit Hermocrates deuiſing with himſelfe how to deceiue Nicias, ſent ſome of his friends vnto him with inſtructions, to tell him that they came from ſuch as were wont to ſend him ſecret intelligence of all things during this warre: and willed him to take heede not to depart that night, leaſt he fell into the ambuſhes which the SYRACVSANS had laid for him, hauing ſent before to take all the ſtraights and paſſages, by the which he ſhould paſſe. Nicias being ouerreached by Hermocrates craft and ſubtilty, ſtaied there that night, as though he had bene affraide to fall within the danger of his enemies ambuſh. Thereupon the SYRACVSANS the next morning by peepe of day, hoyſed ſaile, got the ſtraights of Nicias paſſage, ſtopped the riuers mouthes, & brake vp the bridges: and then caſt their horſemen in a ſquadron in the next plaine fieldes adioyning, ſo that the ATHENIANS had no way left to eſcape and paſſe by them without fighting. At laſt notwithſtanding, hauing ſtaied all that day and the next night following, they put themſelues in iorney, and departed with great cries & lamentations, as if they had gone from their naturall country, and not out of their enemies lande: as well for the great diſtreſſe and neceſſity wherein they were, (lacking all things needefull to ſuſtaine life) as alſo for the extreame ſorow they felt to leaue their ſore wounded companions and diſeaſed kinſemen and friends behinde them, that could not for their weakeneſſe followe the campe, but ſpecially for that they looked for ſome worſe matter to fall to themſelues, than that which they ſawe preſent before their eyes to be happened to their fellowes. But of all the moſt pitifull ſightes to beholde in that campe, there was none more lamentable nor miſerable, than the perſon of Nicias ſelfe: who being tormented with his diſeaſe, and waxen very leane and pale, was alſo vnworthily brought to extreame want of naturall ſuſtenance, euen when he had moſt neede of comfort, being very ſickely. Yet notwithſtanding his weakneſſe and infirmitie, he tooke great paines, and ſuffered many things which the ſoundeſt bodies doe labour much to ouercome and ſuffer: making it appeare euidently to euery man, that he did not abide all that paines for any reſpect of himſelf, or deſire that he had to ſaue his owne life, ſo much as for their ſakes in that he yeelded not vnto preſent deſpaire. For where the ſouldiers for very feare & ſorrow burſt out into teares & bitter wailing: Nicias ſelfe ſhewed, that if by chance he were forced at any time to doe the like, it was rather vpon remembrance of the ſhame and diſhonour that came into his minde, to ſee the vnfortunate ſucceſſe of this voyage, in ſteede of the honor and victory they hoped to haue brought home, than for any other reſpect. But if to ſee Nicias in this miſery, did moue the lookers on to pitie: yet did this much more encreaſe their compaſſion, when they remembred Nicias wordes in his orations continually to the people, to breake this iorney, and to diſſwade them from the enterpriſe of this warre. For then they plainly iudged him not to haue deſerued theſe troubles. Yet furthermore, this cauſed the ſouldiers vtterly to deſpaire of helpe from the goddes, when they conſidered with themſelues, that ſo deuout and godly a man as Nicias (who left nothing vndone that might tend to the honor and ſeruice of the goddes) had no better ſucceſſe, than the moſt vile and wicked perſons in all the whole armie. All this notwithſtanding, Nicias ſtrained himſelfe in all that might be, both by his good countenance, his cheerefull wordes, & his kind vſing of euery man: to let them know that he fainted not vnder his burden, nor yet did yeeld to this his misfortune and extreame calamitie. And thus trauelling eight daies iorney out right together, notwithſtanding that he was by the way continually ſet vpon, wearied and hurt: yet he euer maintained his bandes, and led them whole in company vntill that Demoſthenes with all his bandes of ſouldiers was taken priſoner, in a certaine village called POLYZELIOS: where remaining behinde, he was enuironned by his enemies in fight, and ſeeing himſelfe ſo compaſſed in, drewe out his ſworde, and with his owne handes thruſt him ſelfe thorow, but died not of it, becauſe his enemies came ſtraight about him, and tooke hold of him. The SYRACVSANS thereupon went with ſpeede to Nicias, and told him of Demoſthenes caſe. He giuing no credite to them, ſent preſently certaine of his horſemen thither to vnderſtand the truth: who brought him word that Demoſthenes and all his men were taken priſoners. Then he beſought Gylippus to treate of peace, to ſuffer the poore remaine of the ATHENIANS to depart out of SICILE with ſafetie, and to take ſuch hoſtages for the ſure payment of all ſuch ſummes of money the SYRACVSANS had diſburſed by meanes of this warre, as ſhould like himſelfe: which he promiſed he would cauſe the ATHENIANS to performe & ſatisfie vnto them. Howbeit the SYRACVSANS would in no wiſe hearken to peace, but cruelly threatning and reuiling them that made motion hereof, in rage gaue a new onſet vpon him, more fiercely then euer before they had done. Nicias being then vtterly without any kind of victuals, did notwithſtãding hold out that night, & marched al the next day folowing (though the enemies dartes ſtill flew about their eares) vntill he came to the riuer of Aſinarus, into the which the SYRACVSANS did forcibly driue them. Some others of them alſo dying for thirſt, entred the riuer of themſelues, thinking to drinke. But there of all others was the moſt cruell ſlaughter of the poore wretches, euen as they were drinking: vntill ſuch time as Nicias falling downe flat at Gylippus feete, ſaide thus vnto him. Since the goddes haue giuen thee (Gylippus) victorie, ſhew mercy, not to me that by theſe miſeries haue won immortall honor and fame, but vnto theſe poore vanquiſhed ATHENIANS: calling to thy remembrance, that the fortunes of warre are common, and how that the ATHENIANS haue vſed you LACEDÆMONIANS courteouſly as often as fortune fauored them againſt you.

Gylippus ſheweth mercy to Nicias.

Gylippus beholding Nicias, & perſwaded by his words, tooke compaſſion of him (for he knew he was a friend vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS at the laſt peace concluded betwixt them, and furthermore thought it great honor to him, if he could carie away the two Captaines or Generals of his enemies priſoners) ſhewed him mercy, gaue him wordes of comfort, and moreouer commaunded beſides that they ſhould take all the reſidue priſoners. But his commaundement was not knowen in time to all: inſomuch as there were many moe ſlaine than taken, although ſome priuate ſouldiers ſaued diuers notwithſtanding by ſtealth. Now the SYRACVSANS hauing brought all the priſoners that were openly taken into a troupe together, firſt vnarmed them, then taking their weapons from them hung them vp vpon the goodlieſt young trees that ſtoode vpon the riuers ſide in token of triumph.

And ſo putting on triumphing garlands vpon their heades, and hauing trimmed their owne horſes in triumphant maner, & alſo ſhorne all the horſes of their enemies: in this triumphing ſort they made their entry into the citie of SYRACVSA, hauing gloriouſly ended the moſt notable warre that euer was amongſt the GREEKES one againſt an other, and attained alſo the nobleſt victorie that could be atchieued, and that only by force of armes and valiancy. So at their returne, a councell and aſſembly was holden at SYRACVSA, by the citizens and their confederates: in the which, Eurycles one of the orators (a practiſer in publicke cauſes) firſt made petition, that the day on the which they had taken Nicias, might for euer thenceforth be kept holy day, without any maner of worke, or labour, but only to do ſacrifice to the goddes: and that the feaſt ſhould be called, Aſinarus feaſt, after the name of the riuer where the ouerthrow was giuen.

This victory was had the ſixe & twenty day of the moneth of Iuly. And as touching the priſoners that the confederates of the ATHENIANS and their ſlaues ſhould be openly ſold by the dromme: and that the naturall ATHENIANS which were free men, and their confederates of the country of SICILE, ſhould be clapped in irons, and laid in priſon, the Captaines only excepted, whom they ſhould put to death.

The Captaines of the Athenians condemned to die.

The SYRACVSANS confirmed this decree. And when the Captaine Hermocrates went about to perſwade them that to be mercifull in victory, would be more honor vnto them, than the victory it ſelf: they thruſt him backe with great tumult. And furthermore, when Gylippus made ſute that for the Captaines of the ATHENIANS, he might carie them aliue with him to SPARTA: he was not onely ſhamefully denied, but moſt vilely abuſed, ſo luſtie were they growen vpon this victorie, beſide alſo that in the time of the warre they were offended with him, & could not endure his ſtraight ſeuere LACONIAN gouernement. Timæus ſaith moreouer, that they accuſed him of couetouſnes and theft, which vice he inherited from his father.

For Cleandrides his father was conuict for extortion, and baniſhed ATHENS. And Gylippus ſelfe hauing ſtolen thirtie talents out of a thouſande which Lyſander ſent to SPARTA by him, and hauing hid them vnder the eauings of his houſe, being bewrayed, was compelled with ſhame to flie his countrie, as we haue more amply declared in the life of Lyſander. So Timæus writeth, that Nicias & Demoſthenes were not ſtoned to death by the SYRACVSANS, as Thucydides and Philiſtus report, but that they killed themſelues, vpon word ſent them by Hermocrates (before the aſſembly of the people was broken vp) by one of his men whom the keepers of the priſon let in vnto them: howbeit their bodies were caſt out at the iaile dore, for euery man to beholde.

I haue heard there is a target at this preſent to be ſeene in a temple at SYRACVSA, which is ſaid to be Nicias target, couered all ouer with golde and purple ſilke, paſſing finely wrought together. As for the other priſoners of the ATHENIANS, the moſt of them died of ſickneſſe, and of ill handling in the priſon: where they had no more allowed them to liue withall but two diſhfuls of barley for their bread, and one of water for ech man a day. In deede many of them were conueyed away, and ſold for ſlaues: and many alſo that ſcaped vnknowen as ſlaues, were alſo ſolde for bondmen, whom they branded in the forehead with the print of a horſe, who notwithſtanding beſides their bondage endured alſo this paine. But ſuch, their humble patience and modeſtie did greatly profite them. For either ſhortly after they were made free men, or if they ſtill continued in bondage, they were gently intreated, and beloued of their maiſters. Some of them were ſaued alſo for Eurypides ſake. For the SICILIANS liked the verſes of this Poet better, than they did any other GRECIANS verſes of the middeſt of GRECE. For if they heard any rimes or ſongs like vnto his, they would haue them by hart, and one would preſent them to an other with great ioy. And therfore it is reported, that diuers eſcaping this bondage, and returning againe to ATHENS, went very louingly to ſalute Euripides, & to thanke him for their liues: and told him how they were deliuered from ſlauery, onely by teaching them thoſe verſes which they remembred of his workes. Others told him alſo, how that after the battell, they ſcaping by flight, and wandering vp and downe the fields, met with ſome that gaue them meate and drinke to ſing his verſes. And this is not to be maruelled at, weighing the report made of a ſhip of the citie of CAVNVS, that on a time being chaſed in thither by pyrates, thinking to ſaue themſelues within their portes, could not at the firſt be receiued, but had repulſe: howbeit being demanded whether they could ſing any of Euripides ſongs, and anſwering that they could, were ſtraight ſuffered to enter, and come in. The newes of this lamentable ouerthrow, was not beleeued at the firſt, when they heard of it at ATHENS. For a ſtranger that landed in the hauen of PIRÆA, went and ſat him downe (as the manner is) in a barbers ſhop, and thinking it had bene commonly knowen there, began to talke of it. The barber hearing the ſtranger tell of ſuch matter: before any other had heard of it: ranne into the citie as faſt as he could, and going to the gouernours told the newes openly before them all. The Magiſtrates thereupon did preſently call an aſſembly, and brought the barber before them: who being demaunded of whom he heard theſe newes, could make no certaine report. Whereupon being taken for a forger of newes, that without ground had put the citie in feare and trouble: he was preſently bound, and layed on a wheele, whereon they vſe to put offenders to death, and ſo was there tormented a great time, vntill at laſt there arriued certaine men in the citie, who brought too certaine newes thereof, and told euery thing how the ouerthrow came. So as in fine they found Nicias wordes true, which now they beleeued, when they ſaw all thoſe miſeries light fully vpon them, which he long before had prognoſticated vnto them.

Marcus Craſſus.

Marcus Craſſus kinred, and youth.

Marcus Craſſus was the ſonne of a Cenſor, who had alſo receiued the honour of triumph: but himſelf was brought vp in a litle houſe with two other of his brethrẽ, which were both maried in their fathers & mothers life time, and kept houſe together. Whereupon it came to paſſe, that he was a man of ſuch ſober and temperate dyet, that one of his brethren being deceaſed, he maried his wife by whõ he had children. For womẽ, he liued as continent a life, as any ROMAINE of his time: notwithſtanding, afterwardes being of riper yeares, he was accuſed by Plotinus to haue defloured one of the Veſtall Nunnes called Licinia. But in troth the cauſe of that ſuſpitiõ grew thus. Licinia had a goodly pleaſant garden hard by the ſuburbes of the citie, wherewith Craſſus was maruellouſly in loue, and would faine haue had it good cheape: and vpon this onely occaſion was often ſeene in ſpeach with her, which made the people ſuſpect him. But for aſmuch as it ſeemed to the iudges that his couetouſneſſe was the cauſe that made him follow her, he was cleared of the inceſt ſuſpected, but the neuer left following of the Nunne, till he had got the garden of her. The ROMAINES ſay there was but that onely vice of couetouſneſſe in Craſſus, that drowned many other goodly vertues in him: for mine owne opinion, me thinkes he could not be touched with that vice alone without others, ſince it grew ſo great, as the note of that onely did hide and couer all his other vices. Now to ſet out his extreme couetous deſire of getting, naturally bred in him, they proue it by two manifeſt reaſons. The firſt, his manner and meanes he vſed to get: and the ſecond, the greatneſſe of his wealth. For at the beginning he was not left much more worth, then three hundred talents. And during the time that he delt in the affaires of the common wealth, he offered the tenthes of all his goods wholly vnto Hercules, kept open houſe for all the people of ROME, and gaue alſo to euery citizen of the ſame as much corne as would keepe him three monthes: & yet when he went from ROME to make warre with the PARTHIANS, himſelfe being deſirous to know what all he had was worth, found that it amounted to the ſumme of ſeuen thouſand one hundred talents. But if I may with licence vſe euill ſpeach, writing a troth: I ſay he got the moſt part of his wealth by fire and bloud, raiſing his greateſt reuenue of publicke calamities. For when Sylla had taken the citie of ROME, he made portſale of the goods of them whom he had put to death, to thoſe that gaue moſt, terming them his booty, onely for that he would the nobilitie, and greateſt men of power in the citie ſhould be partakers with him of this iniquitie: and in this open ſale Craſſus neuer left taking of giftes, nor bying of things of Sylla for profit. Furthermore, Craſſus perceiuing that the greateſt decay commonly of the buildings in ROME came by fire, and falling downe of houſes, through the ouermuch weight by numbers of ſtories built one vpon an other: bought bondmē that were maſons, carpenters, and theſe deuiſours and builders, & of thoſe he had to the number of fiue hundred. Afterwardes, when the fire tooke any houſe, he would buy the houſe while it was a burning, and the next houſes adioyning to it, which the owners ſold for litle, being then in daunger as they were, and a burning: ſo that by proces of time, the moſt part of the houſes in ROME came to be his. But notwithſtāding that he had ſo many ſlaues to his workemen, he neuer built any houſe from the ground, ſauing his owne houſe wherein he dwelt: ſaying, that ſuch as delighted to build, vndid themſelues without helpe of any enemy. And though he had many mynes of ſiluer, many ploughes, and a number of hyndes and ploughmen to follow the ſame: yet all that commoditie was nothing, in reſpect of the profit his ſlaues and bondmen brought him dayly in. As readers, ſcriueners, goldſmithes, bankers, receiuers, ſtewardes of houſhold, caruers, and other ſuch officers at the table, taking paines himſelfe to helpe them when they were learners, and to inſtruct them what they ſhould do: and to be ſhort, he thought the greateſt care a good houſholder ought to haue, was to ſee his ſlaues or ſeruants well taught, being the moſt liuely cattell and beſt inſtruments of a mans houſe. And ſurely therein his opinion was not ill, at the leaſt if he thought as he ſpake: that all things muſt be done by ſeruaunts, and his ſeruaunts muſt be ruled by him. For we ſee that the art and skill to be a good husband, when it conſiſteth in gouernement of things without life or ſence, is but a baſe thing, onely tending to gaine: but when it dependeth vpon good order and gouernement of men, me thinkes then it is to know how to gouerne well a common wealth. But as his iudgement was good in the other, ſo was it very bad in this: that he thought no man rich, and wealthie, that could not maintaine a whole armie with his owne proper goods. For the warre (as king Archidamus was wont to ſay) is not made with any certaintie of expence: and therefore there muſt no ſufficiencie of riches be limited for the maintenance of the ſame. But herein Marius and he differed farre in opinion: who hauing allowed euery ROMAINE foureteen acres land (called with them, Iugera) vnderſtanding that ſome were not pleaſed, but would haue more, made them this anſwer. The gods forbid any ROMAINE ſhould thinke that land litle, which indeed is enough to ſuffiſe for his maintenance. This notwithſtanding, Craſſus was curteous to ſtraungers, for his houſe was open to them all, and he lent his friends money without intereſt: but when they brake day of payment with him, then would he roūdly demaunde his money of them. So, his curteſie to lend many times without intereſt, did more trouble them, than if he had taken very great vſurie. Indeede when he bad any man to come to his table, his fare was but euen ordinarie, without all exceſſe: but his fine and cleanly ſeruice, & the good entertainement he gaue euery man that came to him, pleaſed them better, than if he had bene more plentifull of dyet and diſhes. As for his learning and ſtudy, he chiefly ſtudied eloquence, and that ſort ſpecially that beſt would ſerue his turne to ſpeake in open preſence: ſo that he became the beſt ſpoken man in ROME of all his time, and by his great induſtry and diligent indeuour excelled all them that euen by nature were moſt apt vnto it. For ſome ſay, he had neuer ſo ſmall nor litle a cauſe in hand, but he alwayes came prepared, hauing ſtudied his caſe before for pleading: and oftentimes alſo when Pompey, Cæſar, and Cicero refuſed to riſe, and ſpeake to matters, Craſſus would defend euery cauſe if he were requeſted. And therfore was he generally beloued & well thought of, becauſe he ſhewed himſelfe painfull, & willing to helpe euery man. Likewiſe was his gentleneſſe maruellouſly eſteemed, becauſe he ſaluted euery body curteouſly, & made much of all men: for, whom ſo euer he met in the ſtreetes that ſpake to him as he paſſed and ſaluted him, were he neuer ſo meane, he would ſpeake to him againe, and call him by his name. It is ſayd alſo he was very well ſtudied in ſtories, and indifferently ſeene in Philoſophy, ſpecially in Ariſtotles workes, which one Alexander did read vnto him, a man that became very gentle and patient of nature, by vſing of Craſſus company: for it were hard to ſay, whether Alexander was poorer when he came to Craſſus

or made poorer while he was with him. Of all his friendes he would euer haue Alexander abroad with him, and while they were abroad, would lend him a hat to couer his head by the way: but ſo ſoone as they were returned, he would call for it againe. O wonderfull patience of a man! to ſee that he making profeſsion of Philoſophie as he did, the poore man being in great pouertie, did not place pouertie in things indifferent. But hereof we will ſpeake more hereafter. Cinna and Marius being now of greater power, and comming on directly towards ROME, euery man ſuſpected ſtraight their comming was for no good to the common wealth, but as appeared plainly, for the death and deſtruction of the nobleſt men of ROME. For it ſo fell out indeede, that they ſlue all the chiefe men they found in the citie, among whom Craſſus father & his brother were of the number, and himſelfe being at that time but young, eſcaped the preſent danger onely by flight. Furthermore, Craſſus hearing that they layed wait to take him, and that the tyrants ſought him in euery place, tooke three of his friends in his company, and ten ſeruants onely, and fled into SPAYNE with all poſsible ſpeede, where he had bene with his father before, and had got ſome friends when he was Prætor, and ruled that country. Neuertheleſſe, ſeeing euery body afrayed, and miſtruſting Marius crueltie as if he had bene at their doores, he durſt not bewray himſelfe to any man, but went into the fieldes, and hid him in a great caue being within the land of one Vibius Piciacus by the ſea ſide, from whence he ſent a man of his to this Piciacus, to feele what good will he bare him, but ſpecially for that his victuals began to faile him. Vibius hearing that Craſſus was ſafe, and had ſcaped, became very glad of it: and vnderſtanding how many perſons he had with him, and into what place he was gotten, went not himſelfe to ſee him, but called one of his ſlaues (who was his receiuer and occupied that ground for him) and bringing him neare the place where Craſſus was, commaunded him euery night to prouide meate for ſupper, to bring it ready dreſſed to this rocke whereunder was the caue, & make no wordes of it, neither be inquiſitiue for whom it was, for if he did, he ſhould dye for it: and otherwiſe, for keeping the thing ſecret as he commanded, he promiſed to make him a free man. This caue is not farre from the ſea ſide, & is cloſed in round about with two rocks that meet together, which receiue a ſoft coole wind into them. When ye are entred into the caue, it is of a great height within, and in the hollowneſſe therof are many other caues of great receit one within an other, and beſides that, it neither lacketh light nor water: for there is a well of paſsing good water running hard by the rocke, and the naturall riftes of the rockes alſo receiuing the light without, where they meet together, do ſend it inward into the caue. So that in the day time it is maruellous light, and hath no dampe ayre, but very pure and dry, by reaſon of the thickeneſſe of the rocke, which ſendeth all the moiſtneſſe and vapour into that ſpringing well. Craſſus keeping cloſe in this caue, Vibius receiuer brought victuals thither dayly to relieue him, and his company, but ſaw not them he brought it to, nor could vnderſtand what they were: and yet they ſaw him plainly, obſeruing the houre and time of his comming when he brought the ſame. He prouided them no more then would euen neceſſarily ſerue their turne, and yet plenty ſufficient to make good cheare withall: for Vibius was bent to entertaine Craſſus as honorably as he could poſsible, in ſomuch as he conſidered he was a young man, and therefore reaſon would he ſhould offer him ſome occaſion to take ſuch pleaſure and delight as his youth required. For to relieue his neceſsitie onely, he thought that rather a part of feare, than any ſhew of loue towardes him. One day he tooke two fayre young damſels, and brought them with him to the ſea ſide: and when he came to the caue, ſhewed them where they ſhould get vp, and bad them not be afrayed. Craſſus at the firſt, when he ſaw the young wenches, was afrayed he had bene betrayed: yet he asked them what they were, and whom they ſought. They being inſtructed by Vibius what they ſhould ſay, aunſwered, that they ſought their maiſter that was hidden there. Then Craſſus knew this was Vibius mirth to ſhew him curteſie: ſo he receiued them into his caue, and kept them as long as he lay there, letting Vibius vnderſtand by them what he lacked. Feneſtella writeth, that he ſaw one of them when ſhe was an old woman, and that he had heard her tell him this tale many a time with great delight. In fine, Craſſus (after he had lyen hidden in this caue eight monthes) vnderſtanding that Cinna was dead, came out: and ſo ſoone as he made himſelfe to be knowen, there repayred a great number of ſouldiers vnto him, of whom he onely choſe two thouſand fiue hundred, and with them paſſed by many cities, and ſacked one called MALACA, as diuers do write, but he flatly denied it, and ſtoutly contraried them that affirmed it. And afterwardes hauing gotten ſhippes together, went into AFRICKE, to Metellus Pius, a man of great fame, and that had already gotten a great army together. Howbeit he taried not long with Metellus, but iarring with him, went vnto Sylla, who welcomed and honored him as much, as any that he had about him. Sylla afterwardes arriuing in ITALIE, intending to imploy all the young nobility he had in his company, gaue euery one of them charge vnder him, and ſent Craſſus into the country of the MARSIANS, to leauy men of warre there. Craſſus deſiring certaine bandes of Sylla to aide him, being driuen to paſſe by his enemies: Sylla aunſwered him angerly againe. I giue thee thy father, thy brother, thy friendes and kinſemen to aide thee, whom they moſt wickedly haue ſlaine and murthered, and whoſe deathes I purſue with hot reuenge of mayne army, vpon thoſe bloudy murtherers that haue ſlaine them. Craſſus being netled with theſe wordes, departed thence preſently, and ſtoutly paſsing through his enemies, leauied a good number of ſouldiers: and was euer after ready at Syllaes commaundement in all his warres. Here began firſt (as they ſay) the ſtrife and contention betwixt him and P*ompey*. For Pompey being younger than Craſſus, and borne of a wicked father in ROME, whom the people more hated thā euer they did man: came yet to great honour by his valiancy, & by the notable acts he did in the warres at that time. So that Sylla did P*ompey* that honor many times, which he ſeldome did vnto them that were his elders, nor yet vnto thoſe that were his equals: as to riſe vp when he came towardes him, to put off his cappe, to call him Imperator, as much as Lieutenant generall. And this galled Craſſus to the hart, although he had no wrong in that P*ompey* was taken before him, becauſe he had no experience in matters of warre at that time, and alſo becauſe theſe two vices that were bred in him, miſery and couetouſneſſe, drowned all his vertue and well doing. For at the ſacke of the citie of TVDER, which he tooke, he priuily got the moſt part of the ſpoyle to himſelfe, whereof he was accuſed before Sylla. Yet in the laſt battell of all this ciuill warre (which was the greateſt and moſt daungerous of all other) euen before ROME it ſelfe, the wing that Sylla led, was repulſed and ouerthrowen: but Craſſus that led the right wing, ouercame his enemies, followed them in chaſe till midnight, ſent Sylla word of his victory, and demaunded victuals for his men. But then againe he ranne into as great defame, for buying, or begging the confiſcate goodes of the outlawes appointed to be ſlaine, for litle or nothing. And it is ſayd alſo, that he made one an outlaw in the country of the BRVTIANS, without Syllaes priuitie or commaundement onely to haue his goodes. But Sylla being told of it, would neuer after vſe him in any open ſeruice. Surely this is a ſtraunge thing, that C*raſſus* ſelfe being a great flatterer of other, & could creepe into any mans fauour: was yet himſelfe eaſie to be won through flattery, of any man that would ſeeke him that way. Furthermore, it is ſayd of him that he had this propertie: that though himſelfe was as extremely couetous as might be, yet he bitterly reproued and vtterly miſliked them that had his owne humour of auarice. P*ompeyes* honour that he attained vnto dayly, by bearing great charge & rule in the warres, did greatly trouble C*raſſus*: both becauſe he obtained the honour of triumph before he came to be Senatour, & alſo for that the ROMAINES commonly called him, P*ompeius Magnus*, to ſay, P*ompey* the great. C*raſſus* being in place on a time when one ſayd that ſaw P*ompey* comming, ſee, P*ompey* the great is come. And how great I pray ye, ſayd he ſcornefully? howbeit deſpayring that he could not attaine to match him in the warres, he gaue himſelfe vnto the affaires of the citie: and by his paines and induſtry of pleading, and defending mens cauſes, by lending of money to them that needed, and by helping of them that ſued for any office, or demaunded any thing elſe of the people, he attained in the end to the like eſtimation and authoritie that P*ompey* was come vnto, by his many noble victories. And there was one notable thing in either of them. For P*ompeyes* fame & power was greater in ROME, whē him ſelfe was abſent: and contrariwiſe when he was there preſent, C*raſſus* oftentimes was better eſteemed than he. P*ompey* caried a great maieſty and grauity in his maner of life, would not be ſeene often of the people, but kept from repayring to open places, and would ſpeake but in few mens cauſes, and that vnwillingly: all to keepe his fauour and credit whole for himſelfe, when he ſtood in neede to employ the ſame. Where C*raſſus* diligence was profitable to many, becauſe he kept continually in the market place, and was eaſie to be repayred vnto by any man that required his helpe, dayly following thoſe exerciſes, indeuouring himſelfe to pleaſure euery man: ſo that by this eaſie acceſſe and familiaritie, for fauour and good will, he grew to exceede the grauity and maieſty of Pompey. But as for the worthineſſe of their perſons, their eloquence of ſpeach, and their good grace and countenance: in all thoſe (it is ſayd) Pompey and Craſſus were both alike. And this enuy and emulation neuer caried Craſſus away, with any open malice and ill will. For though he was ſory to ſee Pompey and Cæſar honoured aboue him: yet the worme of ambition neuer bred malice in him. No, though Cæſar when he was taken by pyrates in Asia (as he was once) and being kept priſoner cryed out aloude: O Craſſus, what ioy will this be to thee, when thou ſhalt heare I am in priſon. This notwithſtanding, they were afterwardes good friendes, as it appeareth. For Cæſar being ready on a time to depart out of Rome for Prætor into Spayne, and not being able to ſatisfie his creditours that came flocking all at once about him, to ſtay and arreſt his cariage: Craſſus in that time of neede forſooke him not, but became his ſurety for the ſumme of eight hundred and thirty talentes.

In fine, all Rome being deuided into three factions, to wit, of Pompey, Cæſar, and Craſſus (for as for Cato, the eſtimation they had of his fidelitie was greater, than his authority: and his vertue more wondered at then practiſed) inſomuch as the graueſt and wiſeſt men tooke part with Pompey. The liueliest youthes, and likelieſt to runne into deſperate attemptes, they followed Cæſars hope.

Craſſus keeping the middeſt of the ſtreame, was indifferent to them both, and oftentimes chaunged his minde and purpoſe. For in matters of gouernement in the common weale, he neither ſhewed himſelfe a conſtant friend, nor a daungerous enemy: but for gaine, was eaſily made friend or foe. So that in a moment they ſaw him prayſe and reproue, defend and condemne, the ſame lawes, and the ſame men. His eſtimation grew more, through the peoples feare of him: than for any good will they bare him. As appeareth by the aunſwere that one Sicinius (a very buſie headed man, and one that troubled euery gouernour of the common weale in his time) made to one that asked him, why he was not buſie with Craſſus amongſt the reſt: and how it happened that he ſo ſcaped his handes? O, ſayd he, he caries hay on his horne.

The manner was then at Rome, if any man had a curſt bullocke that would ſtrike with his horne, to winde hay about his head, that the people might beware of him when they met him.

The warre of the bondmen, called Spartacus warre.

The commotion of fenſers, which ſome call Spartacus warre, their waſting and deſtroying of Italie came vpon this occaſion. In the citie of Capva, there was one Lentulus Batiatus, that kept a great number of fenſers at vnrebated foyles, whom the Romaines call Gladiatores, whereof the moſt part were Gavles & Thracians. Theſe men were kept locked vp, not for any fault they had committed, but onely for the wickedneſſe of their maiſter that had bought them, and compelled them by force, one to fight with an other at the ſharpe. On a time two hundred of them were minded to ſteale away: but their conſpiracie being bewrayed, three ſcore and eighteen of them entred into a cookes houſe, and with the ſpittes and kitching kniues, which there they got, went quite out of the citie. By the way they fortuned to meete with cartes loden with fenſers weapons, that were brought from Capva going to ſome other citie: thoſe they alſo tooke by force, and arming themſelues therewith, got them then to a ſtrong place of ſituation.

Where amongſt themſelues they choſe three Captaines, & one Spartacus a Thracian borne (and of thoſe countrymen that go wandring vp and downe with their heards of beaſtes neuer ſtaying long in a place) they made their Generall. This Spartacus was not onely valiant, but ſtrong made withall, and endued with more wiſedome and honeſty, than is commonly found in men of his ſtate and condition: and for ciuilitie and good vnderſtanding, a man more like to the Grecians, than any of his country men commonly be It is reported, that whẽ Spartacus came firſt to Rome to be ſold for a ſlaue, there was found as he ſlept, a ſnake wound about his face. His wife ſeeing it, being his owne country woman, & a wiſe woman beſides, poſſeſt with Bacchus ſpirit of diuination: ſaid plainly that it did ſignifie, that one day he ſhould be of great power, much dread, and haue very good ſucceſſe. This ſame woman propheteſſe was then with him, and followed him likewiſe when he fled. Now firſt they ouerthrew certaine ſouldiers that came out of Capva againſt them, thinking to take them: and ſtripping them of their armour & weapons, made them glad to take the fenſers weapons, which they threw away as vile and vnſeemly. After that, the ROMAINES ſent Clodius Prætor againſt them, with three thouſand men. Who beſieged them in their forte, ſituate vpon a hill that had a verie ſteepe and narrowe aſcent vnto it, and kept the paſſage vp to them: all the reſt of the ground round about it, was nothing but high rocks hanging ouer, and vpon them great ſtore of wilde vines. Of them the bondmen cut the ſtrongeſt ſtirppes, and made thereof ladders, like to theſe ſhip ladders of ropes, of ſuch a length and ſo ſtrong, that they reached from the top of the hill euen to the very bottome: vpon thoſe they all came ſafely downe, ſauing one that taried aboue to throwe downe their armor after them, who afterwards by the ſame ladder ſaued himſelfe laſt of all. The ROMAINES miſtruſting no ſuch matter, theſe bondmen compaſſed the hill round, aſſailed them behinde, and put them in ſuch a feare with the ſodaine onſet, as they fled vpon it euery man, and ſo was their campe taken. Thereupon diuerſe heardmen and ſheapheards that kept cattell hard by the hill, ioyned with the ROMAINES that fled, being ſtrong and hardy men: of which ſome they armed, and others they vſed as ſcoutes and ſpials to diſcouer. Vpon this ouerthrowe was ſent an other Captaine from ROME, called Publius Varinus, againſt theſe bondmen: who firſt ouercame Furius, the Lieutenant of Varinus in battell, and two thouſand of his men: & after that againe they ſlue one Coſſinius, and ouerthrew a great army of his, being ioyned with P. Varinus, as his fellow and counſeller. Spartacus hauing intelligence that Coſſinius was bathing himſelf at a place called the ſalte pits, had almoſt taken him tardie, hauing much a do by flight to ſaue himſelfe: notwithſtanding, Spartacus wanne all his cariage at that time, and hauing him hard in chaſe, tooke his whole cãpe with great ſlaughter of his men, among whom Coſſinius ſelf was ſlaine. Spartacus hauing thus now in ſundry battels and encounters ouercome the Prætor himſelfe, P. Varinus, and at the length taken his ſergeants from him that caried the axes before him, and his owne horſe whereon he rode himſelfe: was growne then to ſuch a power, as he was dreaded of euery man. Yet all this notwithſtanding, Spartacus wiſely conſidering his owne force, thinking it not good to tary till he might ouercome the power of the ROMAINES: marched with his armie towards the Alpes, taking it their beſt way after they had paſſed them ouer, euery man to repaire home to his owne countrey, ſome into GAVLE, the reſt into THRACIA. But his ſouldiers truſting to their multitude, and perſuading themſelues to do great things: would not obey him therein, but went againe to ſpoile and ouerrune all ITALIE. The Senate of ROME being in a great perplexitie, not onely for the ſhame and diſhonor that their men ſhould be ouercome in that ſort by ſlaues and rebels, but alſo for the feare and danger all ITALIE ſtood in beſides: ſent both the Conſulles together, Gelius and Lentulus, as vnto as difficult and dangerous a warre, as any that could haue happened vnto them. This Gellius one of the Conſuls, ſetting ſodainly vpõ a band of the GERMAINES, which in a brauerie and contempt as it were, diſpearſed themſelues from their campe, put them to the ſworde euery man. Lentulus, his colleague & fellow Conſull on the other ſide, campaſſed in Spartacus round with a great armie. but Spartacus charged his Lieutenants that led the army, gaue them battell, ouerthrew them, and tooke all their cariage. Hereupon, marching on ſtill with his armie towards the Alpes, Caſſius the Prætor, and Gouernor of GAVLE about the PO, came againſt him with an armie of ten thouſand men. Spartacus ioyned battell with him, and ouercame him. Caſſius hauing loſt a great number of his men, with great difficultie ſaued himſelfe by flying. The Senate hearing of Caſſius ouerthrow, were maruellouſly offended with the Cõſuls, and ſent commaundement vnto them, to leaue off the warre: and thereuppon gaue the whole charge therof vnto Marcus Craſſus, who was accompanied in this iorney with many noble young gentlemen of honorable houſes, both for that he was maruellouſly eſteemed, and alſo for the good will they bare him. Now went Craſſus from ROME, and camped in ROMANIA, tarying Spartacus comming, who was marching thitherward. He ſent Mummius one of his Lieutenants with two legions, to fetche a compaſſe about to intrappe the enemie behinde, ſtraightly commanding him to follow Spartacus rereward, but in no caſe to offer him skirmiſh nor battell. But Mummius notwithſtanding this ſtraight commaundement, ſeeing ſome hope giuen him to doe good, ſet vpon Spartacus, who gaue him the ouerthrowe, ſlue numbers of his men, and moe had ſlaine, ſauing that certaine of them ſaued themſelues by flight, hauing only loſt their armor and weapons. Hereupon Craſſus was grieuouſly offended with Mummius, and receiuing his ſouldiers that fled, gaue them other armour and weapons: but yet vpon ſureties, that they ſhould keepe them better thencefoorth, than they had before done. Now Craſsus of the fiue hundred that were in the firſt ranckes, and that firſt fled, them he deuided into fiftie times ten, and out of euery one of thoſe he put one of them to death as the lot fell out: renuing againe the ancient diſcipline of the ROMAINES to puniſh cowardly ſouldiers, which of long time before had not bene put in vſe. For it is a kinde of death that bringeth open ſhame withall, and becauſe it is done in the face of the campe, it maketh all the reſidue afraide to ſee the terror of this puniſhment. Craſſus hauing done execution in this ſorte vpon his men, led his armie againſt Spartacus: who ſtill drue backe, vntill he came to the ſea ſide through the country of the LVCANIANS, where he found in the ſtraight of the Far of MESSINA, certaine pirats ſhips of CILICIA, and there determined to go into SICILIA. And hauing put two thouſand men into SICILE, he then reuiued the warre there of the ſlaues, which was but in maner newly ended, and lacked ſmall prouocation to begin it againe. But theſe pirats hauing promiſed Spartacus to paſſe him ouer thither, and alſo taken giftes of him, deceiued him, and brake their promiſe. Wherupon Spartacus returning back againe from the ſea ſide, went and camped within a litle Ile of the RHEGIANS. Craſſus comming thither to ſeeke him, and perceiuing that the nature of the place taught him what he ſhould do: determined with a wall to choke vp the bar or channell entring into this litle Iland, both to keepe his men occupied from idleneſſe, and his enemies alſo from victuall. This was a maruellous hard and long peece of worke, notwithſtanding, Craſſus finiſhed it beyond all mens expectation in a very ſhort time, and brought a trenche from one ſide of the ſea to the other ouerthwart this barre, which was three hundred furlongs in length, fifteene foote broade, and ſo many in height: and vpon the top of this trenche built a high wall, of a maruellous ſtrength, whereof Spartacus at the firſt made light account, and laughed at it. But when pillage began to faile him, & trauelling all about the Ile for victuals, perceiuing himſelf to be ſhut in with this wall, and that there was no kinde of victuals to be had within all the compaſſe of the Ile: he then tooke the vantage of a rough boiſterous night, the winde being very great, when it ſnowed exceedingly, ſet his men a worke, and filled vp a peece of the trenche (being a ſmall breadth) with earth, ſtones, and boughes of trees, whereupon he paſſed ouer the third part of his army. Craſſus at the firſt then became afraide, leaſt Spartacus would haue taken his way directly towarde ROME: but he was ſoone put out of that feare, when he heard they were fallen out together, and that a great number of them rebelling againſt Spartacus, went & camped by themſelues by the lake of LVCANIA, which water by reporte hath this variable propertie, that at certaine times it changeth and becommeth very ſweete, and at ſome other times againe ſo ſalt and brackiſh, as no man can drinke it. Craſsus going to ſet vpon them, draue them beyond the lake, but could kill no great number of them, nor follow them very farre: becauſe Spartacus came preſently to the reſcue with his army, who ſtayed the chaſe. Craſſus had written letters before to the Senate, to call Lucullus home out of THRACIA, & Pompey out of SPAINE, whereof he then repented him, and made all the poſſible ſpeede he could to end this warre, before either of them came thither: knowing, that which of them ſo euer came to his helpe, to him would the people giue the honour of ending this warre, and not to him ſelfe. Wherefore he firſt determined to aſſaile them that had reuolted from Spartacus, and camped by themſelues: who were led by Caius Canicius, and an other called Caſtus. So Craſſus ſent ſix thouſand footemen before to take a hill, commaunding them to lie as cloſe as they could, that their enemies might not diſcouer them: and ſo they did, and couered their morians and headpeeces as well as might be, from being ſeene. Neuertheleſſe they were diſcouered by two women doing ſacrifice for the ſafetie of their armie: and thereupon were all in great hazard of caſting away, had not Craſſus bene, who came in time to their aide, and gaue the enemies the cruelleſt battell that euer they fought in all that warre. For there were ſlaine of the ſlaues at that battell, twelue thouſand and three hundred, of which, two onely were found hurt in the backes, and all the reſt ſlaine in the place of their ranckes, valiantly fighting where they were ſet in battell raye. Spartacus after this ouerthrowe, drew towards the mountaines of Petelie, whither Quintus, one of Craſſus Lieutenants, and Scrofa his treaſurer followed him, ſtill skirmiſhing with his rereward all the way: yet in fine, Spartacus turned ſodainly vpon them, made the Romaines flie that ſtil harried his men in that ſort, and hurt Scrofa Craſſus treaſurer ſo ſore, that he hardly eſcaped with life. But the vantage they had of the Romains by this ouerthrow, fell out in the ende to the vtter deſtruction of Spartacus. For his men thereby, being the moſt of them fugitiue bondmen, grew to ſuch a ſtoutneſſe and pride of themſelues, that they would no more flie from fight, neither yet would they any longer obey their leaders and Captaines: but by the way as they went, they compaſſed them in with their weapons, and tolde them, that they ſhould go backe againe with them whether they would or not, and be brought through Lvcania againſt the Romaines. All this made for Craſsus as he wiſhed, for he had receiued newes that Pompey was comming, and that diuers were ſuters for him at Rome to be ſent in this iorney, ſaying, that the laſt victory of this warre was due to him, and that he would diſpatche it at a battell, as ſoone as he came thither. Craſsus therefore ſeeking occaſion to fight, lodged as neere the enemie as he could, and made his men one day caſt a trenche; which the bondmen ſeeking to preuent, came with great furie, & ſet vpon them that wrought. Whereupon fell out a hotte skirmiſh, and ſtill ſupplies came on of either ſide: ſo that Spartacus in the ende perceiuing he was forced vnto it, put his whole power in battell ray. And when he had ſet them in order, and that they brought him his horſe he was wonte to fight on: he drew out his ſworde, and before them all ſlue the horſe dead in the place, ſaying: if it be my fortune to winne the field, I know I ſhall haue horſe enow to ſerue my turne: and if I chance to be ouercome, then ſhall I need no more horſes. After that, he flew in among the Romains, thinking to attaine to fight with Craſſus, but he could not come neere him: yet he ſlue with his owne hands two Romaine Centurions that reſiſted him. In the end, all his men he had about him, forſooke him and fled, ſo as Spartacus was left alone among his enemies: who valiantly fighting for his life, was cut in peeces. Now though Craſſus fortune was very good in this warre, and that he had ſhewed himſelfe a noble and valiant Captaine, venturing his perſon in any danger, yet he could not keepe Pompey from the honour of ending this warre: for the ſlaues that ſcaped from this laſt battell where Spartacus was ſlaine, fell into Pompeyes hands, who made an end of all thoſe rebellious raſcals. Pompey hereupon wrote to the Senate, that Craſſus had ouercome the ſlaues in battell, but that he him ſelfe had pulled vp that warre euen by the very rootes. After this Pompey made his entrie into Rome, and triumphed for his victorie of Sertorius, and the conqueſt of Spayne. Craſſus alſo ſued not for the great triumphe, neither thought he the ſmall Ouation triumphe a foote, which they granted him, any honour vnto him, for ouercomming a few fugitiue bondmen. But for this ſmall triumphe, whereby it was called Ouatio, how much it differeth from the great triumphe: ſee Marcellus life, where we haue at large diſcourſed thereof. Now Pompey being called to be Conſull: Craſſus, though he ſtood in good hope to be choſen Conſull with him, did yet notwithſtanding pray his friendſhip and furtherance. Pompey was very willing to helpe him, and was euer deſirous to make Craſſus beholding to him: wherupon he delt friendly for him, and ſpake openly in the aſſembly of the city, that he would no leſſe thanke the people to appoint Craſſus his companion and fellow Conſull with him, then for making himſelfe Conſull. But notwithſtanding they were both Conſuls together in office, their friendſhip held not, but were euer at iarre, and the one againſt the other. So by meanes of their diſagreement, they paſſed all the time of their Conſulſhip, without any memorable act done: ſauing that Craſſus made a great ſacrifice to Hercules, and kept an open feaſt for the people of Rome of a thouſand tables, and gaue to euery citizen corne to finde him three moneths. But in the ende of their Conſulſhip, at a common councell holden, there was a knight of Rome called Onatius Aurelius: (a man not greatly knowne, for that he had no dealings in the ſtate, and kept moſt in the country) who getting vp to the pulpit for orations: told the people what a viſion he had ſeene in his dreame. Iupiter, ſaid he, appearing to me this night, willed me to tell you openly, that ye ſhould not put Craſſus and Pompey out of their office, before they were reconciled together. He had no ſooner ſpoken the wordes, but the people commaunded them to be friends. Pompey ſate ſtill, and ſaide neuer a word to it. But Craſſus roſe, and tooke Pompey by the hand, & turning him to the people, tolde them alowd: my Lords of ROME, I do nothing vnworthy of my ſelfe, to ſeeke Pompeys friendſhip and fauour firſt, ſince you your ſelues haue called him the great, before he had any haire vpon his face, and that ye gaue him the honor of triumphe, before he was Senatour. And this is all that Craſſus did of any account in his Conſulſhip. When he was Cenſor alſo, he paſſed it ouer without any acte done. For he reformed not the Senate, muſtered not the men of warre, nor tooke any view or eſtimate of the peoples goods: although Luctatius Catulus was his colleague and fellow Cenſor, as gentle a perſon as any of that time that liued in ROME. Now Craſſus at the firſt entry into his office of Cenſor, going about a cruell and violent act, to bring EGYPT to pay tribute to the ROMAINES, Catulus did ſtoutly withſtand him: wherby diſſention falling out betwene them, they both did willingly reſigne their office. In that great conſpiracie of Catiline, which in manner ouerthrew the whole ſtate and commonwealth of ROME, Craſſus was had in ſome iealouſie and miſtruſt: becauſe there was one of the confederates that named him for one of them, howbeit they gaue no credit vnto him. Yet Cicero in an oration of his, doth plainly accuſe Craſſus & Cæſar, as confederats with Catiline: howbeit this oration came not forth till they were both dead. And in the oration he made alſo, when his office and authority of Conſul ceaſed, he ſaid: that Craſſus came one night to him, & ſhewed him a letter touching Catiline, certainly confirming the conſpiracy then in examination. For which cauſe Craſſus euer after hated him: and that he did not openly reuenge it, the let was by meane of his ſonne. For Publius Craſſus much fauouring eloquence, and being giuen to his booke, bare great good will vnto Cicero: in ſuch ſorte, that vpon his baniſhment he put on changed garments as Cicero did, and procured many other youthes to do the like alſo, and in fine, perſuaded his father to become his friend. Cæſar now returning to ROME from the prouince he had in gouernement, intended to ſue for the Conſulſhip: and perceiuing that Pompey and Craſſus were againe at a iarre, thought thus with himſelfe, that to make the one of them his friend to further his ſute, he ſhould but procure the other his enemy: and minding therfore to attaine his deſire with the fauor of them both, ſought firſt the meanes to make them friends, and perſuaded with them, that by their controuerſie the one ſeeking the others vndoing, they did thereby but make Cicero, Catulus, and Cato, of the greater authoritie, who of themſelues were of no power, if they two ioined in friendſhip together: for making both their friends & factions one, they might rule the ſtate and commonwealth euen as they would. Cæſar hauing by his perſuaſion reconciled Craſſus and Pompey, ioyning their three powers in one, made themſelues vnuincible, which afterwards turned to the deſtruction of the people and Senate of ROME. For he made them not onely greater than they were before, the one by the others meanes: but himſelfe alſo of great power through them. For when they began to fauour Cæſar, he was ſtraight choſen Conſull without any deniall: and ſo behaued himſelfe in the Conſulſhip, that at the length they gaue him charge of great armies, and then ſent him to gouerne the GAVLES: which was, as a man may ſay, euen themſelues to put him into the caſtell that ſhould keepe all the citie in ſubiection: imagining that they two ſhould make ſpoile and good booty of the reſt, ſithence they had procured him ſuch a gouernment. Now for Pompey the cauſe that made him commit this error was nothing elſe, but his extreame ambition. But as for Craſſus, beſides his old vice of couetouſneſſe rooted in him, he added to that a new auarice and deſire of triumphes and victories, which Cæſars fame for proweſſe and noble actes in warres did throughly kindle in him, that he being otherwiſe his better in all things, might not yet in that be his inferior: which furie tooke ſuch holde as it neuer left him, till it brought him vnto an infamous end, and the commonwealth to great miſery. Thus Cæſar being come out of his prouince of GAVLE vnto LVCA, diuerſe ROMAINES went thither to ſee him, and among other Pompey and Craſſus. They hauing talked with him in ſecret, agreed among them to deuiſe to haue the whole power of ROME in their hands: ſo that Cæſar ſhould keepe his armie together, and Craſſus and Pompey ſhould take other prouinces and armies to them. Now to attaine to this, they had no way but one: that Pompey and Craſſus ſhould againe ſue the ſecond time to be Conſuls, and that Cæſars friends at ROME ſhould ſtand with them for it, ſending alſo a ſufficient number of his ſouldiers to be there at the day of chooſing the Conſuls. Thereupon Pompey and Craſſus returned to ROME to that ende, but not without ſuſpition of their practiſe: for there ranne a rumor in the citie, that their meeting of Cæſar in LVCA, was for no good intent. Whereupon, Marcellinus and Domitius asked Pompey in open Senate, if he ment to make ſute to be Conſull. Pompey aunſwered them: peraduenture he did, peraduenture he did not. They asking him againe the ſame queſtion: he aunſwered, he would ſue for the good men, not for the euill. Pompeys anſwers were thought very proud & haughty. Howbeit Craſſus aunſwered more modeſtly, that if he ſaw it neceſſarie for the commonwealth, he would ſue to be Conſull: if not, that he would not ſtand for it. Vpon theſe words, ſome were ſo bolde to make ſute for the Conſulſhip, as Domitius among other. But afterwards Pompey and Craſſus ſtanding openly for it, all the reſt left off their ſute for feare of them, Domitius onlie excepted: whome Cato ſo prayed and intreated, as his kinſeman and friend, that he made him to ſeeke it. For he perſwaded him, that it was to fight for the defence of their libertie, and how that it was not the Conſulſhip Craſſus and Pompey looked after, but that they went about to bring in a tyranny: and that they ſued not for the office, but to get ſuch prouinces and armies into their hands as they deſired, vnder colour and countenance of the Conſulſhip. Cato ringing theſe words into their eares, and beleeuing it certainly to be true as he ſaid, brought Domitius as it were by force into the market place, where many honeſt men ioyned with thē: becauſe they wondred what the matter meant that theſe two noble men ſhould ſue the ſecond time to be Conſuls, and why they made ſute to be ioyned together, and not to haue any other with them, conſidering there were ſo many other worthie men, meete to be companion with either of them both in that office. Pompey fearing he ſhould be preuented of his purpoſe, fell to commit great outrage and violence. As amongſt other, when the day came to chooſe the Conſuls, Domitius going earely in the morning before day, accompanied with his friends to the place where the election ſhould be: his man that caried the torche before him was ſlaine, by ſome whom Pompey had laid in waite, and many of his companie hurt, and among others, Cato. And hauing thus diſperſed them, he beſet a houſe rounde about whither they fled for ſuccour, and incloſed them there, vntill they were both choſen Conſuls together. Shortly after they came with force to the pulpit for orations, and draue Cato out of the market piace, and ſlue ſome of them that reſiſted and would not flie. They alſo then prolonged Cæſars gouernment of the GAVLES for fiue yeares more, and procured for themſelues by decree of the people, the countries of SYRIA and SPAINE. Againe, when they drew lots together, SYRIA fell to Craſſus, and SPAINE to Pompey. Euery man was glad of their fortune. For the people on the one ſide were loth Pompey ſhould go farre from ROME: and himſelf alſo louing his wife well, was glad he had occaſion to be ſo neere her, that he might remaine the moſt of his time at ROME. But Craſſus of all other reioyced moſt at his hap, that he ſhould go into SYRIA: and it appeared plainely that he thought it was the happieſt turne that euer came to him, for he would euer be talking of the iourney, were he in neuer ſo great or ſtrange company. Furthermore, being among his friends and familiars, he would giue out ſuch fonde boaſts of it, as no young man could haue made greater vauntes: which was cleane contrary to his yeares and nature, hauing liued all his life time as modeſtly, and with as ſmall oſtentation as any man liuing. But then forgetting himſelfe too much, had ſuch fonde conceits in his head, as he not only hoped after the conqueſt of SYRIA, and of the PARTHIANS, but flattered himſelfe that the world ſhould ſee all that Lucullus had done againſt king Tigranes, and Pompey againſt king Mithridates, were but trifles (as a man would ſay) to that he intended. For he looked to conquer the BACTRIANS, the INDIANS, and the great Ocean ſea toward the Eaſt, though in the decree paſſed by the people, there was no mention made of any warres againſt the PARTHIANS. Now euery man ſaw Craſſus ambition and greedie deſire of honor: inſomuch as Cæſar ſelfe wrote vnto Craſſus out of GAVLE, commending his noble intent and forwardneſſe, and wiſhed him to goe thorow therewith. But Atteius one of the Tribunes being bent againſt Craſſus to withſtand his departure: (hauing diuers other confederates with him to further his purpoſe, who much miſliked that any man of a brauery & luſtines ſhould make war with any nation or people that had no way offended the ROMAINES, but were their friends & confederates) Craſſus fearing this conſpiracy, praied Pompey to aſſiſt and accompany him out of the city, becauſe he was of great authority and much reuerenced of the people, as it appeared then.

For, though multitudes of people were gathered together of purpoſe to let Craſſus of his departure, and to crie out vpon him: yet when they ſaw Pompey go before him, with a pleaſant ſmyling countenance, they quieted themſelues, and made a lane for them, ſuffering them to paſſe on, and ſaid nothing. This notwithſtanding, Atteius the Tribune ſtepped before them, and commaunded Craſſus he ſhould not depart the city, with great proteſtations if he did the contrary. But perceiuing Craſſus ſtill held on his way notwithſtanding, he commanded then one of the officers to lay hold of him, and to arreſt him: howbeit the other Tribunes would not ſuffer the officer to do it. So the ſergeant diſmiſſed Craſſus. Then Atteius turning towards the gate of the city, got a chafingdiſh with coles, and ſet it in the middeſt of the ſtreete. When Craſſus came againſt it, he caſt in certaine perfumes, and made ſprincklings ouer it, pronouncing horrible curſes, and calling vpon terrible and ſtrange names of gods. The ROMAINES ſay that thoſe manner of curſes are very auncient, but yet very ſecret, and of ſo great force: as he that is once curſed with that curſe can neuer eſcape it, nor he that vſeth it dooth euer proſper after it. And therefore fewe men do vſe it, and neuer but vpon vrgent occaſion. But then they much reproued Atteius, for vſing of theſe dreadfull ceremonies and extreame curſes, which were much hurtefull to the commonwealth, although he for his countries ſake had thus curſed Craſſus. Craſſus ſetting forward notwithſtanding, ſailed on, and arriued at BRVNDVSIVM, when winter ſtormes had not left the ſeas, and he had loſt many of his ſhips: howbeit he landed his army, and marched through the country of GALATIA. There he found king Deiotarus, a very old man and yet building a new city: and to taunt him pretily, ſaid vnto him. What, O king, begin you to builde now in the afternoone? To whom the king of the GALATIANS againe ſmiling made aunſwer. And truely Syr Captaine, you goe not very early (me thinkes) to make warre with the PARTHIANS. For indeed Craſſus was threeſcore and vpward, and yet his face made him ſeeme elder then he was. But to our ſtory againe. Craſſus being come into the country, had as good luck as he looked for: for he eaſily built a bridge vpon the riuer of Euphrates, and paſſed his armie ouer it without any let or trouble. So entring into MESOPOTAMIA, receiued many cities, that of good will yeelded themſelues vnto him. Howbeit there was one city called ZENODOTIA, wherof Appolonius was tyrant, where Craſſus loſt a hundred of his men: thereupon he brought his whole armie thither, tooke it by force, ſacked their goods, and ſolde the priſoners by the drumme. The GREEKES called this citie ZENODOTIA, and for winning of the ſame Craſſus ſuffered his men to call him Imperator, to ſay, ſoueraigne Captaine: which turned to his ſhame and reproach, and made him to be thought of a baſe minde, as one that had ſmall hope to attaine to great things, making ſuch reckoning of ſo ſmall a trifle. Thus when he had beſtowed ſeauen thouſand of his footemen in garriſon, in thoſe cities that had yeelded vnto him, and about a thouſand horſmen: he returned backe to winter in SYRIA. Thither came his ſonne P*ublius Craſſus* to him out of GAVLE from Iulius Cæſar, who had giuen him ſuch honours, as Generals of ROME did vſe to giue to valiant ſouldiers for rewarde of their good ſeruice: and brought vnto his father a thouſand men of armes, all choiſe men. This me thinkes was the greateſt fault C*raſſus* committed in all his enterpriſe of that warre. For when he ſhould preſently haue gone on ſtill, and entred into BABYLON and SELEVCIA, (cities that were euer enemies vnto the PARTHIANS) he tracted time, & gaue them leiſure to prepare to encounter his force when he ſhould come againſt them. Againe they found great fault with him for ſpending of his time when he lay in SYRIA, ſeeming rather to leade a marchants life, than a chiefetaines. For he neuer ſawe his armie, nor trained them out to any martiall exerciſe, but fell to counting the reuenue of the cities, and was many daies buſily occupied weying of the golde and ſiluer in the temple of the goddeſſe Hierapolis. And worſe then that: he ſent to the people, princes, and cities about him, to furniſh him with a certaine number of men of warre, and then he would diſcharge them for a ſumme of money. All theſe things made him to be both ill ſpoken of, & deſpiſed of euery body. The firſt token of his ill lucke that happened to him, came from this goddeſſe Hierapolis, whom ſome ſuppoſe to be Venus, other ſay Iuno, and others, that ſhe is the mother and chiefe cauſe that giueth beginning of moiſture to euery thing that commeth forth and hath a being, and taught men the originall cauſe alſo of euery good thing. For as C*raſſus* the father, & ſonne

both, were comming out of the temple: Craſſus the younger fell firſt on his face, and the father afterwardes vpon his ſonne. Likewiſe as he was gathering his garriſons together, calling them out of the cities into the field, there came Ambaſſadours vnto him from Arſaces, king of the PARTHIANS: who deliuered him their meſſage in few words, and told him, that if this army he brought came from the ROMAINES to make warre with their maiſter, then that he would haue no peace nor friendſhip with them, but would make mortall warres againſt them. Further, if it were (as he had heard ſay) that Craſſus againſt the peoples mindes of ROME, for his owne couetous deſire, and peculiar profit was come in a iolity to make war with the PARTHIANS, and to inuade their countrey: then in that reſpect Arſaces would deale more fauorably, in conſideration of Craſſus yeares, and was contented alſo to ſuffer his men to depart with life and goods, whom he tooke rather to be in priſon, then in garriſon within his cities. Thereto Craſſus coragiouſly aunſwered, that he would make them aunſwere in the city of SELEVCIA. Therewith Vagiſes, one of the eldeſt Ambaſſadors fell a laughing, and ſhewing Craſſus the palme of his hand, told him thus: haire will ſooner grow in the palme of my hand, Craſſus, then you will come to SELEVCIA. In this ſort the Ambaſſadors tooke their leaue of Craſſus, and returned to their king Hyrodes, telling him he was to prepare for warre. In the meane ſpace, certaine of Craſſus ſouldiers whom he had left in garriſon in the cities of MESOPOTAMIA, hauing ſcaped maruellous daungerouſly and with great difficulty: brought him newes of importance, hauing themſelues ſeene the wonderfull great campe of the enemy, and their maner of fight in the aſſaults they made to the cities where they lay in garriſon. And, as it falleth out commonly among men eſcaped from any daunger making things more fearefull and daungerous then they be in deede: they reported that it was vnpoſſible by flying to ſaue them ſelues, if they did follow in chaſe: neither to ouertake them alſo, if they fled. And further, that they had ſuch kinde of arrowes as would flie ſwifter, then a mans eye could diſcerne them, and would pearce through any thing they hit, before a man could tell who ſhot them. Beſides, for the horſemens weapons they vſed, that they were ſuch, as no armour could poſſibly hold out: and their armors on the other ſide made of ſuch a temper and metall, as no force of any thing could pearce them through. The ROMAINES hearing theſe newes, fell from their former ſtoutnes and courage, being borne in hand before, that the PARTHIANS differed nothing at all from the ARMENIANS and CAPPADOCIANS, whom Lucullus had ouercome and ſpoiled ſo oft, that he was weary withall: and they had already made account, that their greateſt paines in this warre, was but the tediouſnes of the iourney they had to make, and the trouble they ſhould haue to follow thoſe men that would not abide them. But then contrarie to expectation, they looked to come to ſtrokes, and to be luſtely fought withall. Hereupon, diuers Captaines and head officers that had charge in the army (among whom Caſſius the treaſurer was one) aduiſed Craſſus to ſtay, and to deliberate in councell to know whether he were beſt to goe on, or to remaine where he was. The Soothſaiers them ſelues did partly let Craſſus vnderſtand, that the goddes ſhewed no good tokens in all their ſacrifices, and were hardly to be pacified. But Craſſus gaue no eare to them, neither would heare any other that told him as much, but only liſtned to them that counſelled him to make haſt. Yet Craſſus chiefeſt comfort and incoragement, was of Artabazes, king of ARMENIA, who came to his campe with ſixe thouſand horſe, which were but onely the kings cornet and guard. Againe he promiſed him other tenne thouſand horſemen all armed and barbed, and thirty thouſand footemen which he kept continually in pay, and counſelled Craſſus to enter the PARTHIANS country vpon ARMENIAES ſide: becauſe his campe ſhould not onely haue plenty of victuals, which he would ſend him out of his country, but for that he ſhould alſo march in more ſafety, hauing a countrey full of mountaines and wods before him very ill for horſemen, which was the onely ſtrength and force of the PARTHIANS. Craſſus coldly thanked Artabazes for his good will, & al his noble offer of aide: yet told him he would take his iorney through MESOPOTAMIA, where he had left many good ſouldiers of the ROMAINS. And thus departed the king of ARMENIA from him. But now as Craſſus was paſſing his army vpō the bridge he had made ouer the riuer of Euphrates, there fell out ſodaine ſtrange and terrible cracks of thunder, with fearefull flaſhes of lightning full in the ſouldiers faces: moreouer, out of a great blacke cloude came a wonderfull ſtorme and tempeſt of winde vpon the bridge, that the maruellous force thereof ouerthrew a great part of the bridge, and caried it quite away. Beſides all this, the place where he appointed to lodge, was twiſe ſtriken with two great thunder clappes. One of his great horſe in like caſe, being brauely furniſhed and ſet out, tooke the bit in his teeth, and leapt into the riuer with his rider on his backe, who were both drowned, and neuer ſeene after. They ſay alſo, that the firſt Eagle and enſigne that was to be taken vp when they marched, turned backe of it ſelfe, without any handes layed vppon it. Further it fortuned that as they were diſtributing the victuals vnto the ſouldiers, after they had all paſſed ouer the bridge, the firſt thing that was giuen them, was ſalt, and water lintels, which the ROMAINES take for a token of death and mourning, becauſe they vſe it at the funerals of the dead. After all this, when Craſſus was exhorting his ſouldiers, a word ſcaped his mouth that troubled the army maruellouſly. For he told them that he had broken the bridge which hee had made ouer the riuer of Euphrates, of purpoſe, becauſe there ſhould not a man of them returne backe againe. Where in deede when he had ſeene that they tooke this word in ill part, he ſhould haue called it in againe, or haue declared his meaning, ſeeing his men ſo amazed thereat: but he made light of it, he was ſo wilfull. In the end he made ordinary ſacrifice for the purging of his army: and when the Soothſayer gaue him the intrailes of the beaſt that was ſacrificed, they fell out of his handes. Craſſus perceiuing that the ſtanders by were troubled withall, fell a laughing, and told them, you ſee what age is: yet ſhall you not ſee my ſword fall out of my hand. So hauing ended his ſacrifice, he beganne to march forward into the countrey by the riuers ſide, with ſeuen legions of footemen, and litle lacke of foure thouſand horſe, and in manner as many ſhot and ſlings lightly armed. There returned to him certaine of his skoutes that had viewed the country, and told him there was not an enemy to be ſeen in the field: howbeit that they had found the tracke of a maruellous number of horſe, which ſeemed as they were returned backe. Then Craſſus firſt of all beganne to hope well: and his ſouldiers alſo, they fell to deſpiſe the PARTHIANS, thinking certainly that they would not come to battell with them. Yet Caſsius his treaſurer euer perſwaded him the contrary, and thought it better for him to refreſh his army a litle in one of the cities where he had his garriſon, vntill ſuch time as he heard more certain news of the enemies: or elſe that he would march directly towards SELEVCIA by the riuers ſide, which lay fit for him to victuall him ſelfe eaſily by botes that would alwaies follow his campe, and ſhould be ſure beſides that the enemies could not enuiron him behind, ſo that hauing no way to ſet vpon them but before, they ſhould haue none aduantage of them. Craſſus going about then to conſult of the matter, there came one Ariamnes vnto him, a Captaine of the ARABIANS, a fine ſubtill fellow, which was the greateſt miſchiefe and euill, that fortune could ſend to Craſſus at that preſent time, to bring him to vtter ruine and deſtruction. For there were ſome of Craſſus ſouldiers that had ſerued Pompey before in that countrey, who knew him very well, and remembred that Pompey had done him great pleaſures: whereuppon they thought that he bare great good will to the ROMAINES. But Ariamnes had bene labored at that time by the king of PARTHIAES Captains, and was won by them to deceiue Craſſus, and to entiſe him all he could, to draw him from the riuer and the woddy countrey, & to bring him into the plaine field, where they might compaſſe him in with their horſemen: for they ment nothing leſſe then to fight with the ROMAINES at the ſwordes point. This barbarous Captaine Ariamnes comming to Craſſus, did highly praiſe and commend Pompey, as his good Lord and benefactor (for he was an excellent ſpoken man) and extolled Craſſus army, reprouing him that he came ſo ſlowly forward, tracting time in that ſort as he did, preparing himſelfe as though he had neede of armor and weapon, and not of feete and hands ſwift and ready againſt the enemies: who (for the chiefeſt of them) had of long time occupied them ſelues to flie with their beſt moueables, towards the deſerts of SCYTHIA and HYRCANIA. Therefore if you determine (ſaid he) to fight, it were good you made haſt to meete them, before the king haue gathered all his power together. For now you haue but Surena and Syllaces, two of his Lieutenaunts againſt you, whom he hath ſent before to ſtay you that you follow him not: and for the king him ſelfe, be bold, he meaneth not to trouble you. But he lied in all. For king Hyrodes had deuided his army in two partes at the firſt, whereof him ſelfe tooke the one, and went to ſpoile the realme of ARMENIA, to be reuenged of king Artabazes: and with the other he ſent Surena againſt the ROMAINES, not for any contempt he had of Craſſus (for it was not likely he would diſdaine to come to battel with him, being one of the chiefeſt noble men of ROME, & to thinke it more honorable to make warre with king Artabazes in ARMENIA) but I thinke rather he did it of purpoſe to auoide the greater daunger, and to keepe farre off, that he might with ſafety ſee what would happen, and therefore ſent Surena before to hazard battell, and to turne the ROMAINES backe againe. For Surena was no meane man, but the ſecond perſon of PARTHIA next vnto the king: in riches, reputation, valure, and experience in warres, the chiefeſt of his time among all the PARTHIANS, and for execution, no man like him. Surena, whẽ he did but remoue into the country only with his houſhold, had a thouſand camels to cary his ſumpters, and two hundred coches of Curtiſans, a thouſand men of armes armed at all peeces, and as many moe beſides lightly armed: ſo that his whole traine and court made aboue ten thouſand horſe. Further, by the tenure of that land he had by ſucceſſion from his anceſters, his office was at the firſt proclaiming of any king, to put the roiall crown or diademe vpon the kings head. Moreouer, he had reſtored king Hyrodes that then raigned, to his crowne, who had bene before driuen out of his realme: and had wonne him alſo the great city of SELEVCIA, him ſelfe being the firſt man that ſcaled the wals, and ouerthrew them with his owne handes that reſiſted him. And though he was vnder thirty yeares of age, yet they counted him a wiſe man, as well for his counſell, as his experience, which were the meanes whereby he ouercame Craſſus. Who through his raſhnes and folly at the firſt, and afterwards for very feare and timerouſnes, which his misfortune had brought him vnto, was eaſie to be taken and intrapped, by any policy or deceit. Now this barbarous Captaine Ariamnes hauing then brought Craſſus to beleeue all that he ſaid, and drawen him by perſwaſion from the riuer of Euphrates, vnto a goodly plaine country, meeting at the firſt with very good way, but after with very ill, becauſe they entred into ſandes where their feete ſuncke deepe, and into deſert fields where was neither tree nor water, nor any end of them that they could diſcerne by eye, ſo that not onely extreame thirſt, and miſerable way maruellouſly amazed the ROMAINS, but the diſcomfort of the eye alſo, when they could ſee nothing to ſtay their ſight vpon: that, aboue all the reſt, wrought their extreame trouble. For, neither far nor neare any ſight of tree, riuer, brooke, mountaine, graſſe, or greene herbe appeared within their view, but in troth an endleſſe ſea of deſert ſandes on euery ſide, round about their campe. Then beganne they to ſuſpect that they were betraied. Again, when newes came that Artabazes king of ARMENIA, was kept in his country with a great war king Hyrodes made vpon him, which kept him that he could not according to his promiſe come to aide him, yet that he wiſhed him to draw towardes ARMENIA, that both their armies being ioyned together they might the better fight with king Hyrodes, if not, that he would alwaies keep the woddy country, marching in thoſe vallies and places where his horſemen might be ſafe, and about the mountaines: Craſſus was ſo wilfull, as he would write no aunſwere to it, but angrily told the meſſenger, that he had no leyſure then to hearken to the ARMENIANS, but that afterwardes he would be reuenged well enough of Artabazes treaſon. Caſſius his treaſurer was much offended with Craſſus for this anſwere: howbeit perceiuing he could do no good with him, and that he tooke euery thing in euill part, he ſaid vnto him, he would tell him no more. Notwithſtanding, taking Ariamnes this Captaine of the ARMENIANS a ſide, he rebuked him roundly, and ſaid: O thou wretch, what curſed deuill hath brought thee to vs, and how cunningly haſt thou bewitched & charmed Craſſus: that thou haſt made him bring his army into this endleſſe deſert, and to trace this way fitter for an ARABIAN Captaine of theeues, then for a Generall and Conſull of the ROMAINES? Ariamnes being crafty and ſubtil, ſpeaking gently vnto Caſſius, did comfort him, and prayed him to haue patience, and going and comming by the bandes, ſeeming to helpe the ſouldiers, he told them merily: O my fellowes, I beleeue you thinke to marche through the countrey of Naples, and looke to meete with your pleaſaunt ſprings, goodly groues of wodde, your naturall bathes, and the good innes round about to refreſhe you, and doe not remember that you paſſe through the deſertes of ARABIA and ASSYRIA. And thus did this barbarous Captaine entertaine the ROMAINES a while: but afterwardes he diſlodged betimes, before he was openly knowen for a traitor, and yet not without Craſſus priuity, whom he bare in hand, that he would goe ſet ſome broile and tumult in the enemies campe. It is reported that Craſſus the very ſame day came out of his tent not in his coate armor, of ſcarlet, (as the manner was of the ROMAINE Generals) but in a blacke coate: howbeit, remembring him ſelfe, he ſtraight chaunged it againe. It is ſaied moreouer, that the enſigne bearers when they ſhould march away, had much a doe to plucke their enſignes out of the ground, they ſtucke ſo faſt. But Craſſus ſcoffing at the matter, haſtened them the more to march forward, compelling the footemen to goe as faſt as the horſemen, till a few of their ſkowtes came in, whom they had ſent to diſcouer; who brought newes how the enemies had ſlaine their fellowes, and what a doe they had them ſelues to ſcape with life, and that they were a maruellous great army, and well appointed to giue them battell. This newes made all the campe afraied, but Craſſus ſelfe more then the reſt, ſo as he beganne to ſet his men in battell ray, being for haſt in maner beſides him ſelfe.

At the firſt following Caſſius minde, he ſet his ranckes wide, caſting his ſouldiers into a ſquare battell, a good way a ſunder one from an other, becauſe hee would take in as much of the plaine as he could, to keepe the enemies from compaſſing them in, and ſo deuided the horſemen into the wings. Yet afterwardes he chaunged his minde againe, and ſtraighted the battell of his footemen, faſhioning it like a bricke, more long then broad, making a front, and ſhewing their faces euery way. For there were twelue cohorts or enſignes imbatteled on either ſide, and by euery cohort a company of horſe, becauſe there ſhould be no place left without aide of horſemen, and that all his battell ſhould be a like defended. Then he gaue Caſſius the leading of one wing, his ſonne Publius Craſſus the other, and him ſelfe led the battell in the middeſt. In this order they marched forward, till they came to a litle brooke called Baliſſus, where there was no great ſtore of water, but yet happily lighted on for the ſouldiers, for the great thirſt and extreame heate they had abidden all that painefull way, where they had mette with no water before. There the moſt part of Craſſus Captaines thought beſt to campe all night, that they might in the meane time finde meanes to know their enemies what number they were, and how they were armed, that they might fight with them in the morning. But Craſſus yeelding to his ſonnes and his horſemens perſwaſion, who intreated him to march on with his army, and to ſet vpon the enemy preſently: commaunded, that ſuch as would eate, ſhould eate ſtanding, keeping their ranckes. Yet on the ſodaine, before this commaundement could runne through the whole army, he commaunded them againe to march, not faire and ſoftly as when they go to giue battell, but with ſpeede, till they ſpied the enemies, who ſeemed not to the ROMAINES at the firſt to be ſo great a number, neither ſo brauely armed as they thought they had bene.

The Parthians kettle drums.

For, concerning their great number, Surena had of purpoſe hid them, with certaine troupes he ſent before: and to hide their bright armors, he had caſt cloakes and beaſts ſkins vpon them, but when both the armies approached neare the one to the other, and that the ſigne to giue charge was lift vp in the aire: firſt they filled the fielde with a dreadfull noiſe to heare. For the PARTHIANS doe not encorage their men to fight with the ſound of a horne, neither with trumpets nor howboies, but with great kettle drums hollow within, and about them they hang litle bels and copper rings, & with them they all make a noiſe euery where together, and it is like a dead ſound, mingled as it were with the braying or bellowing of a wilde beaſt, & a fearefull noiſe as if it thundered, knowing that hearing is one of the ſenſes that ſooneſt moueth the heart and ſpirit of any man, and maketh him ſooneſt beſides him ſelfe. The ROMAINES being put in feare with this dead ſound, the PARTHIANS ſtraight threw the clothes & couerings from them that hid their armor, & then ſhewed their bright helmets and curaces of Margian tempered ſteele, that glared like fire, & their horſes barbed with ſteele and copper.

And Surena alſo, General of the PARTHIANS, who was as goodly a perſonage, and as valiant, as any other in all his hoaſt, though his beauty ſomewhat effeminate, in iudgement ſhewed ſmall likelihood of any ſuch corage: for he painted his face, and ware his haire after the faſhion of the MEDES, contrary to the maner of the PARTHIANS, who let their hair grow after the faſhion of the TARTARES, without cōbing or tricking of them, to appeare more terrible to their enemies. The PARTHIANS at the firſt thought to haue ſet vpon the ROMAINS with their pikes, to ſee if they could breake their firſt ranckes. But when they drew neare, and ſaw the depth of the Romaines battell ſtanding cloſe together, firmely keeping their rancks: then they gaue backe, making as though they fled, and diſperſed them ſelues. But the Romaines marueiled when they found it contrary, and that it was but a deuiſe to enuiron them on euery ſide. Whereupon Craſſus commanded his ſhot and light armed men to aſſaile them, the which they did: but they went not farre, they were ſo beaten in with arrowes, and driuen to retire to their force of the armed men. And this was the firſt beginning that both feared and troubled the Romaines, when they ſaw the vehemency and great force of the enemies ſhot, which brake their armors, and ran through any thing they hit, were it neuer ſo hard or ſoft. The Parthians thus ſtill drawing backe, ſhot al together on euery ſide, not a fore hand, but at aduenture: for the battell of the Romaines ſtoode ſo neare together, as if they would, they could not miſſe the killing of ſome. Theſe bowmen drew a great ſtrength, and had big ſtrong bowes, which ſent the arrowes from them with a wonderful force. The Romains by means of theſe bowes were in hard ſtate. For if they kept their rancks, they were grieuouſly woũded: againe if they left them, and ſought to run vpon the Parthians to fight at hand with them, they ſaw they could do them but litle hurt, and yet were very likely to take the greater harme them ſelues. For, as faſt as the Romaines came vpon them, ſo faſt did the Parthians flie from them, and yet in flying continued ſtill their ſhooting: which no nation but the Scythians could better doe then they, being a matter in deede moſt greatly to their aduantage. For by their flight they beſt doe ſaue them ſelues, and fighting ſtill, they thereby ſhunne the ſhame of that their flying. The Romaines ſtill defended them ſelues, and held it out, ſo long as they had any hope that the Parthians would leaue fighting, when they had ſpent their arrowes or would ioyne battell with them. But after they vnderſtoode that there were a great number of camels loden with quiuers full of arrowes, where the firſt that had beſtowed their arrowes fetched about to take new quiuers: then Craſſus ſeeing no end of their ſhotte, began to faint, and ſent to Publius his ſonne, willing him in any caſe to charge vpon the enemies, and to giue an onſet, before they were compaſſed in on euery ſide. For it was on Publius ſide, that one of the wings of the enemies battell was neareſt vnto them, and where they rode vp and downe to compaſſe them behinde. Whereuppon Craſſus ſonne taking thirteene hundred horſemen with him (of the which, a thouſand were of the men of armes whom Iulius Cæſar ſent) and fiue hundred ſhot, with eight enſignes of footemen hauing targets, moſt neare to the place where him ſelfe then was: he put them out in bredth, that wheeling about they might giue a charge vpon them that rode vp and downe. But they ſeeing him comming, turned ſtraight their horſe and fled, either becauſe they met in a mariſhe, or elſe of purpoſe to beguile this young Craſſus, intiſing him thereby as farre from his father as they could. Publius Craſſus ſeeing them flie, cried out, theſe men will not abide vs, and ſo ſpurred on for life after them: ſo did Cenſorinus and Megabacchus with him (the one a Senatour of Rome a very eloquent man, the other a ſtout coragious valiant man of warre) both of them Craſſus well approued friendes, and in maner of his owne yeares. Now the horſemen of the Romaines being trained out thus to the chaſe, their footemen alſo would not abide behinde, nor ſhew them ſelues to haue leſſe hope, ioy and corage, then their horſemen had. For they thought all had bene won, and that there was no more to do, but to follow the chaſe: till they were gone farre from the army, and then they found the deceit. For the horſemen that fled before them, ſodainely turned againe, and a number of others beſides came and ſet vpon them. Whereuppon they ſtaied, thinking that the enemies perceiuing they were ſo few, would come and fight with them hand to hand. Howbeit they ſette out againſt them their men at armes with their barbed horſe, and made their light horſemen wheele round about them, keeping no order at all: who gallowping vp and down the plaine, whirled vp the ſand hils from the bottome with their horſe feete, which raiſed ſuch a wonderfull duſt, that the Romaines could ſcarce ſee or ſpeake one to an other. For they being ſhut vp into a litle roome, and ſtanding cloſe one to another, were ſore wounded with the Parthians arrowes, and died of a cruell lingring death, crying out for anguiſh and paine they felt: and turning and tormenting them ſelues vppon the ſand, they brake the arrowes ſticking in them. Againe, ſtriuing by force to plucke out the forked arrowe heades, that had pearced farre into their bodies through their vains and ſinewes: thereby they opened their woundes wider,and ſo caſt them ſelues away. Many of them died thus miſerably martyred: and ſuch as died not, were not able to defend them ſelues. Then when Publius Craſſus prayed and beſought them to charge the men at armes with their barbed horſe, they ſhewed him their hands faſt nailed to their targets with arrowes,and their feete likewiſe ſhot through and nailed to the ground: ſo as they could neither flie nor yet defend them ſelues. Thereupon him ſelfe encoraging his horſemen, went and gaue a charge, and did valiantly ſet vpon the enemies, but it was with too great diſaduantage, both for offence, and alſo for defence. For him ſelfe and his men with weake and light ſtaues, brake vpon them that were armed with curaces of ſteele, or ſtiffe leather iackes. And the PARTHIANS in contrary maner with mighty ſtrong pikes gaue charge vpon theſe GAVLES, which were either vnarmed,or elſe but lighty armed. Yet thoſe were they in whom Craſſus moſt truſted, hauing done wonderfull feates of warre with them. For they receiued the PARTHIANS pikes in their handes,and tooke them about the middels, and threw them off their horſe, where they lay on the ground, and could not ſturre for the weight of their harneſſe: and there were diuerſe of them alſo that lighting from their horſe, lay vnder their enemies horſe bellies, and thruſt their ſwordes into them. Their horſe flinging and bounding in the aire for very paine threw their maſters vnder feete,& their enemies one vpon an other,and in the end fell dead among them. Moreouer, extreame heate and thirſt did maruellouſly comber the GAVLES,who were vſed to abide neither of both:and the moſt part of their horſe were ſlaine,charging with all their power vpon the men at armes of the PARTHIANS,and ſo ranne them ſelues in vpon the points of their pikes. At the length, they were driuen to retire towards their fotemen, and Publius Craſſus among them, who was very ill by reaſon of the woundes he had receiued. And ſeeing a ſand hill by chaunce not farre from them,they went thither,and ſetting their horſe in the middeſt of it, compaſſed it in round with their targets, thinking by this meanes to couer and defend them ſelues the better from the barbarous people: howbeit they found it contrary. For the countrey being plaine,they in the formoſt ranckes did ſomewhat couer them behinde, but they that were behinde, ſtanding higher then they that ſtoode formoſt(by reaſon of the nature of the hil that was higheſt in the middeſt)could by no meanes ſaue them ſelues,but were all hurt alike,as well the one as the other, bewailing their owne miſery and misfortune, that muſt needes die without reuenge, or declaration of their valiancy. At that preſent time there were two GRECIANS about Publius Craſſus, Hieronymus, and Nicomachus, who dwelt in thoſe quarters, in the city of CARRES: they both counſelled P. Craſſus to ſteale away with them,and to flie to a city called ISCHNES, that was not farre from thence, and tooke the ROMAINES part. But P. aunſwered them, that there was no death ſo cruell as could make him forſake them, that died for his ſake. When he had ſo ſayd, wiſhing them to ſaue them ſelues,he embraced them,and tooke his leaue of them: and being very ſore hurt with the ſhot of an arrow through one of his handes, commaunded one of his gentlemen to thruſt him through with a ſword,and ſo turned his ſide to him for the purpoſe. It is reported Cenſorinus did the like. But Megabacchus ſlue him ſelfe with his owne handes, and ſo did the moſt part of the gentlemen that were of that company. And for thoſe that were left aliue, the PARTHIANS got vp the ſand hill,and fighting with them,thruſt them through with their ſpeares and pikes, and tooke but fiue hundred priſoners. After that, they ſtroke off Publius Craſſus head, and thereupon returned ſtraight to ſet vpon his father Craſſus, who was then in this ſtate. Craſſus the father,after he had willed his ſon to charge the enemies, and that one brought him word he had broken them,and purſued the chaſe:& perceiuing alſo that they that remained in their great battell, did not preaſe vpon him ſo neare as they did before, becauſe that a great number of them were gone after the other for reſcue: he then began to be liuely againe, and keeping his men cloſe, retyred with them the beſt he could by a hils ſide, looking euer that his ſonne would not be long before that hee returned from the chaſe. But Publius ſeeing him ſelfe in daunger, had ſent diuerſe meſſengers to his father, to aduertiſe him of his diſtreſſe, whom the PARTHIANS intercepted and ſlue by the way: and the laſt meſſengers he ſent, ſcaping very hardly, brought Craſſus newes, that his ſonne was but caſt away, if he did not preſently aide him, and that with a great power. Theſe newes were grieuous to Craſſus in two reſpects: firſt for the feare he had, ſeeing him ſelfe in daunger to loſe all: and ſecondly for the vehement deſire he had to goe to his ſonnes helpe. Thus he ſaw in reaſon all would come to nought, and in fine determined to go with all his power, to the reſcue of his ſonne. But in the meane time the enemies were returned from his ſonnes ouerthrow, with a more dreadfull noyſe and crie of victorie, than euer before: and thereupon their deadly ſounding droms filled the aire with their wonderfull noiſe. The ROMAINES then looked ſtraight for a hot allarme. But the PARTHIANS that brought Publius Craſſus head vpon the point of a lance, comming neere to the ROMAINES, ſhewed them his head, and asked them in deriſion, if they knew what houſe he was of, and who were his parents: for it is not likely (ſaid they) that ſo noble and valiant a young man, ſhould be the ſonne of ſo cowardly a father, as Craſſus. The ſight of Publius Craſſus head killed the ROMAINES hearts more, than any other daunger they had bene in at any time in all the battell. For it did not ſet their hearts a fire as it ſhould haue done, with anger, and deſire of reuenge: but farre otherwiſe, made them quake for feare, & ſtroke them ſtarcke dead to behold it. Yet Craſſus ſelfe ſhewed greater courage in this miſfortune, than he before had done in all the warre beſide. For riding by euery band he cried out aloude. The griefe and ſorrow of this loſſe (my fellowes) is no mans but mine, mine only: but the noble ſucceſſe and honor of ROME remaineth ſtill vnuincible, ſo long as you are yet liuing. Now, if you pitie my loſſe of ſo noble and valiant a ſonne, my good ſouldiers, let me intreate you to turne your ſorrow into furie: make them deerely buy the ioy, they haue gotten: be reuenged of their crueltie, and let not my misfortune feare you. For why: aſpiring mindes ſometime muſt needes ſuſteine loſſe. Lucullus ouercame not Tigranes, nor Scipio Antiochus, but their bloud did pay for it. Our aunceſters in olde time loſt a thouſand ſhippes, yea in ITALIE diuers armies and chieftaines for the conqueſt of SICILIA: yet for all the loſſe of them, at the length they were victorious ouer them, by whom they were before vanquiſhed. For the Empire of ROME came not to that greatneſſe it now is at, by good fortune onely, but by patience and conſtant ſuffering of trouble and aduerſitie, neuer yeelding or giuing place vnto any daunger. Craſſus vſing theſe perſwaſions to encourage his ſouldiers for reſolution, found that all his wordes wrought none effect: but contrarily, after he had commaunded them to giue the ſhowte of battell, he plainely ſawe their heartes were done, for that their ſhowt roſe but faint, and not all alike. The PARTHIANS on the other ſide, their ſhowt was great, and luſtely they rang it out. Now when they came to ioyne, the PARTHIANS archers on herſebacke compaſſing in the ROMAINS vpō the wings, ſhot an infinite number of arrows at their ſides. But their men at armes giuing charge vpon the front of the ROMAINS battel with their great lances, compelled them to draw into a narrow roome, a fewe excepted, that valiantly, and in deſperate maner ranne in among them, as men rather deſiring ſo to die, than to be ſlaine with their arrows, where they could do the PARTHIANS almoſt no hurt at all. So were they ſoone diſpatcht, with the great launces that ranne them through, head, wood and all, with ſuch a force, as oftentimes they ranne through two at once. Thus when they had fought the whole day, night drew on, and made them retire, ſaying: they would giue Craſſus that nights reſpit, to lament and bewaile his ſonnes death: vnleſſe that otherwiſe he wiſely looking about him, thought it better for his ſafety to come and offer him ſelfe to king Arſaces mercy, then to tarie to be brought vnto him by force. So the PARTHIANS camping hard by the ROMAINS, were in very good hope to ouerthrow him the next morning. The ROMAINES on the other ſide had a maruellous ill night, making no reckoning to bury their dead, nor to dreſſe their wounded men, that died in miſerable paine: but euery man bewailed his hard fortune, when they ſaw not one of them could eſcape, if they taried til the morning. On the other ſide, to depart in the night through that deſert, their wounded men did grieue them much. Becauſe, to cary them ſo away, they knew it would let their flight: and yet to leaue them ſo behinde, their pittifull cries would giue the enemies knowledge of their departure. Now, though they all thought Craſſus the only author of their miſery, yet were they deſirous to ſee his face, and to heare him ſpeake. But Craſſus went a ſide without light, and layed him downe with his head couered, becauſe he would ſee no man, ſhewing thereby the common ſort an example of vnſtable fortune: and the wiſe men, a good learning to know the fruites of ill counſell, and vaine ambition, that had ſo much blinded him, as he could not be content to commaund ſo many thouſandes of men, but thought (as a man would ſay) himſelfe the meaneſt of all other, and one that poſſeſt nothing, becauſe he was accounted inferior vnto two perſons onely, Pompey and Cæſar. Notwithſtanding, Octauius one of his chiefetaines, and Caßius the treaſurer, made him riſe, and ſought to comfort him the beſt they could. But in the end, ſeeing him ſo ouercome with ſorrow, and out of heart, that he had no life nor ſpirite in him: they themſelues called the Captaines and Centurions together, and ſate in counſell for their departure, and ſo agreed that there was no longer tarying for them. Thus of their owne authority at the firſt they made the armie march away without any ſound of trumpet or other noyſe. But immediatly after, they that were left hurt and ſicke, and could not follow, ſeeing the campe remoue, fell a crying out and tormenting themſelues in ſuch ſort, that they filled the whole campe with ſorrow, and put them out of all order with the great mone and loude lamentation: ſo as the formoſt ranke that firſt diſlodged, fell into a maruellous feare, thinking they had bene the enemies that had come and ſet vppon them. Then turning oft, and ſetting themſelues in battell ray, one while loading their beaſts with the wounded men, an other while vnloding them againe, they were left behinde, ſauing three hundred horſemen that ſcaped, who came about midnight to the citie of CARRES. Ignatius their Captaine called to the watch on the walles, and ſpake in the Latine tongue. Who anſwering, he willed them to tell Coponius, Gouernor of the towne, that Craſſus had fought a great battell with the PARTHIANS, and ſaid no more, neither tolde what he was: but rode on ſtill, till he came to the bridge which Craſſus had made ouer Euphrates. Yet this word Ignatius gaue to the watch to tell Coponius, ſerued Craſſus turne very well. For Coponius thought by this great haſt of his, and the ſhorte confuſed ſpeeche he made, paſſing on his way, that he had no good newes to tell them: wherefore he ſtraight armed his ſouldiers, and vnderſtanding that Craſſus was returning backe, went to meete him, and brought him & his army into the city of CARRES. The PARTHIANS knew well enough of the remouing of the ROMAINS campe, but yet would not follow thē in the night, but the next morning entring into their campe where they lay, ſlue all that were left behinde, which were about foure thouſand men: and riding after them that were gone, tooke many ſtragglers in the plaine. Among them there was Barguntinus, one of Craſſus Lieutenants, who ſtraied in the night out of the army with foure whole enſignes, and hauing loſt his way, got a hill, where the PARTHIANS beſieged him, ſlue him and all his company, though he valiantly there defended himſelfe: yet twenty of them onely eſcaped, who with their ſwordes drawne in their hands, running forward with their heads, thruſt in among the thickeſt of the PARTHIANS: They wondering at their deſperation, opened of themſelues, & ſuffered them to march on towards the city of CARRES. In the meane time falſe newes was brought to Surena, how Craſſus with all the chiefeſt men of his hoſt was fled, & that the great number that were receiued into the city of CARRES were men of all ſorts gathered together, and not a man of any qualitie or eſtimation. Surena thereupon thinking he had loſt the honour of his victory, yet ſtanding in ſome doubt of it, becauſe he would know the troth, that he might either beſiege the city of CARRES, or purſue after Craſſus: ſent one of his interpreters to the walles of the city, charging him to cal for Craſſus, or Caßius, and to tell them that Surena would parle with them. The interpreter did as he was commaunded. Word was brought to Craſſus, and he accepted parlance. Shortly after alſo, thither came certaine ſouldiers of the ARABIANS from the campe of the PARTHIANS, who knew Craſſus and Caßius very well by ſight, hauing diuers times ſeene them in their campe before the battell. Theſe ARABIANS ſeeing Caßius vpon the walles, told him, that Surena was contented to make peace with them, and to let them goe ſafely, as his maiſters good friendes, ſo that they would ſurrender MESOPOTAMIA into the king of PARTHIANS handes, and how they thought that was the beſt way for both parties, rather then to be enforced vnto it by extremity. Caßius thought this a good offer, and told them, that they muſt appoint the day and place, where Craſſus and Surena ſhould meete to talke together of the matter. The ARABIANS made aunſwere they would doe it: and ſo departed. Surena hearing this, was glad he had them at ſuch aduantage, where he might beſiege them. The next day he brought al his army before the city of CARRES. There the PARTHIANS maruellouſly reuiled the ROMAINES, and told them, they muſt deliuer them Craſſus and Caßius bound hands and feete, if they would haue any grace or peace with them. The Romaines were maruellouſly offended that they were thus deceiued, & told Craſſus that it was no boote any longer to looke for aide of the Armenians, but preſently to flie: howbeit to keepe it ſecret in any wiſe from any of the Carrenians, till the very houre of their departure. Yet Craſſus ſelfe had told it to Andromachus, the verieſt traitor and villain in al the city, whom he had choſen to be his guide. This traitor Andromachus aduertiſed the enemies in euery point, of their purpoſe and departure. But becauſe the Parthians do neuer vſe to fight in the night, & that it was a hard matter to bring them to it, and againe that Craſſus departed in the night time: Andromachus was affraid leaſt the Romaines would win ſuch ground before the Parthians, as they could not poſſibly ouertake him the next day. Therefore of purpoſe he ſometime brought them one way, other while an other way, and at the laſt, brought them into a great bogge or mariſh, full of deepe holes and ditches, and where they muſt needes make many turnes and returnes before they could get out againe, and yet very hardly. Whereupon, ſome in the armie began to miſtruſt, that Andromachus ment no good to turne and toſſe them vp and downe in that ſort, and therefore would followe him no more: inſomuch as Caſſius among others, returned towardes the citie of Carres againe, from whence they came. And when his guides (who were Arabians) counſelled him to tary there, til the moone were out of the ſigne of Scorpio, he anſwered them: I feare the ſigne of Sagittarie more. So as ſoone as he could, he tooke his way towardes Assyria with fiue hundred horſemen. And other of the armie alſo hauing faithfull guides, recouered a countrie of the mountaines, called Sinnaca, and retired into a ſafe place before the breake of day: and they were about fiue hundred men, whom Octauius a noble man had in charge. But the day ſtale vpon Craſſus, hunting vp & down yet in the marriſſe, in thoſe ill fauored places, into the which Andromachus that traitor had of purpoſe brought him, hauing with him foure enſignes of footmen all with targets, and very few horſemen, and fiue ſergeants that caried the axes and roddes before him: with whom, with much a do and great labour, he got into the right way, when the enemies were almoſt vpon him, and that he was within twelue furlong of ioyning with Octauius. There in haſt he had gotten a hil, which was not ſo ſteepe for horſemen, neither of ſuch ſtrength as the other hilles were, called Sinnaees, yet vnder them, and ioyning to them by a long hill that runneth alongſt the plaine, ſo as Octauius plainly ſaw the danger Craſſus was in. Thereupon he firſt ran downe the hilles with a few of his men that followed him: but after alſo came all the reſt, ſaying they were cowards if they ſhould tary behinde. At their comming they gaue ſuch a hot onſet vpon the Parthians, that they made them giue back from that hill: and compaſſing Craſſus in the middeſt of them, couering him rounde with their targets, they ſpake nobly, that neuer arrowe of the Parthians ſhould touche the bodie of their Generall, before they were ſlaine one after an other, and that they had fought it out to the laſt man in his defence. Hereupon Surena perceiuing the Parthians were not ſo couragious as they were wont to be, and that if night came vpon them, and that the Romaines did once recouer the high mountaines, they could neuer poſſibly be met withall againe: he thought cunningly to beguile Craſſus once more by this deuiſe. He let certaine priſoners goe of purpoſe, before whom he made his men giue out this ſpeech. That the king of Parthia would haue no mortall warre with the Romaines: but farre otherwiſe, he rather deſired their friendſhip, by ſhewing them ſome notable fauour, as to vſe Craſſus very courteouſly. And to giue colour to this brute, he called his men from fight, and going himſelfe in perſon towards Craſſus, with the chiefeſt of the nobility of his hoaſt, in quiet maner, his bow vnbent: he held out his right hand, and called Craſſus to talke with him of peace, and ſaid vnto him. Though the Romaines had felt the force & power of their king, it was againſt his will, for he could do no leſſe but defend himſelfe: howbeit that now he was very willing and deſirous to make them taſt of his mercy & clemencie, and was contented to make peace with them, and to let them go ſafely where they would. All the Romaines beſides Craſſus were glad of Surenaes words. But Craſſus that had bene deceiued before by their crafty fetches and deuiſes, conſidering alſo no cauſe apparant to make them change thus ſodainly: would not hearken to it, but firſt conſulted with his friends. Howbeit the ſoldiers they cried out on him to goe, and fell at wordes with him, ſaying: that he cared not though they were all ſlaine, and that himſelfe had not the heart only to come downe and talke with the enemies that were vnarmed. Craſſus proued firſt to pacifie them by faire meanes, perſwading them to beare a litle patience but till night, which was at hande, and then they might ſafely depart at their pleaſure, and recouer the mountaines and ſtraight paſſages, where their enemies could not follow them: and pointing them the way with his finger, he prayed them not to be faint hearted, nor to deſpaire of their ſafetie, ſeeing they were ſo neere it. But in the ende Craſſus perceiuing they fell to mutiny, and beating of their harnes did threaten him if he went not, fearing then they would doe him ſome villany: went towardes the enemy, and comming backe a litle, ſaid only theſe wordes: O Octauius, and you Petronius, with all you ROMAINE gentlemen that haue charge in this armie: you all ſee now how againſt my will I am enforced to go to the place I would not, & can witnes with me, how I am driuen with ſhame and force.

„ Yet I pray you if your fortunes be to eſcape this danger, that ye will report whereſoeuer you „ come, that Craſſus was ſlaine, not deliuered vp by his own ſouldiers into the hands of the barbarous „ people, as I am: but deceiued by the fraud and ſubtilty of his enemies. Octauius would not tary behind on the hill, but went down with Craſſus: but Craſſus ſent away his officers that followed him. The firſt that came frō the PARTHIANS vnto Craſſus were two mongrel GRECIANS, who diſmounting from their horſe ſaluted him, and prayed him to ſend ſome of his men before, and Surena would ſhewe them, that both himſelfe and his traine came vnarmed towards him. Craſſus thereto made them aunſwer, that if he had made any account of his life, he would not haue put himſelfe into their hands. Notwithſtanding he ſent two brethren before, called the ROSCIANS, to knowe what number of men, and to what ende they met ſo many together. Theſe two brethren came no ſooner to Surena, but they were ſtayed: and himſelfe in the meane time kept on his way a horſe backe, with the nobleſt men of his army. Now when Surena came neere to Craſſus: why, how now (quoth he) what meaneth this? a Conſull and Lieutenant generall of ROME a foote, and we a horſebacke? Therewithall he ſtraight commaunded one of his men to bring him a horſe. Craſſus aunſwered Surena againe: In that, they neither of both offended, following the vſe and maner of their country, when any meeting is made for treatie of peace. Surena replied: As for the treatie of peace, that was already agreed vpon betwene the king Hyrodes, and the ROMAINES: howbeit that they were to go to the riuer, and there to ſet downe the articles in writing. For you ROMAINES, ſaid he, do not greatly remember the capitulations you haue agreed vpon. With thoſe wordes he gaue him his right hand. As Craſſus was ſending for a horſe, you ſhall not neede, ſaid Surena, for looke, the king doth preſent you this. And ſtraight one was brought him with a ſteele ſaddle richly gilt, vpon the which his gentlemen mounted Craſſus immediatly, and following him behinde, laſhed his horſe to make him runne the ſwifter. Octauius ſeeing that, firſt laide hand on the bridle, then Petronius Colonell of a thouſand footmen: and after them, all the reſt of the ROMAINES alſo gathered about Craſſus to ſtay the horſe, & to take him from them by force, that preſſed him on of either ſide. So they thruſt one at an other at the firſt very angrily, and at the laſt fell to blowes. Then Octauius drew out his ſword, and ſlue one of the barbarous noble mens horſekeepers: and another came behinde him, and ſlue Octauius. Petronius had no target, and receiuing a blow on his curaces, lighted from his horſe, and had no hurte: and on the other ſide came Pomaxathres, one of the PARTHIANS, and ſlue Craſſus. Some ſay notwithſtanding, that Pomaxathres ſlue him not, but an other, yet that he cut off his head and his hand after he fell dead to the ground. But all theſe reports are rather coniectures, then any certainty. For as for them that were there, ſome of them were ſlaine in the field fighting for Craſſus, and other ſaued themſelues by flying to the hill. The PARTHIANS followed them, and tolde them that Craſſus had paide the paine he had deſerued: and for the reſt, that Surena bad them come downe with ſafetie. Then ſome of them yeelded to their enemies: and other diſperſed themſelues when night came, and of them very fewe eſcaped with life. Other being followed and purſued by the ARABIANS, were all put to the ſworde. So as it is thought there were ſlaine in this ouerthrow, about twentie thouſand men, and ten thouſand taken priſoners. Surena had now ſent Craſſus head and his hand vnto Hyrodes, the king his maiſter, into ARMENIA: and gaue out a brute as farre as the citie of SELEVCIA, that he brought Craſſus aliue, liue, and that he had prepared a ſight to laugh at, which he called his triumph. Among the ROMAINE priſoners there was one called Caius Pacianus, who was very like Craſſus: him they clothed in womans apparell of the PARTHIANS, and had taught him to anſwere, when any called him Craſſus, or Lord captaine. Him they put a horſebacke, and had many trumpets before him, and ſergeantes vpon camels backes, that caried axes before them, and bundles of roddes, and many purſes tyed to the bundles of roddes, and ROMAINES heads newly cut off, tyed to the axes: and after him followed all the ſtrumpets and women minſtrels of SELEVCIA, who went ſinging of ſongs of mockery and deriſion of Craſſus womaniſh cowardlineſſe. Now for theſe open ſhewes, euery one might ſee them: but beſides that ſight, Surena hauing called the Senate of SELEVCIA together, laide before them Ariſtides bookes of ribaldrie, intituled the Mileſians, which was no fable, for they were found in a ROMAINES fardle or truſſe, called Ruſtius. This gaue Surena great cauſe to ſcorne and deſpiſe the behauiour of the ROMAINES, which was ſo farre out of order, that euen in the warres they could not refraine from doing euill, and from the reading of ſuch vile bookes. Then the Senatours of SELEVCIA found that Æſope was a wiſe man, who ſaid, that euery man caried a ſacke on his necke, and that they put other mens faultes at the ſackes mouth, and their owne towardes the bottome of the ſacke. When they conſidered that Surena had put the book of the laſciuiouſnes of the MILESIANS at the ſackes mouth, and a long taile of the PARTHIANS vaine pleaſures and delightes in the bottome of the ſacke, carying ſuch a number of carts loden with naughtie packes in his armie as he did, which ſeemed an army of ermites and fielde miſe. For in the voward and foremoſtranckes, all appeared terrible and cruell, being onely launces, pikes, bowes, and horſe: but all they ended afterwards in the rereward with a traine of harlots, inſtruments of muſicke, daunſing, ſinging, banqueting, and ryoting all night with Curtiſans. I will not deny but Ruſtius deſerued blame: but yet withall, I ſay, that the PARTHIANS were ſhameleſſe to reproue theſe bookes of the vanities of the MILESIANS, conſidering that many of their kings, and of the royal bloud of the Arſacides, were borne of the IONIAN & MILESIAN curtiſans. Things paſſing thus in this ſorte, king Hyrodes had made peace & league with Artabazes king of ARMENIA, who gaue his ſiſter in mariage vnto Pacorus, king Hyrodes ſonne, and made great feaſts one to another: in the which were many Greeke verſes ſong, Hyrodes ſelfe vnderſtanding well the Greeke tongue, and Artabazes was ſo perfit in it, that he himſelfe made certaine tragedies, orations, and ſtories, whereof ſome are yet extant at this day. The ſame night Craſſus head was brought, the tables being all taken vp, Iaſon a common plaier of enterludes (borne in the city of TRALLES) came before the kings, and recited a place of the tragedy of the BACCHANTES of Euripides, telling of the miſfortune of Agaue, who ſtrake off his ſonnes head. And as euery man tooke great pleaſure to heare him, Sillaces comming into the hall, after his humble duty firſt done to the king, deliuered him Craſſus head before them all. The PARTHIANS ſeeing that, fell a clapping of their handes, and made an outcry of ioy. The gentlemen huſhers by the kings commaundement, did ſet Sillaces at the table. Iaſon caſting off his apparell repreſenting Pentheus perſon, gaue it to an other player to put it on him, & counterfaiting the BACCHANTES poſſeſt with fury, beganne to rehearſe theſe verſes, with a ieſture, tune, and voice, of a man madde, and beſide him ſelfe.

Pomaxathres hearing them diſpute about the matter, being ſet at the table with others, roſe ſtraight, and went and tooke the head him ſelfe, to whome of right it belonged to ſay thoſe wordes, and not vnto the player that ſpake them. King Hyrodes liked this ſport maruellouſly, and rewarded Pomaxathres according to the maner of the countrey in ſuch a caſe: and to Iaſon he alſo gaue a talent. Such was the ſucceſſe of Craſſus enterpriſe and voyage, much like vnto the end of a tragedy. were in the end iuſtly reuenged vpon them both, according to their deſerts. For king Hyrodes enuying Surenaes glorie, put Surena to death. And Hyrodes fell into a diſeaſe that became a dropſie, after he had loſt his ſonne Pacorus, who was ſlaine in a battell by the ROMAINES. Phraates his ſecond ſonne, thinking to ſet his father forwards, gaue him drinke of the iuice of Aconitum. The dropſie receiued the poiſon, and ōne draue the other out of Hyrodes body, and ſet him a foote againe. Phraates perceiuing his father to amend vpon it, to make ſhort worke, with his owne hands ſtrangled him.

THE COMPARISON OF Craſſus with Nicias.

Nicias and Craſſus richeſſe.

Lycurgus ſaying.

BVt now to proceede to the compariſon: firſt, Nicias goods were more iuſtely gotten, and with leſſe reproach, than Craſſus wealth, for otherwiſe a man cannot giue any great praiſe to minerall works, the which are wrought by lewd and ill diſpoſed barbarous fellows kept in irons, and toiled to death in vnholſome and peſtilent places. But being compared vnto Craſſus buying of confiſcate goods at Syllaes handes, and vngentlemanly bargaines of houſes a fire, or in danger thereof: ſurely Nicias trade will appeare the better way of getting. For as openly did Craſſus auow vſury, as tillage. And again for other faults, wherewith Craſſus many times was burthened, and which he ſtoutly denied: as, that he tooke money of men hauing matters before the Senate at ROME, to winne fauor for their ſide: and that he preferred matters to the preiudice of the confederats of the ROMAINES, only for his priuate profit: and therefore curried fauor with Ladies, & generally ſought to cloke all foule offenders: of all theſe faults, was Nicias neuer ſo much as once ſuſpected. For he to the contrarie, was mocked of euery bodie, becauſe for feare he maintained wicked doers by giftes: which perhaps would not haue becommed Pericles, nor Ariſtides, and yet was meete for Nicias, who was borne a timerous natured man, and neuer had courage in him. Whereof Lycurgus the Orator did vaunte afterwardes to the people, being accuſed that he redeemed detractours with money: I am glad, ſaid he, that hauing dealt thus long in affaires of the ſtate, it is found I haue rather giuen than taken. And now touching expences: Nicias was thought the better and more ciuill citizen. For his charge and coſt was, in dedicating ſome goodly image to the goddes, or in making of publicke playes or paſtimes to recreate the people. But all the money he ſpent that way, and all that he was worth beſides, was nothing comparable, and but a ſmall parte of that Craſſus beſtowed in an open feaſt he made at ROME: feaſting ſo many thouſands at one time, and did finde and maintaine them alſo for a certaine time after. Now I cannot but wonder at thoſe men, that deny vice to be an inequality and diſagreement

of manners,repugnant in it ſelfe, ſeing men may honeſtly ſpend that which is naughtily gotten. Thus much for their goodes. For Nicias doings in the common weale, he did nothing maliciouſly,cruelly,nor vniuſtly,neither any thing of ſelfe will or ſtomacke, but rather dealt plainly and ſimply. For he was deceiued by truſting of Alcibiades, and neuer came to ſpeake before the people, but with great feare. Craſſus on the other ſide was reproued for his vnconſtancie and lightnes, for that he would eaſily chaunge friendes or enemies: and he himſelfe denied not, that he came to be Conſull the ſeconde time by plaine force and crueltie, hauing hired two murtherers to kill Cato & Domitius. And in the aſſembly the people held for deuiding of the prouinces,many men were hurte, and foure were ſlaine in the market place: and more then that, Craſſus himſelfe (which we haue forgotten to write in his life.) gaue one Lucius Annalius ſo ſore a blow on the face with his fiſt,for ſpeaking againſt him,that he ſent him going with blood about his eares. But as Craſſus in thoſe things was very fierce and cruell: ſo Nicias womaniſh behauior on the other ſide,and faint heart in matters of the cõmon wealth, humbling himſelfe to the meaneſt and moſt vile perſons, deſerueth great reproach. Where Craſſus in this reſpect ſhewed himſelfe aſſuredly of a noble mind,not contending with men of ſmall account,as with Cleon, or Hyperbolus, but would giue no place to Caſars fame and glory,nor yet to Pompeyes three triumphes, but ſought to goe euen with them in power and authority:and had immediatly before exceeded Pompeyes power, in the dignity of Cenſor. For Magiſtrates, and Gouernors of the common weale, ſhould make themſelues to be honored, but not enuied, killing enuie by the greatnes of their power. But if it were ſo that Nicias preferred quietnes, and the ſafety of his perſon aboue all things elſe, and that he feared Alcibiades in the pulpit for orations, the LACEDÆMONIANS in the forte of Pyle, and Perdiccas in THRACIA: he had liberty & ſcope enough to repoſe himſelf in the city of ATHENS,& might haue forborne the dealing in matters,and (as Rhetoricians ſay) haue put a hoode of quietnes vpon his head very well. For doubtleſſe, concerning his deſire to make peace, it was a godly minde in him,and an act worthy of a noble perſon,to bring that to paſſe he did, appeaſing all warre: wherein Craſſus certainly was not to be compared to him,though he had ioyned all the prouinces to the empire of ROME, that reach vnto the Caſpian ſea, and to the great Occean of the INDIAS. But on the other ſide alſo, when one hath to deale with people that can diſcerne when a man ruleth according to equitie and iuſtice, and that he ſeeth he is in the prime of his credit and authoritie: he muſt not then for lacke of courage ſuffer wicked men to ſteppe in his roome, nor giue occaſion to preferre ſuch to authoritie in the common weale, as are vnworthy for that place and countenaunce: neither ſhould alowe ſuch any credit, as are altogether of no credit nor truſt, as Nicias did: who was the only occaſion that Cleon, being before but a pratling Orator, was choſen Generall. Neither do I alſo commend Craſſus, for that in the warre againſt Spartacus, he made haſt to giue him battell, more raſhely then ſafely or conſiderately. For his ambition ſpurred him forward, becauſe he was afrayed leaſt Pompeyes comming ſhould take from him the glory of all that he had done in that warre: as Mummius tooke from Metellus the honor of the winning of CORINTHE. But beſides all this, Nicias fact therein was without the cõpaſſe of reaſon, and can no way be excuſed. For he did not reſigne his honor & office of Generall to Cleon his enemie,when there was hope of good ſucceſſe, or litle perill: but fearing the daunger of the iorney, he was contented to ſaue one, and tooke no care beſides for the common wealth. Which Themiſtocles ſhewed not, in the time of the warre againſt the PERSIANS. For he, to keepe Epycides an Orator (a man of no reckoning beſide his eloquence, and extreamely couetous) from being choſen generall of ATHENS, leaſt he ſhould haue ouerthrowne the common weale: ſecretly bribed him with money to leaue off his ſute. And Cato alſo when he ſawe the ſtate of ROME in greateſt danger, ſued to be tribune of the people for the common wealthes ſake. And Nicias in contrary maner,reſeruing himſelfe to make war with the city of MINOA, or with the Ile of CYTHERA, or with the poore vnfortunate MELIANS, if there fell out afterwards occaſion to fight againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS, then away went his Captaines cloke,and he left the ſhippes,the armie, and munition to the charge and gouernment of Cleons raſhnes and ſmall experience of warre, when the neceſſitie of the ſeruice required the wiſeſt and moſt expert Captaine. The which he did not, deſpiſing the meanes to make him honored: but it was a plaine drawing backe, at time of need, to defend his countrie. Wherefore, afterwardes he was compelled againſt his will to be Generall, to make wars in SICILIA with the SYRACVSANS: becauſe the people thought he was not ſo earneſt to diſſwade the iorney, for that he thought it not meete for the common wealth, but becauſe through his ſloth and cowardlineſſe he would make his countrie loſe ſo good an oportunitie to conquer SICILE. Yet was this a great teſtimony of his honeſty and truſt they had in him: who though he euer hated warre, and did flie from the offices of honor and charge in the common wealth, his countrimen notwithſtanding did alwayes chuſe him, as the moſt experienced perſon, and meeteſt man of the citie. Now Craſſus in contrarie manner deſiring nothing elſe but to be Generall, could neuer attaine to it, but in the warre of the bondmen, and yet was it for lacke of another: (for Pompey, Metellus, and both the Lucullus were then abroade in the warres) although he was otherwiſe of great eſtimation and authority. Howbeit it ſeemeth to me, that his frends that loued him beſt, thought him (as the comicall Poet ſayeth)

The diuerſitie betwixt Nicias and Craſſus

His ambition notwithſtanding & couetous deſire of rule, did nothing benefit the ROMAINS. For the ATHENIANS ſent Nicias to the war againſt his will: but Craſſus led the ROMAINS thither againſt their willes. So that the common wealth fell into miſerie by the one, and the other through the common wealth was brought into miſerie: and yet therein there is rather cauſe to praiſe Nicias, then to blame Craſſus. For Nicias like a wiſe man, and a Captaine of great experiēce, could neuer ſo much as be brought to thinke they ſhould conquer SICILE: and therfore diſſwaded his countrimen from the iorney, & would giue no place to the vaine hope of the people of ATHENS. But Craſſus taking vpon him to make warres with the PARTHIANS, as though it had bene an eaſie matter to ouercome them, found himſelfe deceiued, yet did he aſpyre to great things. For as Iulius Cæſar had conquered and ſubdued to the Imperiall crowne of ROME, all the countries of the Weſt partes, to ſay the GAVLES, the GERMAINES, and ENGLAND: euen ſo did Craſſus deſire to go towards the Eaſt partes, to conquer all to the great weſt ſea of the INDIANS, and to ſubdue all the regions of ASIA, whereunto Pompey and Lucullus aſpyred, being both very noble perſonages, and ſuch as euer courteouſly behaued themſelues to all men: notwithſtanding, prouoked thereunto with the like deſire that Craſſus had. For when the charge of the warres in the Eaſt parts was aſſigned to Pompey, by decree and order of the people: the Senate vtterly miſliked it, and were againſt it all they could. When newes were brought to ROME that Iulius Cæſar in battell had ouerthrowne and ſlaine three hundreth thouſand GERMAINES, Cato perſwading with the Senate, was yet ſtill of this minde, that Cæſar ſhould be deliuered into the hands of his enemies whom he had ouercome, for to be puniſhed: thereby to turne the ſharpe reuenge and wrath of the gods from ROME, vpon him only, that was the vniuſt breaker of peace. This notwithſtāding, the people making none account of Catoes perſwaſions, made common feaſtes and proceſſions fifteene dayes together, and open ſacrifices to the gods with great ioy through the citie, to thanke thē for this famous victory. How gladde may we thinke would they haue bene, and how many dayes would they haue feaſted and ſacrificed, if Craſſus had written from BABYLON of his victory, and that he had conquered all the realmes of the MEDES, of the PERSIANS, of the HYRCANIANS, of SVSE, and of the BACTRIANS, and that he had made new gouernments and prouinces to the Empire of ROME?

If a man will needes do wrong and iniuſtice,

As Eurypides ſayeth to them, that cannot liue in peace, and be contented with their owne: he muſt not then ſticke at trifles, (as raiſing of a caſtell of Scandia, or of a citie of MENDA, or chaſing of the ÆGINETES being out of their own naturall countrie, and hiding themſelues like birdes without neaſts, in another birdes holes) but muſt deerely ſell the wrong he doeth, and not lightly contemne iuſtice, as a thing of ſmall account. For they that will commend the intent of Alexander the great in his voyage, for the conqueſtes he made in the Eaſt, and doe diſpraiſe Craſſus voyage: doe not well to iudge of the beginning, by the euents and ſucceſſe of the end. For executing of their offices, Nicias did many noble exployts. For he ouerthrew his

his enemies in diuerſe battels, and had almoſt taken the city of SYRACVSA: and ſure they cannot iuſtely blame him for all the misfortunes that chaunced in the warre of SICILIA, but partly the plague was a cauſe of it, and partly alſo the enuie of thoſe towardes him that remained at ATHENS. Where as Craſſus ranne into ſo many errors, and committed ſuch foule partes in all his voyage, that he gaue fortune no leaſure to do him good: ſo that I wonder not ſo much that his folly was ouercome by the power of the PARTHIANS, as that it could ouercome the good fortune of the ROMAINES. Sithens it ſo falleth out thẽ, that they both came to like vnfortunate end, Nicias prognoſticating before what things ſhould happen by arte and rule of diuination, and Craſſus contrarily diſdaining to obſerue any thing: ſure it falleth out hard in iudgment, which of them two proceeded with moſt ſafety. Yet according to the beſt approued opinions, a fault committed of feare is more excuſable, then of raſhnes and folly to breake any ancient lawe or cuſtome. For their deathes, Craſſus end deſerued leaſt reproach. For he againſt his will did yeeld himſelfe, and was neither bound nor mocked, but onely perſwaded by his friends, and through his enemies fraude and treaſon moſt traiterouſly deceiued: where Nicias, cowardly, and diſhonorably hoping to ſaue his life, truſting to the mercy of his enemies, made his death more infamous.

Craſſus death more commendable then Nicias end.

Sertorius.

PEraduẽture it is not to be maruelled at, if in long proces of time (fortune altering her effectes daily) theſe worldly euentes fall often out one like another. For whether it be that the varietie of things are infinite, fortune hath ſtore of matter apt enough to worke to likenes: or be it that worldly matters be cõprehended within determinate number: of neceſſitie one thing muſt fall out like an other, ſince they proceede from one cauſe, tyed to the ſame meanes it before did vſe. But becauſe men doe delight to compare ſuch chaunces together, as they haue ſeene or heard to haue happened ſo like, as if they had bene done of puropſe, the one by the example of the other: (as that of two men being both named Attis, both of them come of noble houſes, the one in SYRIA, and the other in ARCADIA, both the one and the other were ſlaine with a wilde bore. was torne in peeces by his dogs,the other by his louers. That of the two famous Scipioes, the CARTHAGINIANS were firſt ouercome by the one,and afterwards vtterly deſtroyed by the other. That the citie of TROYE was firſt taken by Hercules, for the horſes that Laomedon had promiſed him : the ſecond time by Agamemnon, by meanes of the great woodden horſe : and the third time by Charidemus,by means of a horſe that fell within the gate,& kept the TROYANS that they could not ſhutte it in time. And that of two ſweete ſmelling plantes, IOS, and SMYRNA,two cities were named, the one ſignifying the violet, and the other Mirre:it is ſuppoſed that the poet Homer was borne in the one, and that he died in the other) we may alſo adde to this example, that amongſt the auncient Captaines, the greateſt warriers, and that haue done the nobleſt exploytes by wit and warlike ſtratagemes, had but one eye : as Philippe, Antigonus, Hanniball and Sertorius alſo,whom we write of at this preſent. Whom we may truly reporte to haue bene more chaſt, than Philippe : more faithfull to his friend than Antigonus : more courteous to his enemies than Hanniball: and for wiſdome and iudgment to giue place to none of them,but in good fortune to them all. The which, though ſhe ſhewed her ſpight more to him, than to his enemies that were all great men : yet in experience he was equall with Metellus,in prowes and valiancie with Pompey,and in fortune with Sylla. So that being baniſhed his country, a ſtranger in another realme, and hauing to gouerne a barbarous nation, he notwithſtanding maintained wars for a time, againſt the power of the ROMAINS. Me thinkes therefore,that of all the GRECIAN Captaines I can liken none ſo well vnto him as Eumenes the CARDIAN. For both of them knew how to command, both were very valiant & politicke in wars, both were baniſhed men out of their countrie, both were Captaines ouer ſtraungers,and both of them were traiterouſly and villainouſly ſlaine by them, through whom they had before ouercome their enemies. Now for Sertorius, he came of worſhipfull parents, & was borne in the citie of NVRSIA in the coūtry of the SAMBINES. His father left him a very childe with his mother, who carefully brought him vp, and whom he ſingularly loued and reuerenced. Her name as they ſay was Rhea. His firſt riſing and beginning grew by pleading matters in law, which he could handle very well : inſomuch as being a young man he came to ROME,and wanne ſome name by his eloquence. Howbeit,the honor and eſtimation he atchieued afterwardes by his valiant actes, made him imploy all his ſtudie and ambitious care,to armes and warres. The firſt time of his ſouldierfare was,when the CIMBRES & TEVTONS inuaded GAVLE with a mighty army:where, whē the ROMAINS had bene ouercome vnder the leading of Cæpio, his horſe being ſlaine vnder him, and himſelfe hurt,he notwithſtanding ſwam ouer the riuer of Rone, with his corſelet & target vpon him, breaking the fury and rage of the riuer with meere ſtrength, ſo able and luſty a body he had to brooke all paines and hardnes. The ſecond time that theſe barbarous CIMBRES returned with an infinite number of fighting men,and with proude and dreadfull threates:the ROMAINES were thē ſo afrayd that they thought him a ſtout man that had but the courage to keepe his ranke, and obey his Captaine. At that time was Marius Generall of the ROMAINES armie, and then did Sertorius vndertake to goe and diſcouer the enemies campe. And for the purpoſe,apparelled himſelfe like a GAVLE, and learned the common wordes and phraſes of their language, to ſalute one another when they mette,and in this ſorte went among them : and hauing partly by ſight and reporte learned that he ſought for, he returned to Marius, who then gaue him ſuch honorable reward,as was due to his deſerte. All the time of the warres after, he did ſuch valiant actes and deedes of armes, that his Captaine had him in great eſtimation, and committed the chiefeſt matters to his charge. Whereupon the warres being ended with the TEVTONS & CIMBRES, Sertorius was ſent into SPAYNE, vnder Didius the Pretor,with charge of a thouſand footemen, with whom he wintered in the city of CASTVLO, in the marches of the CELTIBERIANS: where the ſouldiers finding plentie of victuals,fell to gluttonie and drunckennes, and committed great inſolencie, being ouercome with wine. Inſomuch as the barbarous people of the city grew to ſuch a miſliking and diſdaine of them,that they ſent one night to their nexte neighbours the GYRISENIANS for aide, and as they came by the ROMAINS lodgings,ſlue a great number of them. Sertorius hearing the noiſe, went immediatly out of the city with a few of his men,and gathering them together alſo that fled one after an ther to ſaue themſelues, went round about the walles of the citie, and finding the gate open where the GYRISÆNIANS came in, there entered he alſo: who being more carefull than they had ſhewed themſelues, left the gates, and all the parts of the city well garded, and then put all to the ſword within that were of age to carrie weapon. Nowe when he had executed this reuenge, he commaunded all his ſouldiers to leaue off their owne apparell and weapons, and to take theſe of the barbarous people whom they had ſlaine, and to follow him to the city of the GYRISÆNIANS, from whence they came that had on ſuch a ſodaine aſſailed thẽ in the night. The GYRISÆNIANS ſeing the garments and weapons of their ſuppoſed men farre off, thinking certainly they had bene they: opened their gates, and a number of people went out, as to meete their friendes and cittizens, whom they thought had happely ſped of their purpoſe. Thus were a maruellous number of them ſlaine by the ROMAINES, euen hard at the gates of their citie: and the reſt putting themſelues to Sertorius mercy, he ſolde for ſlaues. After this exploit, Sertorius wanne great fame through all SPAINE, and returning to ROME, was made Queſtor or treaſuror generall of GAVLE, on this ſide of the mountaines, by the riuer of Po. A happy chaunce for ROME: for euen at that very preſent time fell out the warres of the confederates and allies of ITALIE, called the MARSIANS warre, in the which he had cõmiſſion to preſt ſouldiers, and to make armor. And therein he ſhewed ſuch diligence and expedition for quicke diſpatch of that ſeruice, in reſpect of the long delaye and careleſſe regarde other young men had of the ſame before: that he won the name to be a carefull man of his charge, and one that afterwardes would atchieue great enterpriſes. Furthermore, when he came to be a Captaine himſelfe, he would not let to venture his perſon as valiantly, as any other priuate ſouldier whatſoeuer, but did maruellous actes with his owne handes, euen in greateſt perilles and conflicts: inſomuch as at the length he loſt one of his eyes in fight. Whereof he was nothing aſhamed, but continually gloried in it: for others, ſayed he, do not alwaies carie the markes about them of their valiant ſeruice, but leaue them otherwhiles at home, as their chaines, carconets, iauelings, and crownes, giuen them by their Captaines for teſtimonie of their valiancie: howbeit that he alwaies caried the marks about him (whereſoeuer he went) of his ſeruice, ſo that ſuch as ſaw the bleamiſh of his eye, did therewithall witnes his valiantnes and courage. The people alſo did honor him as became them. For when he came into the Theater, they welcomed him with clapping of their hands, and great praiſes, which the ROMAINS did ſcantly vſe vnto their oldeſt Captaines, and which were moſt honored for their great and noble ſeruice. Neuertheleſſe, when he ſued to be Tribune, he was reiected by Syllaes practiſe who hindered him: whereupon grew as it ſeemeth, that grudge & malice which he euer after bare vnto Sylla. For after that Marius was fled being ouercome by Sylla, and that Sylla was gone out of ITALIE to make warre with Mithridates, and that of the two Conſuls, Octauius tooke part with Sylla, and Cinna the other Conſul (which ſought chaunge and alteration) was gathering men together to ſet vp Marius faction, that was in manner vnder foote: Sertorius tooke his parte, becauſe he ſaw that Octauius was but a ſlow and lither man, and did not beſides truſt any of Marius friends. So was there a cruell conflict betwene them, euen in the market place within the city ſelfe, where Octauius had the vpper hand: and Cinna and Sertorius ſcaped by flying, hauing loſt few leſſe then ten thouſand men in this only ouerthrowe. Neuertheleſſe, afterwardes through practiſe and policie, they got thoſe ſouldiers together againe that were diſperſed here and there through ITALIE, ſo as in ſhort time they made their power equall with Octauius force. Marius alſo being aduertiſed of the ſame, tooke the ſea incontinently, & returned into ITALIE out of AFRICKE, and came to Cinna to ſerue as a priuate ſouldier, vnder his Captaine and Conſul. Now they all liked wel, that Marius ſhould be receiued, ſauing Sertorius, who was againſt him all he could: fearing that either his credit and eſtimation ſhould diminiſh, Cinna hauing a worthier Captaine then himſelfe to ſerue him, or elſe that Marius cruelty and ſeuerity (who pardoned none offence) would marre altogether, hauing no ſtay in his anger, but bent vtterly to all kinde of crueltie to his enemies, if Cinna fortuned to haue the victory. And thereunto he added this further: that now they had the victory in maner in their hands, if they once receiued Marius vnto them, he would rob them of all the honor of ending this warre, and being alſo in authority, he was neither to be truſted nor commaunded. Whereunto Cinna anſwered thus: that he thought the wordes he had alleadged to be true, howbeit that he was aſhamed, and beſides, could not ſee with honeſty how he might refuſe Marius, or ſend him back, ſithence he had purpoſely ſent for him, to commit parte of the charge of theſe warres vnto him. Sertorius againe replied. Sure I thought Marius had come of his owne goodwill vnſent for, & therfore (as for the beſt in mine owne opinion) I gaue aduiſe not to receiue him: but ſithence it is ſo that you ſent for him before, and that he is now come vpon your commandement, you were much to blame to aske counſell whether you ſhould nowe receiue him or not. And therfore you muſt needes accept his ſeruice, that is come vpon your word: for, the bond of your promiſe paſt you, doth now cut off all counſell or other reſolution. Thereupon Marius was called for: and when he came, they deuided their whole army into three partes, and then beganne to charge vpon their enemies of all handes, ſo as they obteined victorie. Howbeit Cinna and Marius committed as horrible cruelty in this victory, as could poſſibly be ſhewed: inſomuch as the ROMAINS thought all the miſeries they had endured in time of this warre nothing, and but a play as it were, in reſpect of the great calamities they fell into afterwardes. Now Sertorius on the other ſide neuer cauſed man to be ſlaine for any priuate malice or quarrell he had with any perſon, neither did he hurte any man when he had ouercome, but was much offended with Marius inſolency & cruell murthers: and when he had good oportunity to ſpeake with Cinna apart, he did qualifie him the beſt he could, and made him more milde and tractable through his perſwaſion. In fine, Sertorius ſeeing Marius garded with a great number of bondmen for lacke of other ſoldiers in this warre, whom he vſed as executioners of his ſlaughter and butchery, alwayes attending about his perſonne as a garde, and ſuffering them alſo to make themſelues rich, partly with that he gaue them, or commaunded them to ſpoyle, and partely alſo with that they violently tooke without his commaundement of their own maſters, killing them when they had done, rauiſhing their miſtreſſes, & defiling their children: he could no longer abide ſuch wickednes and villainy, but made them all to be ſlain in their campe where they lay together, being no leſſe then foure thouſand perſons. Afterwards when he ſaw that the elder Marius was dead, and that ſoone after Cinna was ſlaine, the younger Marius his ſonne (againſt his counſell, and contrary to the lawes of ROME) had by force made himſelfe conſull: and that Carbo, Scipio, and Norbanus (which had bene ouercome by Sylla) were come out of GRECE to ROME wards, partly through the cowardlines of their captaines, and partely alſo becauſe they were betrayed and ſolde of their owne men: and further, conſidering therewithall, that his perſon could do no good in thoſe affaires which waxed worſe and worſe, by meanes of the authoritie of ſuch as had leaſt wit and vnderſtanding, and ſpecially alſo ſeing Sylla campe hard by Scipio, making much of him, and feeding him with hope of a good peace, whilſt vnderhand he wanne his ſouldiers from him, notwithſtanding that he was certainly warned and told of it before: Sertorius then vtterly deſpairing of ROMES proſperitie and welfare, departed from ROME to go towards SPAINE, thinking that if he could get the firſt poſſeſſion and gouernment of that realme, it would at the leaſt be a refuge and receite for all thoſe of their tribe, that ſhould chaunce to be baniſhed out of their country. Howbeit in his voyage thitherward, he met with fowle and rough weather: and paſſing through a cōtry of mountains, the barbarous people inhabiting the ſame, demaunded tribute of him, for licence to paſſe through their territories. Therat the ſoldiers of his company were maruellouſly offended, ſaying: that it were too much ſhame and diſhonor for a Proconſull of ROME, to pay tribute to vile barbarous people. Notwithſtāding, Sertorius paſſed not for the ſhame they ſayd it would be to him but anſwered them thus: that he bought time, which thing he ſhould moſt reckon of, that aſpireth to haughtie enterpriſes: and ſo pleaſed the barbarous people with money. And thus he made ſuch ſpeede, as he quickly recouered SPAINE, which he founde greatly repleniſhed with people, and ſpecially of young men able to weare armor. But now Sertorius perceiuing that they had bene hardly dealt withall before, through the inſolencie, pride, and couetouſnes of the ROMAINE gouernors, whom they ordinarily ſent from ROME, and that therfore they hated all manner of gouernment: firſt of all ſought to winne the good willes of all the whole countriemen one and other. and of the common people, by eaſing them of their taxe and ſubſidies. But that which bred him moſt loue of all men generally was this: that he diſpenſed with them for lodging of ſouldiers, and receiuing of any garriſon within their cities, compelling his ſouldiers to ſet vp their tentes, and to make their cabines without the ſuburbes of great cities to winter there, & cauſing alſo his owne pauillion to be firſt ſet vp, and lay in it himſelfe in perſon. This notwithſtanding, he pleaſed not theſe barbarous people in all things to win their fauor: for he armed all the ROMAINE citizens of age to cary weapon that dwelt in SPAINE, and made them make all ſortes of engines for batterie, and a number of gallies beſides, ſo that he had all the cities at commandement, being very courteous to them in matters of peace, but in warlike munition, very dreadfull to his enemies. After Sertorius vnderſtoode that Sylla kept ROME, and that the moſt part of the tribe of Marius & Carbo was vtterly ouerthrowen, miſtruſting that it would not be long before they ſent ſome Captaine with a great armie againſt him: he ſent Iulius Salinator betimes to keepe the mountaines Pirenei, with ſixe thouſande men well armed. Immediatly after Caius Annius alſo came thither, ſent by Sylla: who ſeeing no poſsibilitie to diſtreſſe Salinator in a place of ſuch aduantage, was driuen to ſtay at the foote of the mountaine, not knowing what to determine. But by misfortune, one Calphurnius ſurnamed Lanarius, traiterouſly ſlew Salinator: whereupon his ſouldiers foorthwith forſooke the toppe of the mountaines, and by this meanes Annius had eaſie paſſage with his armie which was very great, and ouerthrew them that reſiſted his farther comming on into the country. Sertorius finding him ſelfe not ſtrong enough to fight with him, marched away with three thouſand men vnto the citie of new CARTHAGE, and there tooke ſea: from thence he coaſted ouer into AFRICKE, and fell with the coaſt of the MAVRVSIANS, where his ſouldiers landed immediatly for freſh water, diſperſing themſelues without keeping any order. Thereupon the barbarous people gaue a charge vpon them, & ſlew numbers of them: inſomuch as Sertorius was driuen to imbarke againe, and to take his courſe towards SPAINE, where he was kept from landing. Then was he driuen to take certaine pirates botes of the CILICIANS, and to ſaile towardes the Ile of PITYVSA, where he landed in deſpight of Annius garriſon, and put them to diſtreſſe. But ſhortly after came Annius thither himſelfe with a good number of ſhippes, and fiue thouſande fighting men in them. Him Sertorius determined to abide, and to fight withall by ſea, though he had but ſmall barkes, purpoſely made for ſwift ſailing, & of no ſtrength for fight. But now the Weſt winde riſing very bigge, did ſwell the ſea in ſuch ſort, that it caſt the moſt part of Sertorius ſhippes (being weake and very light) vpon rockes in the ſea, and himſelfe with a few being kept from land by his enemies, and from the ſea by ſtorme was driuen to ride ten daies together at anker, working ſtill for life againſt the danger of the ſurging waues & boiſterous windes, which continued rough all that time: yet in the end when it calmed againe he wayed anker, and ranne into certaine deſolate Iles, where was no water to be had. Then hoyſing ſaile from thence, he paſſed the ſtraight of Gilbratar, and turning on his right hande, landed vpon the coaſt of SPAINE, lying towardes the great Weſterne ſea, a litle aboue the mouth of the riuer of Bætis, the which falling into the ſea Atlanticum, gaue name in olde time to that part of SPAINE, which was called HISPANIA BÆTICA. There certaine ſailers met with him that were newly arriued from the Iles of the Ocean Atlanticum, which the aunciemts called, the fortunate Ilands. Theſe two Ilands are not farre one from an other, being but a litle arme of the ſea betweene them, and are from the coaſt of AFRICKE only tenne thouſand furlongs. They haue raine there very ſeldome, howbeit a gentle winde cōmonly that bloweth in a litle ſiluer dew, which moiſteth the earth ſo finely, that it maketh it fertile and luſtie, not onely to bring forth all that is ſet or ſowen vpon it, but of it ſelfe without mans hand it beareth ſo good frute, as ſufficiently maintaineth the inhabitants dwelling vpon it, liuing idlely, and taking no paines. The weather is faire and pleaſant continually, and neuer hurteth the body, the climate and ſeaſons of the yeare are ſo temperate, and the aire neuer extreame: becauſe the windes that blow vpon that land from the other ſide of the coaſt oppoſite to it, as the North & Eaſterly winde comming from the maine, what with their long comming, and then by diſperſing themſelues into a wonderfull large aire and great ſea, their ſtrength is in maner ſpent and gone before their comming thither. And for the windes that blow from the ſea (as the South and Weſterly) they ſometime bring litle ſhowers with them which commonly doe but moiſt the ground a litle, and make the earth bring forth all things very trimmely: inſomuch as the very barbarous people themſelues doe faithfully beleeue, that there are the Elyſian fieldes, the abode of bleſſed creatures, which Homer hath ſo much ſpoken of. Sertorius hearing report of theſe Ilandes (vpon a certaine deſire now to liue quietly out of tyranny and wars) had ſtraight a maruellous mind to go dwell there. But when the pyrates of CILICIA (who were no men of peace, but giuen altogether to ſpoile & pillage) heard that: they by and by forſooke Sertorius, & went into AFRICK, to reſtore Aſcalius the ſonne of Iphtha to his realme of MAVRITANIA againe. Sertorius quailed not for all their departure from him, but determined to aide them that made war againſt Aſcalius, and al to the end that his ſouldiers ſeeing matter of new hope and meanes to be imployed, ſhould not ſo leaue him, being faced afterwardes to be diſcharged of very neceſſity. The MAVRVSIANS being very glad of his arriualll, he preſently went on with his enterpriſe, ouercame Aſcalius in battell, and beſieged the citie whereinto vppon the ouerthrowe of his armie he was fled for refuge. Sylla being aduertiſed thereof, ſent Paccianus thither with an army to aide Aſcalius. Sertorius gaue him battell, ſlew him in the field, & wan the reſt of his army, which yeelded vnto him: then tooke he the citie of TINGIS, whereinto Aſcalitus was fled with his brethren. The LIBYANS write that Antæus is buried there. But Sertorius giuing no credite to the tales of the barbarous people of that countrie, by reaſon of the greatneſſe of the tombe they ſhewed: made it to be broken open round, and finding there the bodie of a man (as they ſay) of threeſcore cubits long, he maruelled at it, and ſo finiſhing his ſacrifice to honor the memory thereof, cauſed the tombe to be well cloſed vp againe. By this acte he did greatly increaſe the honour of Antæus memory, which the citie did vnto him, and thereby confirmed the countrymens report of Antæus. For the TINGIANS doe report, that after Antæus death, his wife Tinga lay with Hercules, and had a goodly ſonne by him called Sophax, who was king of that country, and there built this citie, giuing it his mothers name. Furthermore, it is ſaid alſo that this Sophax had a ſonne called Diodorus, who conquered the moſt part of AFRICKE with an army of the GRECIAN OLEIANIANS and MYCENIANS, which Hercules brought thither to inhabite thoſe partes. We were willing to imbrace the occaſion offered vs to ſpeake of this matter as we went, for the honor of Inba, the nobleſt hiſtoriographer that euer came of royall bloud: for it is thought his aunceſtors were lineally diſcended from Sophax & this Diodorus. Sertorius as conquerour now, hauing the whole country in ſubiection, did in no wiſe hurt them that yeelded vnto him, & put truſt in him, but reſtored them their goods, cities, and gouernment againe, contenting himſelfe with that they offered him of their good wils. But then ſtanding doubtfull what way to determine: the LVSITANIANS ſent Ambaſſadors vnto him, to intreate him to be their chiefetaine. For they ſtoode in great neede of a worthy perſonage, and a man expert in warres to defende them againſt the furie of the ROMAINES: and therefore they only truſted him, hearing of his honorable behauiour by them that were conuerſant with him. Whoſe qualities as we finde written, were theſe. He was neuer greatly moued, with feare nor ioy: but as he was a reſolute man without feare in moſt danger, ſo was he moſt temperate in greateſt proſperitie. In valiantneſſe inferiour to no Captaine of his time, and very quicke of execution in euery imminent danger. For where any preſent exploit was to be done, any ſtrong place of aduantage to lodge or fight in to be taken, or that he was to paſſe ouer any riuer, or ſcape any inſtant danger, where it ſtoode vpon ſpeedy execution, and to ſhewe ſome ſtratageme or policie in time and place to ſupplant the enemie: in thoſe matters he paſſingly excelled. Furthermore, he was both bountifull in rewarding good ſeruice, and mercifull in puniſhing of offenders: but this notwithſtanding, the foule murther he did in his latter daies vppon certaine young children that were pledges with him (which doubtleſſe was an act of great cruelty and anger that could not forgiue) doth manifeſtly proue, that he was neither mercifull nor courteous of nature: but that he many times did finely counterfaite it, when both the time and the warres did ſo require it. But for mine opinion, ſure I am perſwaded that no misfortune can haue power to make perfect vertue, grounded vpon good reaſon, to worke in any ſort contrarie to it ſelfe: neither doe I thinke it impoſſible alſo, but that mens good willes and gentle natures being iniured without cauſe, cauſe, may peraduenture change their naturall diſpoſitions. Which then proued true in Sertorius, who finding fortune contrary vnto him, and his good happe changed into ill, grew ſo crabbed and fierce of nature, that he would take cruell reuenge of them which had villanouſly betraied him. But now to our matter where we left. Sertorius departed out of AFRICK vpon the LVSITANIANS offer, who choſe him for their generall, giuing him abſolute power and authoritie: and ſo ſoone as he arriued, he ſtraight leauied men of warre, and with them ſubdued the people of SPAINE fronting vppon their marches, of which the more part did willingly ſubmit themſelues, vpon the brute that ranne of him to be mercifull and courteous, and a valiant man beſides in preſent danger. Furthermore, he lacked no fine deuiſes and ſubtilties to winne their good willes: as among others, the pollicie and deuiſe he had of the hynde, which was this. There was a poore man of the countrie called Spanus, who meeting by chance one day with a hynde in his way that had newly calued, flying from the hunters: he let the damme goe not being able to take her, and running after her calfe tooke it, which was a young hynde, and of a ſtrange haire, for ſhe was all milke white. It chaunced ſo, that Sertorius was at that time in thoſe partes, who was alwaies very glad when any man offered him ſuch maner of preſentes: as frutes, foule, or veniſon, and would make very much of them that brought them to him, and alſo reward them well for the ſame. So, this poore man preſented Sertorius with his young hynde, which he gladly receiued, and which with time he made ſo tame, that ſhe would come to him when he called her, and follow him where euer he went, being nothing the wilder for the daily ſight of ſuch a number of armed ſouldiers together as they were, nor yet affraid of the noyſe and tumult of the campe. Inſomuch as Sertorius by litle & litle made it a miracle, making the ſimple barbarous people beleeue that it was a gift that Diana had ſent him, by the which ſhe made him vnderſtande of many and ſundrie things to come: knowing well enough of himſelfe, that the barbarous people were men eaſily deceiued, and quickly caught by any ſubtill ſuperſtition, beſides that by Art alſo he brought them to beleeue it as a thing very true. For when he had any ſecret intelligence giuen him, that the enemies would inuade ſome part of the countries and prouinces ſubiect vnto him, or that they had taken any of his fortes from him by any intelligence or ſodaine attempt: hee ſtraight tolde them that his hynde ſpake to him as he ſlept, and had warned him both to arme his men, and put himſelfe in ſtrength. In like maner if he had heard any newes that one of his Lieutenantes had wonne a battell, or that he had any aduantage of his enemies, hee would hide the meſſenger, and bring his hynde abroad with a garlande and coller of noſegayes: and then ſay it was a token of ſome good newes comming towardes him, perſwading them withall to be of good cheare, and ſo did ſacrifice to the goddes, to giue them thankes for the good tidings he ſhould heare before it were long. Thus by putting this ſuperſtitiō into their heads, he made them the more tractable and obedient to his will, inſomuch as they thought they were not now gouerned any more by a ſtranger wiſer than themſelues, but were ſtedfaſtly perſwaded that they were rather led by ſome certaine god: and ſo much the more, becauſe that his deedes confirmed their opinions, ſeeing his power ſo daily to increaſe beyonde the hope and expectation of man. For with two thouſand fiue hundred ſouldiers, which he called ROMAINES (although the moſt of them indeed were AFRIKANS, which came ouer with him out of AFRICKE into SPAINE) & foure thouſand LVSITANIANS, with ſeuen hundred horſemen alſo, he made warre againſt foure great Captaines of ROME, which had the leading of ſixe ſcore thouſand footemen, two thouſand archers and ſlingmen, with a world of cities and countries beſides. Where Sertorius at the firſt had not aboue twentie at the moſt: and yet with this ſmall power to maintaine this warre withall, he did not only conquere great countries and many goodly cities, but tooke ſome of the Captaines priſoners alſo, whom the ROMAINES ſent againſt him. Of which company Cotta was one, whom he ouerthrew in battell by ſea, not farre from the citie of MELLARIA. He alſo ouercame Fidius in battell, being gouernor of SPAINE BAETICA, by the riuer of Bætis, where he ſlew two thouſand ROMAINES. By his treaſurer likewiſe he ouercame Lucius Domitius, Proconſull of the other prouince of SPAINE. And another time he diſcomfited Toranius an other Captaine, one of Metellus Lieutenants, whom he ſlew in fight with all his army. And Metellus ſelfe, being taken at that time for one of the moſt expert men of warre, and chiefeſt Captaines among the ROMAINES: him he put alſo ſo oft to diſtreſſe, that Lucius Lollius was fain to come out of GAVLE NARBONENSIS (now Languedocke) to aide. And they were furthermore driuen to ſend Pompey the great with all ſpeed from ROME with a new army. Becauſe Metellus knew not what courſe to take, hauing to fight with a moſt valiant man, & one whom he could neuer either bring to any ſet battell, nor yet entrappe in the plaine fielde (ſo eaſily could he caſt himſelfe into all kinde of formes) by reaſon of the dexteritie and ſwiftneſſe of his ſpaniſh ſouldiers being lightly armed. Where he cleane contrary, was wont to fight a pitched field, without remouing a foote, and to leade an army heauie armed, which could keepe their ranckes, and fighting ſteadily could ouerthrow their enemies with handſtrokes, and march vpon their bellies. But to clime vp the mountaines, and to be continually (as they were) charged in the rereward with theſe men armed as light as the winde, and to purſue them in chaſe that fled ſtill, and neuer kept place: it was vnpoſſible for them to do it, and much leſſe to abide hunger and thirſt, to liue without a kitchin and fire, and likewiſe to lie on the bare ground without tentes or pauillions, as Sertorius ſouldiers did. Furthermore Metellus being growen an old man (hauing ſpent all his youth in ſeruice of the warres, and taken and ſuffred great paines and troubles, giuing himſelfe now to quiet and pleaſure) was matched with Sertorius, being then euen at his beſt age, and luſtieſt of body, beſides that nature had made him both ſtrong, actiue, and temperate withall. For he was neuer giuen to his belly, nor to be a great bibber, when he was at moſt quiet, and out of warres, he was likewiſe acquainted with paines & hardnes from his youth, could away with long iorneies, watch many daies and nightes without ſleepe, eate litle, and content himſelfe with any meate that came to hand. And had he neuer ſo litle leaſure, he would continually be on horſebacke, riding a hunting vp and downe the fieldes, which made him very readie and expert to know how to winde himſelfe out of danger when he was diſtreſſed, and contrarily alſo to compaſſe in his enemie vpon any aduantage: and beſides, to ſee where he might enter, & where not. For this cauſe was Metellus driuen (who was ſtill deſirous to fight) to abide the loſſes & diſcommodities which they ſuffer that be vanquiſhed: and Sertorius on the other ſide refuſing battell, and flying before him, had all the vantage of him that they haue, which chaſe their enemies whom they haue ouercome. For hee cut off his victualles on euery ſide, tooke away his water, and kept him in from foraging. When he thought to march further forward, Sertorius ſtaied him. And when he lay ſtill in his campe, Sertorius came and gaue him alarums, and draue him to diſlodge. If Metellus laide ſiege to any place, Sertorius ſtraight beſieged him for want of victuals. So that his ſouldiers were euen weary of altogether. Wheruppon, when Sertorius challenged the combat of Metellus: oh, well ſaid, cryed all the ſouldiers, let Captaine fight againſt Captaine, and ROMAINE againſt a ROMAINE. Howbeit Metellus refuſed him, and the ſouldiers laughed him to ſcorne. Neuertheleſſe he did but ſmile at them, and therein ſhewed himſelfe a wiſe man: for as Theophraſtus ſaith, a Captaine muſt die as a Captaine, not like a priuate ſouldier. Furthermore, Metellus conſidering that the LANGOBRITES (who gaue great aide vnto Sertorius in all ſeruices) were eaſie to be taken for lacke of water (hauing but one only well in all their city) and that whoſoeuer did beſiege that ſame, ſhould ſtraight be maſter of all the ſpring heades of the ſuburbes about it, hoping thereby to make the citie yeelde vnto him within two dayes at the vtmoſt: he commaunded his ſouldiers to victuall themſelues for fiue daies only. But Sertorius hauing intelligence thereof, gaue good direction and ſpeedy order to preuent him. For he cauſed two thouſand goates skinnes to be filled with water, and promiſed round ſummes of money for euery skinne brought thither. Many SPANYARDS and MAVRVSIANS ſtraight tooke vpon them the enterpriſe. Therupon Sertorius chooſing the luſtieſt men among them, ſent them away through the mountaine, commaunding them withall, that when they deliuered their goates skinnes with water vnto the citizens, they ſhould cauſe them foorthwith to put out all their idle people, that the water might laſt them the longer which defended the city. Metellus receiuing aduertiſement hereof, was much agrieued withall, becauſe his ſouldiers victuals were well neere ſpent, which they had brought according to his commandement: and therefore he ſent Aquinus one of his Lieutenantes, with ſixe thouſand men to get victuals. Sertorius hauing intelligence of his purpoſe,

This place may well be taken two waies, and either of both allowable: and according to the other it might be ſaid, to leade Romaine citizens to the wars, fighting like valiant men.

preſently laide an ambuſh for his returne in a valley full of wodde, and beſtowed there three thouſande men to ſet vppon the rereward, whileſt he himſelfe gaue charge on the vowarde. Thus made he Aquinus flie, ſlew the moſt part of his men, and tooke the reſt priſoners. Howbeit Aquinus ſelfe the Captaine hauing loſt his weapons and horſe, by flying recouered Metellus campe: who thereupon was driuen with ſhame to raiſe his ſiege, being mocked of all the SPANYARDS. For theſe valiant deedes, was Sertorius wonderfully beloued and honored of all the barbarous people, and ſpecially becauſe he had made them good ſouldiers, brought them from their former rude and beaſtly fight, and had taught them to be armed after the ROMAINE faſhion, to keepe their ranckes when they fought, to follow their enſigne, & to take the ſignall and word of the battell: inſomuch as he made them then appeare a goodly army, well taught and trained, being before a confuſed multitude of theeues and robbers. Furthermore, he deuided great ſtore of gold and ſiluer among them, ſhewing them how they ſhould gilde their headpeeces, ſet out their ſhieldes and targettes with fine workemanſhippe, and alſo brauely apparell themſelues with rich clokes and ſleeueleſſe caſſockes vppon their armour, teaching them to be fine, and furniſhing them with money, whereby he maruellouſly wanne the heartes of the barbarous people. Yet did he farther binde them vnto him, by that he did vnto their children. For he ſent generally for all the noble mens young ſonnes, through all the countries and prouinces ſubiect vnto him: and brought them to the goodly citie of OSCA: where he prouided them of ſchoolemaſters to teach them the Greeke and Latine tongue: bearing their parentes in hande, that it was to no other end, but to make them (when they came to be men) meete to be imployed in the ſeruice of the common weale, albeit in deede it was but a fine deuiſe of him, to haue them as hoſtages for their faith and loyaltie towardes him. Then were the fathers of theſe children glad men to ſee their ſonnes apparelled like ROMAINES, in faire long gownes garded with purple, to goe ciuilly to the ſchooles: that Sertorius payed for their learning: and that oftentimes hee went thither to appoſe them, to ſee how they profited: and how he gaue rewardes vnto them that were the beſt ſchollers, hanging iewels about their necks, which the ROMAINES call Bulla. Inſomuch, that they hauing a cuſtome at that time in SPAINE, that ſuch as were about the Prince or their Chieftaine ſhould die with him when he died, that cuſtome of voluntarie vow to die with their Lorde, being called by the barbarous people, deuotion: there were very fewe of their followers and familiars that would vow to die with other Captaines, but on the other ſide, thouſandes commonly folowed Sertorius, hauing vowed to looſe their liues with him. And for proofe hereof it is reported, that when his army on a time was ouerthrowen by a certaine citie of SPAYNE, the enemies egerly purſuing him: the SPANYARDS not regarding their owne liues to ſaue his, tooke him vp on their ſhoulders, and ſo paſſed him from man to man vpon them, till they put him into the citie, who being ſafe & out of danger, they then looked by running to ſaue them ſelues the beſt they could. Thus was Sertorius not only beloued of the SPANYARDS, but of other ſouldiers alſo that came out of ITALIE. For when Perpenna Vento, being of the ſame faction, arriued in SPAINE full of mony & with a good number of ſouldiers, intending to make warre in his behalfe againſt Metellus: his ſouldiers fell out with him, and had none other talke in his campe but of Sertorius. The which ſpighted Perpenna to the hart, being proud & ſtately by meanes of his wealth and eſtate, comming of a noble houſe. Newes being come that Pompey was paſt ouer the mountaines Pyrenei, the ſouldiers armed themſelues, and plucked vppe their enſignes that were faſt in the ground, and cried out vpon Perpenna to lead them to Sertorius, threatning him that if he would not, they would leaue him alone, and ſeeke them a Captaine that could both ſaue himſelfe and them. So was Perpenna forced againſt his will to followe their mindes, and to leade the three and fiftie enſignes he had with him, to ioyne with Sertorius force. Thus became Sertorius army very great, and ſpecially after all the cities on this ſide the riuer of Ebrus had yeelded vnto him. For then came ſouldiers to him out of all partes, howbeit they were a raſh confuſed multitude of Omnigatherum together, hauing no reaſon nor patience to abide time, but cryed out in furie, to ſet vpon their enemies. This troubled Sertorius much, ſeeking firſt to quiet them by reaſon and perſwaſion. But when he ſawe they fell to mutinie, and would needes haue their wils, and both without reaſon and all good order would ſo goe ſet vpon their enemies : he gaue them the head , and let them goe as they would, knowing well enough they would pay for their follie,but yet tooke ſuch order and direction, as they ſhould not vtterly be caſt away, hoping after that to haue them the more obedient vnto him. And indeede they had their paiment as he coniectured : notwithſtanding he went to reſcue them,and ſo brought them ſafe into his campe. Now to take away the feare & perplexitie from them , which this ouerthrow perhappes had ſtriken into them : immediatly after he cauſed his whole armie to aſſemble , as purpoſing to vſe ſome ſpeech vnto them. At which time he cauſed two horſes to be brought and ſet in the middeſt among them,the one an old and feeble iade,and the other a goodly luſtie horſe,which beſides other things, had a maruellous faire thicke taile. Behind the old leane iade, he ſet a luſty tall fellow : and behinde the goodly horſe alſo,he placed a litle weariſh man,& ſeeming to ſight to haue but ſmall ſtrength. Now vpon a ſigne giuen them which he had made them priuy to , the ſtrong man tooke the leane horſe by the taile with all his might, as if he would haue pluckt it off by the ſtumpe : and the other weariſh man fell to plucking off haire by haire from the great horſe taile. So when the ſtrong man had tugged and ſwet a great while in vaine at the leane horſe taile, thinking to haue plucked it off,and in the end did nothing elſe but make the lookers on laugh: and that the weariſh wretch on the other ſide in a ſhort ſpace (and at eaſe)had left the great horſe taile with neuer a haire on it : Sertorius then riſing vp , ſpake in this ſort to his ſouldiers. Doe ye not ſee (my friendes and companions) ſaid he, how time and perſeuerance exceedeth force ? and that things vnlikely at the firſt to be ouercome by force , are yet in time by litle and litle obtained. For continuance ouercommeth all things , and there is no force nor power , but proceſſe of time conſumeth and bringeth to nought , being a moſt certaine helpe to them that can take oportunitie, and abide time : as in contrariwiſe haſte and raſhnes is as dangerous an enemie as may be, to them that doe things of a head without regard. By theſe common deuiſes wherewith Sertorius daily acquainted the barbarous people, he taught them to abide the oportunitie of time. But of all the ſtratagemes he vſed in warre, that only exceeded all other,which he ſhewed vnto a people called the CHARACITANIANS. The people do dwell on the other ſide of the riuer of Tagus, and haue neither cities nor villages for their common abode,but only a great high hill, full of hollow caues and deepe holes among the rockes, looking towardes the North. At the foote of this mountaine the valley is a great ſlimie ground and ſo rotten, that it is not able to beare a man, but being troden on,crummeth like white lyme, & turneth to duſt vnder his feete. And therefore by meanes of the ſame, when thoſe people were affraide of anie enemies, or that they had conueyed the goods they had robbed and ſtolen from their neighbours into thoſe caues , they thought themſelues ſafe, if they were once gotten into them : for it was impoſſible to compell them to come out. Now it chaunced that Sertorius flying from Metellus,came and encamped hard by this hill which theſe barbarous people inhabited,who made no reckoning of him,imagining Metellus had ouerthrowen him. But Sertorius being in a rage with them,and becauſe he would ſhew that he fled not : tooke his horſe backe the next morning , and rode as neere to the hill as he could , to viewe the nature and ſituation of the place : and when he ſaw there was no way to bring a man into it, he fretted,and walked vp & downe, vainely threatning them to no purpoſe. Yet going and comming to and fro , he perceiued the winde raiſed a great duſt, of that brittle earth we haue ſpoken of, and caried it full into the CHARACITANIANS holes, the mouthes whereof as we ſaid before , lay full vpon the North. This Northen winde which ſome call Cæcias, is the only winde of all other that moſt keepeth in that quarter , and riſeth from the moores and mountaines thereaboutes , which be continually couered with ſnow , and then in the hart of ſommer is nouriſhed and inforced by the melting of the ice and ſnow,and ſo bloweth a iolly coole wind, which refreſheth the barbarous people and beaſtes all the day long. Sertorius marking this with himſelfe , and vnderſtanding by the inhabitants therabouts,that this winde blew commonly among them: commaunded his ſouldiers to gather a great quantitie of this light brittle earth together, & to raiſe a mount of it, right againſt the other hill. The barbarous people made a mockerie of it at the firſt,thinking Sertorius would haue made a mount to haue fought with them vpõ it: howbeit he went on with his worke till night came, and then brought his ſouldiers backe againe into his camp. The next morning by breake of day there was a prety litle wind ſturring, that onely blew off the top of his forced mount, and the higheſt part of that maſſe of earth, as chaffe when they winnow corne: and as the ſunne began to haue any power, the North winde alſo roſe, which forthwith filled all the hill with duſt. And withall, came Sertorius ſouldiers who threw downe the hill to the bottome, which they had gathered the day before, and brake all thoſe dry clots of clay in peeces. The horſemen on the other ſide, they ſtill mannaged their horſes vp and downe in it, to raiſe vp the greater duſt, which the winde caried as ſoone as it roſe, and blew into the caues of theſe barbarous people, full in their faces, through their holes and riftes of the rockes. So they hauing no other ventes nor ayre any way, but there where the winde blew in vpon them: it did ſo blindfold their eyes, and filled their caues with ſuch a hot ſtuffing ayre, that they were almoſt choked withall, not able to take breath. For when they ſhould draw their breathes, this ſtuffing ayre and duſt came in at their mouthes ſo faſt, that they had much a do to hold out two dayes, and on the third yeelded themſelues vnto Sertorius mercy: the which thing did not ſo much increaſe his power, as it wanne him honor, by policie to haue wonne ſuch an vnlikely conqueſt, which by force could neuer haue bene gotten, and where to fight was matter impoſsible. So long therefore as he made warre with Metellus alone, he commonly had the aduantage of him, becauſe Metellus was an old man and heauy, and could not reſiſt Sertorius luſty youth, that led a light army, like rather to a company of theeues and robbers, than to an army of men of warre. But afterwardes when P*ompey* was come ouer the mountaines Pyrenei, and that both of them being encamped ech before other, and that P*ompey* had ſhewed him all the ſtratagemes and policies of warre poſsible for a good Captaine to deuiſe, & he the like vnto Pompey: and found that Sertorius had the better of him, both in laying his ambuſhes, & alſo in foreſeeing to intrappe him: then grew the fame of Sertorius to be ſo great, that euen in ROME it ſelfe he was thought to be the nobleſt Captaine, & of beſt conduction of any man in his time. Yet was P*ompey* at that time of great fame and reputation, which afterwardes alſo waxed greater, by the noble actes he did vnder Sylla, who gaue him the ſurname of P*ompey* the great, for that he had deſerued honour of triumphe, before his beard was growen. So, when he was come thus into SPAYNE, diuers townes and cities ſubiect vnto Sertorius, were halfe in minde to yeeld vnto P*ompey*: but afterwardes they altered againe, vpon the chaunce that happened vnto the citie of LAVRON, beyond all expectation. For Sertorius being gone to lay ſiege to it, P*ompey* in haſt went thither with his army to raiſe the ſiege. Neare vnto the citie there was a litle hill very commodious to lodge a camp in, and alſo to diſtreſſe them of the city: whereupon the one made haſt to get it, and the other to keepe him from it. Notwithſtanding, Sertorius was the firſt man, and got the hill: and P*ompey* came euen as he had taken it, who was very glad it had ſo fallen out, thinking to haue made Sertorius ſure at that time, being kept in on the one ſide with the citie of LAVRON, and with his armie on the other. Thereupon he ſent vnto the citizens, and bad them care for nothing, more then to ſtand vpon their walles at their pleaſure, to ſee Sertorius ſtraightly beſieged, who thought to haue beſieged them. This meſſage being brought to Sertorius, he ſmiled at it, and ſayd, that he would teach Syllaes young ſcholler (for ſo in mockerie he called P*ompey*) that a wiſe Captaine ſhould rather ſee behind then before him: and therewithall he ſhewed the LAVRONITANS ſix thouſand footemen well armed, which he had left in his camp when he came to take the hill where he was, to the end that if P*ompey* came by chance to aſſaile him, they ſhould giue a charge vpon his rereward. P*ompey* hauing found this too late, durſt not offer Sertorius battell, fearing to be compaſſed in behind: and on the other ſide he was aſhamed to forſake the LAVRONITANS, whom he was driuen in the end to ſee vtterly ſpoyled and deſtroyed before his eyes, and durſt not once ſturre to helpe them. The barbarous people of the contrarie part ſeeing no hope of aide by him, yeelded ſtraight vnto Sertorius, who did not onely pardon them, but alſo ſuffered them to go whither they would. Howbeit he burnt the citie, for no anger or crueltie (being a Captaine that neuer ſhewed crueltie in anger) but to ſhame P*ompey* withall, and to ſtoppe their mouthes that made ſuch account of him: and that this brute might runne among the barbarous people, that P*ompey* himſelfe being preſent, and might in manner haue warmed him by the fire that burnt a goodly citie of his confederates, neither durſt nor could helpe them. Indeede Sertorius in continuance of this warre ſuſteined much loſſe and great hurt, howbeit it was alwayes through the fault of his Lieutenants: for, as touching himſelfe, he was neuer ouerthrowen, not thoſe he led. And yet he euer wanne more honor in recouering of thoſe battels which his Captaines loſt, than his enemies did that had put them to the worſe. As in the battell he wanne againſt Pompey, by the city of SVCRON: and in an other he wanne againſt Pompey and Metellus both, by the citie of TVTTIA. And as for the ouerthrow of SVCRON, it is thought it came through Pompeyes ambition, making the more haſt for feare Metellus ſhould be partaker of the honour of his victorie: and that was the thing Sertorius looked for, to fight before Metellus came to ioyne with him, and therefore he fought the battell with Pompey towardes night, ſuppoſing the darkeneſſe of the night would trouble his enemies much, be a helpe to ſaue themſelues if they were ouercome, and alſo to chaſe the enemies if ſo it happened they had the vpper hand, becauſe they were ſtraungers, and knew not the country. When both battels came to giue charge, Sertorius at the firſt was not directly againſt Pompey, but againſt Afranius, who led the left wing of Pompeyes battell, and himſelfe was in the right wing of his owne battell. Howbeit Sertorius being aduertiſed that the left wing of his owne army againſt the which Pompey fought, was in ſuch diſtreſſe as they gaue backe, and could abide no longer, if they were not preſently aided: ſtraight left the leading of the right wing, which he aſsigned ouer to other of his Captaines, and ranne with all ſpeede poſsible vnto the left wing, which were then euen as good as flying. And firſt he gathered them together againe which had turned their backes, and after put thoſe alſo in good order that were yet a fighting: and ſo hauing encouraged them both with his wordes, and the preſence of his perſon, he gaue a new charge againe vpon Pompey, more couragiouſly than before, (who thinking he had already wonne the field, was then a chaſing ſuch as fled) and came ſo fiercely vpon him, that he put all the whole army of the ROMAINES to flight: in ſomuch as Pompey himſelfe eſcaped killing in the field very hardly being ſore hurt, & ſaued by a ſtraunge meane. For the AFRIKANS of Sertorius hauing taken Pompeyes horſe (which was richly trapped with harneſſe of gold & other pretious furniture) falling out among themſelues, and fighting for diuiſion of the ſame: in the meane time let Pompey go, and neuer followed after him. Afranius againe on the other ſide, whileſt Sertorius was gone to helpe the other wing of his battell, made them flye all that ſtood before him, and followed killing of them euen into the trenches of their camp, entring in amongſt them that fled, and ſpoyled the camp being darke night, knowing nothing of Pompeyes ouerthrow, neither could he withdraw his men from ſpoile. Sertorius alſo comming thither vpon the inſtant, finding Pompeyes men in diſorder, ſlue a number of them: & the next morning betimes armed his men againe, and brought them out into the field, to fight once more with Pompey. But receiuing intelligence that Metellus was at hand, he ſounded the retreate, and diſloged from the place he encamped, ſaying: had not that old woman come, I would haue whipped that young boy to ROME with rods. Now was Sertorius very heauy, that no man could tell him what was become of his white hynde: for thereby all his ſubtiltie and fineſſe to keepe the barbarous people in obedience was taken away, and then ſpecially, when they ſtood in neede of moſt comfort. But by good happe, certaine of his ſouldiers that had loſt themſelues in the night, met with the hynde in their way, & knowing her by her colour, tooke her, and brought her backe againe. Sertorius hearing of her, promiſed them a good reward, ſo that they would tell no liuing creature that they brought her againe, and thereupon made her to be ſecretly kept. Then within a few dayes after, he came abroad among them, and with a pleaſaunt countenaunce told the noble men and chiefe Captaines of theſe barbarous people, how the goddes had reuealed it to him in his dreame, that he ſhould ſhortly haue a maruellous good thing happen to him: and with theſe wordes ſate downe in his chaire to giue audience. Whereupon they that kept the hynde not farre from thence, did ſecretly let her go. The hynde being loſe, when ſhe had ſpied Sertorius, ran ſtraight to [illegible] chaire with great ioy, and put her head betwixt his legs: and layed her mouth in his rig[illegible] hand, as ſhe before was wont to do. Sertorius alſo made very much of her, and of pur[illegible]e appeared maruellous glad, ſhewing ſuch tender affection to the hynde, as it ſeemed [illegible] water ſtood in his eyes for ioy. The barbarous people that ſtood thereby and beheld the ſame, at the firſt were much amazed therewith: but afterwardes when they had better bethought themſelues, for ioy they clapped their handes together, and waited vpon Sertorius to his lodging with great and ioyfull ſhouts, ſaying, and ſtedfaſtly beleeuing, that he was a heauenly creature, and beloued of the goddes: whereupon they were maruellouſly pleaſed in their mindes, and certainely hoped that their affaires ſhould proſper dayly better and better. An other time hauing ſtraighted his enemies with ſcarcitie of victuals, in the territorie of the SAGVNTINES, he was by force compelled to fight againſt his will, for that they ſent great troupes of men to forrage the country, to get victuals. Vpon the encounter it was valiantly fought of either ſide, where Memmius was ſlaine, (the valianteſt Captaine P*ompey* had) couragiouſly fighting in the middeſt of the battell. Sertorius finding himſelfe the ſtrõger, followed his firſt wing, making great ſlaughter of thoſe that withſtood him, vntill he came vnto Metellus ſelfe, who taried his comming, defending himſelfe more valiantly then was either hoped, or looked for, in a man of his yeares: in ſomuch as he was at the laſt hurt with a partiſan. Which was ſuch a diſhonor to the ROMAINES, not vnto thẽ onely that ſaw it, but vnto ſuch alſo as heard of it, that being all aſhamed to forſake their Captaine, and turning their ſhame into anger againſt their enemies: they couered Metellus round about with their ſhieldes and targets, and getting him out of the preſſe and furie of the fight, gaue ſuch a fierce onſet, as they draue the SPANYARDS to flie. Thus fortune chaunging the victory, Sertorius to giue his ſcattered men time to ſaue themſelues, and leaſure alſo for a new ſupplie (which he cauſed to be preſently leauied) to come at their pleaſure: fled of purpoſe into a citie of the mountaines of ſtrong ſituation, and there ſetting a good face of the matter repayred the rampers, and fortified the gates, thinking nothing leſſe then to abide there to be beſieged, but onely to lay a baite for his enemies, comming to beſiege the citie, hoping they ſhould eaſily winne it, and in the meane time left purſuing of the barbarous people which had thereby good leaſure giuen them to ſaue themſelues. Furthermore, they tooke no order to ſuppreſſe the new ſupplie that was comming to Sertorius, who had ſent out his Captaines to the next cities and ſhyres adioyning, to leauie men, with expreſſe commaundement, that when they had muſtered a conuenient number together, they ſhould ſend them vnto him, as they did. So when he vnderſtood of their comming, he eaſily paſſed through his enemies to meete them, and with them ſodainly came backe againe, and harried his enemies worſe then before: ſometime cutting their victuals from them by land, through his ambuſhes and continuall ſubtle policies, being quickely in euery place whither they thought to go, with his light army: and on the ſea alſo with certaine pyrats pinneſes, with the which he ſcoured all the coaſt vpon the ſea ſide. By this meanes, both the Captaines his enemies were compelled to ſeuer themſelues farre one from the other, inſomuch as Metellus went to winter in GAVLE, P*ompey* remained in SPAYNE, (in great ſcarcitie of all things for lacke of money) to winter in the territories of the VACCEIANS, and wrote to the Senate at ROME, that he would returne with his army into ITALIE, if they ſent him not money out of hand, for that he had ſpent all his own dayly fighting for the defence of ITALIE. Thus it was certainly thought at ROME, that Sertorius would be in ITALIE before P*ompey*; becauſe he had through his valiancie and great skill brought two of the moſt famous Captaines of their time, to great extremitie and diſtreſſe. Then did Metellus ſhew how much he feared Sertorius, and how he thought him a great and dreadfull enemie. For he proclaimed by ſound of trumpet, that if any ROMAINE could kill him, he would giue him an hundred ſiluer talents, and twentie thouſand Iugera of land: and if he were a baniſhed man, he promiſed he ſhould be reſtored to his country and goods againe, buying his death by treaſon, whom he could not ouercome by force. And furthermore, being his chaunce once to winne a battell of Sertorius, he was ſo ioconde and proud for this victorie, that he would needes therefore be called Imperator, to ſay, Prince, or ſoueraine Captaine: and was contented the people ſhould ſet vp aulters and do ſacrifices vnto him in euerie citie where he came. And it is furthermore reported of him, that he wore garlandes of flowers on his head, and would be bidden to diſſolute banquets, ſitting at the table in a triumphing robe: and they made images of victory go vp and downe the hall, moued by certaine ſecret engines carying triumphes of gold, and crownes and garlandes of triumphe, and daunſers of goodly young boyes and fayre girles following of them, with ſongs of triumphe in his prayſe. Wherein doubtleſſe he deſerued to be laughed at, ſhewing himſelfe ſo much caried away with ioy and vaine glorie, for one ouerthrow giuen vnto him, whom himſelfe was wont to call Syllaes fugitiue, & the remnant of the baniſhed men of Carbo. On the other ſide, Sertorius noble courage was eaſily diſcerned, firſt, for that he called the baniſhed mẽ which were eſcaped from ROME, and come to him Senatours: and hauing them about him, called them the Senate, making ſome of them Treaſurers, others Pretors, directing and ordering all things according to the manner of his country. And in this alſo, that making warres with the ſouldiers of the cities of SPAYNE, and defraying the ſame at their owne charges, yet he neuer gaue them any authoritie, ſo much as in word, but ruled them alwayes with ROMAINE officers & Captaines: ſaying ſtill, that he fought for the libertie of the people of ROME, and not to increaſe the glorie and power of the SPANIARDS, to the hurt and diſhonour of the ROMAINES. For to ſay truly of him, he euer loued his country well, & longed much to be ſent for home againe; and yet in his greateſt troubles, when things thwarted him moſt, then was his minde greateſt, yeelding no manner of ſhew or appearance to his enemies, of any faint hart or diſcouragement in him. Againe, when he was in beſt proſperitie, and had moſt aduantage of his enemies, he ſent vnto Metellus and P*ompey* both letting them vnderſtand that for his part he was contented to lay armes aſide, and to liue at home like a priuat man, ſo that he might be lawfully reſtored and called home by edict: and that he had rather be counted the meaneſt citizen in ROME, then being a baniſhed man out of his country, to be called Emperour of the world. And it is ſayd, that one of the chiefeſt cauſes which made him deſire ſo much to be called home againe, was the tender loue he bare vnto his mother (that had brought him vp from the time of his fathers death) vpõ whom he caſt all his loue & delight: in ſomuch as after that his friends in SPAYNE had ſent for him to come to be their Captaine, and that he had bene a while among them, receiuing newes that his mother was departed out of the world, it ſo ſtrake him to the hart, that he had almoſt dyed for ſorrow. For he lay ſeuen dayes together continually on the ground weeping, & neuer gaue his ſouldiers the watch word, nor would be ſeene of any of his friends: vntill that the other noble men and Captaines of his owne eſtate, came to him to his tent, and were ſo importunate of him by intreatie and perſwaſion, that they got him out of his tent to ſhew himſelfe to his ſouldiers, to ſpeake to them, and to take order for his affaires which proſpered very well. By theſe ſignes many haue iudged, that he was of a curteous and pityfull nature, and that naturally he was giuen to be quiet and peaceable: howbeit, that he was forced of neceſsitie to take charge of men of warre, becauſe he could not otherwiſe liue quietly nor ſafely, being purſued by his enemies, which would neuer let him reſt, and thereupon entred into warre, for his owne gard and ſafetie. The treatie ſelfe he made with king Mithridates, argued his noble minde. For when Mithridates whom Sylla had ouercome, was recouered gaine (like a wreſtler that being ouerthrowen getteth vp on his feete to try an other fall with his enemy) and tooke vpon him to inuade ASIA: Sertorius fame was then ſo great, that he was ſpoken of through the world, by marchaunts comming from the Weſt, who blew abroad the report thereof all the Eaſt parts ouer, euen into the realme of PONT, like to marchandiſes which the went to ſeeke for in ſtrange countryes. Whereupon Mithridates being perſwaded by the vaine vaunts of his fauoured courtiers, who compared Sertorius to Hanniball, and him ſelfe vnto king P*yrrus*, ſaying that the ROMAINES being ſet vpõ by thẽ both, could not withſtand two ſuch excellent natures, and great powers together, when the nobleſt Captaine of the world ſhould be ioyned with the greateſt and moſt puiſſant Prince that euer was: ſent thereupon his Ambaſſadours into SPAYNE vnto Sertorius, with full power and commiſsiõ to promiſe him money and ſhippes towardes the maintenaunce and charge of this warre, in recompence whereof he deſired that Sertorius would redeliuer him the poſſeſsion of ASIA againe, the which he had ſurrendred vp vnto the ROMAINES vpon the peace made betwixt him and Sylla. Sertorius hereupon called his councell together (which he termed the Senate) to conſult vpõ this matter. And when they were all of opinion that he ſhould accept Mithridates offers, and were exceedingly glad of the ſame, conſidering that they asked them nothing but a title in the ayre, and a name of things which were not in their power, offring them therfore things preſent, whereof they had greater neede, yet would Sertorius neuer agree thereunto. Notwithſtanding, thus much he granted Mithridates, that he ſhould enioy CAPPADOCIA & BITHYNIA, which had euer bene countryes ſubiect vnto kings, and whereunto the ROMAINES had neuer any right, excepting this ſpecially: that he would neuer ſuffer him to vſurpe any country, vnto the which the ROMAINES had any iuſt title, & the which he had loſt in warres by force of armes vnto Fimbria, and had afterwardes alſo willingly ſurrendred by agreement made betwixt him and Sylla. For he ſaid he would enlarge the Empire of ROME through his victories, but not impayre or hurt it by his conqueſtes. For, a valiant man (ſayd he) ſhould couet to conquer with honour, but in no wiſe deſire life with diſhonour. His aunſwere being reported vnto king Mithridates, did much amaze him: & ſome haue written, that he then ſayd vnto his familiars. What would Sertorius commaund vs then, if he ſate among them in the Senate at ROME, who being an exile now, & remaining in the fartheſt part of the world by the ſea Atlanticum, doth take vpon him to bound the certaine confines of our kingdome, threatning vs alſo with warres, if we attempt any thing againſt ASIA? All this notwithſtanding, they were agreed vpon othes takē betweene them, that Mithridates ſhould enioy the countryes of CAPPADOCIA and BITHYNIA, and that Sertorius ſhould ſend him one of his Captaines with aide of men of warre, and that vpon performance thereof, the king ſhould giue him the ſumme of three thouſand talents, and fortie ſhippes of warre. So Sertorius ſent thither one of his Captaines called Marcus Marius, a Senator of ROME, who fled to him for ſuccour: with whom Mithridates diſtreſſed certaine cities of ASIA. And when Marius entred into them, with his ſergeaunts carying the bundles of roddes and axes before him, as before a Proconſull of the ROMAINES: Mithridates gaue him the vpper hand, as his better and followed after him. Furthermore, Marius did ſet certaine cities at libertie, and wrote vnto others, declaring vnto them, that Sertorius of his grace and goodneſſe did releaſe them of their taxe and cuſtomes they payed: ſo that poore ASIA which had bene oppreſſed by the couetouſneſſe of the Treaſurers and farmers of the ROMAINES, and alſo by the pride & inſolencie of the ſouldiers which lay in garriſon among them, began to haue ſome hope of chaunge, and to deſire the alteration of gouernemēt, which Sertorius offered. But on the other ſide, the Senators of ROME that were in SPAYNE as baniſhed men in Sertorius armie, and of the like dignitie and eſtate that himſelfe was of, they hearing ſay that all was well again at ROME, and perſwading them ſelues that they ſhould be ſtrong enough for their enemies, hauing no cauſe to feare any more daunger: began then to enuie Sertorius greatneſſe and authoritie, but Perpenna ſpecially among other, who by reaſon of his nobilitie being puft vp with a vaine preſumption and ambitious ſelfe will, practiſed to make himſelfe chiefe of all the armie, and to that end threw forth amongſt his friendes and familiars ſuch kinde of ſeditious wordes. What curſed fortune (quoth he) my friendes doth dayly haunt vs worſe then other, making vs that were vnwilling to obey Sylla (commaunding at this day both land and ſea at his will) to chooſe rather to forſake our landes and country? And now being come hither in hope to liue at libertie, we willingly make our ſelues ſlaues, becomming Sertorius garde for defence of his perſon in his exile: who to requite vs withall, payeth vs with fayre wordes, calling vs the Senate, whereat euerie man laugheth to heare vs ſo called, and in fine we muſt abide this diſhonour to be at his commaundement, and drudge and take as much paines, as the SPANYARDS and LVSITANIANS do themſelues. Hereupon the more part of them being caried away with theſe mutinous wordes, durſt not yet ſhew themſelues in actuall rebellion againſt Sertorius, being afeard of his authoritie: howbeit ſecretly vnderhand they ouerthrew his doings, by ſhewing extreme crueltie vnto the barbarous people, by pretext of iuſtice, impoſing great payments vpon them, giuing it out it was Sertorius commaundement. By which their lewd practiſes, many cities reuolted againſt him, and put themſelues into his enemies hands: and they dayly alſo raiſed new mutinies and rebellions vpon him. Furthermore, thoſe whom he ſent to pacifie the tumultes did handle themſelues in ſuch ſort, that where they ſhould haue quieted the grudges and rebellions of the people, they ſet them farther out, and procured new tumultes. Hereupon was Sertorius gentle nature and former goodneſſe ſo altered, that he committed a moſt cruell act vpon all the noble mens children of that land, which he brought vp at ſchoole in the citie of OSCA: for ſome of them he put to death, and others he ſold as ſlaues. Thus P*erpenna* hauing many aſſociates in his wicked conſpiracie againſt Sertorius, brought into his confederacie alſo one called Manlius, who had chiefeſt charge in all the army. This Manlius loued a yoũg boy exceedingly, & becauſe he would let him know he loued him well, he told him on a time the whole plot of this conſpiracy, willing him not to reckon any more of others loue but of his, and to loue him onely: for he ſhould ſee him a great man before it were long. The young boy louing an other better then him, called Aufidius, went & reuealed vnto him all that Manlius had told him. Aufidius maruelled to heare the boy made priuie to it, ſeeing himſelfe alſo was of the confederacie, and knew not yet that Manlius was one of them And when the boy alſo named Perpenna, Græcinus, & ſome other whom Aufidius knew well to be of coũſell, he was worſe afrayed then before, but yet ſeemed to make litle of it, and told the boy: for that matter it was nothing, and counſelled him not to credit Manlius wordes, who was but a vaine man, and boaſted of that which was not true, and did it onely but to deceiue him. This notwithſtanding, departing thence, he went forthwith vnto P*erpenna*, and told him how their practiſe was diſcouered, declaring further what daunger they were in, if it were not ſpeedily put in execution. All the confederates agreed it was true that he ſayd, & thereupon they deuiſed this treaſon. They had ſuborned a meſſenger to bring counterfeite letters to Sertorius, feyning in the ſame that one of his Lieutenaunts had wonne a great battell, in the which he had ſlaine a maruellous number of his enemies. Sertorius being very glad of the good newes, made ſacrifice vnto the goddes to giue them thankes. Whereupon, Perpenna taking the preſent oportunity inuited Sertorius to ſupper to him, and all other his friends that were preſent (euery one of the conſpiracie with him) and was ſo importunate with Sertorius, that in the end he promiſed him to come. Now Sertorius did euer vſe great modeſtie at the bourd, and would ſuffer no diſſolute talke nor light partes at his meate, and had acquainted them alſo that vſed his table, to talke of graue and wiſe matters, and yet one to be honeſtly mery with an other, without any playing or vncomely talke. In the middeſt of ſupper, they that ſought occaſion of quarell, began to ſpeake lewd wordes, counterfeiting to be drunke, and to play many vile partes of purpoſe to anger Sertorius. Whereupon Sertorius, whether it was that he could not abide to ſee thoſe villainous partes, or that he miſtruſted their ill will towards him by ſumbling of their words in their mouthes, and by their vnwonted irreuerent maner ſhewed vnto him: fell backewardes vpon the bed where he ſate at meate, ſeeming no more to marke what they did or ſayd. P*erpenna* at that inſtant tooke a cup full of wine, and making as though he dranke, let it fall of purpoſe. The cup falling downe made a noyſe, and that was the ſigne giuen among them. There withall Antonius that ſate aboue Sertorins at the table, ſtabbed him in with his dagger. Sertorius feeling the thruſt, ſtroue to riſe: but the traiterous murtherer got vp on Sertorius breſt, & held both his handes. And thus was Sertorius cruelly murthered, not able to defend himſelfe, all the conſpiratours falling vpon him. Sertorius death being blowen abroad, the moſt part of the SPANYARDS ſent Ambaſſadours immediatly vnto P*ompey* and Metellus, and yeelded themſelues vnto them: and P*erpenna* with thoſe that remained with him, attempted to do ſome thing with Sertorius army and preparation. But all fell out to his vtter deſtruction and ruine, making the world know that he was a wicked man, who could neither commaund, nor knew how to obey. For he went to aſſaile P*ompey*, who had ouerthrowen him ſtraight, and was in the end taken priſoner. And yet in that inſtant of his calamitie, he hid not vſe himſelfe like a valiant minded man, and one worthy to rule: for, thinking to ſaue his life, hauing Sertorius letters and writings, he offered P*ompey* to deliuer him all Sertorius letters ſent him from the chiefeſt Senators of ROME, written with their owne handes, requeſting Sertorius to bring his armie into ITALIE, where he ſhould finde numbers of people deſirous of his comming, and that gaped ſtill for chaunge of gouernement. But here did P*ompey* ſhew himſelfe a graue and no young man, deliuering thereby the citie of ROME from great feare and daunger of chaunge and innouation. For he put all Sertorius letters and writings on a heape together, and burnt them euery one, without reading any of them, or ſuffering them to be red. And moreouer, he preſently put P*erpenna* to death, fearing he ſhould name ſome, which if they were named, would breed new occaſion of trouble & ſedition. And as for the other conſpirators, ſome of thē afterwards were brought to Pompey, who put them all to death: and the reſt of them fled into AFRICKB where they were all ouerthrowne by them of the countrie, and not a man of them ſcaped, but fell vnfortunately vpon the edge of the ſworde, Aufidius only except, Manlius companion in loue. Who, either becauſe he was not reckoned of, or elſe vnknowne, died an olde man in a pelting village of the barbarous people, poore, miſerable, and hated of all the world.

How Eumenes came to preferment by the kings of Macedon.

D*Vris* the Hiſtoriographer writeth, that Eumenes was borne in the city of CARDIA in THRACIA, being a cariers ſonne of the ſame country, (who for pouerty earned his liuing by carying marchandiſes too and fro) and that he was notwithſtanding honeſtly brought vp, aſwell at ſchoole, as at other comely exerciſes. And furthermore, how that he being but a boy, Phillip king of MACEDON chancing to come throgh the city of CARDIA, where hauing nothing to do, he tooke great pleaſure to ſee the young men of the citie handle their weapons, and boyes to wreſtle: and among them, Eumenes ſhewed ſuch actiuitie, & performed it with ſo good a grace withall, that Philip liked the boy well, and tooke him away with him. But ſure their report ſeemeth trueſt, which write that Philip did aduance him for the loue he bare to his father, in whoſe houſe he had lodged. After the death of Philip, Eumenes continued his ſeruice with king Alexander his ſonne, where he was thought as wiſe a man, and as faithfull to his maiſter, as any: and though he was called the Chancellor or chiefe ſecretary, yet the king did honor him as much as he did any other of his chiefeſt friends & familiars For he was ſent his Lieutenant generall of his whole army, againſt the INDIANS, and was Perdiccas ſucceſſor in the gouernement of his prouince, Perdiccas being preferred vnto Hephæſtions charge after his death. Nowe becauſe Neoptolemus (that was one of the chiefe Squiers for the body vnto the king) after the death of Alexander tolde the Lords of the councell of MACEDON, that he had ſerued the king with his ſhield and ſpeare, and how Eumenes had followed with his pen and paper: the Lordes laughed him to ſcorne, knowing that beſides many great honors Eumenes had receiued, the king eſteemed ſo well of him, that he did him the honor by mariage to make him his kinſman. For the firſt Lady that Alexander knew in ASIA, was Barſine Artabazus daughter, by whom he had a ſonne, & called his name Hercules: & of two of her ſiſters he maried the one of them called Apama vnto Ptolomye, & her other ſiſter alſo called Barſine, he beſtowed vpon Eumenes, when he diſtributed the PERSIAN ladies among his Lords and familiars to marrie them. Yet all this notwithſtanding, he often fell in diſgrace with king Alexander, and ſtood in ſome danger by means of Hephæſtion. For Hephæſtion following Alexanders courte on a time, hauing appointed Eurus a phiphe player a lodging, which Eumenes ſeruants had taken vp for their maiſter: Eumenes being in a rage, went with one Mentor vnto Alexander, crying out that a man were better be a phiphe & a commō plaier of Tragedies, then a ſouldier, ſithence ſuch kinde of people were preferred before men of ſeruice that ventured their liues in the warres. Alexander at that preſent time was as angrie as Eumenes, & roundly tooke vp Hephæſtion for it: howbeit immediatly after hauing changed his mind, he was much offended with Eumenes, becauſe he thought him not to haue vſed that francke ſpeech ſo much againſt Hephæſtion, as of a certaine preſumptuous boldneſſe towards himſelfe. And at an other time alſo, when Alexander was ſending Nearchus with his army by ſea to cleere the coaſts of the Ocean, it chanced the king was without money: whereupon he ſent to all his friends to take vp money in preſt, and among others, vnto Eumenes, of whom he requeſted three hundred talents. Eumenes lent him but a hundred, and ſaid he had much a doe to get him ſo much of all his tenants. Alexander ſaid nothing to him, neither would he ſuffer them to take his hundred talents: but commaunded his officers to ſet Eumenes tent a fire, becauſe he would take him tardy with a lie, before he could giue order to cary away his golde and ſiluer. Thus was his tent burnt downe to the ground, before they could make ſhift to ſaue any thing: the which Alexander repented afterwards, and was ſorie it was burnt, becauſe all his letters and writings were burnt withall. Howbeit, after the fire was quenched, they found in niggots of gold and ſiluer mingled together, aboue a thouſand talents, and yet Alexander tooke none of it away: but more then that, he ſent vnto all his Lieutenants, Captaines, and Gouernors of countries, whereſoeuer they were, that they ſhould ſend him copies of all the letters which they before had ſent vnto him, becauſe all thoſe which he had were burnt, and commanded Eumenes to take them againe. After that, Eumenes and Hephæſtion fell at variance againe, by reaſon of a gifte that was giuen him, inſomuch as very foule words paſſed betwixt Hephæſtion and him: yet did not the king giue Eumenes any ill countenance at that time. Notwithſtanding, ſhortly after Hephæſtion was dead, the king taking his death greeuouſly whom he loued ſo dearely, gaue no good countenance (and was very briefe beſides) vnto thoſe whom he knew bare any grudge to Hephæſtion whiles he liued, & that he thought were glad of his death, but ſpecially vnto Eumenes of all other, whoſe malice towards Hephæſtion was knowne to him well enough: inſomuch as he would oft twit him withall, remembring him of the iniuries he had offred Hephæſtion. But Eumenes being very wiſe, and one that could take his time, procured his helpe by the ſelfe ſame meane that did him hurte: and deuiſed (to further Alexanders deſire, ſeeking to honor Hephæſtions funerall with all pompe poſſible) new inuentions to ſet forth the ſame, of more magnificence then had before bene ſeene, ſparing for no coſt, laying on money bountifully, to make him a rich and ſtately tombe. Againe, when Alexander was dead, there fell out great variance betwixt the MACEDONIAN footmen, and the noble men that had bene neereſt about him: and in that quarrell, Eumenes in good will ſtucke to the Lords, but in words he ſeemed a newter and friend to both parts: ſaying, it was not for him being a ſtranger, to thruſt himſelfe into the quarrels of the MACEDONIANS. And when the other Lordes were departed from BABYLON, Eumenes tarying behinde pacified the greateſt part of the ſouldiers, and made them more tractable and ready to agree with the Lordes. Whereupon, after the Lordes and Captaines had conſulted together, and taken order for thoſe contentions, they deuided the gouernement of the prouinces among them which they called Satrapaes: in which partition Eumenes had CAPPADOCIA, PAPHLAGONIA, and all that coaſt vpon Mare Ponticum, vnto the city of TRAPEZVNTE, the which at that time was not ſubiect to the empire of MACEDON, for Ariarathes kept it then as king. Howbeit it was ſaid, that Leonatus and Antigonus would put him in poſſeſſion of it, with a great and puiſant armie. And make him Gouernour there. Yet afterwards Antigonus made none account of Perdiccas letters vnto him, putting him in the head of great imaginations to conquer all, deſpiſing all other. And Leonatus alſo came downe into PHRYGIA, and vndertooke the iorney of this conqueſt for Eumenes ſake. But when he was in iorney thitherwards, Hecatæus, tyrant of the CARDIANS, went to him to his army, & praied him rather to go helpe Antipater & the other MACEDONIANS, which were beſieged in the citie of LAMIA. So Leonatus, being willing to take ſea, and go thither, went about to perſuade Eumenes alſo to like of it, and to reconcile him with Hecatæus: for they were not friends one with another, by reaſon of a quarrell that Eumenes father had with this Hecatæus, about the gouernment of their citie. Beſides that, Eumenes had many times complained of him openly vnto king Alexander, ſaying, that he was a tyrant, and beſought the king that it would pleaſe him to ſet the CARDIANS at libertie. And therefore Eumenes refuſing that iourney againſt the GRECIANS, alleaging that he was afraide of Antipater, who had bene his enemy of long time, doubting that for the olde grudge he bare him, & alſo to gratifie Hecatæus, he would put him to death: Leonatus then reuealed himſelfe and his purpoſe to him, and how he made as though he would paſſe ouer the ſea to aide Antipater, where in deed his meaning was to take the kingdom of MACEDON. Thereupon he ſhewed him letters ſent him from Cleopatra, willing him to come to the citie of PELLA, and there ſhe would mary him. When Eumenes was made priuy to his purpoſe: either becauſe he feared Antipater, or els for that he had no great good opinion of Leonatus, knowing him to be a fonde man, and very raſhe and vnconſtant in his doings, he ſtale away from him by night, with thoſe few men he had (being about three hundred horſemen, and two hundred footmen well armed) taking all his golde with him, which amounted to the ſumme of fiue thouſand talents, and fled with them vnto Perdiccas, vnto whom he bewrayed all Leonatus intent and minde: whereupon he was immediatly of great credit about him, and called to counſell. Shortly after, Perdiccas brought him into CAPPADOCIA, with a great armie which he himſelfe did leade. Where Ariarathes was taken priſoner, and Eumenes eſtabliſhed Gouernour of the countrie, who deliuered the charge of the great cities vnto his friends, and left them there Captaines of garriſons which he appointed, placing euery where, Iudges, Receiuers, Gouernours, and all ſuch other officers neceſſarie as he thought meete, Perdiccas medling with nothing at all. Notwithſtanding, Eumenes went away with Perdiccas againe, as well to waite vpon him, as alſo becauſe he would euer be about the kings. But Perdiccas thinking with himſelf that he alone could wel enough performe the enterpriſe he went about, and conſidering alſo that the realme he left behinde him ſtood needfull of a wiſe and ſkilful Gouernor, whom he might truſt with the ſafety of his ſtate: when they were in CILICIA, returned Eumenes back againe, vnder colour to ſend him to his gouernment, but in deed to keepe the realme of ARMENIA in obedience, the which confined vpon the fronters of his countrie whereof he was Gouernor, becauſe Neoptolemus did vnder hand practiſe ſome alteration. Now though Neoptolemus was a proude and inſolent perſon, yet Eumenes ſtill deuiſed to hold him in, and kept him from attempts, by gentle and faire words. Furthermore, perceiuing alſo that the regiment of the MACEDONIAN footmen were growne exceeding ſtout & inſolent: he for a ſtrength & defence againſt them, ſet vp a company of horſmen, and to bring it to paſſe, releaſed all the countrymen from paying of tribute or taxe, being meete to ſerue a horſebacke, and bought a great number of horſe of ſeruice, which he gaue amongſt them that were about him, in which he put his moſt truſt and affiance, making them coragious, by honors and gifts he gaue to them that ſerued well, and ſo by continuall exerciſe and often remouing them from place to place, made them very ready and ſeruiceable. Thus were the noble men of MACEDON, ſome much amazed, ſome others very glad when they ſawe how by this diligence Eumenes had in ſo ſhort a time gotten about him ſuch a number, as ſix thouſand three hundred horſemen. About that time, Craterus and Antigonus hauing ſubdued the GRECIANS, came on with their army into ASIA to ouerthrowe Perdiccas greatneſſe and power: and newes alſo, that ſhortly they would inuade CAPPADOCIA. Wheruppon Perdiccas being otherwiſe occupied in warres, fighting againſt Ptolomey, made Eumenes his Lieutenant generall, and gaue him commiſſion and full authoritie ouer all his ſouldiers that were for him, either in CAPPADOCIA, or in ARMENIA: and wrote letters vnto Neoptolemus and Alcetas, commanding them by the ſame that they ſhould be obedient vnto Eumenes, and ſuffer him to order all matters according to his diſcretion. Nowe for Alcetas, he flatly anſwered, that he would not be at this warre: for the MACEDONIANS vnder his charge were aſhamed to take armes againſt Antipater, and moreouer they would not fight againſt Craterus, but contrarily were bent to receiue him for their Captaine, ſo much good will they bare him. Neoptolemus on the other ſide, was as ready to play the traitor, and to do Eumenes a ſhrewde turne, as Alcetas was. For being ſent for by Eumenes to come to him, where he ſhould haue obeyed him, he ſet his men in battell ray to fight with him. There did Eumenes reape the firſt fruite of his wiſe foreſight of the horſemen, which he had ſet vp to make head againſt the footmen of the MACEDONIANS. For when his owne footmen were broken and ouerthrowne, he ouercame Neoptolemus, and put him to flight with his horſmen, and tooke all his cariage. Then he made thē march in order of battell againſt the MACEDONIANS, who were diſperſed euery where, following the chaſe of his footmen, whom they had ouerthrowne. Thus cōming vpon them in this diſorder, he draue them to throwe away their weapons, and to yeelde vnto him: and moreouer, euery man to take his othe to ſerue him faithfully in this warre, whereſoeuer he would lead them. Now Neoptolemus gathering a few together that fled, went with them vnto Craterus and Antipater: who ſent vnto Eumenes to pray him to take their part, with condition that he ſhould not only enioy the countries and prouinces ſtill which he had in gouernment, but furthermore that they would giue him others vnto them, and make him ſtronger then euer he was: beſides that by the acceptation of the offer, he ſhould be taken for Antipaters good friend, where before he was euer reckoned his enemy. Whereunto Eumenes made aunſwer: that hauing alwaies bene Antipaters enemy, he could not of a ſodaine become his friend, ſpecially ſeeing him vſe his friends as enemies: howbeit otherwiſe that he was very willing to make Craterus peace with Perdiccas, and to reſtore him againe to his fauour, vpon reaſonable & indifferent conditions. And furthermore, that if he ment to aſſaile him, that then he would aide him ſo long as he had any breath in his bodie, and would loſe his life before he would breake his promiſe. This anſwer being brought vnto Antipater, they fell to conſult at leiſure what was to be done. In the meane ſpace, Neoptolemus that fled vpon his ouerthrowe, was come vnto them: who tolde them how the battell was fought, and beſought them both very inſtantly, (but Craterus chiefly) to giue him aide if it were poſſible. For the MACEDONIANS were ſo farre in loue with him, that if they did but ſee his hatte, and heare him ſpeake, they would all arme themſelues and follow him. For, to ſpeake a troth, Craterus was had in great eſtimation among the MACEDONIANS: inſomuch as after Alexanders death, he was more deſired of the common ſouldiers, than any other Captaine, remembring how often he had for their ſakes incurred Alexanders diſgrace and diſpleaſure, becauſe he went about to perſuade him to leaue the king of PERSIAES maner, whereunto Alexander by litle and litle gaue himſelfe: and alſo for that he maintained & defended the cuſtomes of the country of MACEDON, the which euery man through pride and exceſſe began to forſake and contemne. At that time therefore Craterus ſent Antipater into CILICIA, and he himſelfe with Neoptolemus, went againſt Eumenes with the beſt part of his army, hoping to take him tardy and altogether vnprouided, ſuppoſing he would giue himſelfe to pleaſure and paſtime, after ſo late a victorie. But Eumenes like a wiſe and vigilant Captaine had taken ſuch order, that he heard news time enough of his enemies comming, and had thereupon prepared his men in readineſſe to reſiſt him. Yet was not this the chiefeſt point of his ſkill in warre. For he looked ſo preciſely to his doings, that he did not onely keepe his enemies from knowledge of any thing that he did, but making his men alſo to kill Craterus in battell, before they knew againſt whom they ſhould fight, & to keepe alſo ſo dreadfull an enemie from their knowledge: that of all others ſhewed the paſſing ſkill of an expert Captaine. And to worke this feate the better, this was his policy. Firſt, he made a rumor to be ſpred in his hoaſt, how Neoptolemus & Pigres were againe come againſt him, with certaine horſemen of all ſortes gathered together, CAPPADOCIANS and PAPHLAGONIANS. And when he thought to haue remoued in the night, a great deſire of ſleepe came vpon him, in the which he had a maruellous ſtrange dreame. For it ſeemed vnto him that he ſaw two Alexanders preparing to fight one with an other, either of them leading a battell of footmen, ranged after the MACEDONIAN faſhion: who comming to giue charge the one vpon the other, came the goddeſſe Minerua to aide the one, and Ceres likewiſe to aide the other. Then him thought that after they had fought a long time together, he whom Minerua aided was ouerthrowne, and that Ceres had gathered eares of corne and made a crowne of them, to giue him that had wonne the field. Hereupon Eumenes perſuaded himſelfe that this dreame made for him, and promiſed him victorie, for that he fought for a fertile countrie of corne, where was great plenty of it. For all the fields were ſowne with corne in euery place, that it was a pleaſure to behold it, ſhewing the benefit of long peace, to ſee all the corne fieldes how greene they looked. But when he vnderſtood that the enemies had giuen their ſouldiers for the ſignall of battell, Minerua and Alexander: then was his firſt imagination confirmed more then before. Whereupon, he gaue Ceres and Alexander for ſignall of the battell to his ſouldiers, and commaunded euery man to make them a garland of wheate eares to weare on their heads, and that they ſhould wreath flowers and noſegayes about their pikes. He was in a minde many times to make his truſtieſt Captaines priuie againſt whome they ſhould fight, and not alone to truſt himſelfe withall, to keepe ſo neceſſary a thing as that ſecret: yet in fine, he kept his firſt reſolution, thinking it the ſafeſt way, not to commit this danger, but to himſelfe. Now when he came to giue battell, he would place neuer a MACEDONIAN directly againſt Craterus, but ſet two companies of men of armes that were ſtrangers againſt him, the which Pharnabazus (Artabazus ſonne) and Phœnix Tenidian did lead. Then he ſpecially commanded, that ſo ſoone as they ſawe the enemies before them, they ſhould ſtraight giue charge, giuing them no leaſure to ſpeake nor retire, neither to hearken to any Heraulde or trumpet that they ſhould ſend vnto them: for he feared much that the MACEDONIANS would turne againſt him, if they once came to know Craterus. Now for himſelfe, he led the right wing of his battell, with a troope of three hundred men at armes, the chiefeſt men of all his armie, where he ſhould meete full with Neoptolemus fronte. When they had paſſed a litle hill that ſtood betweene both battels, Eumenes horſemen following his commandement, ranne with full cariere to ſet vpon their enemies. Craterus ſeeing that, was amazed withall, and banned and curſed Neoptolemus that had deceiued him in that ſorte, informing him that the MACEDONIANS would turne of his ſide, if they might but once ſee him: notwithſtanding, he praied them that were about him, to ſhew themſelues like valiant men that day, and therewithall fiercely ſet ſpurres to his horſe to meete with his enemies. The encounter was very cruell on either ſide, and their ſtaues being broken, they fell ſtraight to their ſwords: but that day did not Craterus diſhonor the memory of Alexander, for he ſlue many of his enemies round about him, valiantly repulſed them that did aſſaile him, and many times ouerthrew them. Yet in fine one of the men of armes of THRACIA gaue him ſuch a blowe on the ſide, that he turned him off his horſe, and when he was downe, many paſſed ouer him. But Gorgyas, one of Eumenes Captaines knowing him, lighted from his horſe, and appointed men about him to guarde him: howbeit it was too late, for he was drawing on, and euen in the very pangs of death. Eumenes and Neoptolemus on the other ſide, which had bene mortall enemies of long time, being a fire with an old malice, they ſought vp & downe the one for the other. So at the two firſt courſes they could not one light vpon the other, but at the third meeting, when they knew one an other, then they ſet ſpurres to their horſes, their ſwords drawne, and with great cries gaue charge vpon each other. And their horſes met ſo fiercely together, as if two armed gallies had met with their prowes: and both the Captaines laying the bridles in their horſe necks, cloſed together, and with both hands ſtriued to plucke off each others headpeece, and to rent their polrons from their ſhoulders. Whileſt they were thus tearing each other, their horſes ran from them, and they fell to the ground, one holding the other faſt as if they had wreſtled together. Neoptolemus got vp firſt: but as he roſe, Eumenes cut the hamme of his legge, and raiſed him ſelfe vp withall. Neoptolemus ſtaying himſelfe vpon one knee, his other legge being very ſore hurt, defended himſelfe on the ground the beſt he could, from Eumenes that was on his feete, but he could giue him no deadly wound: neuertheleſſe himſelfe had a blow on the necke, that laide him flat on the grounde. Then Eumenes inflamed with choller againſt him, went about to ſtrippe him, and fell a reuiling of him, and being in that furious moode, remem-

bred not that Neoptolemus had his ſword yet, who hurt him vnder his curaces, euen about his groine, not farre from his priuie partes: howbeit the wounde made Eumenes worſe afraide, then there was cauſe of hurt, for that Neoptolemus ſtrength was gone before the ſtroke came, dying preſently vpon it. Eumenes hauing ſtripped him found himſelfe very ill, (by reaſon of his wounds) on his armes and legs, which had many a ſore gaſhe: notwithſtanding, he got vp on his horſe againe, and rode towards the other wing of his battell, thinking his enemies had bene fighting ſtill. But there being tolde that Craterus had his deaths wound, he went ſtraight to the place where he lay, and found him yet aliue, not paſt knowledge. Then Eumenes lighted from his horſe, and wept, and taking him by the right hand, accurſed Neoptolemus that had brought him to that pittifull ſtate, and had alſo forced him to be in battell againſt one of his deereſt friends, to make him the inſtrument of his vtter vndoing. This ſecond battell Eumenes wanne ten dayes after the firſt battell obtained, which got him great honour, for that he had diſcomfited one of his enemies through wiſedome, and the other by valiantneſſe. But yet this bred him much ill will, not onely of his enemies, but of his friends alſo that tooke his parte, when they bethought them, that he being a ſtranger, had with the weapons and power of the MACEDONIANS themſelues, ſlaine the greateſt and moſt famous Captaine among them. Now if Perdiccas had bene ſo happie, as to haue liued and receiued the aduertiſement of Craterus death: no doubt he had bin the greateſt perſon of all the MACEDONIANS. But as ill luck would haue it, within two dayes after that Perdiccas was ſlaine in a mutinie of his men in EGYPT, newes came to his army of Eumenes victorie, and alſo of the death of Craterus. Wherevpon the MACEDONIANS were ſo offended with Eumenes, that incontinently they condemned him to die, & gaue Antigonus and Antipater commiſſion to execute the reuenge. When Eumenes paſſing by mount Ida (where the king kept a race and breed of horſes) had takẽ away with him as many horſes as he would, and had ſent letters of aduertiſement thereof to the kings riders: Antipater, as it is reported, ſmiled, and in mockerie ſaid, that he maruelled to ſee Eumenes great care, to thinke that he ſhould either giue or receiue any account of the kings goods. So Eumenes thought good to fight in the great plaines of LYDIA, eſpecially neere vnto the chiefe citie of SARDIS, becauſe he was the ſtronger in horſemen, and for that he would make Cleopatra ſee the power of his armie. Howbeit, being intreated by her (who feared blame of Antipater) he went further into high PHRYGIA, and wintered in the citie of CELÆNES. But there Polemon, Alcetas, and Docimus, fell in contention with him for leading of the army, ſaying, that they had as much right to leade the armie as he. Eumenes anſwered them, truly here is euen the common ſaying vp and downe: deſperate men regard no danger. Now Eumenes hauing promiſed his ſoldiers pay within three daies, to keep his promiſe, ſold them all the farmes and caſtels of that country, together with the men and beaſts of the ſame, whereof the prouince was fully repleniſhed. Thereupon his Lieutenants of the bands hauing bought certaine of them, went and tooke them perforce, through Eumenes engines of batterie which he ſuffered them to cary with him: and hauing taken them, they went and deuided the ſpoile, paying euery ſouldier ratably his wages due. This deuiſe brought him againe in fauour among his ſouldiers. For certaine papers being found in his campe caſt abroade by his enemies, promiſing great offices, and a hundred talents beſides to any man that killed Eumenes: the MACEDONIANS that ſerued vnder him were ſo offended withall, that they preſently ſet downe an order, that from that time forward a thouſand of the beſt ſouldiers among them (which alſo had charge vnder them) ſhould alwaies garde his perſon, keeping watche euery night about him, as fell out by turnes one after another. Whereunto they all agreed: and Eumenes gaue them thoſe honors and rewards, which the kings of MACEDON were wonte to giue vnto their friends, and which they gladly receiued. For through their graunt he had authoritie to giue purple clokes and hats to whome he thought good, which was the honourableſt gift the king of MACEDON could giue. It is true that proſperitie maketh ſimple men high minded, whereby they ſeeme (though they be not) very honorable, but ſpecially when fortune hath raiſed them to honor & wealth. But indeed he that is of a noble minde and ſtout courage is beſt diſcerned in aduerſitie: for he neuer yeeldeth to any troubles, as appeareth by Eumenes. For whẽ he had loſt a battell among the ORCYNIANS, in the realme of CAPPADOCIA,

CIA, through the treaſon of one of his ſouldiers: he being purſued, yet neuer gaue the traitour any leyſure to flie to his enemies for ſafety, but tooke him and truſſed him vp. And after he had fled for a time, he turned his horſe head vpon a ſodaine, and leauing his enemies ſide hand of him that had him in chaſe, he cloſely ſtale by them without their knowledge, and held on iornying ſo long, vntill he came to the ſelfe ſame plaine, where the battell was fought. There he camped, and gathering vp the dead bodies, (the Captaines by them ſelues, and the ſouldiers apart) he burnt them with the dores, gates, & windowes of all the villages and townes thereabouts that he could get together: and in ſtead of tombes for them, he raiſed vp great heapes of earth. Inſomuch as Antigonus comming thither immediatly after, he wondred much at his valiantneſſe and inuincible courage. Remouing thence, he met with Antigonus cariage, and might eaſily without danger haue taken a number of priſoners, as well free as bond, and haue gotten all the riches and treaſure which they had ſpoiled in ſo many ſundry wars, townes, and countries: howbeit he was afraied that if his ſouldiers were loden with that ſpoile, it would make them more heauy to march, and vnable to flie, but ſpecially more tender to abide to run from place to place a long time together, being the only meane wherein he truſted to come to end this war. For he made account that Antigonus in the end would be weary in following him ſo long a time, and therfore that he would turne ſome other way. Moreouer he perceiued that it was vnpoſſible for him by his authority to keepe the MACEDONIANS from taking ſo rich a prey, as offered it ſelfe vnto them: whereupon he commanded them to ſtay a while, and baite their horſe firſt, and then that they ſhould go ſtraight to ſpoile the enemies cariage. But in the meane time he ſecretly ſent a meſſenger to Menander (who had the charge and conduct of all the cariage) to will him to flie with all ſpeede out of the plaine, and to get him to the hanging of a hill not far from thence, and ſafe from horſmen, where they could not be enuironned, and there to fortifie him ſelfe: ſending him word alſo, that he ſent him this aduertiſement, for the old friendſhip and acquaintaunce that had bene betweene them afore. Menander hearing what danger he was in, made his men truſſe vp their cariage ſtraight. Thereupon Eumenes openly ſent certaine light armed men to diſcouer, and to bring him news: and therwithall commanded them to arme, and bridle their horſes, as if he had ment to haue led them againſt the enemies. His skouts were now returned, and told him that it was vnpoſſible either to diſtreſſe or take Menander, for that he was fled into a place of ſuch ſtrength, & therefore he was not to be come by. Eumenes ſeemed to be very ſory for it, howbeit he led his army from thence notwithſtanding. Menander afterwardes reported this matter to Antigonus, & the MACEDONIANS that were in his army, who did greatly commend Eumenes, & after that loued him better then euer they did before: becauſe that hauing their childrẽ in his hands whom he might haue made ſlaues, and their wiues alſo whom he might haue defiled, he ſpared them all. Howbeit Antigonus to put them out of this humor, told them, ye are deceiued, my friends: for it was not for your ſakes, nor yet to pleaſure you, that Eumenes tooke not your wiues, your children, and your goods, but only for the feare he had to haue ſhackles on his heeles, to let him from ſpeedy flying. So Eumenes departing from thence, fled ſtil before Antigonus, & wandring vp & down, did him ſelfe wiſh his ſouldiers to get them ſomewhere elſe: either in deed for that he was careful of them, or for that he was vnwilling to haue ſuch a number about him, being too few to fight a battel, and too many to hide his flying. In fine, he went to a ſtrong place of ſituation called Nora, in the confines of LYCAONIA and CAPPADOCIA, with fiue hundred horſmen, and two hũdred footmẽ well armed. And when he was come thither alſo, he gaue euery one leaue to depart that asked him licence, becauſe they could not haue abiddẽ the diſcommodity of the place, which was very ſtraight, and the lacke of neceſſary victuals which they muſt needs haue wanted, if the ſiege did continue long: and thus departed from them with very good wordes and louing countenance. Shortly after came Antigonus before the fort, but would not beſiege it, before he ſent for Eumenes to come to him vpon his word. Eumenes anſwered him, that Antigonus had many of his friends about him, that after him might come to be the heades of his tribe, and that him ſelfe on the other ſide had not a noble man for whom he fought. And therfore if Antigonus would haue him come and ſpeake with him, that he ſhould ſend him one of his chiefeſt frends in hoſtage. Againe, Antigonus being earneſt with him, & telling him it was

reaſon he ſhould come to him, for that he was the better man, and of greater power: Eumenes aunſwered him, I will acknowledge none better then my ſelfe, ſo long as I can hold my ſword in my hand. In the end, Antigonus (according to Eumenes requeſt) ſent his owne nephew Ptolomy into the fort, and then came Eumenes out. At their meeting they both embraced and ſaluted each other, as friendes of old acquaintance and familiarity: and ſo fell in talke of diuerſe matters: but all this while Eumenes neuer once made requeſt to depart in ſafety, neither yet demaunded pardon, but only deſired the confirmation of his charge and gouernment, and that he might be reſtored to that which was giuen him. They that were preſent at their meeting maruelled much at Eumenes, & greatly commended his ſtoutnes. Now whileſt they were thus in talke together, the MACEDONIANS came out of all partes of the campe, to ſee what maner of man Eumenes was: becauſe that after the death of Craterus there was no talke among the MACEDONIAN ſouldiers, of any Captaine, but of Eumenes. Neuertheleſſe, Antigonus fearing they would doe Eumenes ſome miſchiefe, commaunded them aloude to giue backe, and made ſtones to be throwen among them to keepe them off him. All this notwithſtanding he was faine in the end to put them off with his gard, and to take Eumenes in his armes, and had much a doe to deliuer him ſafely into his fort againe. After this imparlance, Antigonus compaſſed this fort of Nora round about with a wall, and left a ſufficient number of men to continue the ſiege, and ſo went his way with the reſt of his army. In the meane time Eumenes remained beſieged within this fort, where there was plenty of wheate, water, and ſalt, but of no other thing that was good to eate, nor ſweete of taſt, to ſuſtain them with their bread. Yet with ſuch as he had, he kept them in good liking that were in houſe with him. For he made them euery one after an other ſit at his bourd with him, and withall did faſhion out that manner of diet, with a certaine life and familiarity of pleaſaunt deuiſes to entertaine them at their meate. For beſides that he ſought to ſhew them as pleaſaunt a countenaunce as he could, yet naturally he had a ſweete faire face, not looking like a man of warre, that all the dayes of his life had bene trained vp in it: but like a freſh youth, being of ſuch a conſtitution of body, that the excellenteſt workeman that euer was could not better ſet out all the partes and proportion of a man, then were naturally to be ſeene in him. His ſpeach was not harſh nor churliſh, but very milde, and pleaſant, as appeareth by the letters he wrote. Now for the ſiege, there was nothing that more annoyed the beſieged, then the narrowneſſe of the fort wherein they were, which was not aboue two furlongs compaſſe about, and their houſes ſo litle and narrow, that they could ſcant turne them in them: and did eate and drinke without any manner of exerciſe for themſelues, or their horſe. Now Eumenes to take away the ſluggiſhneſſe that groweth by idleneſſe, a thing moſt hurtfull to them that are acquainted with trauell and paines) to keepe them in breath, and to make them the lighter to flie, if occaſion were offred: put his men into the longeſt and wideſt hall he had in his houſe, (being fourteene cubites long to wake vp and downe in) and taught them firſt of all to march fair and ſoftly, and then by litle and litle to haſten their pace. For the horſes he had, them he made to be girt before, one after an other, and then did ſoftly triſe them vp with long pulleyes faſtned to the beames: their hindmoſt feete ſtanding on the groũd, and their formoſt being aloft. The horſes being triſed vp in this maner, their riders came with loude cries behind them, and ſome with whippes in their handes to laſh them, that the horſe being mad withall, yerked out behinde, and ſprang forward with his formoſt legges to touch the ground, that they did but euen raſe it a litle, ſo as euery vaine and ſinew of them were ſtrained by this meanes, that they blue, and were all of a fome withall, ſo good an exerciſe to them it was, as well to put them in breath, as to keepe their legges ſupple to run. After that, they had their oats very cleane pickt and dreſſed, that they might digeſt them the ſooner. Antigonus hauing long continued this ſiege, newes came vnto him that Antipater was dead in MACEDON, and that the realme was in a great broile, through the factions of Caſſander & Polyperchon. Antigonus, whoſe head was ſtraight ful of great imaginatiõs, greedily coueting with him ſelfe the whole kingdome of MACEDON, thought good to make Eumenes his friend, that through his helpe he might attaine his deſired purpoſe. Thereupon he ſent Hyeronymus vnto him to treate of peace, and gaue him the forme of the othe which he would haue him ſweare vnto him. When Eumenes had ſeene it, he would not be ſworne in that maner, but corrected it

& ſayed: that he did refer himſelfe to the iudgment of the Macedonians which kept him beſieged, to iudge which of thoſe two formes was moſt meeteſt: that which Antigonus had ſent him, or the ſame which he had corrected. For in Antigonus forme of oth, there was a litle mention onely made at the beginning of the blood royall, but in all the reſt following, he bound Eumenes particularly to himſelfe. But Eumenes in his forme of oth, did firſt of all put Olympias the mother of king Alexander, and the kings his ſonnes afterwardes: and for the reſt, he ſware he would be friend of the friendes, and enemie of the enemies not of Antigonus onely, but of the kings, and of Olympias. The Macedonians being at the ſiege before Nora, did better like the forme of Eumenes oth, than they did that of Antigonus. So hauing giuen Eumenes his oth, & made him ſweare according to that forme: they raiſed their ſiege, and ſent alſo vnto Antigonus to take his oth. All this accompliſhed, Eumenes redeliuered the Cappadocians their hoſtages, (which he had kept in Nora with him) and they that came for them, gaue him in their ſteade, horſe of warre, beaſtes of cariage, tentes and pauilions. Thus he beganne to gather his men againe together, which were diſperſed abroade after his ouerthrowe, ſo that in few dayes he was aboue a thouſand horſmen, with whom he fledde, fearing yet Antigonus, and he did wiſely. For Antigonus had not onely commaunded them to ſhutte him vp againe ſtraighter then he was before: but beſides that wrote ſharpe letters and very angrily vnto the Macedonians, which had accepted the correction of the oth. Whileſt Eumenes wandred vp & downe flying ſtill, he receiued letters from certaine in Macedonia (fearing Antigonus greatneſſe) and ſpecially from Olympias: which ſent vnto him to come into Macedon, to take the charge and gouernment of her young ſonne Alexander, whom they ſought to put to death. Furthermore, he likewiſe receiued letters from Polyperchon and from king Philippe, who commanded him to make war with Antigonus with his armie he had in Cappadocia, and to put in his purſe of the kings fiue hundreth ſiluer talentes (which had bene taken from him before) which were in the citie of Cyndes, and beſides, to defraye the charges of the warres, as much as he thought meete. And therewithall alſo they wrote vnto Antigenes and Teutamus, the two Captaines of the Argyraſpides: to wit, the ſouldiers with the ſiluer ſhieldes, or ſhieldes ſiluered, which were of the olde bandes of Alexanders armie. Theſe two Captaines hauing receiued theſe letters, did vſe Eumenes with very good wordes, and ſhewed him great countenance: yet a man by their lookes might eaſily coniecture that they enuied him, for either of them both thought themſelues men ſufficient, and worthy to commaunde Eumenes, not to aide him. Howbeit Eumenes behaued himſelfe very wiſely. For as touching their enuie, he pacified that, becauſe he tooke not the money which he was cõmaunded to take for his owne vſe, for that he had no need of it. And as for their ambition and preſumption, diſdaining to be commaunded by him, though they could neither tell howe to commaunde nor obey: he did reclaime them, by a ſuperſtition he layed before them, which was this. He made them beleeue that Alexander did appeare to him in his ſleepe, and that he ſhewed him a pauilion ſumptuouſly ſette out in the ſtate and magnificence of a king, in the which was a royall throne: and tolde him, that if they would keepe their councell place in that pauilion, he would be preſent among them, and ayde them in all their councels and conductes of their warres, ſo that they would alwaies begin by him. He eaſily perſwaded Antigenes and Teutamus to beleue that which he ſpake, who would not goe to him to conſult of any matters: neither did he thinke it honorable for himſelfe to be ſeene to go to other mens gates. Wherefore with all their conſents they incontinently ſet vp a goodly rich pauilion, which was called Alexanders pauilion: and there they kept their coũcels and aſſemblies for diſpatch of all their weightieſt cauſes. After this, they went towardes the hie countries and met with Peuceſtas on the way, (Eumenes very great frend) who ioyned with them, and other great peeres of the realme, with all their power beſides. This did greatly ſtrengthen the armie of the noblemen of Macedonia, as touching the number of men, and their braue armors and furniture: but for their owne perſons, becauſe they had no man to commaund them ſince the death of Alexander, they were growen ſelfe willed by diſſolute libertie, and effeminate in their manner of life: and moreouer they had gotten a tirannicall fierceneſſe, nouriſhed & increaſed by the vanities of the barbarous people. So that many of them being then together, could not be quiet one with an other, but ſhamefully flattered the olde bands of the MACEDONIAN ſouldiers, giuing them money, and making them banquets and feaſtes of ſacrifices. And thus in ſhort time, of a campe they brought it to be a diſſolute tauerne, where the noble men got the ſouldiers fauour that they might be choſen chieftaines of all the army: like as the common peoples voyces are bought in free cities (where the people doe rule) to be preferred to honourable ſtates and offices of the common wealth. Now Eumenes found ſtraight that theſe peeres of the realme diſdained one an other, howbeit that they all feared and miſtruſted him, and ſought but for oportunity to kill him. Wherfore to preuent this, he made as though he had occaſion to occupy money, and ſo borrowed a great ſumme of them ſpecially, whom he knew moſt hated him: to the end that from thenceforth they ſhould no more diſtruſt, but truſt him, ſtanding in feare to loſe the money they had lent him. And thereof followed a ſtraunge thing: for other mens money and goods, was the ſafety of his life. For where others giue money to ſaue their liues, he by taking of money ſaued his owne life. Now for the ſouldiers of the MACEDONIANS, whileſt they ſaw they were without daunger of enemies to make them afraied, they ſtill hung vpon them that gaue them, being deſirous to be made Generalles: and came euery morning to their vpriſing to waite vpon them, and follow them whereſoeuer they went. But when Antigonus was come to camp hard by them with a great and puiſant army, and that their caſe required then a valiant Captaine and skilfull leader: not the ſouldiers alone, but all the peeres and ſtates beſides, (which in peace did braue it out) did then willingly (without motion made) ſubmit them ſelues vnto Eumenes, to be at his commaundement. For when Antigonus aſſaied all the wayes he could to paſſe ouer the riuer of Paſitigris, the peeres which were layed in diuers places to let him from paſſing ouer, heard nothing of it, ſo that there was none but Eumenes onely that reſiſted him, and fought with him: where he ſlew ſuch a number of his men, that he filled the riuer with them, and tooke foure thouſand of them priſoners. Againe, when Eumenes was ſicke, theſe olde bandes did more plainely ſhew what opinion they had of him, and of others: to wit, that they could banquet them, and make them good cheare at their houſes, yet that Eumenes onely of all other was worthieſt to be their Captaine, and to commaund them. For Peuceſtas hauing feaſted them in the kingdom of PERSIA, & giuen euery ſouldier a mutton to ſacrifice, thought he had won great fauor and credit among them. But ſhortly after, as the army marched againſt their enemies, Eumenes by misfortune fell dangerouſly ſicke, and therfore would needes be caried in a litter farre from the campe, to be out of the noiſe, becauſe he could take no reſt. But they had not gone farre, before they ſaw their enemies, which hauing paſſed ouer certaine litle hils betweene them, were comming downe into the valley. When the ſouldiers ſaw the gliſtering of the gilt armors of their enemies, that glared in the ſunne, and the good order they marched withall in battell ray, the Elephantes with the towers vpon their backs, and the men at armes with their purple coates vpon their armors: (which was the apparell they wore when they went to fight with their enemies) then the foremoſt ſtaied vpon it, and cried out, willing them to ſend for Eumenes to leade them, for they would elſe go no further if they had not him for their Generall. And therewithall they raiſed their pikes, and laid downe their ſhields at their feete, calling from one to another to ſtay, and to their priuate Captaines alſo: and tolde them plainly, that they would not ſturre a foote from thence, nor fight at all, vnleſſe Eumenes were among them to lead them. Eumenes hearing of it, came to them with great ſpeede, haſtening his ſlaues and littermen to bring him thither: and then opening his litter on euery ſide, he held out his right hand to the ſouldiers, and tolde them he was very glad of the good opinion they had of him. The ſouldiers alſo ſo ſoone as they ſawe him, ſaluted him in the MACEDONIAN tongue, and tooke vp their ſhields, clapping them againſt their pikes with a great ſhoute, bidding their enemies come when they would, they ſhould be fought withall, now that their Captaine was among them. Antigonus on the other ſide, being informed by certaine priſoners which his ſouldiers had taken in skirmiſh, that Eumenes was fallen very ſore ſicke, and by reaſon thereof was caried in a litter: thought nowe he ſhould haue no great a do to diſcomfit the reſt of the army, and therefore made all poſſible ſpeede he could to fight. But when he came ſo neere, that he might eaſily ſee the order and countenance of his enemies, who were ſet in ſuch good order of battell, that it could not any wayes be amended: he was much amaſed withall, and pawſed a great while, and in the meane time ſpied Eumenes litter a farre off, caried from one end of the battell to the other, whereat he laughed out aloude, as his manner was, and turning him ſelfe to his friends, ſayd. See, ſayd he, I beleeue it is that litter that maketh warre with vs, and doth offer vs battell. But with thoſe wordes, he ſounded the retreat, and brought his men backe againe into his campe. When this feare was a litle paſſed ouer, the MACEDONIANS fell to their old trade againe, the peeres to flatter the ſouldiers, and the ſouldiers to waxe braue and ſtoute againſt their Captaines: ſo that when they came to take their garriſons for the winter time, they deuided in maner among them the whole country of the GABENIANS, the firſt from the laſt being lodged almoſt a thouſand furlongs off. Which Antigonus vnderſtanding, determined to ſet vpon them, they miſtruſting nothing. And ſo went ſodainely towardes them, by a ſhorter way then that he had already come, but the worſer way a great deale, and where no water was to be had: in hope that if hee met them thus diſperſed a ſunder, their Captaines could not readily aſſemble them all together. But while he was in this his iourney, in the deſert crooked way, he was ſo ouertaken, and with ſuch boiſterous windes and extreame bitter cold, that his ſouldiers could go no further, but were forced to tary ſtil, to prouide them preſent remedy againſt the fury of the time. Now the onely remedy they had, was to make numbers of fires: and by them their enemies knew of their comming. For the barbarous people inhabiting the mountaines, towardes the deſert, being amaſed to ſee ſuch a number of fires in the valley, ſent preſently with ſpeede vppon two camels light loden, to aduertiſe Peuceſtas, who being neareſt vnto the mountaines was ſo ſcared with theſe newes, that he was at his wittes end, not knowing what to do. For, ſeeing his other companions as much afraied as him ſelfe, he fled vpon it, and caried all them with him which he met in his way. But Eumenes quieted this great feare, aſſuring them that he would ſtay the ſodaine attempt of their enemies, and that they ſhould come three daies later then they looked for: which they beleeued. Then did Eumenes ſend meſſengers into euery quarter to all the Captaines, commaunding them ſpeedily to put their men in readineſſe, and to meete him at a certaine place which he appointed. Him ſelfe in the meane time went with other Captaines to chooſe a fitte ground to lodge a campe, the which might eaſily be ſeene from the toppe of the mountaines, which they muſt paſſe that come from the deſert: and there fortified the ſame with trenches, and deuided it out into quarters, making fire in euery place, ſuch a diſtance off one from an other, as they vſe commonly to make in a campe. It was no ſooner done, but Antigonus came to the toppe of the mountaines, and ſaw theſe fires a farre off, which grieued him much: for he thought that his enemies had long before knowen of his comming, and that they came againſt him. Being afrayd therefore leaſt his enemies would compell him to fight, comming freſh vppon him, his owne men being weary and done with the paines they had abidden, comming through that deſert countrey: hee tooke his way to lead backe his army, not the neareſt way by the which he came, but through the country richly inhabited and repleniſhed with great cities and good townes, to refreſh his ouer-wearied people. Yet ſeeing he had none alaroms giuen, nor any skirmiſhes offered him, (as they vſe commonly when both armies are neare together) and that the valley men told him that they had ſeene none other army but his, ſauing that round about there was ſtore of fires: then he ſtraight miſtruſted that it was one of Eumenes ſtrategemes of warre, wherewith he had deceiued him. And therewithall he was in ſuch a rage, that he went ſtraight to the place where he thought to finde him, determining no more to ſteale vpon him, but to put all to the hazard of a battell. But in the meane time, the moſt part of the hoaſt was gathered about Eumenes, for the great eſtimation euery man had of his wiſdome and ſufficiency: inſomuch that they agreed and ordained, that he onely as their Lieutenant generall ſhould commaund the whole army. This ſpited the two Captains of the Argyraſpides, Antigenes & Teutamus, who bare him ſuch an inward grudge, that from that time forth, they practiſed his death: and aſſembling together with many of the ſtates & particular Captains, they ſat in councell to know when, & in what ſort they ſhould kill him. Howbeit the moſt voices aſſembled in this councell, were whole of opinion, that they ſhuld take the benefit of his ſeruice in leading the battell, & that immediatly after they ſhould put him to death. This being thus reſolued vpon, Eudamus Captaine of the Elephants, and an other called Phadimus, went ſecretly and told Eumenes what they had concluded vpon in the aſſembly againſt him, not for any good will that they bare him, or for that they ſought to pleaſure him, but onely becauſe they were afraied to looſe the money they had lent him. Eumenes gaue them great thankes, and commended their fidelity, and then reported it vnto his beſt friends, and told them: you ſee how I am enuironned with a troupe of wilde and brutiſh beaſtes. That done, he made his will, and tare all the letters and writings that had bene ſent him, becauſe he would not haue them ſuffer for him after his death, that had ſent him ſecret aduertiſements. Afterwardes when he had diſpoſed of all his priuate matters in this ſort, he ſtoode in a doubt whether hee ſhould loſe the battell giuing his enemies the victory, or whether it were better for him to flie into CAPPADÓCIA, through MEDIA and ARMENIA. Howbeit he reſolued of nothing before his friendes. But when the miſchiefe he was in had put diuers thoughts into his head, in fine he determined to fight, and did ſet his army in battell ray, perſwading the GRECIANS as well as the barbarous people to ſtand to it like men. And as for the old ſouldiers of the MACEDONIANS, they ſo litle needed exhortation, that they them ſelues did exhort Eumenes to be of good corage, ſaying; that their enemies would neuer abide them, becauſe they were all the oldeſt ſouldiers, and of greateſt experience, that had bene in all the conqueſtes of king Philippe, and of his ſonne Alexander, and that it was neuer heard that they had bene ouerthrowen in any ſette battell, the moſt of them being three ſcore and tenne yeares olde, and the youngeſt no leſſe then three ſcore. Whereupon, when they ranne with great fury to giue charge vpon their enemies, they cried out aloude ſpeaking to the ſouldiers of the MACEDONIANS that were vnder Antigonus: Ah wretches, come ye to fight with your fathers? And ſo aſſailing them with a luſty courage, and in a rage withall, in a ſhort ſpace ouerthrew the ſquadron of their enemies, and ſlue the moſt part of them in the field. Thus was Antigonus army cleane ouerthrowen on that ſide: but on the other ſide where his men of armes were, through Peuceſtas cowardlineſſe (that handled himſelfe very ill at that battell) he had the vpper hand, and wanne all their cariage, through his foreſight in the greateſt fury of the battell, and the ſtrength of the place where the battell was fought. For it was a maruellous great plaine of length, neither too deepe, nor yet too hard vnder foote, but couered ouer with a ſmall fine ſand, much like to the drie ſand the ſea caſteth vp, and leaueth vpon the ſhore. This ſand being ſcattered abroad by riding and going to and fro of ſo many thouſands of men and horſes during the time of the battell foughten, had raiſed ſuch a mighty duſt and white ſmoke in the element, as if they had ſturred or tempered white lime together, which troubled their ſight ſo ſore, as they could ſee nothing before them: in reſpect whereof Antigonus might eaſily ſeaze all their cariage, them ſelues being neuer a whit the wiſer. The battell being come to this paſſe you haue heard, Teutamus ſent preſently vnto Antigonus, to pray him to redeliuer them their cariage again, which he had taken and caried into his campe. Antigonus made him aunſwere, that he would not onely redeliuer the goodes vnto the ARGYRASPIDES, but would moreouer vſe them with all the fauor he could, ſo farre foorth as they deliuered Eumenes into his hands. Whereupon the ARGYRASPIDES tooke preſently a wicked reſolution, to deliuer him aliue into the handes of his enemies. And with that determination they came neare vnto him, not making any countenaunce as though they would lay handes on him, but rather ſeeming to guard and defend his perſon as their manner was: ſome of them lamēting that their goods were gone: others telling him that he cared not now that he had wonne the battell: and others accuſing the noble men of cowardlines, ſaying, that the fault was in them that they had not the whole victory. But in fine, one of thē hauing ſpied his time, flew to him, and tooke his ſword out of his hand: the others ſtraight layed hold of him, and bound both his hands behinde him with his owne girdle. Antigonus vnderſtanding it, ſent Nicanor thither to take him out of their handes, and to bring him to him. Then Eumenes hauing made requeſt vnto them to ſuffer him to ſpeake, as they brought him through the bandes of theſe old MACEDONIAN ſouldiers: it was graunted him with condition, that he ſhould make no motion vnto them to turne from that they were determinated to doe, but to tell them of things, which (as he ſayd) tended greatly to their benefite. Whereuppon ſilence being made, he got vp vpon a litle hillocke, and there ſpake vnto them, putting forth his hands being bound. O wretched and faithleſſe men, the wickedeſt that euer MACEDON bred. What ſo great triumph or victorie, hath euer Antigonus wonne of you, hauing ſought it ſuch infinite waies: as you your ſelues doe now put into his handes, deliuering him your Captaine bound and manacled? Will not this be to your great ſhame, that being maſters of the fielde, you will grant the honor of the victory vnto your enemy, only for a litle couetouſnes of money and paltry ſtuffe which you haue loſt? And yet is not this all, but the worſt behinde: to ſend your Captaine as you do to pay the ranſome of your baggage. For my ſelfe, though now they leade me bound, yet do I remaine free vnouercome, vanquiſher of mine enemies, & ſold by them that ſhould be my friends. Well, yet this requeſt I only make vnto you, in the name of Iupiter, protector of armes, and for the honor of the goddes, (vnto whom all vowed othes ought faithfully to be kept) I pray and coniure you, to kill me your ſelues in this place. For all commeth to one end. To be ſlaine in Antigonus campe by the handes of mine owne enemies, will euer be counted your deede: and you may be aſſured he will not be angry withall, for he only deſireth Eumenes death, and not his life. If you will needes hold your hands from this attempt, vnloſe yet one of mine onely: that ſhall ſuffice to doe the feate. And if for feare ye will not put a ſword in my hande, throw me bound yet hands and feete vnto wild beaſtes: which if ye performe, then doe I diſcharge you of your othe taken betweene both my handes, which ye haue ſworne vnto your Captaine, as holily and perfectly performed. Vpon this ſpeech of Eumenes, all the reſt of the army had cõpaſſion of him, that they wept for tender affection. But the ARGYRASPIDES cried out to cary him away, and not to giue eare to his preaching: and that it was a good deede to puniſh this wicked CHERRONESIAN, according to his deſertes, conſidering that he had turmoyled the MACEDONIANS with endleſſe warre and battell. And moreouer, that it were too much ſhame that the worthieſt ſouldiers that euer ſerued King Philip and Alexander, ſo painfully in all their warres, ſhould for recompence of their ſeruice in their old age be turned a begging, their wiues hauing now lyen three nightes with their enemies. With thoſe wordes, they violently draue him on towardes Antigonus campe, who fearing leaſt the multitude of people that ranne to ſee him, would ſmother him in the preaſe, becauſe euery man ranne out of the campe: he ſent thither tenne of the ſtrongeſt Elephantes he had, and a good number of men of armes of the MEDES and PARTHIANS, to make way for him in the preaſe. When Eumenes was now come into Antigonus campe, his heart would not ſerue him to ſee him in that miſerable ſtate, for that they had once bene familiarly acquainted together. Whereupon, ſuch as had him in their cuſtodie, came to Antigonus to aske him, how he would haue him kept. Who anſwered them: like a Lyon, or an Elephant. Yet within a while after he tooke pitie of him, and diſcharged him of his weightieſt irons, & ſent one of his houſhold ſeruants to him to ſee him well vſed, and ſuffered his friends to come and bring him any thing he lacked. Thus did Antigonus deferre many daies before he would determine ought of Eumenes, hearing euery man ſpeake, & pondering their purpoſes & ſeuerall opinions. Nearchus CRETAN, and his owne ſonne Demetrius ſpake for Eumenes, and made ſute to ſaue his life, contrary to all the other Lordes & Captaines that were about Antigonus, who would in any caſe haue him die. Eumenes ſtanding in theſe termes, asked his keeper Onomarchus one day what Antigonus ment, that hauing his enemie in his hands, he did not quickly rid him out of his paine, or noblely deliuer him? Onomarchus churliſhly anſwered him againe, that the time was paſt now to ſhew his courage, as though he feared not death: and that he ſhould haue ſhewed it in the field at the battell. So helpe me Iupiter (quoth he) ſo haue I done, & if thou beleeueſt not me, aske them that ſet vppon me: for I neuer met with man yet more ſtrong then my ſelfe. Onomarchus replied againe: ſith now therefore thou haſt found a ſtronger than thy ſelfe, why then canſt thou not abide his pleaſure? In fine, when Antigonus had reſolued of his death, he commaunded them to giue him no more meate: and thus taking his ſuſtenance from him, Eumenes was three daies a dying. In the meane time came ſuch newes, that ſodainly the campe remoued: and therfore before their departure, a man was ſent to Eumenes to diſpatch him out of his paine. Antigonus licenced his friends to take his body and burne it, and then to gather his aſhes & bones to ſend them to his wife and children. Eumenes being ſlaine in this manner, the gods appointed none other iudges to reuẽge the diſloyaltie and treaſon of the ARGYRASPIDES and their Captaines, for betraying of Eumenes, but Antigonus ſelfe: who deteſting them as cruell murderers, and periured perſons to the goddes, appointed Ibyrtius Gouernour of the prouince of ARACHOSIA, to kill them euery mothers ſonne what way he could, that none of them might euer ſee MACEDON againe, nor the Greekiſh ſea.

Eumenes with Sertorius.

SERTORIVS.

The gouernement of Eumenes and Sertorius.

The deedes and conditions of Eumenes and Sertorius compared.

HEre haue we ſet downe the things worthie memory of Eumenes and Sertorius. Now to compare them together, in this they were both a like: that they being ſtrangers in a ſtrange countrie, and baniſhed out of their owne, had alwaies bene Captaines of diuers nations, and chiefetaines of great and warlicke armies. But this was proper to Sertorius, that all thoſe of his faction gaue him the chiefeſt place of authority, as the moſt ſufficienteſt man among them, and worthieſt to command: where Eumenes hauing many that contended againſt him for the chiefe rule and conduction of the armie, through his noble deedes, obtained the chiefe place and authoritie in the ſame. So that they obeyed the one, deſiring to be gouerned by a good Captaine: and for their owne ſafety gaue place to the other, ſeeing themſelues vnable to command. For Sertorius being a ROMAINE, gouerned the SPANIARDS and LVSITANIANS: and Eumenes a CHERRONESIAN, the MACEDONIANS. Of the which, the SPANIARDS of long time had bene ſubiect, to the Empire of ROME: and the MACEDONIANS at that time had ſubdued all the world. Furthermore, Sertorius being then of great eſtimation for that he was a Senatour of ROME, and had had charge of men of warre before, came to the dignity and eſtate to be chiefetaine of a great army. Where Eumenes came with ſmall reputation, diſdained for that he was but a ſecretarie: and when he began to come forwardes, had not only leſſe meanes to preferre him then Sertorius had, but greater lets & impediments alſo, to hinder his riſing and eſtimation. For many openly ſtood againſt him, and ſecretly conſpired his death: and not as Sertorius, whom no man contraried from the beginning, vntill his latter ende, when certaine of his companions ſecretly conſpired againſt him. Therefore Sertorius ende of all his dangers, was to ouercome his enemies: where Eumenes greateſt dangers came through his victories which he wanne of his owne men, through the malice of them that enuied his honour. Now for their deedes of armes, they are both in maner a like: but on the other ſide for their conditions, Eumenes naturally loued warre and contention: and Sertorius imbraced peace & quietnes. For, Eumenes that might haue liued in ſafetie with honor, if he would but haue giuen place to his betters, and forſaken the warres: liked better with the daunger of his life to followe martiall feates, with the greateſt perſonages of Macedon, and in the end ſo came to his death. Sertorius contrarily being vnwilling to come in trouble, was forced for the ſafetie of his perſon to take armes againſt them, that would not let him liue in peace. For had not Eumenes bene ſo ambitious and ſtout to ſtriue againſt Antigonus for the chiefeſt place of authoritie, but could haue beene contented with the ſeconde, Antigonus would haue bene right glad thereof: where Pompey would neuer ſo much as ſuffer Sertorius to liue in reſt. So, the one made voluntary warre onely to rule, and the other againſt his will was cōpelled to rule, becauſe they made wars with him. Whereby it appeareth that Eumenes naturally loued warre, preferring the couetous deſire of a better eſtate, aboue the ſafetie of his life, and the other as a right ſouldier, vſed the warres only for a meane to ſaue his life by valiant defence of armes. Furthermore, the one was ſlaine, miſtruſting no treaſon againſt him: and the other, looking euery houre for preſent death threatned him. Whereof the one argued a noble minde, not to miſtruſt them whom he thought his friends: and the other ſhewed a faint heart, being taken when he ment to flie. So Sertorius death diſhonored not his life, ſuffering that of his owne companions, which his deadly foes could neuer make him ſuffer. The other hauing no power to auoide his deſtinie before he was taken, and hauing ſought meanes to liue being in priſon and captiuitie: could neither patiently nor manfully abide his death. For, begging life at his enemies handes, he gaue him his heart with his body, who before had but his bodie in his power.

Sertorius death more honeſt, then the death of Eumenes.

ARchidamus the ſon of Zeuxidamus, hauing honorably raigned in Lacedæmon, left two ſons behind him: Agis which he begate of that noble lady Lamprido, & Ageſilaus a great deale yonger, which he had by Eupolia, Meliſippidas daughter. So the kingdom falling by ſucceſſion vnto Agis the elder, the yonger ſonne Ageſilaus remaining a priuate perſon, was brought vp after the Laconian maner, which was a ſtraight kind of life: but withal it taught childrē how to obey. Wherof it is thought the poet Simonides calleth Sparta, Damaſimbrotos: to wit, making men ciuil: for that by continuance of cuſtome, it frameth the citizens to be obedient to the lawes, as much or more than any other citie that euer was in the world taming them from their childhood, as they doe young coltes. The law diſpenſeth with the heires apparant to the crowne, from that ſtraight ſubiection and hard life: but Ageſilaus had that excellencie in him aboue all others of his eſtate, that he came to the dignitie and honor to command, hauing from his youth learned to obey. The which vndoubtedly was the cauſe, that he knewe better than any other king, how to pleaſe and beare with his ſubiectes, helping his roiall eſtate & princely behauior grafted in him by nature, with that courteſie and familiaritie which he had attained by education. At that time when he went in company with the boyes which were brought vp together, Lyſander fell in loue with him, wondering at the modeſtie of his wit. For hauing better ſpirite, and being more conſtant in his opinion, then any of the other children, ſtriuing euer to excell in all things, with ſuch a vehemency he tooke all trauels in hande, that it was vnpoſſible to ouercome him, much leſſe to compell him. He was on the other ſide ſo milde & gentle, that euery curteous word wrought in him better obedience, than any feare could doe: becauſe it grieued him more to be reproued, then to take vpon him any paine or labor. And for the deformitie of his legge, the one being ſhorter than the other, in the flower of his youth, through his pleaſant wit, hee vſed the matter ſo pleaſantly and patiently, that he would merrily mocke himſelfe: which maner of merry behauiour did greatly hide the blame of the blemiſh. Yea further, his life & courage was the more commendable in him, for that men ſaw that notwithſtanding his lameneſſe, he refuſed no paines nor labour. Of his perſon we haue drawen no counterfaite, becauſe he would not in any wiſe haue it drawen, and did expreſſely commaund by his will, that they ſhould neither draw his picture nor make any mould or image of his body. Howbeit wee finde that he was of ſmall ſtature, whereby his preſence promiſed no great matters to them that beheld him. Yet for that he was euer merry & pleaſant, and neuer penſiue nor troubleſome in word nor looke, euen to the laſt end of his life he was better loued, than the moſt faire creature that liued. Notwithſtanding, the Ephori (as Theophraſtus writeth) did condemne king Archidamus in a ſumme of money becauſe he maried a litle woman: ſaying that he would beget them demy kings, no kings indeed. In the time that his eldeſt ſonne Agis raigned king, Alcibiades being baniſhed ATHENS fled out of SICILE into LACEDÆMON, & had not long remained in SPARTA before they ſuſpected him that he kept king Agis wife, called Timæa: for which cauſe Agis would not acknowledge the child ſhe brought to be his ſonne, ſaying that Alcibiades had begottē him. But Timæa cared not much for it, as Duris writeth: for otherwhile as ſhe ſate amongſt her women, ſoftly ſhe called him Alcibiades, not Leotychides. On the other ſide they report, that Alcibiades himſelfe ſaid, it was for no hurt he ment to any man, that he lay with Queene Timæa, but onely for the deſire he had that ſome of the kings of LACEDÆMON ſhould be begotten of his ſeede. Neuertheleſſe at the length he was driuen to forſake LACEDÆMON, miſtruſting king Agis, who euer after doubted of the child, & thought him a baſtard: vntill ſuch time as being on his death bed, Leotychides falling on his knees, wept, and ſo behaued himſelfe, that Agis before many witneſſes, ſaide he did acknowledge him for his ſonne. This notwithſtanding, when king Agis was dead, Lyſander that had then ouercome the ATHENIANS by ſea, and was more in credite and authority in the city of SPARTA, than any other: practiſed to put the crowne vpon Ageſilaus head, ſaying, that Leotychides had no intereſt vnto it, becauſe he was a baſtard. The like did diuerſe other citizens ſay of him, which loued Ageſilaus vertue, and liked him paſſingly, for that he had bene brought vp from his childhood among them. But on the contrary part alſo, there was a Soothſaier or wiſard in SPARTA called Diopithes, that had a number of old prophecies without booke, and was accounted a very skilfull man touching prophecies and diuinations. He maintained that it was not lawfull for any lame man to be king of SPARTA: and for proofe thereof he told this ancient oracle before the councell.

As ſtately as thy ſtomacke is ô Sparta take good heede,
And ſtand vpon thy gard, and looke about thee I thee reede.
For halting one day downe will caſt thine Empire to the ground,
By meane of warres and troubles great that ſhall incloſe thee round.

Lyſander replied againſt it, ſaying, that if the SPARTANS were affraide of this oracle, they ſhould rather beware of Leotychides. For the goddes cared not, if any man lame of a foote aſpired to be king: but rather if he were a baſtard,& not lineally deſcended of the race of Hercules. For that, ſaid he, were to make the kingdome halt. Ageſilaus furthermore alleaged, that the god Neptune himſelfe had witneſſed, that Leotychides was a baſtard: for he draue Agis by an earthquake, to runne out of his wiues chamber, and that tenne monethes after that, and more, Leotychides was borne. So was Ageſilaus vpon theſe allegations not onely proclaimed king of SPARTA, but he had giuen him moreouer, as lawfull heire, all his brother Agis goods, and Leotychides reiected as a baſtard. Notwithſtanding, conſidering that his parentes by his mothers ſide were very poore, (yet honeſt men) he left them the moytie of all the goods: by which act, Ageſilaus wonne all their good willes, where elſe they had enuied him for his ſucceſſion in the kingdome. And (as Xenophon ſaith) by obeying his countrie, he grew to ſuch power that he might do whatſoeuer he would. The Ephori and Senators at that time bare all the ſway and gouenment of the common wealth, the Ephores office changing yearely, the other being for life: the which Ephori were only ordained to bridle the inſolency of the kings, for that they ſhould not (as we haue more amply written in Lycurgus life) haue abſolute power in their handes. Vppon this occaſion, the kings that ſucceeded in the gouernement, had (as it were) by inheritance, a preſent grudge and malice againſt them. This notwithſtanding, Ageſilaus tooke a contrary courſe to all his predeceſſors. For where others preſently quarelled with the Ephori and Senatours, Ageſilaus did honor and reuerence them, and would neuer diſpatch any matter without their priuity, but was alwaies readie to goe when they did ſend him. When he was ſet in his chaire of ſtate to giue audience, if any of the Ephori chanced to come in, he would riſe vp vnto them: and at the election of any new Senatour, he would for honors ſake preſent him a gowne and an oxe. And thus cunningly ſeeming to honor and increaſe the dignitie of the Senators, winning their good wils, he made his power great, and the realme much greater. Furthermore, his behauiour towards the reſt of his coūtrimen was ſuch, as his enmity was leſſe faulty then his friendſhip. For he did neuer hurt his enemies without iuſt cauſe, but he aided his friends euen in vniuſt cauſes. And wheras he thought it a ſhame not to honor enemies, whē they had done well: he could not find in his hart to rebuke his friends when they did amiſſe, but rather gloried in ſuccouring & helping of them in their euil doings. For he thought it no ſhame to ſerue his friendes turne, howſoeuer it were. Againe, when any of his aduerſaries offended, he was as ſorie for it as any man, and as ready to beare with it if he were intreated: whereby he allured and wanne the hearts of all men. The Ephori ſeeing that, and fearing his power, puniſhed him in money for that he made the common loue of his countrie priuate to himſelfe. For, as naturall Philoſophers holde opinion, that if contention and ſtrife were taken out of nature, it would come to paſſe that the heauenly bodies ſhould ſtand ſtill, and alſo that the generation of all things ſhould be at a ſtay, by reaſon of the mutuall agreement betweene the world and them: euen ſo, the lawmaker of LACEDÆMON ſeemeth to haue allowed ambition & ſtrife in the common wealth, as a ſpurre to vertue by procuring alwaies ſome contention and emulation among great perſons. And his reaſon was that this baſe and effeminate fauour, in winking one at an other when men are to be rebuked, ought not of right to be called by the name of concord. And ſure ſome thinke that Homer alſo ſaw the ſame, for he would neuer elſe haue made Agamemnon to haue reioyced to ſee Vlyſſes and Achilles at great wordes together, if he had not bene of opinion, that enuy and contention among great men, were very auaileable for the common wealth. Yet is not this thus ſimply to be allowed: for contentions are hurtfull to cities, where they are violent: and doe bring great dangers with them. Now when Ageſilaus was entred into his kingdome of LACEDÆMON, newes were brought him out of ASIA, that the king of PERSIA prepared a great nauy to conquer the LACEDÆMONIANS ſigniory by ſea. Lyſander being glad of this occaſion, longing to be ſent againe into ASIA to ſuccour his friends whom he had left there as Gouernors & Lieutenants of cities & prouinces (of the which, ſome of them were driuen away by their citizens, others alſo put to death for abuſing of their authority & ruling ouer cruelly:) perſwaded Ageſilaus to goe into ASIA, to make warre vpon this barbarous king, farre from GRECE, before his army were gathered together. And to cōpaſſe this the eaſilier, he wrote vnto his friends in ASIA that they ſhould ſend vnto SPARTA to require Ageſilaus for their Captaine, and ſo they

whether contention among the nobilitie be profitable in a commonwealth did. Thereupon Ageſilaus going to the aſſembly of the people, accepted the charge, with condition that they would giue him thirtie Captaines of the SPARTANS to be counſellers & aſſiſtants to him in theſe warres, two thouſand free ILOTES, and ſix thouſand of the confederates of LACEDÆMON. All this was immediatly granted through Lyſanders friendſhippe towards him, and he was ſent away ſtraight with the thirtie Captaines which he had requeſted: of the which Lyſander was the chiefeſt, not only for his riches and authority, but alſo for the good will he bare vnto Ageſilaus: who thought himſelf more beholding to him for procuring him this charge, than for his friendſhip he ſhewed him in bringing him to be king.

Now Ageſilaus army being aſſembled at the hauen of Gereſtæ, himſelfe with certaine of his friends went vnto the citie of AVLIDE, where in his ſleepe he dreamd that one ſaid vnto him: O king of the LACEDÆMONIANS, thou knoweſt that neuer none but Agamemnon, and now thy ſelfe, was choſen Generall of all GRECE, conſidering therefore that thou commaundeſt the ſame people he did, that thou makeſt warres with the ſelfe ſame enemies, departing from the ſelfe ſame place to goe thither, it is reaſon that thou make the ſelfe ſame ſacrifice vnto the goddeſſe, the which he made at his like departure.

Ageſilaus ſtraight vpon this viſion, remembred that Agamemnon through the perſwaſion of the Soothſaiers did ſacrifice his owne daughter in the ſame place. Yet this made him not affraid, but the next day he told it to his friends, and ſaide he would ſacrifice that vnto the goddeſſe, which he thought would pleaſe her well enough, and that he would not followe that cruell deuotion of this auncient Captaine Agamemnon. And with that, he brought a hynde crowned with a garland of flowers, and commanded his Soothſaier to ſacrifice her: and would not ſuffer him to haue the honour to doe the ſacrifice, that was appointed for the ſame purpoſe by the Gouernors of BOEOTIA, according to the cuſtome of that place. The Gouernors of BOEOTIA vnderſtanding it, were much offended, and ſent their officers to will Ageſilaus not to doe any ſacrifice there, contrary to the lawe and cuſtome of their countrie. The officers that were ſent, performed their commiſſion: and finding that the beaſt was ſlaine, & the quarters of it vpon the aulter, they tooke and flong them off the aulter euery way. This vexed Ageſilaus being readie to imbarke, and departed thence in choler againſt the THEBANS, and miſtruſted much his good ſucceſſe by this vnluckie prediction, which ſeemed to prognoſticate vnto him, that he ſhould not preuaile according to his deſire.

Furthermore, when he was arriued at EPHESVS, he preſently miſliked the honor he ſaw done vnto Lyſander, and the great traine that waited on him. For all the countrimen there repaired continually to his houſe, that when he came abroade, they all followed him whereſoeuer he went: as though Lyſander had in deede bene in authority to do what he would, and that Ageſilaus only had but the name to be general, ſo appointed by the law of LACEDÆMON. For in truth there was neuer GRECIAN Captaine in thoſe partes that had won him ſuch eſtimation, nor that was more feared than he: nor there was neuer man that was more beneficiall to his friends, neither alſo that was more hurtfull to his enemies. All theſe things being freſh in memorie, the countriemen of that country perceiuing the ſimplicity of Ageſilaus, and how he was giuen to pleaſe the people, and caried no great maieſtie nor countenance with him, and obſeruing in Lyſander that wonted roughnes and ſharpe ſpeech wherewith they had bene acquainted before: euery man obeyed him, and nothing was done but what he commanded. This firſt of all made the other SPARTANS angrie, for that it appeared they were come as it were to ſerue Lyſander, and not as to counſell the king: but after that, Ageſilaus himſelfe alſo grew miſcontented, although of his owne nature he was not enuious nor ſorie to ſee others honored beſides himſelfe.

Yet being a man ambitiouſly giuen, and of a noble courage, fearing if he ſhould doe any noble exploit in this warre, that they would impute it vnto Lyſander, for the great eſtimation he was of: he firſt beganne to deale in this ſort with him. Firſt he contraried all his counſels: and what matters ſoeuer he preferred, which he was deſirous ſhould haue taken effect, Ageſilaus would none of that, but tooke ſome other in hand. Furthermore, if any of Lyſanders followers came to make ſute to him for his fauor, perceiuing that they did leane vnto Lyſander: he ſent them away without any thing done for them. In like caſe alſo in matters of iudgements, if Lyſander were againſt any, they were ſure to haue the matter paſſe on their ſide. On the contrarie part alſo, if Lyſander bare good will to the partie, and fauored the cauſe to gratifie him: they hardly eſcaped from ſetting a fine on their heades. Ageſilaus continuing theſe ſhewes ordinarily of purpoſe, not by chaunce to one or two, but indifferently to all: Lyſander looking into the cauſe, diſſembled not with his friendes, but told them plainly that it was for his ſake they had thoſe repulſes and wronges, and therefore did counſell them to wait vpon the king, and thoſe that had more credit then himſelfe. Now Ageſilaus ſuppoſed he gaue that aduiſe to make euery man to malice him: wherefore, to deſpite him the more, he made him diſtributer of his victuals, (& hauing done ſo) ſome ſay that he ſpake theſe words in open preſence of many: now let them go and honour my fleſh diſtributer. Lyſander being grieued witall, ſayd vnto the king: my Lord, you know how to oppreſſe your friendes. And ſo do I, ſayd Ageſilaus, how to keepe them vnder, that would be greater then my ſelfe. It may be yet replied Lyſander, I haue not done as your grace doth ſay: yet if you ſo conceiue of me, put me I beſeech you in ſome place of charge or office, where I may do you good ſeruice without offence. After this talke between thē, Ageſilaus ſent him into Helleſpont, where by practiſe he tooke priſoner a noble man a Perſian, called Spithridates, out of Pharnabazus prouince whereof he was gouernour, & brought him to Ageſilaus with a great ſumme of gold and ſiluer, and neare about two hundred horſemen with him. All this notwithſtanding, he forgate not his grudge to Ageſilaus, but being offended ſtill, ſought oportunitie and meanes to defeate the two houſes of the priuiledge of the kingdome, and to bring it in common to all the other houſes of Sparta: and ſurely he had made great broyle (in my opinion) in the city of Sparta, had he not bene preuēted by death, in a iourney he made into Bœotia. Thus we ſee, that ambitious mindes obſeruing no meane, are in a common weale oft times more hurtfull, then beneficiall. For though Lyſander was indeede intollerable, to ſhew himſelfe ſo ambitious, and out of time: yet was not Ageſilaus ignoraunt neither, that there were diuers other meanes leſſe reprochfull to puniſh ſuch a noble man, that offended onely by greedineſſe of honour. But to tell you my opinion, they were both blinded with one ſelfe paſsion: the one not to know his Princes power, & the other not to beare with his friends imperfection. Now Tiſaphernes at the firſt being afrayed of Ageſilaus, made league with him, colourably letting him vnderſtand that the king would be content to ſet the cities of Grece in Aſia at liberty. Notwithſtanding, when he thought he had gathered force ſufficient to fight with him, he proclaimed warre. Ageſilaus was very well content withall: for the expectation was great of him through all Grece, that he would do ſome noble exploit in this iourney. Moreouer he thought himſelfe diſhonored for euer, that the ten thouſand Grecians which were returned backe from the fartheſt part of Aſia, euen vnto the ſea Maior (vnder the conduct and leading of Xenophon their Captaine) had ouercome the king of Perſiaes army as oft as they liſted themſelues: and that he which was the Lieutenant generall of the Lacedæmonians (who at that time commaunded both ſea and land) ſhould not do ſome deede worthy memorie among the Grecians. Preſently therefore to reuenge Tiſaphernes periurie by iuſt deceit, he made a countenaunce as though he would firſt inuade the country of Caria. Whereupon, this barbarous perſon Tiſaphernes, gathered all his power together. But Ageſilaus on a ſodaine returned backe againe, and entred into Phrygia, tooke there many cities, and wanne great ſpoyle, making his men ſee by experience, that to infringe & breake a league made & auowed by oth, was a ſacriledge, and contemning of the goddes. On the other ſide alſo, that to beguile his enemies, it was not onely iuſt and honorable: but alſo profitable and pleaſant. Now Ageſilaus being weaker in horſemen then his enemy, and finding the liuers of the beaſtes which he had ſacrificed, without heades, returned into the citie of Epheſus, and there gathered horſemen together, letting the richmen vnderſtand (which would not themſelues ſerue in perſon) that he did diſpenſe with their perſons, ſo that they did ſet out a horſe and man furniſhed for ſeruice in their place. Many of them tooke that courſe, & by this meanes Ageſilaus within few dayes had leauied a great number of men of armes, in ſtead of footemen that could do ſmall ſeruice. For they that were vnwilling to go to the warres, did hier them that were willing to ſerue in their place: and ſuch alſo as would not ſerue a horſebacke, did giue them pay that were deſirous to ſerue in their ſteades. In this he wiſely followed king Agamemnons example, who did diſpenſe with the perſon of a rich coward for going to the warres, by taking a good mare of him. Then Ageſilaus had commaunded them that ſold the priſoners by the drumme taken in the warres, that they ſhould ſtrippe them naked, & ſo ſell them: which they did. And ſundry perſons willingly bought their ſpoyles and rayment, but they ſcorned their bodies, becauſe they ſaw them white skinned, ſoft, and delicate: ſo that few men would out bid the price for them, for that they thought thoſe men vnprofitable and good for nothing. Ageſilaus alſo being preſent at this ſale of purpoſe, ſayd thus vnto his men. See, my friends, quoth he: theſe be the men againſt whom ye are to fight, and here be the ſpoyles for the which ye ſhall fight. Time being come now to put himſelfe into the field, and to inuade his enemies country againe, he gaue it out that he would enter LYDIA, not meaning to deceiue Tiſaphernes againe, but Tiſaphernes deceiued himſelfe. For he being deceiued before by Ageſilaus, gaue no credit to this ſecond rumour, but perſwaded himſelfe that doubtleſſe Ageſilaus ment then to enter into CARIA, & the rather for that it was a woddie country, very ill for horſemen, in the which he was the weaker. This notwithſtãding, Ageſilaus inuading (as he had giuen it out) the champion country, in the which ſtood SARDIS, the capitall city of LYDIA: Tiſaphernes was cõpelled to come to reſcue it in haſt, and being come thither with great ſpeede with his horſemen, he ſtale vpon many of his enemies whom he found ſtraggling out of order, ſpoyling the country, & put the moſt of them to the ſword. Ageſilaus hauing intelligence of this, imagined with himſelfe that the footemen of his enemy could not yet be arriued, and conſidering alſo that he had his army whole about him: thought it beſt forthwith to bid him battell, rather then to delay time any longer. Therupon he thruſt in among the horſemen his light armed footemen, & commaunded them ſtraight to charge the enemy, whileſt he cauſed the heauier armed men to follow at their heeles, as they did. But the barbarous people fled vpon it immediatly: & the GRECIANS luſtily following the chaſe, tooke their camp, and made great ſlaughter of them that fled. After this field foughten, they had leaſure enough not onely to ſpoyle & ouerrun the kings country at their pleaſure, but alſo to ſee the reuenge taken of Tiſaphernes, that was a vile man, and a cruell enemy to the GRECIANS. For the king of PERSIA made an other his Lieutenaunt immediatly in his roome, called Tithrauſtes: who ſtrake off Tiſaphernes head, and ſent vnto Ageſilaus to pray him to take peace with them, and to offer him ſtore of gold and ſiluer to depart out of his country. Thereto Ageſilaus aunſwered, that for peace, it was not in him to make it, but in the LACEDÆMONIANS: and that for his owne part, it was an eaſier matter to enrich his ſouldiers, than himſelfe. And furthermore, that the GRECIANS thought it diſhonor to them, to take any gift of their enemies, other then ſpoyles. This notwithſtanding, to gratifie Tithrauſtes ſomewhat, for that he had taken reuenge of a common enemy of all the GRECIANS: for the ſumme of thirtie talents giuen him to defray his charges, he withdrew his army out of LYDIA, & went into PHRYGIA. In his iourney he receiued from the councell of LACEDÆMON, the Scytala, or ſcrolle of parchement wreathed about, aduertiſing him that the citizens had made him alſo their Generall by ſea, as he was by land. Ageſilaus onely of all men obtained this honour, who without compariſon was of all other the worthieſt man of fame in his time, as Theopompus witneſſeth: & yet gloried rather to be commended for his vertue, then for the greatnes of his authority. In this notwithſtanding he was to be blamed, when he made choyſe of one Piſander his wiues brother, to be Lieutenant of the nauy, and forſooke other Captaines of better experience and elder yeares: ſeeking rather to pleaſe his wife, and to aduaunce one of his kinne, then to regard the weale and ſafety of his country. Afterwardes he led his army into Pharnabazus country which he had in charge, where he found not onely plenty of all ſortes of victuals, but gathered together alſo a wonderfull maſſe of money. From thence he went into the realme of PAPHLAGONIA, and made league there with king Cotys: who for his vertue and conſtant fidelitie, was very deſirous of his friendſhip. The like did Spithridates, forſaking Pharnabazus, and came vnto Ageſilaus: and after he was come to him, he neuer went from him, but alwayes followed him whereſoeuer he went. Spithridates had a young ſonne that was paſsing fayre, called Megabetes, (of whom Ageſilaus had great liking) & likewiſe a fayre young woman to his daughter, of age to be maried, whom Ageſilaus cauſed king Cotys to mary. So, taking of king Cotys a thouſand horſemen and two thouſand footemen light armed, he returned backe into PHRYGIA, and there deſtroyed Pharnabazus country which he had in gouernement, who durſt not meete him in the field, nor truſt to his holdes, but ſtill fled from him, carying all his chiefeſt things with him, flitting from place to place: vntill that Spithridates, accompanied with Erippidas the SPARTAN, followed him ſo neare, that he tooke his camp, and all his treaſure in it. But there did Erippidas ſhew himſelfe ſo hard and cruell, ouerſtraightly ſearching out part of the ſpoyle that had bene imbeaceled, compelling the barbarous people to deliuer it againe, ranſacking euery corner for it: that Spithridates was ſo offended withall, that on a ſodaine he tooke the PAPHLAGONIANS with him, & went backe vnto the citie of SARDIS. This more grieued Ageſilaus, thē any thing that happened to him in all his iourney: for that he had loſt ſo valiant a man as Spithridates, and ſuch a number of good ſouldiers as he caried away with him. Moreouer, he was afrayed leaſt they would detect him of miſerable couetouſneſſe, a thing which he euer was carefull to auoid, not only in his own perſon, but alſo to keepe al his countrymen from it. But beſides theſe knowen cauſes, the loue he bare to Spithridates ſonne pinched him nearely: though when the boy was with him, he ſtriued with his owne nature to ſubdue that naughty affection and deſire he had of him. For when Megabates on a time came to make much of him, & to kiſſe him: Ageſilaus turned his face from the boy. The boy being aſhamed of the repulſe, durſt no more come ſo familiarly, but ſaluted him aloofe of. Ageſilaus then repenting him that he had not ſuffered Megabates to kiſſe him, made as though he maruelled why he did not kiſſe him as he was wont to do. Then aunſwered ſome of his familiars about him: your ſelfe, O king, is in fault, becauſe you durſt not tarie, but were afrayed to kiſſe ſo fayre a boy. For if he knew your minde, he would come againe, ſo that you turned your face no more away. When Ageſilaus had heard them, he pawſed a while, and ſayd neuer a word, but in fine aunſwered them: It ſhall not neede you ſay any thing to him, for it would do me more good I could refuſe ſuch an other kiſſe againe, then if all that I ſee before me were gold. Thus was Ageſilaus diſpoſed whē Megabates was with him: but in his abſence he did ſo loue him, that I dare ſcātly ſay, that if the boy had come againe into his preſence, he would haue refuſed a kiſſe at his hands. After that, Pharnabazus ſought to ſpeake with him, and one Apollophanes a CYZICENIAN brought them together, that was a friend vnto them both. Ageſilaus was the firſt that met at the place appointed with his friends, and tarying for Pharnabazus comming, he layed him downe vpon the deepe graſſe in the ſhadow, vnder a fayre great tree. Pharnabazus alſo came thither, & they ſpread ſoft ſkinnes long haired, and tapeſtry excellently wrought of diuers colours, for him to ſit on vpon the ground. But being aſhamed to ſee Ageſilaus layed on the bare ground in that ſort, he alſo lay downe by him, though he had vpon him a maruellous rich gowne, of excellent tiſſue and paſsing colour. Now when they had embraced one an other, Pharnabazus began firſt to ſpeake, and lacked no good perſwaſions & iuſt complaints, for that he hauing bene (as he was) a friend vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS in the warre againſt the ATHENIANS, was then ſpoyled and ſacked by them. Ageſilaus then finding that the SPARTANS that were about him at that meeting, hung down their heads for ſhame, not knowing how to aunſwere him, conſidering that Pharnabazus had iniury offered him: began to ſpeake in this manner. Heretofore whē we were friends with the king (my Lord Pharnabazus) we haue vſed his goods like friends, but now that we are his enemies, like enemies we vſe them: and ſince we ſee that thou wilt needes be a ſlaue of his, maruell not though we hurt thee for his ſake. But when thou ſhalt like rather to be a friend of the GRECIANS, then a ſlaue to the king of PERSIA: then make account, that all theſe ſouldiers, this armour, our ſhips, and all we are to defend thy goods and libertie againſt him, without which, nothing that is honeſt can be looked for of mortall men. Thereupon Pharnabazus told him his minde plainly: ſurely, ſayd he, if the king do ſend hither any other Captaine to be his Lieutenant, be ſure I will then take your part ſtraight. But on the other ſide, if he make me his Lieutenant in this warre, truſt to it, I will do him the beſt ſeruice I can againſt you. This aunſwere paſsingly pleaſed Ageſilaus, who taking him by the hand, and riſing vp with him, ſaid vnto him. I would wiſh (my Lord Pharnabazus) hauing ſo noble a minde as thou haſt, that thou were rather our friend, then an enemy. So Pharnabazus departing from thence with his men, his ſonne being left behind, ranne to Ageſilaus, and ſmiling told him. King Ageſilaus, I will make thee my friend: & therewith gaue him a dart he had in his hand. Ageſilaus tooke it of him, and liking well the beautie of the young youth, and the curteſie he had offred him, looked about him if any man in his company had any proper thing that he might beſtow on him. At the laſt he ſpied his ſecretarie Adæus horſe, which had a rich capariſſon on: he ſtraight tooke it from him, and gaue the horſe & furniture to this liuely youth Pharnabazus ſonne, who neuer after forgate it. For it chaunced afterwardes that being driuen out of his country by his brethren, and flying into PELOPONNESVS, Ageſilaus made very much of him, and did not ſticke to further him in his loue abroad. For he had a great fancie and liking to a boy of ATHENS, whom they brought vp in wreſtling, one day to play for the beſt games. But when he was growen a bigge man and ſtrong, and that he came to offer himſelfe to be billed with them that ſhould wraſtle at the games Olympicall, being in ſome perill to be vtterly refuſed: this PERSIAN that loued him, went vnto Ageſilaus, and beſought his helpe, that this wraſtler might not receiue the ſoyle to be reiected. Ageſilaus being deſirous to pleaſure him, performed his requeſt with ſome difficultie. Thus Ageſilaus in all things elſe was a ſtraight obſeruer of the law: but in his friendes cauſes to be ſtraight laced in matters of iuſtice, he ſayd that was but an excuſe for them that would do nothing for their friendes. To this effect, they finde a letter of his written vnto Idrian, Prince of CARIA, for the deliuerie of his friend. If Nicias haue not offended, let him go: if he haue offended, then pardon him for my ſake. But howſoeuer it be, let him go. This was Ageſilaus manner in the moſt part of his friends cauſes. Notwithſtanding, occaſions fell out oftentimes, that he rather inclined to the benefit of the common wealth. As appeared one day when he was driuen to remoue in haſt on a ſodaine, and to leaue one ſicke behind him whom he loued dearely: the ſicke man calling him by his name as he was going his way, beſought him that he would not forſake him. Ageſilaus (as Hieronymus the Philoſopher reporteth) turned backe againe, and ſayd: O how hard is it both to loue, and to be wiſe. Now had Ageſilaus ſpent two yeares in this warre, and was ſpoken of throughout ASIA, being maruellouſly commended to the king himſelfe, for his great honeſtie, his continencie, his curteſie and plaine dealing. For when he rode out into the country with his owne trayne onely, he would euer lye in the holyeſt temples of the goddes: becauſe he would the goddes themſelues ſhould be witneſſes of his priuate doings, whereas commonly we are loth that men ſhould ſee what we do. Furthermore, amongſt ſo many thouſand ſouldiers as were in his camp, there could hardly be found a worſe mattriſſe, then that himſelfe did lye vpon euery night. And as for heate and cold, he could as eaſily away with either of both, as if by conſtitution of body he had bene borne to abide any weather and ſeaſon. But aboue all, it was a pleaſant ſight to the GRECIANS that dwelt in ASIA, when they ſaw the great Lords, the kings Lieutenaunts of PERSIA, (which before were proud, cruell, rich, and giuen to all luſt and pleaſure) to honour and feare a man that went vp and downe in a poore cape, being afrayed of euery ſhort word that he ſpake like a LACONIAN: in ſomuch as many of them called to minde Timotheus the Poetes verſes, who ſayd,

Ageſilaus to his friendes, was without reſpect a friend.

Ageſilaus letter in the behalfe of his friend.

Other read to haue pitie, and to be wiſe. Ageſilaus ſaying.

As Mars hath no mercy, ſo Greece ſcorneth gold.

Now all ASIA being vp and in garboile, they willingly yeelding to him in euery place, after he had taken order with the cities, and had eſtabliſhed the libertie of their common weale, without any bloudſhed, or baniſhment of any perſon: he determined to go further, into the land, and tranſporting the warres from the ſea coaſtes of GRECE, to fight with the king of PERSIA in proper perſon, and with the wealth and happineſſe of the ECBATANIANS and the SVSIANIANS, and by that meanes to take his leaſure from him, who ſitting ſtill before, made the GRECIANS make warre one with an other, by force of money, corrupting the gouernours of euery city. In the meane time came Epycidas LACONIAN vnto him, and brought him newes how SPARTA was grieuouſly troubled with warres, enforced on them by the other GRECIANS: and that therefore the Ephori did ſend for him home, and commaunded him to returne to defend his country.

Ageſilaus ſent for out of Aſia.

Ah wretched Greece, how cruell ſlaughters haſt
Thou brought vpon thee, for to lay thee waſt?

For how ſhould a man otherwiſe call this enuie, treaſon, and ciuill conſpiracie among the

GRECIANS? Who ouerthrew their good fortune that made thẽ happy before, turning their warres againſt the barbarous people, out of GRECE, and now to bring it againſt themſelues. I am not of Demaratus opinion the CORINTHIAN, that ſayd the GRECIANS delight was taken from them, which ſaw not Alexander the great ſitting in Darius royall throne: but rather I would thinke they ſhould haue wept, to haue left this honor vnto Alexander & the MACEDONIANS, fondly loſing ſo many famous Captaines of GRECE, at the battels of LEVCTRES, of CORONEA, of CORINTHE, and of ARCADIA. Neuertheleſſe, Ageſilaus neuer did better acte in his life, nor euer ſhewed better example of obedience and iuſtice due to his country, then he did in his returne home. For ſith Hanniball that began to haue ill ſucceſſe in his warres, being in manner driuen out of ITALIE, thought neuer (but compelled) to returne againe into his country, to obey his countrymen, which called him home to defend the warre the ROMAINES made at their owne doores: and that Alexander the great alſo being ſent for home vpon the like occaſion did not onely refuſe to returne into MACEDON, but made a ieſt at it, when newes was brought him of the great battell which his Lieutenaunt Antipater had fought with king Agis, ſaying, me thinkes when I heare theſe newes, whileſt we are ouercomming of king Darius here, there hath bene a battell of rattes fought in ARCADIA. Sith then (I ſay) theſe two famous Captaines haue made ſo litle account of their country, may we not thinke the citie of SPARTA bleſſed to haue had ſuch a king, that ſo much reuerenced his country and obeyed the law as receiuing onely a litle ſcrolle of parchement commaunding him to returne, he forſooke a world of goodes and wealth that he quietly enioyed (with aſſured hope and certaintie of more) and imbarked forthwith, leauing all the alies and confederates of his country very ſorowfull, for that he had giuen ouer ſo noble an enterpriſe, which he had ſo happely begun? Yes ſure. Nay furthermore, he paſſed not for the ſaying of Demoſtratus PHÆACIAN, who ſayd, that the LACEDÆMONIANS in publicke matters were the worthieſt men, and the ATHENIANS in priuate cauſes. For as he had ſhewed himſelfe a good king and an excellent Captaine to the common wealth: ſo was he alwayes curteous priuately to his familiar friends. And becauſe the PERSIAN coyne was ſtamped on the one ſide, with the print of an archer: Ageſilaus being ready to depart, ſayd, that ten thouſand archers draue him out of ASIA. For ſo much was brought vnto THEBES and ATHENS, and diſtributed among the Oratours and Gouernours there, who through their Orations made both thoſe great cities to riſe, and make warre againſt the SPARTANS. In his returne, Ageſilaus hauing paſſed the ſtraight of HELLESPONT, tooke his way through the coũtry of THRACIA, and neuer intreated barbarous king nor people to ſuffer him to paſſe, but onely ſent vnto them to know whether they would he ſhould paſſe through the countryes as a friend, or an enemy. All countryes and nations elſe receiued him very honorably to their power, ſaue the people called the TROCHALIANS, vnto whõ king Xerxes himſelfe gaue preſents that he might paſſe friendly through their country: who ſent vnto Ageſilaus to demaund a hundred ſiluer talents, and a hundred women to ſuffer him to paſſe through their country. But Ageſilaus laughing them to ſcorne, aunſwered againe: why, how chaunceth it that they came not themſelues to receiue them? So there withall he marched forward againſt theſe barbarous people who were ranged in battell ray to ſtoppe his paſſage: howbeit he ouerthrew them, and ſlue a great number of them in the field. The like demaund he made vnto the king of MACEDON, whether he ſhould paſſe through his country as a friend, or an enemie. The king made him aunſwere, he would conſider of it. Well, let him thinke of it, quoth Ageſilaus: we will go on in the meane time. The king then wondering at his great boldneſſe, and fearing leaſt he would do him ſome hurt as he went: ſent to pray him that he would paſſe through his country as a friend. Now it chanced ſo that the THESSALIANS at that time were in league with the enemies of the LACEDÆMONIANS: therefore as he paſſed through their countrey, he did ſpoyle and forrage it as his enemies country, and ſent Xenocles & Scytha to the citie of LARISSE, hoping to perſwade them to take part with the LACEDÆMONIANS. Theſe two Ambaſſadours were retained there as priſoners. The SPARTANS were maruellouſly offended withall: & thought good that Ageſilaus ſhould beſiege LARISSE with his army. But he aunſwered them, he would not loſe one of thoſe men, to winne all THESSALIE:

Ageſilaus obedience to his country.

and therefore found meanes that he redeemed them againe by compoſition. Peraduenture this is not to be maruelled at in Ageſilaus, that newes being brought him on a time, that in a great battell fought by the citie of CORINTHE, where were many worthy and valiant Captaines ſlaine of the enemies, and but few of the SPARTANS: he ſeemed not to reioyce at it, but rather to fetch a grieuous ſigh, ſaying. O poore GRECE, how vnfortunate art thou to haue ſlaine with thine owne handes ſo many valiant Captaines of thine owne people, as ioyning together, might at one field haue ouercome all the barbarous people. The PHARSALIANS harying and troubling the rereward of Ageſilaus army, he put forth fiue hundred horſemen which gaue them ſo luſty a charge, that he ouerthrew them by force. For this victorie, he ſet vp tokens of triumph vpon the mountaine called Narthacium, and this victory pleaſed him aboue all the reſt, becauſe with the ſmall number of horſemen which he had gotten together of himſelfe, he had ouerthrowen the glory and pride of the enemies horſemen in battell, whereof they had vaunted many yeares before. Thither came Diphridas one of the Ephores vnto him, ſent of purpoſe from SPARTA, to commaund him immediatly to inuade BOEOTIA with his armie. Now though Ageſilaus intended ſome other time with a greater power to enter BOEOTIA, yet becauſe he would not diſobey the counſels commaundement of SPARTA: he told his men ſtraight, that the battell for the which they returned out of ASIA, was at hand, and therefore he ſent for two companies of them which lay in camp by CORINTHE. The LACEDÆMONIANS that were at SPARTA, to honour Ageſilaus for that he had obeyed their commaundement ſo readily: proclaimed in the citie, that as many young men as were deſirous to go aide the king, ſhould come and enter their names. Notwithſtanding, they onely choſe but fiftie of the valianteſt among them, and ſent them vnto him. In the meane time, Ageſilaus paſſed through the country of THERMOPYLES, and coaſting ouer the land of PHOCIDE, confederates to the LACEDÆMONIANS, he entred into BOEOTIA, and camped by the citie of CHÆRONEA: where immediatly after his arriuall, he ſodainly ſaw the ſunne eclipſed, and darkened in the faſhion of a new moone. Euen withall, came the newes of the death of Piſander vnto him, who was ſlaine in a battel which he loſt by ſea, fighting againſt Pharnabazus and Conon, hard by the Ile of GNIDOS. Theſe newes were very heauy vnto him, both for reſpect of the perſon his kinſeman whom he loſt, as alſo for the great loſſe that happened to the common wealth. Neuertheleſſe, fearing his ſouldiers would be diſcouraged with the newes, and become faint harted, being ready to ioyne battell: he commaunded them that came from the ſea, to brute abroad a contrary tale to that they told him, and he himſelfe to make good their ſpeach, came out among them, with a garland of flowers on his head, and did ſacrifice to the goddes, as thanking them for the good newes, ſending to euery one of his friends a peece of fleſh ſacrificed, as he commonly vſed to do, in any publike cauſe of ioy. Then marching forward, he ſtraight diſcouered his enemies farre off, & they likewiſe him: and thereupon put his men in battell ray, & gaue the left wing vnto the ORCHOMENIANS, leading himſelf the right wing. The THEBANS on the other ſide, placed themſelues in the right wing of their army, & gaue the left vnto the ARGIVES. Xenophō being at that battel on Ageſilaus ſide, writeth that he neuer knew of the like field fought. At the firſt onſet, the conflict was not great between both, neither held long, becauſe the THEBANS brake the ORCHOMENIANS ſtraight, and Ageſilaus the ARGIVES. But when either ſide vnderſtood that the left wings of their battels were in great diſtreſſe, and that they turned their backes: they returned ſodainly againe. And where Ageſilaus might eaſily haue had the victory without any daunger, if he had ſuffred the ſquadron of the enemies to paſſe by him, & afterwards to haue charged them in the rereward: of a noble courage to ſhew his valiantneſſe, he gaue charge vpon the voward, to haue honour in ouercomming them. The THEBANS on the other ſide no leſſe valiantly receiued him, and fought luſtily on all handes: but the cruelleſt fight was about Ageſilaus perſon, with the fiftie young men that were ſent to gard him, who ſhewed themſelues very valiant. Ageſilaus was ſore hurt, notwithſtanding their valiant reſiſtance, his armour being paſſed through with their pikes & ſwordes in ſundry places: whereupon they enuironned him round amongſt them, and kept him from the enemies, killing a great number of thē, & many of themſelues alſo being killed. In fine, finding the THEBANS too ſtrōg in the voward they were forced to do that which they refuſed at the firſt: and opening themſelues, gaue them paſſage thorow them. So when they were paſſed them, the Spartans perceiuing how loſely and diſorderly they marched, as thinking themſelues out of all danger, followed them, and gaue charge vpon ther flancke. But all this could not make the Thebans flie: for they reioycing for their victorie at this battell, retired faire and ſoftly vnto the mountaine Helicon. But Ageſilaus, notwithſtanding he was very ſore hurt, with many a grieuous wound, would not go into his pauillion to be dreſſed before he had bene firſt at the place where the battell was fought, and had ſeene his men that were ſlaine brought away in their armors. As many of his enemies as were fled into the temple of Minerua Itonian, which was not far from thence: (where alſo were ſet vp tokens of triumphe offred vnto her long time before by the Thebans, when they had ouercome the armie of the Athenians, vnder the conduct of Sparton their Captaine, and had ſlaine alſo Tolmides their Captaine in the field) he commanded his men they ſhould let them go where they would. The next morning by breake of day, Ageſilaus deſirous to ſee if the Thebans had any courage to come downe to fight againe: commanded his ſouldiers to put garlands vpon their heads, and his muſitians to ſound their ſhalmes or pipes, whileſt he did ſet vp a token of triumph as victorious. Moreouer, his enemies ſending to him to aske leaue to take away their dead men, he granted them truce for the time, and thereby confirmed his victorie. After that, being caried to the citie of Delphes, where the Pythian games were plaide, he made a ſolemne proceſſion and common ſacrifice vnto Apollo, and offered him the tenth parte of all his ſpoiles which he had brought out of Asia, which amounted to the ſumme of an hundred talents. This thing done, he returned into his countrie, where he was greatly honored and eſteemed of all his citizens and countrimen, for his orderly life and noble behauiour: for he was no changeling, but the ſelfe ſame man in ſtate & condition that he was before he tooke his iorney. He transformed not himſelfe into ſtrangers maners, as commonly other Captaines do, that returne out of a farre countrie where they haue made warres: neither did he ſcorne his countrie faſhions, or ſhewed himſelfe diſobedient to the lawes thereof, but alwaies kept and obſerued them, without any manner of alteration in his meate or drinke, in waſhing or bathing, in his wiues apparell, in his armory, or any way elſe in his houſhold ſtuffe, as if he had neuer paſſed ouer the riuer of Eurotas. Yet further, he left his olde gates ſtanding that were of ſo great continuance, that they were thought to be thoſe which Ariſtodemus had ſet vp. Xenophon alſo ſaith, that his daughters Canathrum was nothing more ſumptuous than any others were. A Canathrum in Lacedæmon, is a kinde of coche or charret after the likeneſſe of griffins, harts, or goates: vpon the which they caried young wenches in ſolemne proceſſions in the citie. Xenophon wrote not what was the name of this daughter of Ageſilaus: and Dicæarchus alſo was much offended, that they neither knew Ageſilaus daughters name, nor yet the mother of Epaminondas. Yet we finde in the Laconian Chronicles, that Ageſilaus wiues name was Cleora, one of his daughters called Apolia, and the other Prolyta. Moreouer, Ageſilaus ſpeare is ſeene to this day in the citie of Sparta, euen like vnto others, and no manner of difference. Now Ageſilaus perceiuing certaine citizens of Sparta to ſtand vpon their reputation, and eſteeming themſelues aboue others, becauſe they kept horſe in their ſtable: perſuaded his ſiſter Cyniſca to ſend her coche and coche horſes to the Olympian games to runne for the beſt priſe, only to let the Grecians ſee that it was no act of any vertue, but ſimply of riches and coſt. Furthermore hauing Xenophon the Philoſopher about him, whome he loued and made great account of, he perſuaded him to ſend for his ſonnes to Lacedæmon, that they might be brought vp there, where they ſhould learne the nobleſt ſcience that men could poſſibly learne, to wit, to obey, and to commaund. When Lyſander was dead, Ageſilaus at his returne out of Asia, found a great faction and conſpiracie raiſed by his meanes againſt him in Sparta: and becauſe it might appeare what manner of citizen Lyſander was when he liued, he was likely to haue openly ſhewed and declared an Oration which he found among his writings (the which the Orator Cleon Halicarnaſſeus had written for him, and Lyſander ſhould haue cunned without booke, to haue ſpoken in open aſſembly) that was to ſtirre innouation, and in manner haue made a change of the whole gouernment of the commonwealth of Lacedæmon. Howbeit there was a graue counſeller that hauing red the oration, and doubting the apparant reaſons and perſuaſions alleaged, tolde him, that he would wiſh him not to pluck vp the dead againe out of his graue, but rather to burie this oration together with his bodie. Ageſilaus liked the counſell, and proceeded no further. And for them that either were, or had bin his enemies, he did them no hurt openly: but found the means to make ſome of them to be ſent as Lieutenant of armie, or otherwiſe to haue charge in the wars. In fine, he made it openly knowne, what couetous and wicked men they had bene in their charges: ſo that when they were accuſed of it before the councell, he would then helpe & intreate for them. By this means he made them againe his friends, where they had bene his enemies: inſomuch as in the ende, he had not one enemie at all. For the other king Ageſipolis his colleague, whoſe father had bin baniſhed: he being a very young man, and of gentle nature, medled not greatly with gouernment of the commonwealth. Neuertheleſſe, he ſo behaued himſelfe vnto Ageſilaus, that he made him his verie good friend: for both the kings when they were in the citie, did eate together in one hall. Then Ageſilaus knowing that Ageſipolis (as himſelfe) was giuen to loue, would euer miniſter talke to him of the goodly young boyes of the citie, intiſing him to loue ſome one of them, which he himſelfe did loue: and therein he was both his companion and helper. For in theſe LACONIAN loues there was no manner of diſhoneſtie offered, but a true affection and honeſt regarde to frame the boy beloued vnto vertue and honeſt conditions: as we haue more amply declared in the life of Lycurgus. Ageſilaus by this meanes, hauing the whole authoritie (aboue all men in the citie) in his hands: made his halfe brother Teleutias Generall by ſea, and himſelfe with the armie by land went to beſiege the citie of CORINTHE, where with his brothers helpe by ſea he tooke the long walles of the ſame. The ARGIVES which kept CORINTHE at that time, at Ageſilaus arriuall there were ſolemnizing the feaſt of the Iſthmian games: who made them flie, euen as they came from ſacrificing vnto the god Neptune, driuing them to leaue all their preparation and ſolemnitie. Then diuerſe baniſhed men of CORINTHE that were in his armie, beſought him that he would keepe theſe Iſthmian games. But he denied them, yet was contented they ſhould themſelues ſolemnize them, and ſo himſelfe remained there, during the time of the feaſt, for their ſafety. Afterwards when Ageſilaus was gone thence, the ARGIVES returned, and did celebrate the Iſthmian games, and there were ſome of them which hauing wonne the game at the firſt, did alſo winne it at the ſecond time: and others that were victours before, were this ſecond time ouercome. Whereupon Ageſilaus ſaid, that the ARGIVES ſhewed themſelues rancke cowards, that eſteeming ſo much (as they did) theſe plaies and ſacrifices, they durſt not once offer to fight with him for defence of the ſame. For himſelfe, touching ſuch like ſportes and games, he euer thought it good to keepe a meane, and not to be too curious. For he was contented to honour ſuch ſolemne aſſemblies and common feaſts with his preſence, as were commonly vſed in SPARTA, and tooke great pleaſure to ſee the ſports betweene the young boyes and girles of SPARTA: howbeit touching the games, he ſeemed not to be acquainted with ſome of them, wherein others had great delight. As we read, that Callipides an excellent ſtage plaier (wonderfully eſteemed of among the GRECIANS for a ſingular man in that arte) meeting Ageſilaus on a time, at the firſt did his dutie to him, and then arrogantly thruſt himſelfe among them that walked with him, thinking the king would haue made much of him: but perceiuing he made no countenance to him, in the end he asked him: O king Ageſilaus, doe you not knowe me? Ageſilaus looking vpon him, aunſwered: what, art not thou Callipides the ſtage plaier? And ſo made no further account of him. An other time being deſired to heare a man that naturally counterfeited the nightingalls voice: he would not heare him, ſaying, I haue oftentimes heard the nightingall it ſelfe. Another time alſo when Menecrates the Phiſitian (hauing by good fortune cured a deſperate diſeaſe) called himſelfe Iupiter, and arrogantly vſurped that name, preſuming in a letter he wrote vnto Ageſilaus, to ſubſcribe it in this manner, Menecrates Iupiter, vnto king Ageſilaus, greeting: Ageſilaus wrote againe vnto him, Ageſilaus vnto *Menecrates health. So, whileſt Ageſilaus was in the territorie of CORINTHE (where he had taken the temple of Iuno) beholding his ſouldiers forraging and ſpoiling the countrie rounde about: Ambaſſadours came to him from THEBES, to pray him to make peace with the THEBANS. But he that alwaies hated the THEBANS, and beſides that thought it then very requiſite for the good ſucceſſe of his doings, to make light of it: ſeemed as he neither heard nor ſaw them that ſpake vnto him. But euen at that very inſtant, as by diuine reuenge to crie quittance, there fell a great miſhap vpon him. For before the Ambaſſadors were gone from him, he had newes that one of their bandes called the mothers, were ſlaine euery man by Iphicrates: which was the greateſt loſſe that they in long time before had ſuſtained. For they loſt a great number of valiant ſouldiers, all naturall LACEDÆMONIANS: who being well armed euery man, were ſlaine by naked or light armed hirelings. Thereupon Ageſilaus went ſtraight into the field with hope to ſaue them, or at the leaſt to be reuenged. But receiuing certaine intelligence by the way that they were all ſlaine, he returned againe to the temple of Iuno from whence he came, and then ſent for the Ambaſſadors of the BOEOTIANS, to giue them audience. But they, to requite his former diſdaine vnto them, made no manner of ſpeach of peace, but onely requeſted him to ſuffer them to enter into CORINTHE. Ageſilaus being offended, aunſwered them: if it be to ſee your friends triumphe of their victorie, yee may ſafely do it to morrow. Thereupon the next morning taking the Ambaſſadors with him, he deſtroied the CORINTHIANS country, euen to the walles of their citie. And when he had made the Ambaſſadors ſee, that the citizens of CORINTHE durſt not come out into the field to defend their countrie: he gaue them leaue to depart. Then taking the remaine of that band that was ouerthrowne, which by flight had eſcaped: he brought them into LACEDÆMON againe, alwaies remouing his campe before day, and neuer encamped till darke night, becauſe the ARCADIANS (their mortall enemies) ſhould not reioice at their loſſe. After this voiage, to gratifie the ACHAIANS, he entred in with them into the countrie of ACARNANIA, and brought great ſpoiles from thence, after he had ouercome them in battell. Moreouer, when the ACHAIANS beſought him to remaine with them all the winter, to keepe their enemies from ſowing of their ground: he made them anſwer he would not. For, ſaid he, they will be afraide of warre the next yeare, when all their fields ſhall be ſowne with corne: & ſo indeed it came to paſſe. For the army returning againe they made peace incontinectly with the ACHAIANS. About that time, Pharnabazus & Conon, with the king of PERSIAES army, being Lords of the ſea without let of any, deſtroyed and ſpoiled all the coaſt of LACONIA. Moreouer, the city of ATHENS did reare vp her wals again by helpe of Pharnabazus money, wherewith he had furniſhed them. Thereupon the LACEDÆMONIANS thought good to make peace with the king of PERSIA, and to that ende ſent Antalcidas Ambaſſadour vnto Tiribazus, moſt ſhamely and cruelly betraying to the king, the GRÆCIANS inhabiting in ASIA, for whoſe libertie Ageſilaus had made warres with him before. So, it was Ageſilaus hap not to be ſoiled with any part of his ſhame: for Antalcidas that was his enemie, ſought all the meanes he could to conclude this peace, for that he ſaw warre did daily increaſe the authoritie, honor, and fame of Ageſilaus. Notwithſtanding, he anſwered one then, that reproued him for that the LACEDÆMONIANS did fauor the MEDES: no, ſaid he, they do not ſo, but the MEDES do play the LACEDÆMONIANS. Neuertheles, threatning warre to all the GRECIANS, which would not agree to the conditions of this peace: he compelled them to yeeld vnto that the king of PERSIA liked. But ſurely he did this chieflie for reſpect of the THEBANS, to the end that they being enforced by the capitulations of the peace, to ſet the country of BOEOTIA at libertie againe, ſhould be ſo much the weaker. This plainly appeared ſoone after by that that followed. For Phœbidas hauing committed a fowle act, in open peace to take the caſtell of the citie of THEBES, called Cadmea, offending therby all the other GRECIANS (and the SPARTANS themſelues alſo not being very well pleaſed withall, & thoſe ſpecially which were Ageſilaus enemies) Phœbidas being asked in great anger, at whoſe commandement he had done that ſodaine enterpriſe: to lay all the ſuſpition of the fact vpon him: Ageſilaus for Phœbidas diſcharge, letted not openly to ſay, that the qualitie of the fact was to be conſidered of, whether it were profitable for the commonwealth or not: and that it was well done of him, the thing falling out profitable for his country to do it of his own head without commandement. All this notwithſtanding he was wont to ſay in priuate talke, that iuſtice was the chiefeſt of all vertues, and therfore that valiantnes without iuſtice was of no validity, & that if all men were iuſt, valiantnes were of no eſtimation. And to them that told him, the great king will haue it ſo: Why, ſaid he, and wherein is he better then my ſelfe, if he be not iuſter? Iudging very wiſely therein,that they ſhould eſteeme a king (whether he were of great or ſmall power) by his iuſtice, as by the beame of princely ballance. When peace was concluded,the king of PERSIA hauing ſent him a priuate letter deſiring his friendſhip, Ageſilaus refuſed it,ſaying:that common friendſhip was enough betwixt them,and that they ſhould neede none other, ſo long as that was kept. But this notwithſtanding, when it came to the point of performance,he went from his firſt good opinion, and gaue place to his will and ambition,ſpecially againſt the THEBANS, at that time when he did not onely ſaue Phœbidas, but alſo procured the citie of SPARTA to take the fault vpon them which he had committed,and to iuſtifie it, by keeping the caſtle of Cadmea ſtill, and making Archias and Leontidas Gouernors of the citie of THEBES,by whom Phœbidas came by the caſtel of Cadmea,and poſſeſſed it. Thereupon euery man thought ſtraight,that Phœbidas was he that had put the matter in execution,and that Ageſilaus gaue the counſell to do it:as things falling out afterwards,did manifeſtly proue the ſuſpition true. For,after that the THEBANS had driuen the garriſon of the LACEDÆMONIANS out of the caſtell of Cadmea, and reſtored their citie againe to libertie, burthening them that they had traiterouſly ſlaine Archias and Leontidas (who indeed were tyrants,though in name Gouernours) he made warre with them: and Cleombrotus,raigning then king with him after Ageſipolis death,was ſent before into BŒOTIA with an armie, Ageſilaus was diſpenſed with by lawe for going any more to the warres, by reaſon of his age, for that he was fortie yeare olde from the firſt growth of haire on his face,and therefore went not that iorney: being aſhamed,that the THEBANS ſhould now ſee him fight to reuẽge the tyrants deaths, who had but a litle before taken armes for the baniſhed men,againſt the PHLIASIANS,

At that time there was a LACONIAN called Sphodrias,of the contrarie faction vnto Ageſilaus: and was then gouernor in the citie of THESPIES,a valiant and ſtout man of his hands,but euer fuller of vaine hope,than of good iudgement. He deſiring fame, and ſuppoſing that Phœbidas came to dignitie and great eſtimation through his valiant enterpriſe at THEBES: perſuaded himſelfe that he ſhould win much more honor, if of himſelfe he tooke the hauen of Piræa ſodainly ſtealing vpon the ATHENIANS by land,cutting them off by that meanes from all trade by ſea. It was thought commonly that this was a practiſe deuiſed by Pelopidas and Gelon, Gouernors of BŒOTIA,who had allured certaine men to faine themſelues very deuout & friendly to the LACEDÆMONIANS. Theſe men praiſing and extolling Sphodrias to his face,put him in the head that they knew none ſo worthie as himſelf alone,to take in hand ſo noble an enterpriſe. Thus by their perſuaſions they trained him on to this attempt,which for vilenes was nothing inferior vnto that tretcherous winning of the caſtell Cadmea at THEBES: although it was attempted with leſſe hardineſſe & diligence. For day was broken when he was yet in the plaine of Thriaſium, where he made account to haue bin at the walles of Piræa by night. Furthermore it is reported, that the men he brought with him ſeeing certaine fires from the temples of the citie of ELEVSIN,were all afraide & amazed: yea he himſelfe alſo fainted perceiuing he was diſcouered,& ſo returned back with ſhame & diſhonor to the city of THESPIES, without any exploit done, ſauing only a litle ſpoile taken.

Thereupon accuſers were ſtraight ſent from ATHENS vnto SPARTA, who vpon their arriuall found that they needed not to accuſe him,for that the councell and Gouernours of the citie had already ſent for him to come vnto them,to condemne him of high treaſon. But he durſt not returne to SPARTA,fearing the furie of his countriemen, thinking indeed that they would ſeeme as though the wrong had bene done to them, becauſe it ſhould not be thought that they had cauſed it to be done. This Sphodrias had a ſonne called Cleonymus,a very faire boy, with whome Archidamus (Ageſilaus ſonne) was farre in loue: who then was maruelous ſorie to ſee this boy he loued, in ſo great danger to loſe his father,and yet durſt not be ſeene to helpe him, becauſe Sphodrias was one of Ageſilaus aduerſaries. Notwithſtanding, Cleonymus making his mone to him with the teares in his eyes,and praying him to pacifie his father Ageſilaus (whom they feared aboue all men elſe) Archidamus followed his father three or foure daies together, and durſt not breake the matter to him: in fine, the day of the next ſeſſion being at hand,when iudgement ſhould be giuen of Sphodrias,he boldly ventured to tell him, how that Cleonymus had praied him to be an humble ſuter to him touching his fathers fact. Ageſilaus vnderſtanding that his ſonne loued

Cleonymus, would not withdrawe him from louing of him, becauſe the boy euen from his childhood gaue alwaies good hope that one day he would ſure make as honeſt a man as any other whatſoeuer: neither made he any countenance to his ſonne, as though he would do any thing at his ſute, but onely anſwered him, for that, he would do as became him in ſuch a caſe. Whereupon Archidamus being baſhfull, left comming any more to Cleonymus, where before he would ſee him oftentimes in a day. This made Sphodrias friends deſpaire of his life more then before, vntill Etymocles, one of Ageſilaus familiars talking with them, tolde them that for the fact it ſelfe, Ageſilaus thought it a ſhamefull deede, and as much miſliked it as might be: but for Sphodrias ſelfe, that he tooke him for a valiant man, and ſaw that the commonwealth had neede of men of ſuch ſeruice. This was Ageſilaus common talke to pleaſe his ſonne, when any man came to ſpeake to him of Sphrodias accuſation. Inſomuch that Cleonymus found ſtraight that Archidamus had dealt as faithfully and friendly for him as might be, and then Sphodrias friends alſo tooke heart againe vnto them, to ſolicite his cauſe, and to be earneſt ſuters for him. Ageſilaus among other had this ſpeciall propertie, that he loued his children deerly: and a tale goeth on him, that he would play with them in his houſe when they were litle ones, and ride vpon a litle cocke horſe, or a reede, as a horſeback. Inſomuch as a friend of his taking him one day with the maner, playing among his children: he praied him to ſay nothing, till he had litle children himſelfe. In fine, Sphodrias was quit by his iudges. The Athenians vnderſtanding it, ſent to proclaime warre with the Lacedæmonians. Whereupon Ageſilaus was much reproued, becauſe that to pleaſe the fonde affection of his ſonne, he had hindered iuſtice, and brought his citie to be accuſed among the Græcians for ſuch grieuous crimes. Ageſilaus perceiuing that king Cleombrotus his companion went with no very good will to make warre with the Thebans, he breaking the order ſet downe for leading of the army, which was kept before, went to the warres himſelfe in perſon, and ſo inuading Boeotia he both receiued and did great hurt. Wherupon Antalcidas ſeeing him hurt one day, now truly (ſaid he) the Thebans haue paide you your deſerued hire, for teaching them againſt their willes to be ſouldiers, that neither had will nor ſkill to fight. For in deed they ſay the Thebans became better ſouldiers and warriours than they were before, being daily trained & exerciſed in armes through the continual inuaſions of the Lacedæmonians. Lo, this was the reaſon, why the olde father Lycurgus in his lawes called Rhetra, did forbid them to make war too oft with one ſelfe people, becauſe that by compulſion they ſhould not be made expert ſoldiers. For this cauſe did the confederats of Lacedæmon hate Ageſilaus, ſaying, that it was not for any knowne offence to the ſtate, but for very ſpight and priuate malice of his own, that he ſought to vndo the Thebans in this maner: & that to follow his humor, they conſumed themſelues going yearly to the warres one while this way, an other while that way, without any neceſſitie at all, following a few Lacedæmonians, themſelues being alwaies the greater number. Thē it was, that Ageſilaus deſiring to make thē ſee what number of men of war they were, vſed this deuiſe. On a time he commanded all the allies to ſit downe together one with an other by themſelues, and the Lacedæmonians alſo by themſelues. Then he made a herauld proclaime that all potmakers ſhould ſtand vp on their feete. When they were vp, he made him crie to the braſiers to riſe alſo. After them in like maner, the carpenters: then the maſons, and ſo conſequently all occupations one after an other. So that at the length the confederats obeying the proclamation, were all in maner on their feete. The Lacedæmonians, not one of them roſe: becauſe all baſe mechanicall crafts were forbidden them to occupie. Then Ageſilaus laughing at them, loe, my friends ſaid he: do ye not ſee now that we bring moe ſouldiers to the field, than ye do? At his returne from this iourney of Thebes, paſſing by the city of Megara, as he went vp into the councell houſe within the caſtell, there ſodainly tooke him a great crampe in his left legge, that ſwelled extreamly, and put him to great paine, men thinking that it was but bloud which had filled the vaine: a Phiſitian of Syracusa in Sicile being there, ſtraight opened a vaine vnder the ankle of his foote, which made the paine to ceaſe: notwithſtanding there came ſuch abundance of bloud, that they could not ſtanche it, ſo that he ſounded oft, and was in great danger of preſent death. In fine, a way was found to ſtop it, and they caried him to Lacedæmon, where he lay ſicke a long time, ſo that he was paſt going to the warres any more. The SPARTANS in the meane time receiued great ouerthrowes both by ſea and land, and among other, their greateſt ouerthrow was at the battell of LEVCTRES, where the THEBANS ouercame and ſlue them in plaine battell. Then the GRECIANS were all of one minde to make a generall peace, and thereupon came Ambaſſadors and the Deputies from all the cities of GRECE, and met at LACEDÆMON to that ende. One of theſe Deputies was Epaminondas, a notable learned man, and a famous Philoſopher, but as yet vnskilfull in warres. He ſeeing how the other Ambaſſadors curried fauor with Ageſilaus, only he of the reſt kept his grauity to ſpeake freely, and made an Oration, not for the THEBANS alone, but for all GRECE in generall, declaring to them all, how warres did only increaſe the greatneſſe and power of the city of SPARTA, and contrarily did miniſh and decay all other cities and townes of GRECE: and for this cauſe, that he did counſell them all to conclude a good and perfect peace indifferently for all, to the end it might continue the longer, when they were all alike. Ageſilaus perceiuing then that all the GRECIANS preſent at the aſſemblie gaue him good eare, and were glad to heare him ſpeake thus boldly of peace: asked him openly, if he thought it meete and reaſonable, that all BOEOTIA ſhould be ſet cleere at libertie againe? Epaminondas preſently & boldly againe asked him: if he thought it iuſt and requiſite to ſet all LACONIA cleere again at liberty? Ageſilaus being offended therwith, ſtood vpon his feet, and commanded him to anſwer plainly whether they would ſet all BOEOTIA at libertie or not? Epaminondas replied vnto him with the ſelf ſpeach again, & asked him whether they would ſet al LACONIA at liberty or not? That nettled Ageſilaus ſo, that (beſides he was glad of ſuch a cloke, for the old grudge he euer bare vnto the THEBANS) he preſently put the name of the THEBANS out of the bill of thoſe, which ſhould haue bene compriſed within the league, and cried open warres vpon them in the market place. For the reſt, he licenſed the other Deputies & Ambaſſadors of the people of GRECE to depart, with this concluſion: that they ſhould louingly take order among themſelues for the controuerſies betwixt them, if they could peaceably agree together, & they that could not fall to ſuch agreement, that then they ſhould trie it by wars, for that it was a hard thing to take vp all quarrels among them. King Cleombrotus by chaunce was at that time in the countrie of PHOCIDE with his armie, vnto whom the Ephori wrote that he ſhould forthwith ſpoile the THEBANS countrie: and therewith alſo they ſent to all their confederates to come and aide them, which had no great fanſie to the iorney, and were loth to make war with them, but yet durſt not refuſe to go, nor diſobey the LACEDÆMONIANS. And notwithſtanding that there were many ſignes preſaging ill luck, as we haue written in the life of Epaminodas, & that Prothous LACONIAN was againſt the enterpriſe of this warre all that he could: Ageſilaus would needs forward, hoping he had now found oportunitie to be reuenged of the THEBANS, ſith all GRECE beſides was in peace and at libertie, themſelues onely exempted from treatie of peace. If there had bene no other thing in it but the very ſhortneſſe of time, that made it manifeſt enough that this warre was begun in a geere, without any manner of reaſon. For the generall peace amongſt the GRECIANS was concluded at SPARTA the fourteenth of May, and the LACEDÆMONIANS were ouercome at the battell of LEVCTRES the fifteene of Iune: ſo as there was but twenty daies betwene them. There were ſlaine a thouſand LACEDÆMONIANS with their king Cleombrotus, and the choiſeſt of the valianteſt SPARTANS about him. Amongſt them was alſo ſlaine that goodly young man Cleonymus, Sphodrias ſonne, of whom we ſpake before: who hauing bene beaten downe thriſe at the kings foote, three times got vp againe, but at the length was ſlaine, valiantly fighting againſt the THEBANS. This great ouerthrowe chancing to the LACEDÆMONIANS vnlooked for, and withall ſo glorious a victorie vnto the THEBANS, as GRECIANS fighting with GRECIANS had neuer the like: the vãquiſhed citie of SPARTA notwithſtanding deſerued no leſſe honour and commendation for her fortitude and worthineſſe, than did the victorious citie of THEBES. For as Xenophon writeth, that as amongſt good men euen in table talke, and in their ſportes and mirth there falleth out euer ſome thing of wit worth the noting and bearing away: euen ſo in like caſe, no leſſe, but rather more, ought noble mens words to be weyed, and their countenances marked as well in aduerſitie as in proſperitie. At that time by chance there was a common feaſt day in the citie of SPARTA, which was full of ſtrangers that came to ſee the daunces and ſportes of them that ſhewed naked in the Theater, when as the meſſengers arriued that brought the newes of the battell loſt at Levctres. The Ephori knowing then that the rumor ſtraight ranne all about, that they were all vndone, and how they had loſt the ſignory and commaundement ouer all Greece: would not ſuffer them for all this to breake off their daunce in the Theater, nor the city in any thing to change the forme of their feaſt, but ſent vnto the parents to euery mans houſe, to let them vnderſtand the names of them that were ſlaine at the battell, they them ſelues remaining ſtill in the Theater to ſee the daunces and ſportes continued, to iudge who caried the beſt games away. The next morning when euery man knew the number of them that were ſlaine, and of thoſe alſo that were eſcaped: the parentes and friends of them that were dead, met in the market place, looking chearefully of the matter, and one of them embraced an other. On the other ſide, the parents of them that ſcaped, kept their houſes with their wiues, as folke that mourned. If any of them alſo had occaſion to go abroad out of their houſes, for any matter of neceſſity: ye ſhould ſee him looke ſo heauily and ſad, that he durſt not talke with you, lift vp his head, nor looke ye in the face. Beſides all this, euen amongeſt the women there was greater difference. For the mothers of them that kept their ſons which came from the battell, were ſad and ſorrowfull, and ſpake not a word. Contrarily, the mothers of them that were ſlaine, went friendly to viſite one an other, to reioyce together. Now when the people ſaw that their confederates beganne to forſake them, and did daily looke that Epaminondas glorying in his victory, would inuade Peloponnesvs: then they beganne to bee pricked in conſcience about the oracles of the goddes, thinking that this misfortune came to their city, for that they had thruſt out of the kingdom a man perfect in lims, to place an impotent perſon, being ſpecially warned by the gods to beware of that aboue all things. This notwithſtanding, they had him in ſuch veneration for his valiantnes, and his authority was ſuch thereby, that they did not only vſe him in war, as their king and ſoueraigne Captaine: but in ciuill cauſes alſo wherein there roſe any queſtion, they euer vſed his counſell and aduiſe. As they did, when they durſt not puniſhe them (according to the penall lawes) that fled from the battell, whom they call at Sparta Treſantas, (being a great number of them, and men of the nobleſt houſes and of greateſt power within the city) leaſt they ſhould moue ſome ſturre or commotion among them. (For by law, they can beare no office in the common wealth. It is ſhame and reproch to giue them any wiues, and alſo to mary any of theirs. Whoſoeuer meeteth them may lawfully ſtrike them, and they muſt abide it, and not giue them a word againe. They are cōpelled to weare poore tattered cloth gowns patched with cloth of diuers colours: and worſt of all, to ſhaue the one ſide of their beards, and the other not.) Whereupon, finding the daunger great to deale with them, to execute the law according to the infamy they deſerued, ſpecially then ſtanding in neede of a great number of men of warre: they referred themſelues altogether vnto Ageſilaus, to take ſuch order in it as he thought good. But Ageſilaus then, without changing or altering any thing of the law, ſaid in open aſſembly at Lacedæmon: that for that day they ſhould let the law alone, notwithſtanding, that afterwards it ſhuld ſtand in force. By this policy he kept the law inuiolate, and ſaued alſo the honor of thoſe poore men: and withall, to put theſe youths againe in heart, being amazed with this feare, he led the army into the countrey of Arcadia, and would giue no battell, but onely tooke a ſmall city of the Mantinians, and foraged the country. This againe did a litle reuiue the city of Sparta with ſome hope, to make that it ſhould not vtterly deſpaire. But ſhortly after, Epaminondas inuaded the countrey of Laconia, with forty thouſand footemen well armed, beſides an infinite number of others light armed, and naked people, that followed his campe for the ſpoile: ſo that in all, there were about three ſcore and tenne thouſand fighting men that came in with him to inuade Laconia. It was well neare ſixe hundred yeares ſith the Dorians poſſeſſed Lacedæmon, and in all that time til then they neuer ſaw enemies in their country that durſt inuade them: but then they ſacked and burnt all that came in their way, euen vnto the riuer of Eurotas, and hard adioyning vnto Sparta, and no man durſt come out to reſiſt them. For Ageſilaus (as Theopompus writeth) would not ſuffer the Lacedæmonians to go out to fight againſt ſuch a tempeſt and fury of warre, but hauing fortified the middeſt of the city, and garded euery end of the ſtreetes with ſouldiers, hee patiently bare all the bragges and threates

of the Thebans, which challenged him out to fight, and bad him come into the field to defend his countrey, that only was the cauſe of all theſe their calamities, hauing him ſelfe procured this war. If this went to Ageſilaus heart, no leſſe grieuous were theſe troubles to him that roſe within the city. As the cries and running to and fro of the old men, which were mad to ſee that they did before their eies: and of ſeely women alſo, which no ground nor place could hold, but ranne vp and downe, as ſtraught of their wits, to heare the noiſe the enemies made, and to ſee the fire which they raiſed all the fieldes ouer. Much more ſorrowfull alſo did this make him, when as he bethought him ſelfe, that entring into his kingdome at ſuch time as the city of Sparta was in the greateſt proſperity that euer it was, he now ſaw his honor eclipſed, and the glory of his kingdome ouerthrowen: and the rather, for that him ſelfe had often auanted, that Laconian women had neuer ſeene the ſmoke of any enemies campe.

And as they ſay of Antalcidas one day, that he anſwered an Athenian that contended with him about the valiantneſſe of one an others nation, alledging for himſelfe, that the Athenians had often driuen the Lacedæmonians from the riuer of Cephiſus. It is true, ſaid the Laconian: but we did neuer driue you from the riuer of Eurotas. The like anſwer made a meane man of Sparta, to one of the Argiues that caſt him in the teeth, there are diuers of your Laconians buried in the countrey of Argolide: ſo are there none of yours, ſaid he, buried in Laconia. It is reported, that Antalcidas being one of the Ephori at that time, did ſecretly ſend his children into the Ile of Cithæra, fearing leaſt the city of Sparta ſhould be taken. Ageſilaus perceiuing that the enemies forced to paſſe ouer the riuer, to enter the city: he ſtood to defend the middle part of the city, being the higheſt place of the ſame, and there had his men ſet in order of battell. Now at that time, by chaunce the riuer of Eurotas was ſwelled greater then of ordinary, by reaſon of the ſnow waters that fell abundantly: which troubled more the Thebans with the coldnes, then roughnes of the ſame, in paſſing it ouer. Some ſhewing Ageſilaus how Epaminondas marched formoſt before his battell, he beheld him a great while, and his eye was neuer off him, ſaying neuer a word but this onely: Oh, what a noble fellow is that? Epaminondas hauing done all that he could poſſible to giue the Lacedæmonians battell, euen within the city ſelfe of Sparta, that he might there haue ſet vp ſome tokens of triumph, he could neuer intiſe Ageſilaus to come out of his fort: wherefore he was driuen in the end to depart thence, and ſo went to deſtroy all the reſt of the country.

There fell out a conſpiracy of two hundred men in Sparta, who of long time had had an ill meaning with them, and tooke that quarter of the city where the temple of Diana ſtood, called Iſſorium, a place of ſtrong ſituation, and ill to diſtreſſe. Hereupon the Lacedæmonians in fury would ſtraight haue ſet vpon them. But Ageſilaus fearing great mutiny and ſtur vpon it: commaunded that no man ſhould ſtur: and him ſelfe vnarmed, in a poore gown went thither, crying out to them that had taken that ſtrength: Sirs, yee haue not obeied my commaundement.

A fine deuiſe to apprehend the traitors.

This is not the place I appointed you to aſſemble in, neither all of you in one place: for I willed you to diſperſe your ſelues, ſome one way, ſome an other way, ſhewing them the quarters of the city. The traitors hearing theſe words, were glad, as thinking that their intent was not bewraied: and ſo leauing that ſtrength, went into thoſe partes of the city that he had ſhewed them. Ageſilaus then bringing others thither, poſſeſſed the fort of Iſſorium, and tooke fifteene of thoſe conſpiratours, and put them to death the next night following. Howbeit then there brake out an other conſpiracy farre greater then the firſt, of the Spartans them ſelues which were ſecretly gotten together into a houſe, to make ſome ſodaine ſturre and garboile, and to puniſh them in ſo great a trouble, it was hard: on the other ſide to neglect it, the conſpiracy was ouer dangerous. Ageſilaus hauing conſulted with the Ephori, did put them all to death, without any iudgement of law, neuer Spartans before them ſuffering death, without due order of law. Againe, whereas diuers of their neighbors, and of the Ilotes them ſelues, (whom they had billed in their bandes for ſouldiers) ſtale away, and ranne to their enemies, which did much diſcorage them that remained: he warned his men that they ſhould euerie day goe to their couches where they lay, and that they ſhould take away their armour that were fled, and hide it, becauſe they ſhould not know the names of them that were fled in this ſort.

The departure of the Thebans out of Laconia

Now for the departure of the Thebans, ſome ſay that they went out of Laconia by reaſon of the winter that came on, whereuppon the ARCADIANS diſcharged their bandes, and euery one departed his way in diſorder. Others alſo hold opinion, that they continued there three moneths together, during which time they deſtroyed the moſt part of the countrey. Theopompus writeth notwithſtanding, that the Captaines of the THEBANS hauing determined to depart, there came one Phrixus a SPARTAN vnto them, ſent from Ageſilaus, who brought them tenne talents that they ſhould depart out of their countrey. Thus had they money giuen them to defray their charges homewardes, to doe that, which they them ſelues had long before determined to hane done. And yet doe I wonder, how it is poſſible that all other hiſtoriographers knew nothing of this, and that Theopompus onely could tell of it. All doe acknowledge truely, that Ageſilaus onely was the cauſe that the city of SPARTA was ſaued: who leauing his ambition and ſelte will, being paſſions borne with him, did wiſely foreſee their ſafety. Neuertheleſſe, after this great ouerthrow, hee could neuer raiſe SPARTA againe to her former greatneſſe. For like as a whole body, which hauing acquainted it ſelfe continually with a moderate diet, with the leaſt diſorder doth ſurfet preſently, and ſo putteth all in daunger: euen ſo Lycurgus hauing framed a perfect ſtate of gouernment in the common wealth of SPARTA, to make her citizens liue in peace and amity together: when they did enlarge it by great kingdomes and realmes, the which the good law-maker thought vnmeete to continue happy life: they were ſtraight ouerthrowen and all went to wracke. By this time Ageſilaus was growen olde, and could no more goe to the warres for very age: but his ſonne Archidamus, with the aide which Dionyſius the tyraunt of SYRACVSA ſent vnto them, wanne a battell againſt the ARCADIANS, called the teareleſſe battell: for there died not one of his men, and they ſlue a great number of their enemies. This victory plainely ſhewed the great weakeneſſe and decay of the city of SPARTA. For in former times it was ſo common a thing vnto them to ouercome their enemies in battell, that they did ſacrifice nothing elſe to the goddes in token of thankes, within the city, but a poore cocke: and they that had fought the battell made no boaſt of it: neither did they that heard the news reioice greatly at it. For when they had wonne that great battell at the city of MANTINEA, which Thucydides deſcribeth: the Ephori only ſent the meſſenger that brought the newes for reward, a peece of powdered meate, and no other thing. But then, when newes was brought of this victory, and that they vnderſtoode Archidamus came home victorious: neither man nor woman could keepe the city, but the father him ſelfe went firſt of all to meete him, with the teares in his eies for ioy, and after him all the other Magiſtrates and officers of the city, and a ſwarme of old folke both men and women came downe to the riuers ſide, holding vp their handes to heauen, and thanking the goddes, as if their city had redeemed and recouered her ſhame and loſt honour, and beganne now to riſe againe, as before it did. For vntill that time, ſome ſay, that the husbandes durſt not boldly looke their wiues in the faces, they were ſo aſhamed of their great loſſes and miſerable eſtate. Now the city of MESSINA being by Epaminondas reedified and repleniſhed with people, he called home againe out of all partes, the naturall inhabitants of the ſame. The SPARTANS durſt not fight with him (nor to hinder his purpoſe) though it ſpighted them to the hearts, and were angry with Ageſilaus, for that in his raigne they had loſt all that territory, which was as great as all LACONIA ſelfe, and that for goodnes and fertility compared with the beſt parts of all GREECE, the which they had quietly poſſeſſed many yeares before. And this was the cauſe why Aegſilaus would not agree to the peace, which the THEBANS ſent to offer him: and all becauſe he would not relinquiſh that in words, which the enemies kept in deedes. Therefore being wilfully bent once more to fight with them, he went not only without recouering the thing he looked for, but had in manner alſo loſt the city of SPARTA by a warlike ſtratageme, in the which he was deceiued. For the MANTINIANS being newly reuolted again from the alliance of the THEBANS, and hauing ſent for the LACEDÆMONIANS: Epaminondas receiuing intelligence that Ageſilaus was departed from SPARTA with all his power to aid the MANTINIANS, matched away ſecretly by night from TEGEA, without the priuity of the MANTINIANS, and went ſtraight to SPARTA, the which he had almoſt ſurpriſed on the ſodaine (going an other way then Ageſilaus came, (being in manner without men to defend it. Howbeit a THESPIAN called Euthynus, as Calliſthenes ſayeth, (or as Xenaphon writeth, a Cretan,) brought Ageſilaus newes of it: who diſpatched a horſeman ſtraight to aduertiſe them of the city of Sparta, and marching forward him ſelfe to returne, ſtayed not long after before he arriued. He was no ſooner come, but incontinently alſo came the Thebans, who paſſing ouer the riuer of Eurotas, gaue aſſault to the city. Then Ageſilaus perceiuing that there was no more place nor time of ſecurity as before, but rather of deſperation and courage: he valiauntly defended it, more then an olde mans yeares could beare. Thus, through courage and deſperate minde, whereto he was neuer brought before, neither did euer vſe it, he put by the daunger, and ſaued the city of Sparta from Epaminondas handes, ſetting vp markes of triumphe for repulſing of the enemies, and making the women and children of Sparta to ſee the Lacedæmonians how honorably they rewarded their nurſe and countrey for their good education: but Archidamus chiefely of all other, fought wonderfully that day, running into euery part of the city, with a few about him, to repulſe the enemies whereſoeuer the daunger was greateſt. It is ſayed alſo that at that time there was one Iſadas the ſonne of Phœbidas, that did maruellous ſtraunge things to behold, both in the face of his enemies, as alſo in the ſight of his friendes. He was of goodly perſonage, and at that time in the prime of his youth: and being ſtarke naked, and vnarmed, his body nointed with oyle, hauing in one hand a boreſtaffe, and in the other a ſword, in this manner he went out of his houſe, and ranne amongeſt them that fought, killing and ouerthrowing his enemies that withſtoode him, and was not once hurt, either for that the goddes preſerued him for his manhoodes ſake, or elſe becauſe men thought him more then a man. The Ephori immediatly gaue him a crowne, in honor and reward of his valiantneſſe: but withall they ſet a fine on his head to pay a thouſand ſiluer Drachmas for his raſhe attempt, to hazard him ſelfe in battell, vnarmed for defence. Shortly after they fought an other great battell before the city of Mantinea. There Epaminondas hauing ouerthrowen the firſt rancks of the Lacedæmonians, and coragiouſly diſtreſſing the reſt, valiantly following the chaſe: there was one Anticrates a Laconian, who receiuing him (as Dioſcorides writeth) ſlue him with his boreſpeare. The Lacedæmonians to this day notwithſtanding, do call the offſpring of this Anticrates, Machæriones: as much to ſay, as ſwordmen, as though he had ſlaine him with a ſword. The Lacedæmonians did eſteeme this Anticrates ſo much, for that deadly ſtroke he gaue (becauſe they were afrayd of Epaminondas while he liued) that they gaue him that ſlue him, great honors and dignities, and diſcharged all his offſpring and kindred from paiment of ſubſidy and common contributions, which priuiledge one Callicrates, a kinſeman of this Anticrates enioyed euen in our time. After this battell and death of Epaminondas, the Grecians hauing taken peace generally amongſt them, Ageſilaus would needes exclude the Meſſinians from being ſworne to this peace, ſaying: that they neede not ſweare, becauſe they had no city. Now, foraſmuch as all the Grecians elſe did receiue them as amongſt the number, and tooke their oth vnto this peace: the Lacedæmonians brake off from this generall peace, and none but they only made war, in hope to recouer the Meſſenians country, and all through the allurement of Ageſilaus, who for this cauſe was thought of the Grecians a cruell and vnſatiable man for warres, to deale ſo craftily, and all to breake this generall league. Againe, hee brought him ſelfe in diſcredit with all men, being compelled to make his city bare of money, borrowing of them ſtill, and raiſing ſundry contributions amongeſt them: whereas in deede it had beene his beſt way to haue ended all thoſe miſeries, hauing ſo happy an occaſion offered at that time, and not to haue loſt ſo great an Empire of ſo many townes and cities, both by ſea and land, and all to plague his countrey, to winne the land and riches of the Meſſenians. But yet was this moſt ſhame vnto him of all other, when he gaue him ſelfe vnto one Tachos, a Captaine of the Egyptians, euery man thinking it a ſhamefull part of him, that ſuch a perſonage as he ( reputed the chiefeſt man of all the Grecians, and the which had filled the world with report of his fame and glory) ſhould for money let out his perſon to hire, and the glory of his name, vnto a barbarous perſon, a traitour and rebell to his king and maiſter, to become a mercenary Captaine and ſouldier to doe him ſeruice. And moreouer, he being now foure ſcore yeares of age and vpwardes, his body all mangled with woundes, though he had vndertaken this honourable charge for the recouery of the liberty of the GRECIANS, yet had his ambition deſerued ſome blame: for noble acts haue their time, yea rather the good and ill doe nothing differ from other, but in meane and mediocrity. But Ageſilaus had no regard of all this, and thought no manner of ſhame in ſeruice, ſpecially for benefite of the common wealth, but perſwaded him ſelfe that it was a diſhonor to him to liue idlely in a city and doe nothing, till death ſhould come and make his ſummons: thereuppon therefore he leuied men of warre through all GREECE with the money Tachos ſent vnto him, and with them tooke ſea, hauing thirty SPARTANS counſellers and aſſiſtants to him, as he had in his firſt iourney. Now Ageſilaus being arriued in EGYPT, all the chiefe Captaines and Gouernours of king Tachos came to the ſea ſhore, and honourably receiued him: and not they only, but infinite numbers of EGYPTIANS of all ſorts (that were maruellous deſirous of him, for the great ſame that went abroad of Ageſilaus) came thither from all partes to ſee what manner of man he was. But when they ſaw no ſtately traine about him, but an olde gray-beard layed on the graſſe by the ſea ſide, a litle man that looked ſimply of the matter, and but meanely apparrelled in an ill fauored threed bare gowne: they fell a laughing at him, remembring the mery tale, that the mountaines ſhould bring forth, and was deliuered of a mouſe. Beſides all this, they wondered when they ſaw men bring him preſentes to welcome him, that he tooke meale, calues, and geeſe, and ſuch groſſe things: and refuſed all confections, perfumes and other delicacies, praying them that offered thoſe dainty things to him, to giue them to the ILOTES his ſlaues. Theophraſtus writeth, that he delighted maruellouſly in the ruſhe Papyrus, and liked the garlandes they made of them, for their fineſſe and the handſomneſſe, the which he caried home with him when he departed thence. Hauing ſpoken at that time with Tachos, who was aſſembling his army to goe on his iorney: hee was not made chieftaine generall, as he looked he ſhould haue bene, but was appointed onely Colonell of all the ſtraungers, Chabrias Generall of all the army by ſea, and the chiefe of all the reſt was Tachos himſelfe in perſon. This at the firſt grieued Ageſilaus to the heart, being driuen whether he would or not, to beare with the vanity and pride of this EGYPTIAN. So he ſayled with him into PHENICE, againſt the PHENICIANS, imbaſing him ſelfe againſt his noble diſpoſition and minde, and gaue him place, vntill he ſaw time of reuenge. It chaunced that one Nectanebos a nephewe of this Tachos, hauing the leading of part of this army, rebelled againſt him, and being choſen king by the EGYPTIANS, he ſent vnto Ageſilaus, and prayed him to come and take his part. The like he did alſo vnto Chabrias, and prayed him to ioyne with him, promiſing great rewardes vnto them both. Tachos vnderſtanding that, beſought them both that they would not forſake him. Chabrias for his part alſo did likewiſe intreate Ageſilaus, and perſwade him what he could, to continue friendſhip with Tachos. Ageſilaus aunſwered him, for thee, Chabrias, thou cameſt of thine owne good will, and therefore mayeſt doe what thou thinkeſt good: but ſo is it not with me. For I am ſent hither a Captaine by my countrey, to ſerue the EGYPTIANS, and therefore it were no honeſty for me to make warre with them, whom I am ſent to ſerue and aide: were it not that they them ſelues which ſent me, doe now commaund me the contrary. This aunſwer being made, he ſent certaine of his men to SPARTA to accuſe Tachos, and to commend Nectanebos. Both they alſo for their parts ſent to intreate the councell of LACEDÆMON: the one as being alwaies their friend and confederate, and the other promiſing to be their faithfull friend thenceforth. The LACEDÆMONIANS hauing heard the requeſts of both, anſwered them openly, that Ageſilaus ſhuld conſider of his matter: and wrote ſecretly to him, that he ſhould do what he thought beſt for the common wealth of SPARTA. So Ageſilaus taking with him the mercenary ſouldiers which he had brought out of GREECE, went vnto Nectanebos, cloking his departure, that it was for the benefite of his countrey, to bewray a wicked thing: but in deede taking away the viſard to benefite his countrey, they might by a better name rightly haue tearmed it treaſon. Howbeit the LACEDÆMONIANS placing the chiefeſt point of honor, to conſiſt in the benefit of their country: did acknowledge nothing to be iuſtice, but that which they thought might ſerue for the aduauncement of the glory of SPARTA. Tachos ſeeing him ſelfe forſaken thus by his mercenary ſtraungers, fled. But now on the other ſide, there roſe an other king in the city of MENDES, againſt this Nectanebos, who hauing leauied to the number of a hundred thouſand fighting men, came to fight with Nectanebos. But he thinking to encorage Ageſilaus, told him, that in deede they were a great number of men of all ſorts together, and ſpecially men of handy craft, and therefore that they were not to be feared, becauſe they knew not what warre ment. But Ageſilaus anſwered him againe: it is not their number that I feare, but their rudeneſſe and vnskilfulneſſe, which is hardeſt of al to deceiue. For warlike ſtratagems doe moſt preuaile againſt men that haue greateſt feare and experience: and therefore they foreſee one thing rather then an other. But men of no iudgement nor experience, neither feare danger, nor haue forecaſt, and therefore do giue him no more aduantage that ſeeketh to deceiue them, then the wraſtler by ſleight is able to ouerthrow him, whom he can not ſturre nor remoue. Afterwards the MENDESIAN king him ſelfe ſent vnto Ageſilaus, to winne him if he could. Nectanebos then beganne to be afraid. For when Ageſilaus counſelled him to try it by battell as ſoone as he could, and not to prolong this warre againſt ignoraunt men that had no skill to fight, but yet for their ouer-multitude, might intrench him round about, and preuent him in diuerſe things: then he beganne to feare and ſuſpect him more, and thereupon retired into a great city well walled about, and of great ſtrength. Ageſilaus being offended that he miſtruſted him thus, tooke it inwardly: but being aſhamed to turne againe vnto the third, and alſo to depart without any exploite done, he followed him, and encloſed him ſelfe within thoſe walles. The enemies purſuing him hard, came vnto the city, and beganne to entrench it round, to keepe him in. Then the EGYPTIAN Nectanebos fearing a long ſiege, determined to giue them battell. Thereto the hiered GRECIANS gaue conſent, as deſiring no better match, and the rather alſo for that there was but ſmall ſtore of corne within the city. But Ageſilaus perſwading the contrary, would in no wiſe conſent to it: whereuppon the EGYPTIANS thought worſe of him then before, and plainely called him traitor to their king. Howbeit he did patiently beare all their accuſations, expecting time to performe an exploite he entended, which was this. The enemies had caſt a deepe trenche without to compaſſe them in. When this trench drew neare to end, and that both endes lacked not much of meeting, tarrying till night came on, he commaunded the GRECIANS to arme, and to put them ſelues in readineſſe: then he came vnto the EGYPTIAN, and ſayed vnto him. Lo here is an excellent occaſion preſented to ſaue thee, which I would not acquaint thee withall til I ſaw it brought to the perfection I looked for, fearing leaſt otherwiſe we ſhuld haue loſt it. Now ſith the enemies them ſelues haue with their owne handes giuen vs the way to ſaue our ſelues by this trench they haue caſt, the which as much as is finiſhed thereof doeth hinder their great multitude to helpe them ſelues, and that which is yet left vnfiniſhed doth giue vs oportunity to fight with them of euen hand: determine to ſhew thy valure, and following vs, ſaue thy ſelfe and thy people. For the enemies which we ſhall aſſaile before vs, ſhall neuer be able to abide vs: and the other by meanes of the trenche which defendeth vs on our ſide, can no way hurt vs. Nectanebos hearing his words, wondered at his great wiſdome, and ſo thruſting in among the GRECIANS, did aſſaile the enemies: the which were ſoone ouerthrown and put to flight, as many as durſt reſiſt and make head againſt them. Ageſilaus hauing wonne Nectanebos againe to truſt him, he once againe deceiued his enemies with the like ſubtilty wherewith he had firſt beguiled them, and which they knew not how to auoide. For one while he made as though he fled, and intiſed them to follow him: ſodainely againe he would turne this way and that way. In fine, he brought all this great multitude into a ſtraight ſluce, walled about of either ſide, with great broad ditches full of running water: ſo that when they were euen in the middeſt of it, he ſodainely ſtopped their paſſage with the front of his battell, which he caſt to the breadth of the ſluce, and thus made his number of fighting men equall with the multitude of his enemies, which could neither compaſſe him in behinde, nor flanke him on the ſides. They hauing in this ſort made ſome ſmall reſiſtaunce, in the end turned their backes and fled, and left a great number ſlaine in the field: the reſidue after that laſt ouerthrow forſooke their Captains, and fled ſtraglingly here and there. Thus the affairs of this EGYPTIAN king after that time had good ſucces, and was quietly ſtabliſhed in his kingdom, making much of Ageſilaus: and doing him all honour poſſible, prayed him to tary with him all that winter. Howbeit he would needes haſten home to his countrey, which was in warre with others, knowing that his city of SPARTA was without money, becauſe they were driuen to giue pay vnto ſtrangers. Thereupon Nectanebos in the end tooke his leaue of him very honorably, preſenting him a gift (beſides all other honors he did him) of two hundred and thirtie ſiluer talents in readie mony, to defray the charges of the warre in his country. Howbeit the ſea being rough in the winter quarter, he died by the way, hauing notwithſtanding recouered land with his ſhips in a deſert place of the coaſt of LYBIA, which was called the hauen of Menelaus, after he was foureſcore and foure yeare old: of the which he had raigned one and forty yeares king of SPARTA, and thirtie yeares thereof and more he was alwaies taken and reputed for the greateſt perſon, and in manner Chiefetaine generall of all GRECE, vntill the battell of LEVCTRES. Now the LACEDÆMONIANS hauing a cuſtome to burie the dead bodies of their citizens that died out of their country, in the ſame place where they departed: (the bodies of their kings excepted) the SPARTANS which were at that time about Ageſilaus, annointed his bodie with waxe for lacke of honny, and caried him home to SPARTA in this manner. His ſonne Archidamus ſucceeded him in the kingdome, whoſe iſſue ſucceſſiuely raigned continually after him, vnto the time of Agis (who was the fifth king in ſucceſſion after Ageſilaus) whom in deede Leonidas put to death, becauſe he ſought to reſtore the LACEDÆMONIANS ancient diſcipline and forme of life.

THE LIFE OF Pompey.

MAGNVS PI. POM.

THe ROMAINS ſeeme to haue loued Pompey from his childhood, with the ſelfe affection that Promotheus in the tragedy of AEſchylus appeareth to haue borne vnto Hercules, after that he was deliuered by him: when he ſaied,

So great a hate I bare not to the father,
But that I loue the ſonne of him much rather.

For the ROMAINES neuer ſhewed more bitter hate againſt any other Captaine, then they did vnto Strabo Pompeys father. Truly ſo long as he liued, they feared his greatneſſe obtained by armes, for in deed he was a noble Captaine: but being ſtriken with a thunderbolt, and dead, they tooke him from the beare whereon his bodie lay as they caried him to buriall, and did thereto great villanie. Contrariwiſe, neuer any other ROMAINE (but Pompey) had the peoples earneſt goodwilles ſo ſoone, nor that in proſperitie and aduerſity continued longer conſtant, than vnto Pompey. One only cauſe procured the fathers hate, and that was: an vnſatiable and greedy deſire of money. But Pompey his ſonne, was for many occaſions beloued. As, for temperance of life, aptneſſe to armes, eloquence of tongue, faithfulnes of word, and curteſie in conuerſation: ſo that there was neuer man that requeſted any thing with leſſe ill will then he, nor that more willingly did pleaſure any man when he was requeſted. For he gaue without diſdaine, and tooke with great honor. Furthermore, being but a childe, he had a certaine grace in his looke that wan mens good willes before he ſpake: for his countenance was ſweete, mixed with grauitie, and being come to mans ſtate, there appeared in his ieſture and behauiour a graue and princely maieſtie. His haire alſo ſtoode a litle vpright, and the caſt and ſoft mouing of his eyes, had a certaine reſemblance (as they ſaid) of the ſtatues and images of king Alexander. And becauſe euerie man gaue him that name, he did not refuſe it himſelfe: inſomuch as there were ſome which ſportingwiſe did openly call him Alexander. Wherupon Lucius Philippus a Conſull, was not aſhamed to ſay openly in an oratiō he made in Pompeys fauour, that it was no maruell if he being Philip, did loue Alexander. It is reported alſo, that when Flora the curtiſan waxed old, ſhe much delighted to talke of the familiaritie which ſhe had with Pompey being a young man: telling that after ſhe had lyen with him, ſhe could not poſſiblie riſe from him, but ſhe muſt needes giue him ſome ſweete quippe or pleaſaunt taunte. She would tell alſo howe one of Pompeys familiars and companions called Geminius, fell in loue with her, & was a maruellous earneſt ſuter to obtaine her goodwill: and that ſhe aunſwered him flatly, ſhe would not, for the loue ſhe bare to Pompey. Geminius thereupon brake the matter to Pompey himſelfe. Pompey deſirous to pleaſure him, graunted the requeſt: howbeit Geminius after that, would not come neere Flora, nor ſpeake vnto her, albeit it appeared that he yet loued her. But Flora tooke this not curtiſan like, for ſhe was ſick a long time for very griefe of minde, and the thought ſhe tooke vpon it. All this notwithſtanding, it is ſaid that this Flora had then ſuch fame for her paſſing grace and beautie, that Cecilius Metellus ſetting foorth and beautifying the temple of Caſtor and Pollux, with goodly tables and pictures: among the reſt, he cauſed her picture to be liuely drawne for her excellent beautie. Furthermore Pompey, againſt his nature, dealt very hardly and vncourteouſly with the wife of Demetrius, his franchiſed bondeman (who while he liued was in great credit with him, and dying, left her worth foure thouſand talents) fearing to be taken with her beautie which was very ſingularlie faire, leaſt he ſhould be thought in loue with her. Now, though herein he ſeemed to be very circumſpect, and to caſt the worſt, yet could he not thus ſcape the detracting tongues of his ill willers: for they did accuſe him, that to pleaſe and content his wiues, he would let paſſe and winke at many things, that was againſt the profite of the common wealth? To proue his ſober and temperate diet, and how he was contented with common meates: a word (they ſay) he ſpake when he was very ſicke, and could taſt no meate, is ſpecially noted. For, to bring his ſtomacke to him againe, his Phiſitian willed him to eate a thruſhe. So ſeeking all about to get him one, there was no thruſhe to be bought for money, for they were out of ſeaſon. Notwithſtanding, one told him that he ſhould not miſſe of them at Lucullus houſe, for he kept them vp all the yeare through. Why, what then, ſayed he: if Lucullus ryot were not, ſhould not Pompey liue? Therewithall, letting his Phiſitians counſell alone, he made them dreſſe ſuch meate as was euery where common. But of that we will ſpeake more hereafter. Now Pompey being a young man, and in the fielde with his father, that was in armes againſt Cinna: there lay with him in his tent a companion of his, called Lucius Terentius, who being bribed with money, had promiſed Cinna to kill him, and other confederators alſo had promiſed to ſet their Captaines tent a fire. This conſpiracy was reuealed vnto Pompey as he ſate at ſupper, which nothing amated him at all, but he dranke freely, and was merrier with Terentius then of cuſtome. So when it was bed time, he ſtale out of his owne tent, and went vnto his father to prouide for his ſafety. Terentius thinking the hower come to attempt his enterpriſe, roſe with his ſword in his hand, and went to Pompeys bed where he was wont to lie, and gaue many a thruſt into the mattereſſe. After he had done that all the campe ſtraight was in an vprore for the malice they bare vnto their Captaine, and the ſouldiers in all haſte would needes haue gone and yeelded to their enemie, beginning alreadie to ouerthrowe their tentes, and to truſſe away bagge and baggage. The Captaine for feare of this tumult, durſt not come out of his tent: notwithſtanding Pompey his ſonne ranne amongſt the mutinous ſouldiers, and humbly beſought them with the teares in his eyes, not to doe their Captaine this villanie, and in fine threwe himſelfe flatling to the ground ouerthwart the gate of the campe, bidding them march ouer him, if they had ſuch a deſire to be gone. The ſouldiers being aſhamed of their follie, returned againe to their lodging, and chaunging minde, reconciled themſelues with their Captaine, eight hundred onely excepted, which departed. But immediatly after that Strabo, Pompeys father, was departed out of the worlde, Pompey being his heire, was accuſed for the father, to robbe the common treaſure. Howbeit he confeſſed and auowed, that it was Alexander one of his fathers infranchiſed bondmen that had ſtolen the moſt part of it, and brought him in before the Iudges. Notwithſtanding, he was accuſed himſelfe, for taking away the toyles and arming cordes of hunters nettes, and bookes that were taken at Aſculum. He confeſſed the hauing of them, and that his father gaue him them when the citie was taken: howbeit that he had loſt them ſince, when Cinna returned vnto ROME with his ſouldiers, who breaking into his houſe by force, ſpoyled him of all that he had. His matter had many dayes of hearing before definitiue ſentence, in which time Pompey ſhewed himſelfe of good ſpirite and vnderſtanding, more then was looked for in one of his yeares: inſomuch he wanne ſuch fame and fauor by it, that Antiſtius being Prætor at that time, and iudge of his matter, fell into ſuch a liking with him, that ſecretly he offered him his daughter in mariage. Then that matter being by friends broken to Pompey, he liked of the match, & the parties were ſecretly aſſured. This was not ſo cloſely conueyed, but the people perceiued it, by the care and paines Antiſtius tooke to fauour his matter. Inſomuch, when the Iudges gaue iudgement, and cleered him: all the people together, as if they had bene agreed, cried out with one voice, Talaſſio, Talaſſio, being the vſuall and common crie they vſed of olde time at mariages in ROME. This cuſtome by reporte of auncient folke came vp in this manner. At what time the chiefeſt peeres and Lordes of ROME did rauiſh the SABINES daughters, which came to ROME to ſee common ſportes plaied: there chanced a fewe raſcalles (as hoggeheards or neatheards) to cary away a goodly faire woman. They fearing ſhe ſhould be taken from them, cried out in the ſtreetes as they went, Talaſſio, as if they would haue ſaid, ſhe is for Tallaſſius. This Tallaſſius was a young gentleman well knowne, and beloued of moſt men: ſo that ſuch as heard him but named onely, did clap their hands for ioy, and cried out with them, Talaſſio, commending the choice they had made for him. So, hereof they ſay came this cuſtome, that euer ſince they haue cried this worde Talaſſio vnto them that are newly maried, becauſe the mariage of that faire young maide proued fortunate, and happy vnto Talaſſius. And this me thinkes ſoundeth neareſt to the troth of that they report of this wedding crie of Talaſſio. Shortly after this iudgement giuen, Pompey maried Antiſtia. After that, going vnto Cinnaes campe, they wrongfully accuſed him for ſomewhat, whereupon he being afraied, ſecretly ſtale away. Now when they could not finde him in Cinnaes campe, there ran ſtraight a rumor abroad, that Cinna had put him to death. Thereuppon, they that of long time had maliced Cinna, did ſet vppon him for this occaſion. But he thinking to ſaue him ſelfe by flying, was ſtraight ouertaken by a priuate Captaine that followed him with his ſword drawen in his hand. Cinna ſeeing him, fell downe on his knees before him, and tooke his ſeale from his finger wherewith hee ſealed his letters, which was of great price, and offered it him. Tuſh, ſayed the Captaine, I come not to ſeale any couenaunt, but to chaſtiſe a villaine and cruell tyraunt: and therewithall thruſt his ſword through him, and ſlue him preſently. Cinna being ſlaine in this ſort, Carbo ſucceeded him, and tooke the gouernment in hand, being a more cruell tyraunt then the firſt. Shortly after came in Sylla, being wiſhed for, and deſired of the moſt part of the ROMAINES, for the grieuous oppreſſions and miſeries they endured, that they thought them ſelues happy to change Gouernour: for their city was brought into ſuch miſery, as hoping no more to ſee ROME recouer her loſt liberty, they deſired yet a more tollerable bondage. Now Pompey at that time was in a place of ITALY called PICENVM (now the marches of ANCONA) where he had certaine inheritance, but much more, great loue and good will of the cities for his fathers ſake. He ſeeing that the nobleſt men of ROME forſooke their houſes and goods, to flie from all partes vnto Syllaes campe, as vnto a place of ſafetie: would not goe to him as a fugitiue and caſt away to ſaue himſelfe, without bringing him ſome power to increaſe his army, but would honorably goe thither with an armie, as he that ment firſt to doe himſelfe pleaſure. So he felt the good will of the PICENTINES, who willingly tooke his part, and reiected them that were ſent by Carbo. Among them there was one Vindius, that ſtepping forth, ſaid: that Pompey which came from ſchoole the laſt day, muſt now in haſte be a Captaine. But they were ſo offended with his ſpeech, that they ſtraight diſpatched him, and killed him out of hand. After that time, Pompey being but three and twentie yeare olde, tarying to receiue no authoritie from any man, tooke it vpon him himſelf, and cauſing a tribunall to be ſet vp in the midſt of the market place of AVXIMVM, a great populous city: he commanded the two brethren called the Ventidians (being the chiefeſt men of the citie, and they that for Carboes ſake withſtoode his doings) without delay foorthwith to auoide the citie, and ſo beganne to leauie men, and to appoint Captaines, ſergeantes of bandes, Centeniers, and ſuch other officers as appertaine to martiall diſcipline. Then he went to all the other cities of the ſame marches, and did the like. They that tooke part with Carbo, fled euery man, and all the reſt willingly yeelded vnto him: whereby in ſhorte ſpace he had gotten three whole legions together, munition to entertaine them, cartes, and all manner of beaſts for cariage. In this ſort he tooke his iourney towards Sylla, not in haſt, as a man affraide to be met with by the way, but by ſmall iourneys, ſtaying ſtill where he might hurt his enemy, cauſing the cities euery where as he came to reuolt from Carbo. Neuertheleſſe, three Captaines of the contrarie part, Carinna, Cælius, and Brutus, all three did ſet vpon Pompey together, not all in a fronte, nor of one ſide, but in three ſeuerall places they compaſſed him with their armies, thinking to haue made him ſure at the firſt onſet. This nothing amazed Pompey, but putting his force together in one place, he firſt marched againſt Brutus, hauing placed his horſemen (among the which he was himſelfe in perſon) before the battell of his footemen. Now the men of armes of the enemie which were GAVLES, comming to giue charge vpon him, he ranne one of the chiefeſt among them through with his launce, and ſlue him. The other GAVLES ſeeing him ſlaine, turned their backes, and brake their owne footmen: ſo that at length they all fled for life. Thereupon the Captaines fell out among themſelues, and ſome fled one way, ſome an other way, the beſt they could. Then the townes round about, thinking that they were diſperſed for feare: came all in to Pompey, and yeelded themſelues. Afterwards Scipio the Conſull comming againſt Pompey to fight with him, when both battels were in maner ready to ioyne: before they came to throwing of their dartes, Scipioes ſouldiers ſaluted Pompeys men, and went on their ſide. So was Scipio driuen to flie. And in fine, Carbo him ſelfe hauing ſent after him diuerſe troups of horſemen by the riuer of Arſis: Pompey made towards them, and did ſo fiercely aſſaile them, that he draue them into ſuch places, as was almoſt impoſſible for horſemen to come into. Whereupon, they ſeeing no way to ſcape, yeelded them ſelues, horſe and armour, all to his mercy. Sylla all this while heard no newes of theſe ouerthrowes: wherefore, as ſoone as he vnderſtoode of it, fearing leaſt Pompey ſhould miſcary, being enuironned with ſo many Captaines of his enemies, hee made haſt to march towardes him for to aide him. Pompey vnderſtanding of his approach, commaunded his Captaines to arme their men, and to put them in battell ray, that their Generall might ſee them brauely appointed when he ſhould preſent them vnto him: for he looked that Sylla would do him great honor, and in deed he did him more honor, then Pompey looked for. For, when Sylla ſaw him a farre off comming towardes him, and his army marſhalled in ſo good order of battell, and ſuch goodly men, that ſo brauely aduaunced them ſelues, being couragious for the victory they had obtained of their enemies: hee lighted a foote. When Pompey alſo came to doe his duety to him, and called him Imperator: (as much as Emperour, or ſoueraigne Prince) Sylla reſaluted him with the ſelfe name, beyonde all mens expectation preſent, litle thinking that he would haue giuen ſo honourable a name, vnto ſo yong a man as Pompey, who had not yet bene Senator: conſidering that he him ſelfe did contend for that title and dignitie, with the faction of Marius and Scipio. Furthermore, the entertainment that Sylla gaue him euery way, was anſwerable to his firſt kindnes offered him. For when Pompey came before him, he would riſe and put off his cappe to him, which he did not vnto many other noble mẽ about him. All this notwithſtanding, Pompey gloried nothing the more in him ſelfe. Wherfore when Sylla would ſtraight haue ſent him into GAVLE, becauſe Metellus that was there, was thought to haue done no exploit worthy of ſo great an armie as he had with him: Pompey anſwered him againe, that he thought it no reaſon to diſplace an ancient Captaine that was of greater fame and experience than himſelfe. Yet if Metellus of himſelfe were contented, and would intreate him: that he would willingly goe and helpe him to ende this warre. Metellus was very glad of it, and wrote for him to come. Then Pompey entring GAVLE did of himſelfe wonderfull exploites, and did ſo reuiue Metellus old courage and valiantneſſe to fight, which now beganne to faint, like boyling copper that being poured vpon the colde and hard copper, doth melt and diſſolue it, as faſt or faſter, than fire it ſelfe. For like as of a wreſtler, who hath bene counted very ſtrong, and the chiefeſt in all games, hauing euer borne the prize away where he hath wreſtled, they neuer recorde among them his childiſh victories and wreſtlings, as things of no account: euen ſo I am affraide to ſpeake of the wonderfull deedes that Pompey did in his childhoode, becauſe they are obſcured in reſpect of the infinite great warres and battels which he had wonne afterwards. For I am affraid that whileſt I ſhould go about particularly to acquaint you with his firſt beginnings, I ſhould too lightly paſſe ouer his chiefeſt actes and moſt notable enterpriſes, which do beſt declare his naturall diſpoſition and ſingular wit. Now when Sylla had ouercome all ITALIE, and was proclaimed Dictator: he did rewarde all his Lieutenants and Captaines that had taken his parte, and did aduance them to honorable place and dignity in the commonwealth, franckly granting them all that they requeſted of him. But for Pompey, reuerencing him for his valiantnes, and thinking that he would be a great ſtay to him in all his warres: he ſought by ſome meanes to allie him to him. Metella his wife being of his opinion, they both perſuaded Pompey to put away his firſt wife Antiſtia, and to marrie Æmylia the daughter of Metella, and of her firſt husband, the which alſo was an other mans wife, and with childe by her husband. Theſe mariages were cruell and tyrannicall, fitter for Syllaes time, rather then agreeable to Pompeys nature and condition: to ſee Æmylia, this new maried wife taken from her lawfull husband, to marie her great with childe, and ſhamefully to forſake Antiſtia, who not long before had loſt her father, and for reſpect of her husband that did put her away. For Antiſtius was murthered within the very Senate houſe, being ſuſpected to take parte with Sylla for his ſonne in lawe Pompeys ſake: and her mother voluntarily put her ſelfe to death, ſeeing her daughter receiued ſuch open wrong. By theſe apparant cauſes, theſe vnfortunate mariages fell out into a miſerable tragedie, by meanes of the death of AEmylia, who ſhortly after miſerably died with childe in Pompeys houſe. Then came newes to Sylla, that Perpenna was gotten into SICILE, and that he had made all that Iland at his deuotion, as a ſafe place to receiue all Syllaes enemies: that Carbo alſo kept the ſea thereabouts with a certaine number of ſhippes: that Domitius alſo was gone into AFRICKE: and diuers other noble men that were baniſhed, that had ſcaped his proſcriptions and outlawryes, were all in thoſe partes. Againſt them was Pompey ſent with a great army. Howbeit he no ſooner arriued in SICILE, but Perpenna left him the whole Iland, and went his way. There he fauorably dealt with all the cities, which before had abidden great trouble and miſery, and ſet them againe at liberty, the MAMERTINES onely excepted, which dwelt in the city of MESSINA. They deſpiſing his tribunall and iuriſdiction, alledged the auncient order and priuiledge of the ROMAINS, ſet downe in times paſt amongſt them. But Pompey aunſwered them in choller: what doe ye prattle to vs of your law, that haue our ſwords by our ſides? It ſeemeth alſo that Pompey dealt too cruelly with Carbo in his miſery. For ſith he muſt needes die, as there was no remedy but he ſhould: then it had bene better they had killed him when he was taken. For then they would haue imputed it to his malice, that ſo had commaunded it. But Pompey after he was taken, made him to bee brought before him that had bene thriſe Conſull at ROME to be openly examined, and he ſitting in his chaire of ſtate or tribunall condemned him to die in preſence of them all: to the great offence and miſliking of euery one that was preſent. So Pompey bad them take him away, and carie him to execution.

The death of Carbo.

When Carbo came to the ſcaffold where he ſhould be executed, and ſeeing the ſword drawne that ſhould ſtrike off his head: he praied the executioners to giue him a litle reſpit and place to vntruſſe a point, for he had a paine in his bellie.

The death of Q. Valerius.

Caius Oppius alſo (one of Iulius Cæſars friends) writeth, that he dealt very cruelly in like maner with Quintus Valerius. For Pompey, ſaid he, knowing that he was excellently well learned, as any man could be, and fewe like vnto him: when he was brought vnto him, he tooke him a ſide, and walked a fewe turnes about: then when he had queſtioned with him, and learned of him what he could, he commaunded his guard to carie him away, and to diſpatche him. Howbeit we may not giue too light credit to all that Oppius writeth, ſpeaking of Iulius Cæſars friends or foes. For Pompey in deed was compelled to make away the greateſt perſonages of Syllaes enemies that fell into his hands, being notoriouſly taken: but for the reſt, all thoſe that he could ſecretly ſuffer to ſteale away, he was contented to winke at it, and would not vnderſtand it: and moreouer did helpe ſome beſides to ſaue themſelues. Nowe Pompey was determined to haue taken ſharpe reuenge of the citie of the HIMERIANS, which had ſtoutly taken the enemies part. But Sthenis, one of the Gouernours of the citie, crauing audience of Pompey, tolde him he ſhould do them wrong and iniuſtice, if he ſhould pardon him that committed all the fault, and ſhould deſtroy them that had not offended. Pompey then asking him, what he was that durſt take vppon him to father the offence of them all.

Sthenis aunſwered ſtraight, that it was himſelfe that had perſwaded his friends, and compelled his enemies to do that which they did. Pompey being pleaſed to heare the franke ſpeech and boldneſſe of this man, firſt forgaue him the fault he had committed, and conſequently all the other HIMERIANS.

Pompey ſealed vp his ſouldiers ſwords.

Pompey vnderſtanding that his ſouldiers did kill diuers men in the high wayes, he ſealed vp all their ſwords, and whoſe ſeale ſoeuer was broken, he was well fauoredly puniſhed. Pompey being buſie about theſe matters in SICILE, receiued letters & commiſſion from Sylla and the Senate, to depart thence immediatly into AFRICKE, to make warre vpon Domitius with all his power, who had leauied already more men of war, than Marius had, not long before, when he came out of AFRICKE into ITALIE: & had there ouerthrowne all the ROMAINES doings, being become of a fugitiue outlaw, a cruell tyrant.

Pompey thereupon hauing ſpeedily put himſelfe in readineſſe to take the ſeas, left Memmius his ſiſters husband Gouernor of SICILE: and ſo himſelfe imbarked, & hoiſed ſaile with ſix ſcore gallies, and eight hundred other ſhippes or bottomes, to tranſport their victuals, munition, money, engines of batterie, and all other cariage whatſoeuer. After he was landed with all his fleete, part at VTICA, and part at CARTHAGE: there ſtraight came to him ſeuen thouſand ſoldiers from the enemies, and yeelded themſelues, beſides ſeauen whole legions that he brought with him. They ſay moreouer, that at his arriuall, he had a pleaſant chance happened vnto him to be laughed at: for it is reported, that certaine of his ſouldiers ſtumbled on a treaſure by chance, and got thereby a great maſſe of money. The reſidue of the armie hearing that, thought ſure that the field where this treaſure was found, was full of golde and ſiluer, which the CARTHAGINIANS had hidden there long before in time of their calamitie. Pompey hereupon, for many dayes after, could haue no rule of his ſouldiers, neither could he chooſe but laugh, to ſee ſo many thouſand men digging the grounde, and turning vp the fielde: vntill in the ende they wearied themſelues, and came and prayed him then to leade them where he thought good, for they had payed well for their follie.

Domitius came to Pompey with his armie ſet in battell ray. Howbeit there was a certaine quamire before him that ran with a ſwift running ſtreame, verie ill to get ouer: beſides that, from the verie breake of day it had poured downe and rained ſo faſt, and was ſo great a winde withall, that Domitius thinking all that day they ſhould not fight, commaunded his people to truſſe away, and remoue. Pompey on the other ſide, finding this an excellent fit occaſion for him, ſodainly made his men to marche, and paſſed ouer the valley. The enemies perceiuing that, being altogether out of order: were maruelouſly amazed, and in that hurly burly would haue made reſiſtance. But they were neither all together, nor yet euenly ſet in battell ray, and had beſides the winde beating the raine full in their faces. So did the ſtorme much hurt vnto the ROMAINES alſo, for they coulde not one ſee an other: inſomuch as Pompey himſelfe was in great danger of being killed by one of his owne ſouldiers, who not knowing him, asked him the worde of the battell, and was ſomewhat long before he anſwered him. In fine when he had ouerthrown his enemies with great ſlaughter: (for they ſay, that of twenty thouſand of them, there were but three thouſand ſaued) Pompeyes ſouldiers ſaluted him by the name of Imperator. But he anſwered them, that he would not accept the honour of that name, ſo long as he ſaw his enemies campe yet ſtanding: and therefore, if it were ſo they thought him worthy of that name, that firſt they ſhould ouerthrow the trench and fort of the enemies, wherein they had intrenched their campe. The ſouldiers when they heard him ſay ſo, went preſently to aſſault it. There Pompey fought bare headed, to auoide the like daunger he was in before. By this meanes they tooke the campe by force, and in it ſlue Domitius. After that ouerthrow, the cities in that countrey came and yeelded them ſelues, ſome willingly, and others taken by force: as alſo they tooke king Iarbas, that had fought for Domitius, and his realme was giuen to Hiempſall. But Pompey, being deſirous further to employ his power, and the good fortune of his army, went many daies iourney into the maine land, and ſtill conquered all where he came, making the power of the ROMAINS dreadfull vnto all the barbarous people of that country, the which made but ſmall account of them at that time. He ſayed moreouer, that the wilde beaſtes of AFRICKE alſo ſhould feele the force and good ſucceſſe of the ROMAINES: and thereupon he beſtowed a few daies in hunting of Lions and Elephantes. For it is reported, that in forty daies ſpace at the vttermoſt, he had ouercome his enemies, ſubdued AFRICKE, and had ſtabliſhed the affaires of the kings and kingdoms of all that countrey, being then but foure and twenty yeare old. So when he returned vnto the city of VTICA, letters were brought from Sylla, willing him to diſcharge all his army, and to remaine there with one legion only, tarying the comming of an other Captaine that ſhould be ſent to ſucceede him in the gouernment of that countrey. This commaundement, grieued him not a litle, though he made no ſhew of it at all: but his ſouldiers ſhewed plainely that they were offended. For when Pompey prayed them to depart, they began to giue out broad ſpeeches againſt Sylla, and told directly that they were not determined (whatſoeuer became of them) to forſake him, & they would not that he ſhould truſt vnto a tyrant. Pompey ſeeing that he could not perſwade them, by any reaſon to be quiet, roſe out of his chaire, and retired into his tent weeping. But the ſouldiers followed him, and brought him againe to his chaire of ſtate, where he ſpent a great part of the day, they intreating him to remaine there and commaund them, and he deſiring them to obey Sylla, and leaue their mutinies. But in fine, ſeeing them importunate to preſſe him to it, he ſware he would kill him ſelfe, rather then they ſhould compell him: yet they ſcant left him thus. Hereupon it was reported vnto Sylla, that Pompey was rebelled againſt him. Sylla when he heard that, ſaied to his friends: well, then I ſee it is my deſtiny, in mine olde daies to fight with children. He meant ſo, becauſe of Marius the younger, who had done him much miſchiefe, and had beſides put him in great danger. But afterwards vnderſtanding the troth, and hearing that all generally in ROME were determined to goe and meete Pompey, and to receiue him with all the honour they could: becauſe he would goe beyond them all in ſhew of good will, he went out of his houſe to meete him, and embracing him with great affection, welcomed him home, and called him Magnus, to ſay great, and commaunded all them that were preſent to giue him that name alſo. This notwithſtanding, ſome ſay, that it was in AFRICKE this name was firſt giuen him by a common crie of al his whole army, and that afterwards it was confirmed by Sylla. In deed it is true that Pompey himſelf being ſent Proconſull into SPAINE, long time after that, was the laſt that ſubſcribed all his letters and commiſſions with the name of Pompey the great: for this name then was ſo commonly knowen and accepted, as no man did enuy it. And therefore rightly is the wiſedome of the ancient ROMAINS, to be both commended & had in admiration: which did not only reward ſeruice in the field with ſuch honorable names and titles, but ciuil ſeruice and good gouernment alſo in peace at home. For there were two whom the people at ROME called Maximi, to ſay, very great: of the which Valerius was the one, for that he made peace and agreement betwixt the people and Senate. The other was Fabius Rullus, for that he put from the Senate certaine bondmen infranchiſed, who through their riches and fauor had obtained that place. After that, Pompey required the honor of triumphe, but Sylla denied it, alleaging that none could enter in triumph into ROME, but conſulles or Prætors. For ſith Scipio the firſt who in SPAINE had ouercome the CARTHAGINIANS, neuer deſired this honour of triumphe, being neither Conſull nor Prætor: much leſſe ſhould he ſtand vpon demaund of triumph into ROME, when that through his young yeares he was not yet a Senator: and beſides, it would purchaſe him enuie of his honor and greatnes. Theſe reaſons did Sylla aleadge againſt Pompey, and told him plainly that if he were bent to ſtand in it, he would reſiſt him.

All this blanked not Pompey, who told him frankly againe, how men did honor the riſing, not the ſetting of the ſunne: meaning therby, how his owne honor encreaſed, and Syllaes diminiſhed. Sylla heard him not very perfectly what he ſayed, but perceiuing by their countenances that ſtoode by, that they wondered at it, he asked what it was he ſayed. When it was told him, he maruelled at the boldnes of ſo young a man, and then cryed out twiſe together, let him then triumph a goddes name.

Pompey not being Senator, triumpheth againſt the law.

Many being offended therewith, Pompey (as it is reported) to anger them more, woulde needes be brought in in triumphant chariot drawen with foure Elephants: for he had taken many of them from thoſe kings and princes which he had ſubdued. Howbeit the gate of the citie being too narrow, he was driuen to leaue the Elephantes, and was contented to be drawen in with horſes. Now his ſouldiers that had not all things as they looked for, and which was promiſed them, going about to trouble and hinder his triumphe: he ſayed he paſſed not for it, and that he would rather let alone all his preparation of triumph, then once to yeeld to flatter them. Whereupon, there was a famous man at that time called Seruilius, who at the firſt was one of the chiefeſt againſt Pompeyes triumph, who ſayd openly: now I know that Pompey indeed is great, and deſerueth triumph: being euident enough, that if he would, he might then haue eaſily bene made Senator: he ſued not for that, but as they ſay, ſought honor by a ſtranger mean leſſe honorable. For if he had bene made Senator, ſo young, it had not bene ſo great a matter: but to haue ſuch honor before he was Senator, that was maruellouſly to be noted. But this wan him the more fauour and good will ſtill amongſt the common people: for they were glad when after his triumph they ſawe him in companie amongſt the ROMAIN Knights. On the other ſide it ſpighted Sylla to ſee him come ſo faſt forward, and to riſe to ſo great credit: notwithſtanding, being aſhamed to hinder him, he was contented to keep it to himſelfe, vntill that Pompey by force & againſt Syllaes will, had brought Lepidus to be Conſull, by the helpe & good will of the people that furthered his deſire.

Theruppon Sylla ſeing Pompey returning ouerthwarte the market place from the election, with a great traine of followers to honor him, he ſayd vnto him: ô young man, I ſee thou art glad of this victory, and ſo haſt thou cauſe, for it is a goodly thing out of doubt to haue had ſuch fauor of the people, as for thy ſake to haue made Lepidus Conſull (the vileſt perſon of all men) before Catulus the honeſteſt man of the citie. But I will tell thee one thing, ſee that thou ſleep not, and looke well to thy buſines, for thou haſt aduanced a dangerous enemie to thy ſelfe.

Sylla fallen from the loue of Pompey

Now the chiefeſt thing wherein Sylla diſcouered moſt his ill will vnto Pompey, was in his laſt will and teſtament: for he gaue legacies vnto euery one of his friendes, and ſome of them he made tutors and ouerſeers of his ſon, but he made no mention of Pompey at all. This notwithſtanding, Pompey tooke it well enough. And where Lepidus and ſome other would haue kept Syllaes body from buriall in the field of Mars, and that his funeralles ſhould not be openly ſolemnized: he contrariwiſe brought him very honorably and ſafely to the ground. Shortly after Syllaes death, his wordes of prophecy vnto Pompey concerning Lepidus, proued true.

For Lepidus vſurping the authoritie which Sylla had before, not colourably, but openly entred ſtraight in armes, ſturring vp againe thoſe of Marius faction, whom Sylla could not be reuenged of, and which lay lurking a long time, ſpying for occaſion to riſe againe. True it is that his colleague, and fellow Conſull Catulus (whom the beſt and ſoundeſt part of the people followed) was thought a maruellous honeſt man, both iuſt and modeſt: howbeit, a better gouernor in peace, then a good man of warre, inſomuch as time required Pompeyes ſkill and experience. So Pompey ſtood not doubtfull which way he would diſpoſe himſelfe, but tooke part ſtraight with the nobility and honeſteſt men, and was preſently choſen Captain of their army againſt Lepidus: who had already wonne the greateſt parte of ITALIE, and with an army vnder the conduct of Brutus, kept GAVLE on this ſide the mountaines called GALLIA CISAL-

PINA. And for the reſt Pompey eaſily ouercame it: howbeit he lay a long time before MODONA, beſieging of Brutus. In the meane ſeaſon Lepidus came to ROME, & being hard at the wals demaunding the ſecond Conſulſhip, made them afrayed in the citie with the great numbers of men he had about him, gathered together of all ſortes. Howbeit this feare was cooled ſtraight, by a letter which Pompey ſent to ROME, aduertiſing how he had ended this warre without any bloodſhed: for Brutus, either betraying his army, or being betrayed of it, yeelded himſelfe vnto Pompey, who gaue him a certen number of horſemen that conducted him vnto a litle towne vpon the riuer of Poe: where the next day after, Geminius being ſent by Pompey, ſlue him. But hereof Pompey was greatly blamed, for that he had written letters to the Senate from the beginning of the chaunge, how Brutus had put himſelfe into his handes: and afterwards wrote letters to the contrary, which burthened him for putting of him to death. This Brutus was father of that Brutus, which afterwardes by the helpe of Caſsius ſlue Iulius Cæſar: howbeit he ſhewed not himſelfe ſo like a coward, neither in warres nor in his death, as his father did. As we haue declared more at large in his life. Furthermore Lepidus, being driuen to forſake ITALIE, fled into SARDINIA, where he died (as it is reported) of a ſickneſſe that he had, not for any ſorrow or griefe of his owne affaires, but for a letter that was brought him which went to his hatt, knowing therby that his wife had played the harlot. There remained at that time Sertorius in SPAYNE, who was another maner of warrier then Lepidus, & that kept the ROMAINS in great awe: for that all the fugitiues of the late ciuill warres were fled to him as from the laſt diſeaſe of the warres. He had already ouerthrowen many inferior Captaines, & was now wreſtling with Metellus Pius, that in his youth had bene a noble ſoldier, but now being old, made warres but ſlowly, and would not coragiouſly take preſent occaſions offered him, which Sertorius by his nimblenes and dexterity tooke out of his hands. For he would euer houer about him, when he thought leaſt of him, like a Captaine rather of theeues then of ſouldiers, and would ſtill lay ambuſhes in euery corner, and round about him: where the good old man Metellus had learned to fight in battell raye, his men being heauie armed. Hereupon Pompey keping his army alway together, practiſed at ROME, that he might be ſent into SPAIN to aide Metellus. But Catulus, notwithſtanding that he commanded him to diſperſe his armie, Pompey ſtill kept them together by colour of new deuiſes, & was continually about ROME in armes, vntill that by Lucius Philippus meãs he had obtained the gouernment of that cõtry. They ſay that one of the Senators maruelling to heare Philip propound that matter to the Senate, asked him: how now Philip, doeſt thou then think it meet to ſend Pompey Proconſull (to ſay, for a Conſull) into SPAINE? no truly ſayed Philip, not Proconſull onely, but Pro conſulibus: (to ſay, for both Conſulles) meaning, that both the Conſulles for that yeare were men of no value. Now when Pompey was ariued in SPAINE, men begã ſtraight to be caried away, (as the maner is commonly where new gouernors be) with the hope of a thing that they had not before. Thereupon Sertorius gaue out proud and bitter wordes againſt Pompey, ſaying in mockery, he would haue no other weapon but roddes to whippe this young boy, if he were not afrayed of this olde woman: meaning Metellus the old man. But notwithſtanding theſe gallant bragges, he ſtood better vpon his gard, and went ſtronger to fight than he did before, being afrayed of Pompey. For Metellus was very diſſolute of life (which no man would haue iudged in him) and was giuen ouer too much to ryot and pleaſure: howbeit they ſaw in him a maruellous ſodaine change both of his honor and glory which he vſed before, as alſo the cutting off of his ſuperfluous expence. That thing, beſides that he did honour Pompey greatly by it, wan him alſo much more the goodwill of the people, when they ſaw that he drew himſelfe downe to a ſtraighter life. And this was no great paine to him for of his owne diſpoſition he was a graue man, and temperatly giuen for his deſires. In this warre fortune changed diuerſly, as it is commonly ſene in warres: but nothing grieued Pompey more then Sertorius winning of the citie of LAVRON. For he thinking to haue ſhut him in, & had giuen out ſome glorious words of the matter: wondered when he ſaw himſelfe ſtraight compaſſed in, that he could not ſturre out of the campe where he laye, and was driuen beſides to ſe the citie burnt before his face. This notwithſtanding, afterwards at a ſet battell by the citie of VALENTIA, he ſlue Herennius and Perpenna, both notable ſouldiers and Sertorius Lieutenantes, and with them ten thouſand men. This victory ſo encoraged Pompey, that he made haſt to fight with Sertorius alone, becauſe Metellus ſhould haue no part of the honor of the victory. So they both met by the riuer of Sucron, about ſunne ſet, both fearing Metellus comming: the one that he might fight alone, & the other with one alone. In fine, the victory fell out doubtfull in the end of the battell: for either of their wings had the vpper hand. Betwene the two Captaines, Sertorius had the greater honour: for he alone ouercame all them that ſtoode before him. And as for Pompey, there was a great man of armes that being on foot, came and ſet vpon him, & hauing both their ſwordes in their handes, they both lighted vpon their handes, but not both in one ſort: for Pompeyes hand was but a litle hurt, and the man of armes had his hand cleane cut off. Then Pompeyes men fell vpon him, all his own fellowes on that ſide being fled from him: notwithſtanding, beyond all hope, he ſaued himſelfe after a ſtrange ſorte, by caſting vp his horſe among his enemies, that was richly trapped with gilt harnes, hauing a capariſon of great value: and in the meane time, while they were buſie deuiding this booty among them, and fighting for it: he eſcaped their handes. The next morning by breake of day, both of them againe brought their bandes into the field, to confirme the victory, which either of them ſuppoſed they had gotten. But Metellus came to Pompey at that preſent time, whereupon Sertorius went his way, and diſperſed his army: for his campe was eaſily broken, & ſodainly gathered againe together. For Sertorius would ſometime wander the fieldes alone, and at another time againe he would haue a hundreth and fifty thouſand fighting men together in the fielde, like a vehement ſtreame that ſometime is dried vp, and that ſodainly againe is all of a flood. Pompey after this battell going to welcome Metellus, when they came neere one another, he commaunded his ſergeantes and officers to put downe their bundell of roddes and axes which they caried before him to honor Metellus withall, who was a better man than himſelfe. But Metellus would not ſuffer them, but ſhewed himſelfe equall with him in that, and in all things elſe, not reſpecting his ſeniority, nor that he had bene Conſull, and Pompey not, ſauing when they camped together, Metellus gaue the watchword to all the campe. Notwithſtanding, commonly they camped aſunder, for their enemy that was ſo flitting from place to place, and was ſeene in ſo ſundry places in ſo ſhort time, compelled them to be a ſunder to foreſee the worſt, drawing them ſodainly from one purpoſe to another: ſo that in fine, cutting them off from victuals euery way, ſpoyling their country, and keping the ſea ſide, he draue them both out of the prouinces of their charge which they had in SPAYNE, and did compell them to goe ſome other where, for lacke of victuals. Pompey in the meane time hauing ſpent the moſt part of his goods in this warre, ſent to ROME for money to pay his ſouldiers, threatning the Senate, that if they ſent him no money, he woulde returne with his armie into ITALIE. Lucullus then being Conſull, though Pompeyes enemy, procured they ſhould ſend him money: for he practiſed to be ſent Captaine againſt king Mithridates, and therfore was afrayed to giue Pompey any occaſion to returne, who deſired nothing more then to leaue Sertorius, to bend his force againſt Mithridates, whoſe ouerthrow ſhould be more honorable to him, and alſo leſſe dangerous. In the meane ſpace, Sertorius died, being betrayed by thoſe whom he thought his friendes, among the which Perpenna was the chiefe man, that after Sertorius death would needes counterfeate his doings, hauing the ſame meanes, the ſame furniture, and the ſame power that he had: howbeit he lacked his wit and ſkill to employ them. Pompey therefore marching directly towards him, and finding how ignorant Perpenna was in his affayres: he layed a bayte for him of ten cohorts which he ſent to prey in the fieldes, commanding them to diſperſe themſelues abroade as farre as they could, one from another. Perpenna ſtraight tooke the occaſion, and gaue them charge, and had them in chaſe. But Pompey tarying him at the ford, was readie for him with all his armie ſet in order: he gaue him battell, obtained the victory, and ended all this warre, becauſe the moſt of the Captaines were ſlaine in the field, and Perpenna the chiefe of all taken priſoner, whom he preſently put to death. But herein Pompey was not to be condemned of ingratitude nor obliuion (as ſome do burden him) of Perpennaes frendſhip ſhewed him in SICILIA, but rather deſerued praiſe to haue determined ſo wiſely for the benefit of the common wealth. For Perpenna hauing in his cuſtody all Sertorius writings, he ſhewed letters of the greateſt noblemen of ROME, (which were deſirous of change of gouernment) willing him to returne into ITALIE. Pompey vpon ſight of theſe letters, fearing leaſt they would breed greater ſedition & ſtur in ROME, then that which was already pacified: put Perpenna to death as ſoone as he could, and burnt all his papers and writings, not reading any letter of them. Then Pompey remaining in SPAINE a certaine time, till he had pacified all commotions and tumultes maruellouſly out of order: he brought his armie back againe into ITALIE, and arriued there when the warre of the bondmen and fenſers led by Spartacus, was in greateſt furie. Vpon his comming therefore, Craſſus being ſent Captaine againſt theſe bondmen, made haſt to giue them battell, which he wan, and ſlue twelue thouſand, three hundreth of theſe fugitiue ſlaues. Notwithſtanding, fortune meaning to giue Pompey ſome part of this honor, fiue thouſand of theſe bondmen eſcaping from the battell, fell into his hands. Whereupon he hauing ouercome them, wrote vnto the Senate that Craſſus had ouercome the fenſers in battell, and that he had pluckt vp this war by the rootes. The ROMAINS receiuing Pompeyes letters, were very glad of this newes for the loue they bare him. But as for the winning of SPAINE againe, and the ouerthrow of Sertorius, there was no man, although it were in ſporte, that euer gaue any man elſe the honor, but vnto Pompey only. For all this great honor and loue they bare vnto Pompey, yet they did ſuſpect him, and were afrayed of him, becauſe he did not diſperſe his army, that he would follow Syllaes ſteppes, to rule alone by plaine force. Hereuppon as many went to meet him for feare, as there were that went for good will they bare him. But after he had put this ſuſpition quite out of their heads, telling them that he woulde diſcharge his armie after he had triumphed: then his ill willers could blame him for nothing elſe, but that he was more enclined vnto the people then to the nobilitie, and that he had a deſire to reſtore the Tribuneſhip of the people which Sylla had put downe, onely to gratifie the common people in all he could: the which indeed was true. For the common people at ROME neuer longed for thing more, than they did to ſee the office of the Tribune ſette vp againe. Yea, Pompey himſelfe thought it the happieſt turne that euer came to him, to light in ſuch a time, to doe ſuch an acte. For, had any other man preuented him of that, he coulde neuer haue founde the like occaſion poſſiblie to haue requited the peoples good willes vnto him, ſo much as in that. Nowe therefore this ſeconde triumphe and firſt Conſulſhippe being decreed by the Senate: that made him nothing the greater, nor better man. And yet was it a ſhewe and ſignification of his greatneſſe, the which Craſſus (the richeſt man, the eloquenteſt and greateſt perſon of all them that at that time dealt in matters of ſtate, and made more eſtimation of himſelfe then of Pompey and all the reſt) neuer durſt once demaunde: before he had craued Pompeyes good will. Pompey was very glad of his requeſt, and had ſought occaſion of long time to pleaſure him: and thereupon made earneſt ſute vnto the people for him, aſſuring them he would as much thanke them for making Craſſus his colleague and fellow Conſull, as he would, for making himſelfe Conſull. All this notwithſtanding, when they were created Conſulles, they were in all things contrarie one to another, and neuer agreed in any one thing while they were Conſuls together. Craſſus had more authoritie with the Senate but Pompey had more credit with the people. For he reſtored them the office of the Tribune, and paſſed by edict, that the Knightes of ROME ſhould haue full power againe to iudge cauſes ciuill and criminall. It was a pleaſant ſight alſo vnto the people, when he came vnto the Cenſors in perſon, to pray that he might be diſpenced with for going to the warres. For it was an auncient cuſtome in ROME, that the Knightes of ROME hauing ſerued a certaine time in the warres appointed by their order, ſhould bring their horſe in the middeſt of the market place before the two Cenſors, declaring euery Captaine vnder whom they had ſerued, in what iornies and countries they had bene, and hauing alſo deliuered account of their good behauior and ſeruice, they then prayed to be diſmiſſed from the warres. Now if it appeared that they had done good ſeruice, there were they honourablie rewarded: or otherwiſe openly ſhamed and puniſhed. At that time, Gellius and Lentulus the two Cenſors, being honorably ſet in their tribunall or iudgement ſeate, taking viewe of all the ROMAINE Knightes that muſtered before them, to be ſeene and examined, they maruelled when they ſawe Pompey comming at the farther ende of the market place, hauing all the markes of a Conſull borne before him, and himſelfe leading his horſe in his hande by the bridle. When

Pompey came neerer, and that they ſawe it was he, he commaunded his ſergeauntes that caried the axes before him, to make roome for him to paſſe by the barres with his horſe, where the Cenſors ſate. Then the people flocked about him, wondering and reioycing, being verie ſilent. The Cenſors themſelues alſo were maruellous glad to ſee him ſo obedient to the lawe, and did him great reuerence. In fine the elder of the Cenſors did examine him in this ſorte. Pompey the great, I pray thee tell mee if thou haſt ſerued ſo long time in the wares, as the lawe doeth appoint? Then anſwered Pompey aloude: yes verily that I haue, and vnder no other Captaine then my ſelfe. The people hearing this aunſwer, made an open ſhoute for ioy, they were ſo gladde to heare it: and the Cenſors them-ſelues came from their iudgement ſeate, and went to accompanie Pompey home to his houſe, to pleaſe the great multitude of people that followed him, clapping of their hands, with great ſignes of ioy. At the ende of their Conſulſhippe, when miſliking increaſed further betwene Pompey and Craſſus, there was one Gaius Aurelius, of the order of Knighthood, who till that time neuer ſpake in open aſſembly, but then got vp into the pulpit for orations, and tolde the people openly: how Iupiter had appeared to him in the night and had commaunded him to tell both the Conſulles from him, that they ſhould not leaue their charge and office, before they were reconciled together. For all theſe wordes Pompey ſturred not. But Craſſus firſt tooke him by the hand, and ſpake openly to him before the people. My Lordes, I thinke not my ſelfe diſhonored to giue place to Pompey, ſith you your ſelues haue thought him worthy to be called the great, before he had any haire on his face, and vnto whom you graunted the honor of two triumphes before he came to be Senator.

When he had ſayed his minde, they were made friends together, and ſo ſurrendred vp their office. Now for Craſſus, he held on his former manner of life which he had begun. Pompey as neere as he could gaue ouer to plead mens cauſes any more, & began litle and litle to withdrawe himſelfe from frequenting the market place, and matters of iudgement, comming ſeldome abroad, & when he did he had alwaies a great traine following him.

It was a rare thing alſo to ſee him any more come out of his houſe, or talke with any man but he was euer accompanied with a great number, & he reioyced to himſelfe, to ſee that he had alwaies ſuch a traine after him: for that made him to be honored the more, & gaue him greater countenance to ſee him thus courted, thinking it diſhonor to him to be familiar with meane perſons. For men that riſe by armes, are eaſily deſpiſed, when they come to liue like priuate citizens: becauſe they cannot faſhion themſelues to be companions with the common people, (who citizen-like vſe a common familiarity together) but looke to be their betters in the city, as they are in the field. Yea & contrarily, they that doe acknowledge themſelues to be their inferiors in warres: will thinke foule ſcorne if they be not their ſuperiors in peace. And by this meanes when they haue a noble warrier among them that followeth publike cauſes (which hath triumphed for many victories and battelles he hath obtained) they obſcure his glory, and make him an vnderling vnto them: whereas they doe not otherwiſe enuie any ſouldiers, that are contented equally to giue them place and authoritie, as plainly appeared ſhortly after, by Pompey himſelfe.

By ſuch an occaſion, the power of pirats on the ſea, tooke beginning in the coũtry of CILICIA, which was not reckoned of at the firſt, becauſe it was not perceiued, vntill they grew bold and venturous in king Mithridates wars, being hired to do him ſeruice. And afterwards the ROMAINS being troubled with ciuill warres, one fighting with another euen at ROME gates, the ſea not being looked to all this while: it ſet them a gog, and made them go farther then euer they did before. For they did not onely rob & ſpoile all marchant venturers by ſea, but rifled alſo all the Ilandes & townes vpon the ſea coaſt: inſomuch as then there ioyned with them, men of great wealth & nobilitie, and of great wiſdom alſo, & entred into their fellowſhippe, as into a commendable faculty.

Now they had ſet vp arſenalls or ſtore houſes in ſundry places, they had ſundry hauens and beacons on the land, to giue warning by fire all alongſt the ſea coaſt, and thoſe well kept and watcht: moreouer, they had great fleetes of ſhips ready furniſht with excellent good galliots of ores, ſkilfull pilots & mariners, their ſhippes of ſwift ſaile, & pinnaſes for diſcouery, but withall ſo glorioſly ſet out, that men leſſe hated their exceſſe, then feared their force. For the poopes of their galliots were all guilt, the couerings of the ſame all of purple ſilke, delighting only to make a glorious ſhew of their pillage. All the ſea coaſt ouer, there was no ſight of any thing but muſicke, ſinging, banqueting, and rioting, priſes of Captaines, and men of great quality, & ranſomes of a thouſand priſoners: and all this was to the ſhame & diſhonor of the ROMAINES. Their ſhips were about a thouſand in number, & they had taken aboue 400. townes. They had ſpoiled & deſtroied many holy temples that had neuer bene touched before. As the temple of the twins in the Ile of CLAROS, the tẽple of Samothracia, the temple of Earth in the citie of HERMION, & the temple of Æſculapius in EPIDAVRVM: the temples of Neptune in ISTHMOS, TÆNARIA, and CALABRIA: and the temples of Apollo in ACTIVM, in the Ile of LEVCADES: the temples of Iuno in SAMOS, in ARGOS, & in LVCANIA. They had alſo many ſtrange ſacrifices & certain ceremonies of religion amongſt themſelues, in the mount Olympus, & among other, the miſterie of Mithres, which is the ſunne: and remaineth yet in being vnto this day, being firſt ſhewed by them. But beſides all theſe inſolent parts and iniuries they did the ROMAINES vpon the ſea, they went a land, & where they found any houſes of pleaſure vpon the ſea coaſt, they ſpoiled and deſtroyed them: and on a time they tooke two ROMAINE Prætors, Sextilius & Bellinus, being in their purple robes, with their ſergeants & officers attending on them, & caried them quite away. An other time alſo they ſtale away the daughter of Antonius (a man that had receiued honor of triumph) as ſhe went a walking abroad in the fields, and ſhe was redeemed for a great ſumme of money. But yet the greateſt ſpight & mockery they vſed to the ROMAINES, was this. That when they had taken any of them, and that he cryed he was a citizen of ROME, and named his name: then they made as though they had bene amazed, and affraide of that they had done. For they clapped their hands on their thighes, and fell downe on their knees before him, praying him to forgiue them. The poore priſoner thought they had done it in good earneſt, ſeeing they humbled themſelues as though they ſeemed fearefull. For ſome of them came vnto him, and put ſhooes on his feete: others clapt a gowne on the backe of him after the ROMAINE faſhion, for feare (ſaid they) leaſt he ſhould be miſtaken an other time. When they had plaied all this pageant, and mocked him their bellies full: at the laſt they caſt out one of their ſhip ladders, and put him on it, and bad him go his way, he ſhould haue no hurt: and if he would not go of him ſelfe, then they caſt him ouer the bord by force, and ſent him packing. Theſe rouers and ſea pirates had all the ſea Mediterraneum at commandement: inſomuch there durſt not a marchant looke out, nor once traffique that ſea. And this was the onely cauſe that moued the ROMAINES (fearing ſcarſity of victuals, and a great dearth) to ſend Pompey to recouer the ſigniory againe of the ſea from theſe pirates. The firſt man that moued it might be decreed, that Pompey ſhould not be only Admirall, or Generall by ſea, but ſhould haue abſolute power to command all manner of perſons as he thought good, without any account to be made of his doings in his charge: was Gabinius, Pompeys friend. The ſumme of this decree gaue him full power and abſolute authoritie of all the ſea from Hercules pillers, and of the maine land, the ſpace of foure hundred furlongs from the ſea. (For the ROMAINES dominions at that time in fewe places went further then that: notwithſtanding, within that compaſſe were many great nations and mightie kings.) Furthermore, it gaue him power to chooſe of the Senate fifteene Lieutenants, to giue vnto euery one of them, ſeuerall prouinces in charge, according to his deſcretion: and alſo to take money out of the treaſure, of the Generall receiuers of the ſtate, to defray the charges of a fleete of two hundred ſaile, with full power beſides to leauie what men of warre hee thought good, and as many galliots and mariners as he liſted. This law when it had bene read once ouer among them, the people confirmed it with very good will. Yet the noble men and chiefe of the Senate thought that this authority did not only exceede all enuie, but alſo that it gaue them apparant cauſe of feare, to giue ſuch abſolute power vnto a priuate perſon. Whereupon, they were all againſt it but Cæſar, who fauoured the decree, not ſo much to pleaſure Pompey, as the people, whoſe fauor he ſought. The noble men fell maruellouſly out with Pom*pey*: and at the length one of the Conſuls was very hotte with him, and told him he looked to follow Romulus ſteps, but peraduenture he would come ſhort of that end he made. Thereupon the people thought to haue killed him. After that, Catulus ſtoode vp to ſpeake againſt this edict. The people at the firſt heard him quietly, becauſe he was a worthy man. Then he began without any ſhew of enuy, to ſpeake many goodly things in the praiſe of Pompey, and in fine, aduiſed the people to ſpare him, and not to venture in ſuch dangerous warres (one after another) a man of ſo great account, as they ought to make of him. If yee chance to looſe him, ſaid he: whom haue you then to put in his place? The people then cried out: your ſelfe. Then perceiuing that he loſt his labour, ſeeking to turne the people from their determination: he left it there, and ſaide no more. Roſcius roſe next after him to ſpeake, but he could haue no audience. When he ſawe that he could not be heard, he made a ſigne with his fingers, that they ſhould not giue P*ompey* alone this authoritie, but ioyne an other with him. The people being offended withall made ſuch an outcrie vppon it, that a crow flying ouer the market place at that inſtant, was ſtriken blind and fell downe amongſt the people. Whereby it appeareth that foule falling out of the aire to the ground, doe not fall for that the aire is broken or pierced with any force or furie: but becauſe the very breath of the voice (when it commeth with ſuch a violence, as it maketh a very tempeſt in the aire) doth ſtrike and ouercome them. Thus for that day, the aſſembly brake vp, and nothing paſt: and at the day appointed when this decree ſhould paſſe by voices of the people, Pompey went abroad into the country. There being aduertiſed that the decree was paſt for the confirmation of his charge, he returned againe that night into the citie, becauſe he would auoide the enuie they would haue borne him to haue ſeene them run out of all parts of the citie vnto him, to haue waited on him home. The next morning he came abroad, and ſacrificed to the goddes: and audience being giuen him at an open aſſembly, he handled the matter ſo, that they gaue him many things beſides to enlarge his power, almoſt doubling the preparation ſet downe and appointed at the firſt decree. For he ordained that the common wealth ſhould arme him fiue hundred ſhippes, and they leauied for him ſixe ſcore thouſand footemen, and fiue thouſand horſemen, and choſe beſides foure and twentie Senators, which had euery one of them bene Generals of armies, and two generall Treaſurers alſo. While things were thus a preparing, the price of victuals fell by chance: which reioyced the people ſo much, that they ſtucke not to ſay, that the name of Pompey only had alreadie ended this warre. This notwithſtanding, he deuided all the ſea betwene the lands into thirteene regions, and in euery of them he appointed a certaine number of his ſhippes, and moreouer, one of his Lieutenantes ouer them. Thus hauing diſperſed his power all abroad, he brought all the pirates ſhippes that were in a fleete together, within his daunger: and when had taken them, he brought them all into a docke. Nowe for them that had diſperſed themſelues betimes, or that otherwiſe could ſcape his generall chaſe: they fled all into CILICIA, as bees into the beehiue, againſt whom he would needes goe himſelfe in perſon with threeſcore of his beſt ſhippes. Howbeit he cared not though he went not before he had ſcoured all the THVSCANE ſea, the coaſtes of LYBIA, SARDINIA, SICILE, and of CORSICA, of all theſe theeues which are wont to keepe thereabouts: and this he did within fortie dayes ſpace, taking infinite paines, both himſelfe and his Lieutenants. Now when one of the Conſuls called Piſo did all the beſt he could to hinder P*ompeys* preparation, and had diſcharged his ower men, for that he enuied P*ompeys* proſperitie: Pompey ſent his ſhippes before to make towardes ITALIE to arriue at the citie of BRVNDVSIVM. He in the meane time, went through THVSCANE to ROME, where, ſo ſoone as his comming was knowen, all the people ran out to meete him, as if he had bene abſent a long time: and that which made the people more ioyfull to ſee him, was the ſodaine change of victuals vnlooked for, that daily came to the towne out of all partes. But P*iſo* went neere to be depriued of his Conſulſhip: for Gabinius had the decree written, and ready to preſent to the people. But P*ompey* would not ſuffer it. So, hauing gentlely brought all to paſſe as he deſired, he went vnto the city of BRVNDVSIVM, and there tooke ſea, and hoiſed ſaile. Now though his haſtie voyage, and ſhortneſſe of time made him paſſe by many good cities without comming into them: notwithſtanding, he would not ſo paſſe by the citie of ATHENS, but landed there, and after he had ſacrificed to the goddes, returned to imbarke againe. At his going out of the citie, he read two writings that were made in his praiſe, the one within the gate which ſaid thus.

The humblier that thou doſt thy ſelfe as man behaue,
The more thou doſt deſerue, the name of god to haue.

And the other writing was without the gate, which ſaid:

VVe wiſht for thee, we waite for thee,
VVe worſhip thee, we waite on thee.

Now becauſe Pompey hauing taken certaine of theſe rouers by ſea that kept together, did vſe them gentlely when they required pardon, and hauing their ſhippes and bodies in his power, did them no hurt at all: their other companions being in good hope of his mercy, fled from his other Captaines and Lieutenants, and went and yeelded themſelues, their wiues and children into his handes. Pompey pardoned all them that came in of themſelues, and by that meanes he came to haue knowledge of the reſt, and to followe them where they went, whom hee tooke in the ende: but knowing that they deſerued no pardon, they hid themſelues. Yet the moſt part and the richeſt of them, had conueyed their wiues, children and goods, and all other their family vnmeete for warres, into ſtrong caſtles and litle townes vppon mount Taurus: and ſuch men as were able to carie weapon, imbarked, and lay before a citie of CORACESIVM, where they taried Pompey, and gaue him battell, firſt by ſea, and there were ouercome, and afterwardes they were beſieged by lande. Howbeit ſhortly after, they prayed they might be receiued to mercie, and thereuppon yeelded their bodies, townes, and Ilandes which they had fortified, and were hard to haue taken and worſe to haue approached. Thus was this warre ended, and all the pirates in leſſe then three monethes driuen from the ſea whereſoeuer they were. He wanne alſo a great number of other ſhippes, beſides foure ſcore and tenne gallies armed with copper ſpurres. And touching the men whom they had taken (who were in number aboue twentie thouſand perſons) he did not only conſider whether he ſhould put them to death, but alſo thought it no wiſe part on the other ſide to let them goe at libertie, to gather force againe, being ſo great a number of them as in deede they were, and all poore men and ſouldiers. Therefore, weying with himſelfe that man by nature is not borne a wild or ſauage beaſt, but contrarily becommeth a brute beaſt changing nature, when he falleth to vice: and againe is made tame and ciuill in time, changing place and manner of life: (as brute beaſtes that being wilde by nature doe alſo become gentle and tractable, with gentler vſage by continuance) he determined to draw theſe pirats from the ſea into the vpland and to make them feele the true and innocent life, by dwelling in townes, and manuring the ground. Some of them therefore he placed in certaine ſmall townes of the CILICIANS, that were ſcant inhabited, and were very glad of them, giuing them land to keepe them with. The citie of the SOLIANS alſo, that not long before had bene deſtroied by Tigranes the king of ARMENIA, being deſirous to repleniſh that againe, he placed many of them there. He beſtowed diuerſe alſo in the citie of DYMA in the countrie of ACHAIA, which at that time lacked inhabitants, and had great ſtore of very good land. Now therfore his enemies reproued him greatly: and for that he did in CRETA, they that were his beſt and greateſt friendes miſliked him. For Metellus that gentle perſon (a coſen to that Metellus which was his colleague, and made warres in SPAYNE with him againſt Sertorius) was ſent Prætor into CRETA, before Pompey was choſen Generall againſt the pirates. This CRETA, next vnto CILICIA, was euen a ſecond denne of pirates. Metellus finding there a great number of theſe theeues, tooke many of them and put them to death, euen all that came to his handes. Then, ſuch as had ſcaped from him, being ſtraightly beſieged, ſent vnto Pompey to pray him of pardon, and to take them to mercie: declaring vnto him, that the Ile of CRETA was within the precinct of his charge, becauſe all partes of that region from the ſea came iuſt within the compaſſe limited him on the lande. Pompey pardoning them vpon their ſubmiſſion, wrote vnto Metellus, and commaunded him to leaue off his warre, and therewithall charged all the cities, that they ſhould not obey Metellus commaundements. After that he ſent Lucius Octauius, one of his Lieutenantes, who entred into the townes Metellus beſieged, and fought for the pirates. This made Pompey not only hated and enuied, but derided alſo: for that vnder his name he had protected ſuch vile theeues, that had neither God nor law, and giuen them his authoritie to ſaue their liues, for a litle enuie and emulation he bare vnto Metellus. And therefore they rightly reproue Achilles and ſay that he ſhewed not the part of a wiſe man, but of a young foole beſides himſelfe, for deſire of glorie, making a ſigne to the GRECIANS, forbidding them to ſtrike at Hector, to the end that as Homer ſaid:

Achilles diſhoneſt fact.

Leaſt he too late ſhould to the battell runne,
VVhen others had the honor of it wonne.

But Pompeys fact was worſe than this. For he fought for the common enemies of the world, & only to depriue a ROMAINE Prætor of triumph, who had done great good ſeruice to haue deſtroyed them. This notwithſtanding, Metellus left not off his warre for Pompeys letters, but hauing taken the pirates by aſſault, he put them to death: and afterwardes hauing done Octauius open ſhame through his campe, he let him goe. When newes came to ROME, that the pirates warre was brought to good end, & that Pompey hauing no other ſeruice in hand, went viſiting the cities vp & downe: one Manilius a Tribune of the people, put forth an other decree vnto them of this effect. That Pompey taking all the army Lucullus had, & the prouinces vnder his gouernment, with al BITHYNIA, which Glabrio kept: ſhould go make war vpon the kings Tigranes and Mithridates, keeping in his hands notwithſtanding al his iuriſdiction and army by ſea, in as royall maner as he had it before. In fine, this was euen to make one man Monarch and abſolute Prince of all the ROMAINE Empire. For by this ſecond decree, he had all theſe countries not named in his former commiſſion, added to amplifie his authority, as PHRYGIA, LYCAONIA, GALATIA, CAPPADOCIA, CILICIA, high COLCHIDA & ARMENIA, with al the armies and forces with the which he had ouercome thoſe two mightie Kings. Then the Senate ſtucke not ſo much at the iniurie that was offered vnto Lucullus, depriuing him of the honor of his doings, to giue it to an other, that ſhould rather ſucceede him in honour of triumph, than in danger of warres, knowing that they did him too manifeſt iniury, and ſhewed themſelues too vnthankefull: but that which moſt grieued them, was to ſee Pompeys power eſtabliſhed in a plaine tyranny. Hereupon therefore, one of them perſwaded and encouraged an other, ſtoutly to withſtand this edict, and not to ſuffer their libertie to be loſt in this ſort. Notwithſtanding, when the day came that the decree ſhould paſſe, they were ſo affraide to anger the people, that their hearts failed them, & none durſt ſpeake againſt it but Catulus onely: that earneſtly inueyed againſt the paſſing of it a long time together, and greatly blamed the people. At the length, perceiuing he had wonne neuer a man to take his part, he oftentimes cried out to the Senate, that they ſhould looke to ſeeke out ſome mountaine or high rocke to retire ſafely vnto to defend their libertie, as their anceſters had done in old time before them. All this preuailed not, for the decree paſſed by the voices of all the tribes, as it is reported. And thus was Pompey in his abſence made Lorde almoſt of all that, which Sylla by force of armes and great effuſion of bloud (hauing made himſelfe Lord of ROME) had before in his power. When Pompey had receiued letters from ROME, aduertiſing him what the people had paſt in his behalfe: ſome ſay that at the receite of them (in the preſence of his familiar friendes that were about him, and reioyced with him for congratulation) he knit his browes, and clapped on his thigh, as though it grieued him maruellouſly to haue ſuch great offices and charge laid vpon him, one in the necke of an other, and burſt forth in theſe wordes. O goddes, ſhall I neuer ſee an ende of ſuch a world of troubles as I haue? Had it not beene better for me to haue bene a meane man borne and vnknowen, than thus continually to be in warre with armor on my backe? What, ſhall I neuer ſee the time, that breaking the neckes of ſpight and enuy againſt me, I may yet once in my life liue quietly at home in my country with my wife & children? When Pompey ſpake thoſe wordes, his familiar friends could not abide to ſee his deepe diſſimulation, knowing that beſides his naturall ambition and couetous deſire to rule, he was glad in his hart that he had this charge, for the contention that was betwixt him and Lucullus: which his deedes forthwith bewrayed. For he preſently ſent out precepts into euery quarter, commanding all ſortes of ſouldiers to come to him immediatly, and made alſo all the Princes and kings within precinct of his charge to come vnto him, and going through the countries, altered and changed all that Lucullus had eſtabliſhed before. Furthermore, he did releaſe the penalties enioyned them, and tooke from them alſo the giftes that Lucullus beſtowed of them. In fine, this was all his purpoſe and deſire: to make them that honored Lucullus know, that he had no further power & authority to doe any thing. Lucullus finding himſelfe hardly handled by Pompey, the friends of either ſide thought good they ſhould meete & talke together: which came ſo to paſſe, for they met in the country of GALATIA. And becauſe they both were great

Captaines of the ROMAINE armies, and had done many famous acts, they had their ſergeants & officers that caried the bundels of rods before them, wreathed about with laurell boughes. When they met, Lucullus came out of a cloſe & woddy country, all couered with greene trees, & Pompey on the other ſide had paſſed through a great ſandy plaine, where no tree was growing. Thereupon Lucullus ſergeantes ſeeing the laurell boughes drie and withered away, which Pompeys ſergeantes caried, they gaue them of their greene and freſh boughes to beautifie the roddes and axes. This was a plaine token that Pompey came to take Lucullus honor from him. In truth Lucullus had bene Conſull before Pompey, & ſo was he alſo older man than he: yet the dignity of Pompey was greater, becauſe he had triumphed twiſe. At their firſt meting, their entertainment & diſcourſe was with great ceremony and courteſie as might be, one highly praiſing the others deedes, reioycing at ech others good ſucceſſe: but at parting, they fell to hotte wordes together, Pompey vpbrayding Lucullus auarice, and Lucullus Pompeys ambition, ſo that their friendes had much a doe to part them. Lucullus departing thence, deuided the landes in GALATIA, which he had conquered, and beſtowed them & other gifts, on ſuch as he thought good. Pompey on the other ſide camping hard by him, ſpecially commaunded the people in euery part to obey him in nothing whatſoeuer he did: and beſides, he tooke all his ſouldiers from him, leauing him only ſixteene hundred, which he ſuppoſed were ſuch, as for diſdaine and ill will they bare him, would do him but ſmall ſeruice. Furthermore, to blemiſh the glory of his doings, he told euery body Lucullus had fought with the pompe & ſhadow only of theſe two kings, and that he had left him to fight with all their whole force and power, Mithridates being then prepared for warres, with ſhieldes, ſwordes, and horſes. Lucullus for reuenge on the other ſide ſaid, that Pompey went to fight but with a ſhadow of warre, like a cowardly buſzard that preyeth vpon dead bodies, which others haue ſlaine: and to cut a ſunder the remaine of this warre ended by an other, as he had done before, attributing the honour of the ouerthrowe of Sertorius, Lepidus, and Spartacus, to himſelfe, where indeede Metellus, Craſſus, and Catulus did ouercome them. And therfore it was no maruell, that he ſought the glory and honor to triumph for the kingdomes of PONTVS and ARMENIA: ſith that through his ſubtill practiſes he had obtained triumph for a fewe ſlaues and fugitiues. Lucullus being nowe gone his way, Pompey ſent good garriſons vnto all the coaſtes vppon the ſea, from the prouince of PHOENICIA, vnto the realme of BOSPHORVS. That done, he tooke his iorney by lande towardes Mithridates, who had in his campe thirtie thouſand footemen, and two thouſande horſemen, and yet durſt not offer battell, but camped firſt vpon a mountaine of great ſtrength, and hard to get vp on: notwithſtanding ſhortly after, he forſooke it for lacke of water. He was no ſooner gone thence, but forthwith Pompey tooke it. Who, coniecturing by the nature of the plantes and trees in that place which were very greene, and alſo by diuers holes he found, that for reaſon thereabouts ſhould be ſome ſprings: he commaunded them to digge welles in euery corner, ſo that in a very ſhort time all his campe had water enough, and he wondred at Mithridates, that he could not find that out in all the time he lay there. In the end, he went and camped rounde about Mithridates, and intrenched him with a wall within his owne campe: who after he had abidden the ſiege fiue and forty daies, fled away with all the choice of his army, vnknowing to Pompey, hauing firſt ſlaine al the ſicke and impotent perſons within his campe. After that, Pompey found him an other time by the riuer of Euphrates, and went and lodged hard by him. But fearing that Mithridates would paſſe ouer the riuer before he could preuent him in time, he raiſed his campe againe, & marched away at midnight. About that time, they ſay, that Mithridates ſawe that in a dreame, which did prognoſticate what ſhould happen. He thought, that hauing the winde in the poope of the ſhippe, he was vnder ſaile, in the middeſt of the ſea of Mare Boſphorum, and that he was maruellous glad of it, and reioyced with them that ſailed with him, thinking himſelfe certainely paſt all danger: yet ſodainly againe, that all this ioy left him, and that he floted vp and downe the waues of the ſea, vpon a litle peece of the ſhippe that was broken, truſting to the mercy of the windes. As hee was troubled with this ill fauored dreame, certaine of his familiars came to him and told him, that Pompey was come ſo neere, that there was no ſhift, but they muſt needes fight to defende their campe. Thereupon his Captaines ſtraight beganne to put his men in battell ray, readie

to fight. Pompey vnderſtanding they prepared to make defence, was in doubt to venter his men to fight in the darke, thinking it better to compaſſe them in to keepe them from flying, & then in the morning to ſet vpon them more eaſily, his men being the better ſouldiers. But Pompeys old Captaines were ſo earneſtly in hand with him to perſwade him they might fight, that in the end he was contented they ſhould giue charge. Now it was not ſo darke but they could ſomewhat ſee, for the moone that was very low and vppon her ſetting, gaue light enough to diſcerne the body of a man: yet becauſe the moone was very low, the ſhadow which gaue out further farre then their bodies, came almoſt euen to their very enemies, which did let thẽ that they could not certainely iudge what ſpace of ground was betwene them, but imagining that they were hard by them, they caſt their dartes at the ROMAINES, but they hurt neuer a man, for their bodies were a great way from them. The ROMAINES perceiuing that, ran vpon thẽ with great cries. But the barbarous people durſt not abide their charge they were ſo affraide, but turned their backes, and ranne away for life, ſo that they were ſlaine downe right. Thus were there tenne thouſande of the barbarous people ſlaine and more, and their campe alſo taken. As for Mithridates himſelfe, at the beginning of the onſet, he made a lane among the ROMAINES with eight hundred horſemen, & paſſed cleane through them. But incontinently his men diſperſed vpon it, ſome one way, ſome an other way, ſo that he was left alone but with three perſons only, whereof Hypſicratea was one of the number, which had euer bene valiant and had a mans heart: whereupon, for that cauſe Mithridates called her Hypſicrates. She at that time being arrayed like a man of armes of PERSIA, and mounted alſo on a horſe after the PERSIAN maner, was neuer weary with any long iorney the king made, nor neuer left to wait vpon his perſon, and to looke to his horſe: vntill ſuch time as the king came to a ſtrong caſtle called Inora, where was great ſtore of gold & ſiluer, and the kings chiefeſt treaſure. Then Mithridates tooke off his richeſt apparell he had there, & gaue it amongſt them that were about him at that time, and a deadly poiſon beſides to euery one of his friends to cary about them, becauſe they ſhould not (vnleſſe they would themſelues) fall into their enemies handes aliue. From thence he thought to take his iorney into ARMENIA vnto king Tigranes. Howbeit Tigranes ſent to let him, and further proclaimed by trumpet, that he would giue a hundred talentes to him that could kill him. Thereupon, paſſing by the head of the riuer of Euphrates, he fled through the country of CHOLCHIDE. In the meane time, Pompey inuaded the country of ARMENIA, at the requeſt of Tigranes the younger, who was reuolted againſt his father, & went to meete with Pompey at the riuer of Araxes, which hath his beginning almoſt about the head of Euphrates: but it runneth towards the Eaſt, and falleth into Mare Caſpium. So they both together marched on further into the country, receiuing ſuch townes as yeelded vnto them. But king Tigranes (that not long before had bene conſumed and deſtroyed by Lucullus) vnderſtanding that Pompey was of a milde and gentle nature, he receiued his garriſons into his ſtrongeſt fortes and royall houſes, and went himſelfe with his friends and kinſemen to meete Pompey, & to yeeld himſelfe vnto him. When he came hard to his campe, being a horſe back, there came out two ſergeants of Pompeys, and commanded him to light and go a foote, for there was neuer man ſeene a horſe back within the ROMAINES campe. Tigranes did not only obey them, but further plucked off his ſword and gaue it them: and in fine, when he came almoſt to Pompey, taking off his royall hat from his head, he would haue laid it at Pompeys feete, & falling downe moſt ſhamefully on the ground, imbaſed himſelfe to imbrace Pompeys knees. But Pompey himſelfe preuented him, and taking him by the hande, made him to ſit downe by him on the one ſide of him, and his ſonne on the other. Then he ſaide vnto them both; as for the other loſſes you haue ſuſteined heretofore, you muſt thanke Lucullus for them, who hath taken from you SYRIA, PHOENICIA, CILICIA, GALATIA, and SOPHENA: but for that you haue left you till my comming, I will let you enioy it, paying to the ROMAINES a fine of ſixe thouſand talents for the iniury you had done them, prouided alſo, that your ſonne haue the kingdome of SOPHENA for his part. Tigranes accepted the conditions of peace. The ROMAINES then ſaluted him king. He was ſo glad therof, that he promiſed to giue euery ſouldier halfe a Mina, euery Centener tenne Minas, and to euery Colonell of a thouſand men a talent. His ſonne was very angry withall: inſomuch as Pompey ſending for him to come to ſupper to him, him, he aunſwered againe, that was not the friendſhip he looked for at Pompeys handes, for he ſhould finde many other ROMAINES that would offer him that curteſie. Pompey for his anſwere, clapped him vp as a priſoner, and kept him to be led in triumph at ROME. Shortly after, Phraates king of PARTHIA ſent Ambaſſadours to Pompey to demaund this young Prince, that was his ſonne in law, & to tell him that the riuer of Euphrates muſt be the vttermoſt confines of his conqueſtes. Pompey aunſwered againe, that Tigranes had more right to his ſonne, then the father in law: and as for limiting of his borders, that he would do it with iuſtice. So, leauing Afranius in ARMENIA to keepe the country, Pompey paſſed by other nations which inhabite about mount Caucaſus, hauing Mithridates in chaſe: of which nations, two of the chiefeſt & of greateſt power, are the ALBANIANS & IBERIANS. The IBERIANS do ſtretch out vnto mount Moſchium, and to the realme of PONTVS. The ALBANIANS lye towardes the Eaſt, & Mare Caſpium. Theſe men firſt ſuffered Pompey to paſſe through their country, vpon his ſending to thē. But winter hauing ſtolen vpon the ROMAINES while they were there, & they buſily occupied about Saturnes feaſts: the barbarous people hauing leauied aboue forty thouſand fighting men in one camp together, came and paſſed ouer the riuer of Cyrnus. (This riuer commeth from the mountaines of the IBERIANS, and receiuing the riuer of Araxes into it, which paſſeth through ARMENIA, diſperſeth it ſelfe into twelue ſeuerall mouthes, and ſo falleth into Mare Caſpium. Some notwithſtanding hold opinion, that Cyrnus receiueth not the riuer of Araxes into it, but that it runneth by it ſelfe, and falleth into the ſame ſea, neare vnto the mouthes of the other.) Pompey might if he had would haue kept them for comming ouer the riuer, yet did he ſuffer them quietly to paſſe ouer. When they were all ouer, he went againſt them, ouercame them in battell, and ſlue a great number of them in the field. Afterwardes he pardoned their king, ſubmitting himſelfe vnto Pompey by his Ambaſſadours, and made peace with him. Then from thence he went againſt the IBERIANS: who were no leſſe in number, then the ALBANIANS were at the firſt, and alſo better ſouldiers, and were reſolutely bent to do good ſeruice vnto Mithridates, and to driue out Pompey. Theſe IBERIANS were neuer ſubiect to the Empire of the PERSIANS, nor of the MEDES, and ſcaped alſo from being ſubiect to the MACEDONIANS, for that Alexāder neuer ſtayed in the country of HYRCANIA: whom alſo Pompey ouercame in a great and bloudy battell, hauing ſlaine nine thouſand in the field, and taken ten thouſand priſoners. From thence he went into the countrey of COLCHIDA. There Seruilius met him by the riuer of Phaſis, with the fleete of ſhippes with the which he kept all Mare Ponticum. Now to follow Mithridates further, who had hid himſelfe amongſt a people that were neighbours vnto the ſtraights of BOSPHORVS, and the mariſſes Mæotides, he found it a hard peece of worke. Furthermore alſo, he had newes that the ALBANIANS were rebelled againe, which drew him backe to be reuenged of them. Thereupon he paſſed againe ouer the riuer of Cyrnus, with great paine and daunger, becauſe the barbarous people had made a ſtrong defence a great way alongeſt the riuer ſide, with a maruellous number of great trees, feld and layed a croſſe one ouer an other. Furthermore, when he had with great difficulty paſſed through thē, he fell into an euill fauoured coūtrey, where he ſhould trauell a great way before he could come to any water. Thereupon he cauſed ten thouſand goates ſkinnes to be filled with water, and ſo went forward to meete with his enemies, whom he found by the riuer of Abas, being ſixe ſcore thouſand footemen, and twelue thouſand horſemen, but all (of the moſt of them) ill armed with wild beaſtes ſkinnes. Their Chiefetaine was Coſis, the kings owne brother, He, when the battell was begun, flew vpom Pompey, and threw a dart at him, and hurt him in the flancke. Pompey on the other ſide, ranne him through with his launce on both ſides, & ſlue him ſtarke dead. Some ſay alſo, that there were certaine AMAZONES at this battell, which fought of the barbarous peoples ſide, cōming frō the mountaines that runne alongeſt the riuer of Thermodon. For, after the ouerthrow giuen, the ROMAINES ſpoyling the dead, found targets, and buskinnes of the AMAZONES, but not a body of a woman among them. They alſo do inhabite on the ſide of the mountaine Caucaſus, that looketh towardes Mare Hyrcanium, and do not border vpon the ALBANIANS: but the GELES, and the LELEGES are betweene them, with whom they company two monthes onely euery yeare meeting together, by the riuer of Thermodon, and all the reſt of the yeare, they liue a part by themſelues. After this laſt battell, Pompey going to inuade the countrey of Hyrcania, as farre as Mare Caſpium, he was compelled to go backe againe for the infinite number of deadly venemous ſerpẽts which he met with, being come within three dayes iourney of it. So he returned backe againe into Armenia the leſſe, and there receiued preſents which were ſent vnto him from the kings of the Elymians and the Medes, & wrote very curteouſly vnto them againe: howbeit he ſent Afranius with part of his armie againſt the king of the Parthians, who had inuaded the country of Gordiena, & harried & ſpoyled the king of Tigranes ſubiectes. Notwithſtanding, he draue him out, & followed him vnto Arbelitide. Furthermore, all the lemmans and cõcubines of king Mithridates being brought vnto Pompey, he would touch none of them, but ſent them all home againe, to their parents and friends, becauſe the moſt of them were either the daughters of Princes, of noble men, or of Captaines. Notwithſtanding, Stratonice that of all the reſt of his lemmans, had moſt credit about Mithridates, vnto whom he had left all the charge of his caſtell, where the greateſt part of his treaſure of gold and ſiluer lay, was a ſingers daughter, who as they ſayd, was not rich, but an old man. She hauing ſong one night before Mithridates, being at ſupper, he fell in ſuch fancie with her, that he would needes haue her lye with him the ſame night, and the old man her father went home offended, becauſe the king would not ſo much as giue him one gentle word. But the next morning when he roſe, he maruelled to ſee the tables in his houſe full of plate of gold and ſiluer, and a great company of ſeruing men, groomes of chamber and pages, and that they had brought him maruellous rich apparell, and a horſe ready at the gates brauely furniſhed, as the kings familiars did vſe when they went abroad into the citie: he thought it was done in mockerie, to haue made ſport with him, and therefore would haue runne his way, had not the ſeruing men kept him, and told him that they were a great rich mans goods that dyed of late, which the king had beſtowed on him, and that all this he ſaw, was but a litle portion in reſpect of the other goods and lands he gaue him. So the old man beleeuing them, at the length did put on this purple gowne they brought him, and got vp a horſe backe, and riding through the ſtreetes, cried, all this is mine, all this is mine. Certaine laughing him to ſcorne for it, he told them: maiſters, ye may not wonder to heare me thus crie out, but rather, that I throw not ſtones at them I meete, I am ſo mad for ioy. Such was Stratonices birth and parentage, as we haue told you. She did then deliuer this caſtell into Pompeys hands, and offered him many goodly rich preſents: but he would take none of them, other then ſuch as ſerued to adorne the temples of the goddes, and to beautifie his triumph, and left all the reſt with Stratonice her ſelfe, to diſpoſe as ſhe thought good. In like manner alſo, the king of the Iberians, hauing ſent him a bedſtead, a table, and a chaire of cleane gold, praying him to take it as a remembraunce from him: he deliuered it ouer vnto the Treaſurers cuſtodie, to be accountable for it vnto the ſtate. In an other caſtell called Cœnon, he found certaine ſecret letters ſent from Mithridates, which pleaſed him maruellouſly to read, becauſe thereby he plainly vnderſtood the kings nature and inclination. For in them were mentioned that he had poyſoned (beſides many other) Ariarathes his owne ſonne, and Alcæus the Sardianian, becauſe he had wonne the bell, at the horſe race before him. There was alſo interpreting of dreames, that either himſelfe or his wiues had dreamed, and alſo loue letters betwixt Monime and him. Theophanes writeth alſo, that there was found an oration of Rutilius, in the which he intiſed and perſwaded Mithridates to put all the Romaines to death that were in Asia. Howbeit in reaſon men thinke, that this was a ſhamefull lye, maliciouſly deuiſed by Theophanes, who hated Rutilius, becauſe he was but a counterfeit to him: or peraduenture to gratifie P*ompey*, whoſe father Rutilius in his hiſtories deſcribeth to be as wicked a man as euer liued. Thence P*ompey* departed towardes the citie of Amisvs. There his ambition brought him to commit ſuch factes, as he himſelfe did condemne before in Lucullus: for that his enemy being yet aliue, he tooke vpon him to eſtabliſh lawes, to giue giftes, and diſtribute ſuch honours, as Captaines that had obtained victorie were wont to do, when they had ended all warre and trouble. For he himſelfe (Mithridates being yet the ſtronger in the realme of Bosphorvs, and hauing a great puiſſant army about him) did all that which he reproued an other for, appointing prouinces, and geuing out giftes to euery man according as he deſerued: to gratifie twelue barbarous kings, with diuers other Princes, Lordes and Captaines, that came to him thither. Writing alſo to the king of PARTHIA, he diſdained to giue him that title, which others were wont to do in the direction of their letters, calling him hing of kings. Furthermore, he had a wonderfull great deſire to winne SYRIA, and to go through the country of ARABIA, euen vnto the red ſea, becauſe he might enlarge his conqueſtes and victories euery way, euen vnto the great ſea Oceanum, that compaſſeth all the whole earth. For in LIBYA, he was the firſt ROMAINE that conquered all to the great ſea. On the other ſide, in SPAYNE he enlarged the Empire of ROME, & brought the confines thereof vnto Mare Atlanticũ. And thirdly, hauing lately the ALBANIANS in chaſe, he came almoſt vnto Mare Hyrcaniũ. Thus he put himſelfe in iourney, intending his circuite vnto the red ſea, ſpecially becauſe he ſaw Mithridates ſo ill to follow, & worſe to ouercome by force when he fled, thẽ when he fought any battell: and that made him ſay, that he would leaue a ſharper enemy behinde him, then himſelfe: and that he ment, famine. For he appointed ſouldiers with ſufficient number of ſhippes, to lye in wait for the marchaunts that ſayled to the country of BOSPHORVS, to cary them any victuals or other marchaundiſes, prohibiting them vpon paine of death that ſhould attempt it. Then he went forward with the beſt part of his army, and in his way, found the bodies of dead ROMAINES which Mithridates had ouerthrowen vnder the leading of Triarius their Captaine, & were yet vnburied. So he cauſed them all to be taken vp, & honourably buried. Lucullus hauing forgotten, or otherwiſe neglected to do it, in my conſcience that was the chiefeſt cauſe why his men did hate him. Pompey now hauing by Afranius ſubdued the ARABIANS, dwelling about mount Amanus, went himſelfe in perſon into SYRIA, and made a gouernement & prouince of it, being won to the ROMAINE Empire, for that it lacked a lawfull king: and conquered all IVRIE alſo, where he tooke king Ariſtobulus, and builded certaine cities there, and deliuered others alſo from bondage, which by tyrants were forcibly kept, whom he chaſtiſed well enough. Howbeit he ſpent the moſt part of his time there, deciding of controuerſies, pacifying of contentions and quarels by arbiterment, which fell out betwixt the free cities, Princes and kings, and ſent of his friends into thoſe places where he could not come himſelfe. For on a time when he was choſen arbitratour betwixt the PARTHIANS & the ARMENIANS, touching the title of a country which both parties claimed: he ſent three commiſsioners thither to iudge definitiuely betwixt them both. If Pompeys fame & renowne were great, no leſſe was his vertue, iuſtice and liberalitie, which indeede did hide many faults, his friends and familiars about him did commit. For truely he was of ſo gentle a nature, that he could neither keepe them from offending, nor yet puniſh them when they had offended. Notwithſtanding, he did vſe them ſo well that complained vnto him, or that had to deale with him in any matter: that he made them contented, patiently to beare their couetouſneſſe and ſtraight dealing. One of his chiefeſt familiars about him whom he loued beſt, was called Demetrius, a bondman infrãchiſed, who otherwiſe was very diſcrete in his doings, but being ſomewhat too bold of his good fortune: of him they make this mention. Cato the Philoſopher being at that time a young man, yet of good iudgement and of a noble minde, in Pompeys abſence went to ſee the city of ANTIOCH. Now for himſelf, his maner was alwayes to go a foote, and all his friends beſides that did accompany him to honour him, were a horſebacke. He perceiuing a farre off, a great ſort of people comming towardes him all in white, and of one ſide of the ſtreete litle children, and on the other boyes, round about them as in a ring: at the firſt he was angry withall, thinking they had done it for his ſake to honor him, that they made this proceſsion, which he in no wiſe would haue had done. Thereupon he commaunded his friends to light from their horſes, and to go a foote with him. But when they came neare to the gate of the citie, the maiſter of the ceremonies that led this proceſsion, hauing a garland on his head, and a rod in his hand, came vnto them, and asked them: where they had left Demetrius, and when he would come? Catoes friends laughed to heare this queſtion: then ſayd Cato, alas poore citie, and ſo paſſed by it. Notwithſtanding, Pompey himſelfe was cauſe that Demetrius had the leſſe ill will borne him, then otherwiſe he ſhould haue had: becauſe they ſaw how boldly he would vſe Pompey, and how well he would take it without offence. It is reported, that when Pompey oftentimes had bidden ſome to dinner or ſupper, while he was entertaining and welcomming of them, and would tary till they were all come: Demetrius would be ſet at the bord, and preſumptuouſly haue his head couered euen to the very eares. And furthermore, before he returned into ITALIE out of this iourney, he had already purchaſed the goodlieſt houſes of pleaſure and fayreſt walkes that were about ROME, and had ſumptuous gardens alſo, the which the people commonly called Demetrius gardens: though his maiſter Pompey was but meanly houſed till his third Conſulſhip. Howbeit afterwardes, he built that famous ſtately Theater, called Pompeys Theater, and ioyned vnto that alſo an other houſe, as a penthouſe to his Theater, farre more ſumptuous and ſtately then the firſt, and yet no more then needed. In ſomuch as he that was owner of it after him, when he came into it, he maruelled, and asked where abouts it was, that Pompey dyned & ſupped. Theſe things are reported thus. Now, the king of the ARABIANS, that dwelt about the caſtell called Petra, hauing neuer vntill that time made any accompt of the ROMAINES army, was thē greatly afrayed of them, and wrote vnto Pompey, that he was at his deuotion, to do what he would commaunde him. Pompey thereupon to proue him, whether he ment as he ſpake: brought his army before this caſtell of Petra. Howbeit this voyage was not liked of many men, becauſe they iudged it was an occaſion found out to leaue following of Mithridates, againſt whom they would haue had him rather haue bent his force, being an auncient enemy to ROME, and that began to gather ſtrength againe, and prepared (as they heard ſay) to lead a great army through SCYTHIA & PANNONIA into ITALIA. But Pompey thinking he ſhould ſooner miniſh his power by ſuffering him to go on with warres, then that he ſhould otherwiſe be able to take him flying: would not toyle to follow him in vaine. And for theſe cauſes he would needes make warres in other places, and linger time ſo long, that in the end he was put by his hope. For when he was not farre from the caſtell of Petra, and had lodged his camp for that day: as he was riding and managing his horſe vp and downe the camp, poſtes came flinging to him from the realme of PONTVS, and brought him good newes, as was eaſily to be diſcerned a farre off by the heades of their iauelings, which were wreathed about with laurell boughes. The ſouldiers perceiuing that, flocked ſtraight about him: but Pompey would make an end of his riding firſt, before he read theſe letters. Howbeit they crying to him, and being importunate with him, he lighted from his horſe, and returned into his camp, where there was no ſtone high enough for him to ſtand vpon to ſpeake vnto them, and againe, the ſouldiers would not tarie the making of one after the manner of their camp, which men of warre do make themſelues, with great turues of earth, laying one of them vpon an other: but for haſt and earneſt deſire they had to heare what newes there was in the letters, they layed together a heape of ſaddles one vpon an other, and Pompey getting vp on them, told how Mithridates was dead, and had killed himſelfe with his owne hands, becauſe his ſonne Pharnaces did rebell againſt him, and had wonne all that which his father poſſeſſed: writing vnto him, that he kept it for himſelfe and the ROMAINES. Vpon theſe newes, all the camp ye may imagine, made wonderfull ioy, and did ſacrifice to the goodes, giuing them thankes, and were as mery, as if in Mithridates perſon alone, there had dyed an infinite number of their enemies. Pompey by this occaſion, hauing brought this warre more eaſily to paſſe then he hoped for, departed preſently out of ARABIA, and hauing ſpeedily in few dayes paſſed through the contrys lying by the way, he came at length to the citie of AMISVS. There he found great preſents that were brought vnto him from Pharnaces, and many dead bodies of the kings bloud, and amongſt the reſt, Mithridates corſe, which could not well be diſcerned by his face, becauſe they that had the carying of his body had forgotten to drie vp the braine: neuertheleſſe, ſuch as deſired to ſee him, knew him by certaine ſcarres he had in his face. For Pompey would in no wiſe ſee him: but to auoid enuie, ſent him away vnto the citie of SINOPE. He wondred much at the maruellous ſumptuous rich apparell and weapons that he ware. The ſcaberd of his ſword (which coſt foure hundred talents) was ſtolen by Publius, and ſold to Ariarathes. Alſo a hat of Mithridates of wonderfull workemanſhip, being begged of Caius his foſter brother, was ſecretly giuen to Fauſtus, the ſonne of Sylla, without Pompeys priuity. But afterwards when Pharnaces vnderſtood of it, he puniſhed the parties that had imbezelled them. Pompey hauing ordered all things and eſtabliſhed that prouince, went on his iorney homewards with great pompe and glory. So,comming vnto MITYLENE, he releaſed the citie of all taxes and payments for Theophanes ſake,and was preſent at a certaine play they yearely make for games, where the Poets report their workes,contending one with an other,hauing at that time no other matter in hand, but P*ompeys* actes and ieſtes. P*ompey* liked exceeding well the Theater where theſe playes were made, and drew a modell or platforme of it to make a ſtatelyer then that in ROME. As he paſſed by the citie of RHODES, he would needs heare all the Rethoritiãs diſpute,and gaue euery one of them a talent. P*oſidonius* hath written the diſputation he made before P*ompey*, againſt Hermagoras the Rethoritian,vpon the theame and propoſition P*ompey* ſelfe did giue them, touching the generall queſtion. P*ompey* did the like at ATHENS vnto the Philoſophers there. For he gaue towardes the reedifying of the city againe,fifty talents. So he thought at his returne home into ITALIE,to haue bene very honorably receiued, and longed to be at home,to ſee his wife & children,thinking alſo that they long looked for him: but the god that hath the charge giuen him to mingle fortunes proſperity, with ſome bitter ſoppe of aduerſity, layed a blocke in his way at home in his owne houſe, to make his returne more ſorowfull. For Mutia his wife had in his abſence played falſe at tables. But P*ompey* being then farre off, made no account of the reportes nor tales that were told him. Howbeit, when he drew neare into ITALIE, and that he was more attentiue to giue eare to the ill reportes he heard: then he ſent vnto her to tell her, that he refuſed her for his wife, writing nothing to her at that time,neither euer after told the cauſe why he had forſaken her. Notwithſtanding, in Ciceroes Epiſtles the cauſe appeareth. Furthermore, there were rumours ranne abroade in ROME which troubled them ſore, being giuen out that he would bring his armie ſtraight to ROME,and make himſelfe abſolute Lord of all the ROMAINE Empire. C*raſſus* thereupon,either for that he beleeued it indeede to be true, or(as it was thought) to make the accuſation true,and the enuie towardes P*ompey* the greater: conueyed himſelfe, his familie, and goodes, ſodainly out of ROME. So P*ompey* when he came into ITALIE,called all his ſouldiers together,& after he had made an oration vnto them,as time and occaſion required: he commanded them to ſeuer themſelues,and euery man to repaire home to apply his buſineſſe, remembring to meete at ROME together,at the day of his triũphe. His army being thus diſperſed, & ſtraight reported abroad for newes: a maruellous thing happened vnto him. The cities ſeeing P*ompey* the great without ſouldiers, hauing but a ſmall traine about him of his familiar friends onely: went all of thẽ to meete him,not as though he were returned home from his great conqueſtes, but from ſome iourney taken for his pleaſure. Such was the loue of the people to him, that they accompanied him to ROME,whether he would or not, with a greater power then that he had brought into ITALIE: ſo that if he had bene diſpoſed to haue made any innouatiõ in the common wealth, he had not needed his army. In thoſe dayes there was a law,that no man ſhould enter into ROME before his triumphe: whereupon Pompey ſent to the Senate, to pray them to deferre the chuſing of Conſuls for a few dayes,becauſe he might be preſent to further P*iſo*,who ſued for the Conſulſhip that yeare. They denied him his requeſt, by Catoes meanes that hindred it. Pompey maruelling to heare of his boldnes & plaine ſpeach,which he only vſed of all other to defend his iuſt cauſes: had a maruellous deſire to win him, & to make him his friend. So Cato hauing two neeces,Pompey deſired to marry the one himſelfe,& the other for his ſon. But Cato miſtruſting this deſire of P*ompeys*,that it was a colour only to win & corrupt him: denied him flatly. His wife & ſiſter on the other ſide,they were angry with him for refuſing to make alliãce with P*ompey* the great About that time it chãced, that P*ompey* being very deſirous to preferre Afranius to be Conſull, he cauſed certaine money to be giuen amongſt the tribes of the people, & the ſame was deliuered out to ſome,euen in his owne gardens. This thing being reported abroad in the city,euery man ſpake ill of Pompey: that he put the Conſulſhip to ſale for money,vnto thoſe that could not deſerue it by vertue, ſith himſelfe onely had obtained it by purchaſe,of many a noble and worthy deede. Then ſayd Cato to his wife & ſiſter: loe now,we had bene partakers of this fault too, had we matched with Pompey. Whẽ they heard it,they confeſſed he had reaſon to refuſe the match,for equitie & his honour. But now to his triumphe. For the ſtatelineſſe & magnificẽce therof,although he had two dayes ſpace to ſhew it, yet he lacked time: for there were many things prepared for the ſhew, that were not ſeene, which would haue ſerued to haue ſet out an other triumphe. Firſt there were tables caried, whereon were written the names and titles of all the people and nations for the which he triumphed, as theſe that follow. The kingdome of PONTVS, ARMENIA, CAPPADOCIA, PAPHLAGONIA, MEDIA, COLCHIS, IBERIA, ALBANIA, SYRIA, CILICIA, and MESOPOTAMIA: and furthermore, the people that dwell about PHOENICIA & PALÆSTINE, IVDÆA, & ARABIA: & all the pirats which he had ouercome both by ſea & by land, in all parts of the world. In all theſe countryes, he tooke about a thouſand caſtels, few leſſe then nine hundred townes and cities: of pirats ſhips eight hundred, & nine & thirtie deſolate townes left without inhabitants, repleniſhed againe with people by him. Moreouer, theſe tables declared, that the reuenue of the cõmõ wealth of ROME before theſe conqueſtes he made, amounted yearely but to fiue thouſand Miriades: and that from thenceforth with the ſummes he had added vnto the former reuenue, they ſhould now receiue eight thouſand & fiue hundred Miriades: & that he brought preſently in ready gold & ſiluer, & in plate & iewels, to put into the cõmon treaſury, the value of twẽty thouſand talents, beſides that which had bene diſtributed already amongſt the ſouldiers: of the which, he that had leſt for his ſhare, had fifteen hũdred Drachmas.

Captiues led in Pompeys third triumph.

The priſoners that were led in the ſhew of this triumph, beſides the Captaines of the pirats, were theſe that follow. The ſonne of Tigranes king of ARMENIA, with his wife and daughter: the wife of king Tigranes himſelfe, called Zoſime: Ariſtobulus king of IVRIE: Mithridates ſiſter with fiue ſonnes of hers, & ſome Ladies of SCYTHIA. The hoſtages alſo of the IBERIANS & the ALBANIANS, & alſo of the kings of the COMMAGENIANS: ouer & beſides a great nũber of other marks of triũphes which himſelfe or his Lieutenants had won at ſundry battels in diuers places. But the greateſt honour that euer he wanne, and which neuer other Conſull of the ROMAINES but himſelfe obtained, was this: that he made his third triumph of the three parts of the world.

Pompey conquered three partes of the world: Africke. Europe. Aſia. Pompey triumphed thriſe before the age of forty yeares. The change of Pompeys fortune and honour.

Diuers other ROMAINES had triumphed thriſe before him, howbeit he firſt triumphed of AFRICKE: the ſecond time of EVROPE: the third time of ASIA. So that it appeared by theſe three triumphes, that he had triumphed in manner of all the land that is inhabited, being at that time, (as it is reported by them which compare his doings vnto Alexander the great) vnder foure and thirtie yeares of age, though in troth at that time he was neare forty. O happy had it bene for him, if he had dyed when he had Alexanders fortune: for all his life afterwardes, made his proſperitie hatefull, or his aduerſity miſerable. Imploying the honour and authoritie he had gotten by his valiantneſſe, fauouring mens vniuſt cauſes: the more he furthered them, the more he leſſened honour, and vnwares brought his greatneſſe to nothing. For like as when the ſtrongeſt places of a citie, which receiuing their enemies into them, do giue them the benefite of their owne ſtrength: euen ſo, through Pompeys power, Cæſar growing to be great, ouerthrew him in the end with the ſelfe ſame meanes he imployed, to the ouerthrow of others. And thus it fortuned.

Lucullus at his returne out of ASIA (where Pompey had vncurteouſly vſed him) was then very well taken of the Senate, and much more when Pompey was alſo come to ROME. For the Senate did counſell and incourage him to deale in the affaires of the ſtate, ſeeing him waxe verie ſlow, & giuen too much to his eaſe and pleaſure, by reaſon of his great wealth he had gotten.

Lucullus inueyed againſt Pompey, by Catoes aſſiſtance. Pompey ioyned with Clodius, Tribune of the people.

So when Pompey was come, he began to ſpeake againſt him, and through the friendſhip and aſſiſtance of Cato, confirmed all his doings in ASIA, which Pompey had broken and reiected. Pompey finding he had ſuch a repulſe of the Senate, was driuen to haue recourſe vnto the Tribunes of the people, and to fall in friendſhip with light young men. Of the Tribunes, the moſt impudent and vileſt perſon was Clodius: who receiued him, & made him a prey vnto the people. For he had Pompey euer at his elbow, & againſt his honour caried him vp & down the market place after him, to ſpeake as occaſion ſerued to confirme any matter or deuiſe which he preferred vnto him to flatter the common people. And further, for recompence of his good will, he craued of Pompey (not as a thing diſhonorable, but beneficiall for him) that he would forſake Cicero, who was his friend, and had done much for him in matters of common wealth.

Pompey graunted his requeſt. Thereupon Cicero being brought in daunger of law, and requiring Pompeys friendſhip to helpe him, he ſhut his doore againſt them that came to ſpeake in his behalfe, and went out himſelfe at an other backe doore. Cicero thereupon fearing the extremitie of law, willingly forſooke ROME. At that time, Iulius Cæſar returning home from his

Prætorſhippe out of SPAINE, beganne to lay ſuch a plotte, that preſently brought him into great fauour, and afterwardes much increaſed his power, but otherwiſe vtterly vndid Pompey and the common wealth. Now he was to ſue for his firſt Conſulſhippe, and conſidering the enmitie betwixt Pompey and Craſſus, if he ioyned with the one, he made the other his enemie: he deuiſed to make them friendes, a thing ſeeming of great honeſtie at the firſt ſight, but yet a peſtilent deuiſe, and as ſubtile a practiſe as could be. For the power of the citie being before deuided into two partes (as a ſhippe euenly balleſt of ech ſide) and maintained the common wealth vpright: being now brought into one mans power, there was no poſſibilitie to withſtand it, ſo that all fell to wracke in the end. Whereupon, Cato wiſely told them afterwardes, that ſaid the ciuill warres betwixt Pompey and Cæſar was cauſe of the deſtruction of the common wealth: that their enmity and diſcord was not the chiefe originall cauſe of this miſerie, but rather their friendſhip and agreement. For by their friendſhip Cæſar was choſen Conſull, who ſtraight fell to flatter the people and poore men, and made a law for reſtoring of the colonies belonging to ROME, and for diſtributing of lands to them that had none, imbaſing the maieſtie and dignitie of the chiefe Magiſtrate, and making the Conſulſhippe in maner no better then the Tribuneſhip of the people. Bibulus his colleague and fellow Conſull, did what he could to reſiſt him, and Cato alſo did aide him to his power: vntill Cæſar openly brought Pompey into the pulpit for orations before the people, and calling him by his name, asked him if he did giue his conſent to the decrees which he did ſet forth. Pompey aunſwered him, he did. Why then, ſaid Cæſar, if any man will by force let the paſſing of this law by voices of the people: wilt thou not then come to helpe them? Yes that I will in deede, ſaid Pompey. Againſt them that threaten with the ſword, I will bring both ſworde and target. Pompey in all his life neuer did nor ſpake thing that men more miſliked, then that which he ſaid at that time. His friends excuſed him, and ſaid it was a word paſſed his mouth before he was aware: but his deeds afterwards ſhewed, that he was altogether at Cæſars commaundement. For not many dayes after, he maried Iulia the daughter of Cæſar, which was affianced, or made ſure before, vnto Seruilius Cæpio when no man thought of it: and to pacifie Cæpioes anger, he gaue him his owne daughter in mariage, whom he had alſo promiſed before vnto Fauſtus the ſonne of Sylla: & Cæſar alſo maried Calphurnia, the daughter of Piſo. After this, Pompey filling all ROME with ſouldiers, did what he would by force. For as the Conſull Bibulus came into the market place accompanied with Lucullus and Cato, they ſodainly ſet vpon him, and brake the bundels of rods which his officers caried before him: and ſome one, whatſoeuer he was, caſt a basket of horſe dung vpon his head. Moreouer, the two Tribunes that were in his company, were alſo very ſore hurt. By this meanes, hauing cleared the market place of all their enemies, they paſſed the law for diuiſion of lands, as they would themſelues. The people being fleſhed with this baite, were contented to be ruled by them as they would, and would neuer ſticke at any matter that they would haue paſſed. So were all Pompeys matters confirmed, which Lucullus was againſt: and they appointed vnto Cæſar alſo, the gouernment of the GAVLES on this ſide and beyond the Alpes: and ILLYRIA for fiue yeares ſpace, with foure whole legions. The next yeare following were appointed Conſuls, Piſo Cæſars father in law, and Gabinius the greateſt flatterer Pompey had about him. But now while things ſtood in theſe tearmes, Bibulus though he were Conſull, kept him ſelfe cloſe in his houſe for eight monethes ſpace, and onely ſent out billes, and ſet them vp on euery poſt in open places, accuſing Pompey and Cæſar. Cato on the other ſide, as if he had bene inſpired with the ſpirite of prophecy, tolde openly in the Senate houſe, what would become of the common wealth and Pompey. Lucullus growing old, lay ſtill and tooke his pleaſure, & would no more meddle in the common wealth. At that time it was that Pompey ſaid: it was more vnſeaſonable for an old man to follow his pleaſure, then to attend matters of the common wealth. Yet him ſelfe ſhortly after was ſo doted of his yong wife, that he would follow her vp and downe in the country, and in his gardens, and leaue all affairs of waight aſide. Whereupon Clodius being then Tribune of the people, deſpiſed Pompey, and beganne to enter into ſeditious attempts. For when he had driuen Cicero out of ROME, and had ſent away Cato to make warres in CYPRVS, and that Cæſar alſo was occupied in GAVLE, and finding that the people in like caſe were at his commaundement, becauſe to flatter them he did what they would haue him: he attempted incontinently to vndo ſome things that Pompey had eſtabliſhed. Amongſt other things, he tooke Tigranes out of priſon, and euer caried him vp and downe with him whereſoeuer he went, and continually pict quarrels vnto Pompeys friends, to trie what credit he had. In the end Pompey comming abroad one day into the common aſſembly, to heare how a matter of his was hādled: this Clodius hauing a company of vagabondes and deſperate men about him, that cared not what they did: he ſitting in a place where he might be ſeene from the reſt, began to aske theſe queſtions out aloude. Who is the licentiouſeſt Captaine in all this city? What man is he that ſeekes for a man? What is he that ſcratcheth his head with one finger? They, like a companie of daunſers or ſingers, when he ſpake and clapped his hands on his gowne, aunſwered him ſtraight aloude to euery queſtion, that it was Pompey. This went to Pompeys hart, that was not wonte to heare himſelfe ſo ill ſpoken of openly, neither was acquainted with any ſuch kinde of fight: but yet it made him bite the lip more, when he ſaw the Senate glad to ſee him thus ſhamed and reproued, as a iuſt reuenge and puniſhment for his vile betraying and forſaking of Cicero. So, great ſturre and vprore being made vpon this in the market place, and many men ſore hurt, and one of Clodius bondmen being taken alſo in the preaſe of the people with a ſword in his hand, very neere vnto Pompey: making this his colour (but otherwiſe fearing Clodius inſolencie and proud words) he would neuer after come into the market place, as long as Clodius was Tribune, but kept at home ſtill, conſulting with his friends what way he ſhould take to appeaſe the anger of the Senate againſt him. Thereuppon, one of his friends called Culeo, perſwaded him to put away his wife Iulia, and vtterly to refuſe Cæſars friendſhip, and to ſticke againe to the Senate: but he would none of that. Notwithſtanding he was contented to hearken vnto them that gaue him counſell to call Cicero home againe, who was Clodius mortall enemie, and in great fauour with the Senate. Thereuppon, he brought Ciceroes brother into the market place, to mooue the matter to the people, with a great number of men about him, where they fell to blowes, and diuers were ſlaine of either ſide: notwithſtanding, he ouercame Clodius. Thus Cicero being called home by decree of the people, when he was come, he brought Pompey againe in fauor with the Senate, and ſtanding with the lawe propounded to giue Pompey authoritie to cauſe corne to be brought to ROME, he once againe made him haue power both by land and ſea ouer all the territories of the ROMAINES. For all the hauens, marts & faires, and all ſtore houſes for corne, yea moreouer all the trade of marchandiſe and tillage, came vnder Pompeys hands. Then Clodius accuſing him, ſaid: that the Senate had not made this law for the dearth of victuals, but that they made a dearth of victuals, becauſe the law ſhould paſſe, to reuiue Pompeys power and authoritie againe, that was almoſt vnder foote. Other ſay, that this was a deuiſe of Lentulus Spinther the Conſull, who gaue Pompey the greater authoritie, becauſe he might be ſent to put king Ptolomy againe into his kingdome. This notwithſtanding, Canidius the Tribune preferred an other law to ſend Pompey without an army, with two ſergeants only to cary the axes before him, to bring Ptolomy in fauor againe with the ALEXANDRIANS. This lawe ſeemed not to miſlike Pompey: but the Senate with honeſt colour put by this law, as being affraide leaſt Pompeys perſon ſhould miſcary in ſo doing. Neuertheleſſe, litle papers were found throwne about the market place, and the Senate houſe, declaring that Ptolomy deſired Pompey might come to aide him in Spinthers ſtead. Timagenes writeth notwithſtanding, that Ptolomy went vnto ROME, & left ÆGYPT without any occaſion giuen him, at the perſuaſion of Theophanes, who perſuaded him to do ſo, becauſe he would giue Pompey occaſion to make newe warres. But Theophanes craft and ſubtilty made not this matter ſo credible, as Pompeys wit and good nature made it altogether vntrue: for his ambitiō was nothing ſo vile nor ill, as that was. So, Pompey hauing now full authority to cauſe corne to be brought to ROME, he ſent then his Lieutenants and friends abroade, and himſelfe in perſon wente into SICILE. Nowe being ready to returne againe, there roſe ſuch a ſtorme of winde in the ſea, that the mariners were in doubt to wey their anckers. But himſelfe firſt imbarked, and commanded them ſtraight to hoiſe ſaile, crying out aloude, it is of neceſſitie I muſt go, but not to liue. So, through his boldneſſe and good ſpirite, vſing the good fortune he had, he filled all the places of marte, and markets with corne, and all the ſea beſides with ſhippes: inſomuch, the plenty he brought did not only furniſh the city of ROME, but all their neighbours alſo about them, and came like a liuely ſpring that diſperſed it ſelfe through all ITALIE. About that time, the great conqueſts that Cæſar made in GAVLE, did ſet him aloft. For when they thought that he was occupied in warres farre from ROME, with the BELGEANS, SWISSES, and Engliſhmen: he by ſecret practiſe, was in the middeſt among the people at ROME, & moſt againſt Pompey in the waightieſt affaires of the commonwealth. For he had the power of an armie about his perſon, which he did harden with paines and continuall practiſe, not with intent to fight onely againſt the barbarous people: for the battels he had with them, were in maner but as a hunting ſporte, by the which he made himſelfe inuincible, and dreadfull to the worlde. But furthermore, by the infinite gold & ſiluer, and the incredible ſpoiles and treaſure which he wan vpon the enemies whom he had ouercome: and by ſending great preſents alſo to ROME, to the AEdiles, Prætors, Conſuls, and their wiues, he purchaſed him many friends. Therefore, after he had paſſed ouer the Alpes againe, and was come to winter in the city of LVCA: a world of people (both men and women) and of the Senate themſelues almoſt two hundred perſons (and amongſt them, Craſſus and Pompey by name) went out of ROME vnto him. Furthermore, there were ſeene at Cæſars gate, ſixe ſcore ſergeants carying axes before Prætors, or Proconſuls. So Cæſar ſent euery one backe againe, either full of money, or good words: but with Pompey and Craſſus, he made a matche, that they two together ſhould ſue to be Conſuls, and that he himſelfe would ſend them good aide to ROME, at the day of election, to giue their voices. And if they were choſen, that they ſhould then practiſe by decree of the people, to haue the gouernments of ſome new prouinces and armies aſſigned them: and withall, that they ſhould adiorne the gouernment of thoſe prouinces he had, for fiue yeares more. This packe being bewrayed and ſpred abroad through ROME, the honeſteſt ſort miſliked much thereof. Whereupon Marcellinus at an open aſſembly of the people, did aske them both, if they would ſue for the Conſulſhip at the next election. So, they being vrged by the people to make aunſwere, Pompey ſpake firſt, and ſaid: peraduenture he would, peraduenture not. Craſſus aunſwered more gently, that he would doe that which ſhould be beſt for the commonwealth. Then Marcellinus ſharpely inueying againſt Pompey, he angrily againe caſt him in the teeth, and ſaid, that Marcellinus was the ranckeſt churle, and the vnthankfulleſt beaſt in the world: for that of a dum man he had made him eloquent, and being in manner ſtarued and famiſhed, many a time he had filled his bellie. This notwithſtanding, diuers that before were determined to ſue for the Conſulſhip, went no further in it, ſauing Lucius Domitius, whom Cato counſelled and incouraged not to giue it ouer: for, ſaid he, thou doeſt not contend for the Conſulſhip, but to defend the common libertie of thy country againſt two tyrants. Pompey therefore fearing Catoes faction, leaſt that hauing all the Senates good willes, he ſhould drawe alſo the beſt parte of the people after him: thought it not good to ſuffer Domitius to come into the market place. To this ende therefore, he ſent men armed againſt him, who at the firſt onſet, ſlue the torche bearer that caried the torche before him, and made all the reſt flie: amongſt whom alſo Cato was the laſt man that retired, who was hurt in his elbow defending of Domitius. Pompey and Craſſus being become Conſuls after this ſorte, they ordered themſelues nothing the more temperately, nor honeſtly. For firſt of all, the people being about to chooſe Cato prætor, Pompey being at the aſſembly of the election, perceiuing that they would chooſe him, brake vp the aſſembly, falſely alleadging that he had noted certaine ill ſignes, and afterwards, the tribes of the people being bribed and corrupted with money, they choſe Antias and Vatinius prætors. After that, by Trebonius tribune of the people, they publiſhed edicts, authoriſing Cæſars charge for fiue yeares longer, according to the appointment they had made with Cæſar. Vnto Craſſus alſo they had appointed SYRIA, and the warre againſt the PARTHIANS. Vnto Pompey in like caſe, all AFRICKE, and both SPAYNES, with foure Legions beſides: of the which, at Cæſars deſire, he lent him two legions to help him in his war in GAVLE. Theſe things done, Craſſus departed to his Prouince, at the going out of his Conſulſhip: and Pompey remained at ROME about the dedicating of his Theater, where he cauſed many goodly plaies to be made, both for exerciſe of perſon, as alſo for learning and muſicke, and cauſed wilde beaſts alſo to be baited and hunted, and killed a fiue hundred lions. But of all things, there was no ſuch fearefull ſight and terrible fight,as was betweene the elephants. This great charge and bountifull expence, defraied by Pompey, to ſhew the people paſtime and pleaſure: made him againe to be very much eſteemed of, and beloued amongſt the people. But on the other ſide,he wanne himſelfe as much ill will and enuy, in committing the gouernement of his Prouinces and Legions into the handes of his Lieutenants, whileſt he himſelfe romed vp and downe the pleaſaunt places of ITALY,with his wife at his pleaſure: either becauſe he was farre in loue with her,or els for that ſhe loued him ſo dearely, that he coulde not finde in his heart to leaue her companie.It was reported of her,(being knowne of many) that this young lady Iulia loued her husband more dearely,not for Pompeys floriſhing age, but for his aſſured continencie, knowing no other woman but her: beſides alſo, he was no ſolemne man, but pleaſant of conuerſation,which made women loue him maruellouſly,vnleſſe we will reproue the curtiſan Floraes falſe teſtimonie. It is certaine,that at an election of the Ædiles, men riſing ſodainly in hurly burly, drew their ſwords, and many were ſlaine about Pompey: inſomuch as his clothes being bloudied, he ſent his men home in haſte to fetche him other to change him. His young wife that was great with child, ſeeing his clothes bloudie, tooke ſuch a flight vpon it,that ſhe fell downe in a ſounde before them, and they had much a doe to recouer her, and yet ſhe fell ſtraight in labour vpon it, and was deliuered. So that they themſelues, which blamed him moſt for his good will he bare vnto Cæſar: could not reproue the loue he bare vnto his wife. An other time after that,ſhe was great with child againe, whereof ſhe died,and the childe liued not many dayes after the mother. As Pompey was about to carie her into the countrie to be buried,to a houſe he had there neere vnto the city of ALBA:the people by force tooke her corſe,& caried it into the field of Mars, more for the pitie they tooke of the young Ladie, then to pleaſure either Cæſar or Pompey: and yet what the people did for them, it appeared rather they did it more for Cæſars ſake being abſent, them for Pompey that was preſent. But ſtraight when his alliãce was broken,which rather couered,then bridled their ambitious deſire to rule: there roſe a new ſturre in ROME immediatly,and euery mans mouth was full of prittle prattle and ſeditious words. Not long after that alſo came newes,that Craſſus was ouerthrowne, and ſlaine in PARTHIA: who was a manifeſt ſtay and let to keepe them two from ciuill warres,for that they both feared him,and therefore kept themſelues in a reaſonable ſorte together. But when fortune had taken awaie this third champion,who could haue withſtood the better of them both that had ouercome the other: then might haue bene ſaid of theſe two which remained,as the comicall Poet ſaid:

See how theſe champions purpoſing each others force to trie,
VVith nointed skin and duſty hands ſtand vaunting valiantly.

So litle can fortune preuaile againſt nature, hauing no power to ſtop couetouſneſſe: ſith ſo large and great an Empire, and ſuch a wide countrie beſides, could not containe the couetous deſire of theſe two men. But though they had often both heard and read,

Among the gods themſelues all things by lot diuided are,
And none of them intrudes himſelfe within his neighbours share.

Yet they thought not that the Empire of ROME was enough for them, which were but two. But Pompey ſpake openly in an oration he made vnto the people, that he euer came to office before he looked for it,and alſo left it ſooner then they thought he would haue done: and that he witneſſed by diſcharging his armie ſo ſoone. Then thinking that Cæſar would not diſcharge his armie,he ſought to make himſelfe ſtrong againſt him, by procuring offices of the citie,without any other alteration. Neither would he ſeeme to miſtruſt him, but he plainely ſhewed that he did deſpiſe and contemne him. But when he ſawe that he could not obtaine the offices of the citie as he would, becauſe the citizens that made the elections were bribed with money: he then left it without a magiſtrate, ſo that there was none either to command, or that the people ſhould obey. Hereupon there ran a brute ſtraight, that there muſt needes be a Dictator made,and the firſt man that propounded it, was Lucilius tribune of the people, who perſuaded them to chooſe Pompey. But Cato ſtuck ſo ſtoutly againſt it, that the Tribune had like to haue loſt his office, euen in the market place. But then many of Pompeys friends ſtepped vp,and excuſed him,ſaying: that he neither ſought, nor would haue the Dictatorſhip.

Then Cato commended him much, and praying him to ſee good order kept in the common wealth: P*ompey* being aſhamed to denie ſo reaſonable a requeſt, was carefull of it. Thereupon two Conſuls were choſen, Domitius, and Meſſala: but afterwardes when the ſtate began to change againe, by the death of one of the Conſuls, and that diuers were more earneſtly bent to haue a Dictator than before, Cato fearing it would breake out with furie, determined to giue P*ompey* ſome office of reaſonable authoritie, to keepe him from the other more tyrannicall. Inſomuch, Bibulus himſelfe being chiefe of the Senate, and P*ompeys* enemie, was the firſt that moued, P*ompey* might be choſen Conſull alone: for, ſaid he, by this meanes, either the commonwealth ſhall be ridde of the preſent trouble: or elſe it ſhalbe in bondage to an honeſt man. This opinion was maruelled at, in reſpect of him that ſpake it. Whereupon, Cato ſtanding vp, it was thought ſtraight he would haue ſpoken againſt him. But ſilence being made him, he plainly tolde them, that for his owne part he would not haue bene the firſt man to haue propounded that was ſpoken: but ſithence it was ſpoken by another, that he thought it reaſonable and meete to be followed. And therefore, ſaid he, it is better to haue an office to commaund, whatſoeuer he be, rather then none: and that he ſaw no man fitter to command, then P*ompey*, in ſo troubleſome a time. All the Senate liked his opinion, and ordained that P*ompey* ſhould be choſen ſole Conſull: and that if he ſawe in his diſcretion he ſhould neede the aſſiſtance of an other companion, he might name any whom he thought good, but not till two moneths were paſt. Thus was P*ompey* made Conſul alone by Sulpitius, regent for that day. Then Pompey made very friendly countenance vnto Cato, and thanked him for the honor he had done to him, praying him priuately to aſſiſt him with his counſell in the Conſulſhip. Cato anſwered him, that there was no cauſe why he ſhould thanke him, for he had ſpoken nothing for his ſake, but for reſpect of the commonwealth onely: and for his counſell, if he would aske it, he ſhould priuately haue it, if not, yet that he would openly ſay that which he thought. Such a man was Cato in all his doings. Now P*ompey* returning into the citie, maried Cornelia, the daughter of Metellus Scipio, not a maiden, but late the widow of P*ublius Craſſus* the ſonne, that was ſlaine in PARTHIA, to whom ſhe was maried a maiden. This Lady had excellent gifts to be beloued beſides her beautie. For ſhe was properly learned, could play well on the harpe, was ſkilfull in muſicke and geometrie, and tooke great pleaſure alſo in philoſophie, and not vainely without ſome profit. For ſhe was very modeſt and ſober of behauiour, without brawling & fooliſh curioſitie, which commonly yong women haue, that are indued with ſuch ſingular gifts. Her father alſo, was a noble man, both in bloud, and life. Notwithſtanding, theſe vnlike mariages did nothing pleaſe ſome: for Cornelia was young enough to haue bene his ſonnes wife. Now the beſt citizens thought, that therein he regarded not the care of the commonwealth, being in ſuch a troubleſome time, which had choſen him onely, as her remedie to redreſſe the ſame: and that he in the meane time gaue himſelfe ouer to marying and feaſting, where rather he ſhould haue bene carefull of his Conſulſhip, which was diſpoſed vpon him againſt the lawe, for common calamities ſake, that otherwiſe he had not come by, if all had bene quiet. Furthermore, he ſharpely proceeded againſt them, which by briberie and vnlawfull meanes came to office: and hauing made lawes and ordinances for the adminiſtration of Iuſtice otherwiſe, he dealt iuſtly and vprightly in all things, giuing ſafetie, order, ſilence and grauitie, to matters of iudgement, with force of armes, himſelfe being preſent: ſauing that when his father in lawe was alſo accuſed among other, he ſent for the three hundred & threeſcore Iudges home to his houſe, praying them to helpe him. Whereupon, when the accuſer ſaw Scipio accompanied by the Iudges themſelues, returning into the market place: he let fall his ſute. This made P*ompey* againe be condemned, and blamed alſo more then before, for that he hauing made a lawe, that no man ſhould praiſe the offendors, whileſt their matter was a hearing: came himſelfe and openly praiſed Plancus being accuſed. Thereupon Cato being one of the Iudges, ſtopped his eares with both his hands, ſaying: that he might not heare an offender praiſed, ſeeing it was forbidden by lawe. But therefore he was refuſed for a Iudge, before they gaue ſentence. Notwithſtanding, Plancus was condemned by all the reſt of the Iudges, to P*ompeys* great ſhame and reproache. Shortly after, Hypſeus, one that had bene Conſull, being likewiſe accuſed, watching P*ompey* on a time as he came out of his bathe to go to ſupper: vpon his knees he beſought Pompeys fauour and helpe. But he ſtately paſſed by him, and gaue him no other aunſwere, but tolde him, he marred his ſupper, and ſaid nothing els to him. This inconſtancy was much reproued in Pompey. Howbeit otherwiſe he ſet all things in good order, and choſe his father in lawe Scipio, for his colleague and fellow in the Conſulſhip, for the fiue laſt moneths. After that, he cauſed the gouernement of his prouinces to be appointed him for foure yeares more, with commiſſion to take yearely out of the treaſure a thouſand talents to defray the charges of this warre. Cæſars friend ſeeing that, ſtepped vp for him, and praied that there might alſo be had ſome conſideration of him, that had likewiſe great warres for the Empire of ROME: ſaying, that his good ſeruice deſerued, either that they ſhould make him Conſull againe, or elſe that they ſhould prolong his charge and gouernment, ſo as he might yet peaceably enioy the honor to commaund that which he had conquered, to the end that no other ſucceſſor might reape the fruite of his labour. Much ſturre and contention being about this matter at ROME, Pompey as though for good will he ment to excuſe the enuie they might haue borne Cæſar, ſaid: that he had receiued letters from him, by the which he requeſted a ſucceſſor, and to be diſcharged of this warre: and furthermore, that he thought it good they ſhould graunt him priuiledge to demaund the ſecond Conſulſhip, although he were abſent. Which Cato ſtoutly withſtood, ſaying, that he muſt returne home as a priuate man, and leauing his armie, ſhould come in perſon to craue recompence of his countrie. But becauſe Pompey made no replie nor aunſwere to the contrarie, men ſuſpected ſtraight that he had no great good liking of Cæſar, and the rather, becauſe he had ſent vnto him for the two legions which he had lent him, vnder colour of his warre againſt the PARTHIANS. But Cæſar though he ſmelt him wherefore he ſent for his ſouldiers, returned them home with liberall rewarde. About that time, Pompey fell ſicke at NAPLES of a dangerous diſeaſe, whereof notwithſtanding he recouered againe. The NEAPOLITANS thereupon, by perſuaſion of Praxagoras, one of the chiefeſt men of their citie: did ſacrifice to the gods for his recouerie. The like did alſo their neighbours round about: and in fine, it ranne ſo generally through all ITALY, that there was no citie or towne (great or ſmall) but made open feaſt and reioycing for many daies together. Beſides, the infinite number of people was ſuch, that went to meete him out of all partes: that there was not place enough for them all, but the high waies, cities, townes and ports of the ſea, were all full of people, feaſting and ſacrificing to the gods, reioycing for his recouerie. Diuerſe alſo went to meete him, crowned with garlands, and ſo did attend on him, caſting noſegaies and flowers vpon him. Thus was his Iorney the nobleſt ſight that euer was, all the way as he came: howbeit men thought alſo, that this was the chiefeſt cauſe of the beginning of the ciuill warres. For he fell into ſuch a pride, and glorious conceit of himſelfe, with the exceeding ioy he tooke to ſee himſelfe thus honored: that forgetting his orderly gouernment, which made all his former doings to proſper, he grew too bolde in deſpiſing of Cæſars power, as though he ſtood in no neede of other power or care to withſtand him, but that he could ouercome him as he would, farre more eaſily, then he could haue done before. Furthermore, Appius thereupon returned from GAVLE, that brought him his two legions back againe which he had lent vnto Cæſar, reproaching much his doings which he had done there, and giuing out many foule wordes againſt Cæſar. For he ſaid, that Pompey knew not his owne ſtrength and authoritie, that would ſeeke to make himſelfe ſtrong, by other power againſt him: conſidering that he might ouercome him with his owne legions he ſhould bring with him, ſo ſoone as they ſaw but Pompey in the face, ſuch ill will did Cæſars owne ſouldiers beare him, and were maruellous deſirous beſides to ſee himſelf. Theſe flattering tales ſo puffed vp Pompey, and brought him into ſuch a ſecuritie and truſt of himſelfe, that he mocked them to ſcorne which were affraide of warres. And to thoſe alſo which ſaid, that if Cæſar came to ROME, they ſaw not how they could reſiſt his power: he ſmilingly aunſwered them againe, and bad them take no thought for that: for as ofte ſaid he as I do but ſtampe with my foote vpon the ground of ITALY, I ſhall bring men enough out of euery corner, both footemen and horſemen. In the meane time, Cæſar gathered force ſtill vpon him, and thenceforth drew neerer vnto ITALY, and ſent of his ſouldiers daily to ROME to be preſent at the election of the magiſtrates, and many of them that were in office, he wanne with money: amongeſt whom, was Paul, one of the Conſuls, whom hee wanne of his ſide, by meanes of a thouſand fiue hundred talents. And Curio the Tribune of the people, whom he diſcharged of an infinite debt he ought: and Marke Antony alſo, who for Curioes ſake, was diſcharged likewiſe for part of the debt which Curio ought, being alſo bound as him ſelfe. Furthermore, it was found that a Captaine or Centurion ſent from Cæſar, being neare vnto the Senate, vnderſtanding that the councell would not prolong Cæſars gouernment which he required, clapping his hand vpon the pummell of his ſword: well ſaid he, this ſhall giue it him. So, to be ſhort, all that was done and ſaied, tended to this end. Notwithſtanding, the petitions and requeſtes that Curio made in Cæſars behalfe, ſeemed ſomewhat more reaſonable for the people: for he requeſted one of the two, either to make P*ompey* to put downe his army, or elſe to licence Cæſar to haue his army as well as he. For, either being both made priuate men, they would fall to agreement of them ſelues: or elſe being both of like ſtrength, neither of both would ſeeke any alteration, fearing one an other, but would content them ſelues either of them with their owne. Or otherwiſe, he that ſhould weaken the one, and ſtrengthen the other: ſhould double his power whom he feared. Thereto very whotly replied the Conſull Marcellus, calling Cæſar, theefe, and ſaied that he ſhould be proclaimed an open enemy to ROME, if he did not diſperſe his army. This notwithſtanding, in fine Curio, Antony, and Piſo, procured that the Senate ſhould decide the matter. For, ſaid he, all thoſe that would haue Cæſar leaue his army, and Pompey to keepe his: let them ſtand on the one ſide. Thereupon the moſt part of them ſtoode at one ſide. Then he bad them againe come away from them, that would haue them both leaue their armies. Then there remained only but two and twenty that ſtoode for Pompey: and all the reſt went of Curioes ſide. Then Curio looking aloft for ioy of the victory, went into the market place, and there was receiued of his Tribune faction, with ſhoutes of ioy and clapping of handes, and infinite noſegayes and garlands of flowers throwen vppon him. Pompey was not then preſent to ſee the Senators good will towardes him: becauſe by the law, ſuch as haue commaundement ouer ſouldiers, can not enter into ROME. Notwithſtanding Marcellus ſtanding vp, ſayd: that he would not ſtand trifling hearing of orations and arguments, when he knew that tenne legions were already paſſed ouer the Alpes, intending to come in armes againſt them: and that he would ſend a man vnto them, that ſhould defend their countrey well enough. Straight they chaunged apparell at ROME, as their manner was in a common calamity. Marcellus then comming through the market place vnto Pompey, being followed of all the Senate, went to him, and tolde him openly: Pompey, I commaund thee to helpe thy countrey with that army thou haſt already, and alſo to leauy more to aid thee. The like ſpeach did Lentulus vſe vnto him, who was appointed one of the Conſuls the yeare following. Now, when P*ompey* thought to leauy ſoldiers in ROME and to bill them, ſome would not obey him, a few others went vnwillingly to him with heauy hearts, and the moſt part of them cried, peace, peace. Antony alſo, againſt the Senates minde, red a letter vnto the people ſent from Cæſar containing certaine offers and reaſonable requeſtes, to draw the common peoples affection towardes him. For his requeſt was, that P*ompey* and he ſhould both of them reſigne their gouernments, and ſhould diſmiſſe their armies to make all well, referring them ſelues wholly to the iudgement of the people, and to deliuer vp account vnto them of their doings. Lentulus being now entred into his Conſulſhippe, did not aſſemble the Senate. But Cicero lately returned out of CILICIA, practiſed to bring them to agreement, propounding that Cæſar ſhould leaue GAVLE, and all the reſt of his army, reſeruing onely two legions and the gouernment of ILLYRIA, attending his ſecond Conſulſhippe. Pompey liked not this motion. Then Cæſars friendes were contented to graunt that hee ſhould haue but one of his legions. But Lentulus ſpake againſt it, and Cato cried out on the other ſide alſo, that P*ompey* was deceiued, and they both. So all treatie of peace was cut off. In the meane time, newes came to ROME, that Cæſar had wonne ARIMINVM, a faire great city of ITALY, and that hee came directly to ROME with a great power. But that was not true. For he came but with three thouſand horſe, and fiue thouſand footemen, and would not tary for the reſt of his army that was yet on the other ſide of the mountaines in GAVLE, but made haſt rather to ſurpriſe his enemies vpon the ſodaine, being afraied

his bathe to go to ſupper: vpon his knees he beſought P*ompeys* fauour and helpe. But he ſtately paſſed by him, and gaue him no other aunſwere, but tolde him, he marred his ſupper, and ſaid nothing els to him. This inconſtancy was much reproued in P*ompey*. Howbeit otherwiſe he ſet all things in good order, and choſe his father in lawe Scipio, for his colleague and fellow in the Conſulſhip, for the fiue laſt moneths. After that, he cauſed the gouernement of his prouinces to be appointed him for foure yeares more, with commiſſion to take yearely out of the treaſure a thouſand talents to defray the charges of this warre. Cæſars friend ſeeing that, ſtepped vp for him, and praied that there might alſo be had ſome conſideration of him, that had likewiſe great warres for the Empire of ROME: ſaying, that his good ſeruice deſerued, either that they ſhould make him Conſull againe, or elſe that they ſhould prolong his charge and gouernment, ſo as he might yet peaceably enioy the honor to commaund that which he had conquered, to the end that no other ſucceſſor might reape the fruite of his labour. Much ſturre and contention being about this matter at ROME, P*ompey* as though for good will he ment to excuſe the enuie they might haue borne Cæſar, ſaid: that he had receiued letters from him, by the which he requeſted a ſucceſſor, and to be diſcharged of this warre: and furthermore, that he thought it good they ſhould graunt him priuiledge to demaund the ſecond Conſulſhip, although he were abſent. Which Cato ſtoutly withſtood, ſaying, that he muſt returne home as a priuate man, and leauing his armie, ſhould come in perſon to craue recompence of his countrie. But becauſe P*ompey* made no replie nor aunſwere to the contrarie, men ſuſpected ſtraight that he had no great good liking of Cæſar, and the rather, becauſe he had ſent vnto him for the two legions which he had lent him, vnder colour of his warre againſt the PARTHIANS. But Cæſar though he ſmelt him wherefore he ſent for his ſouldiers, returned them home with liberall rewarde. About that time, P*ompey* fell ſicke at NAPLES of a dangerous diſeaſe, whereof notwithſtanding he recouered againe. The NEAPOLITANS thereupon, by perſuaſion of Praxagoras, one of the chiefeſt men of their citie: did ſacrifice to the gods for his recouerie. The like did alſo their neighbours round about: and in fine, it ranne ſo generally through all ITALY, that there was no citie or towne (great or ſmall) but made open feaſt and reioycing for many daies together. Beſides, the infinite number of people was ſuch, that went to meete him out of all partes: that there was not place enough for them all, but the high waies, cities, townes and ports of the ſea, were all full of people, feaſting and ſacrificing to the gods, reioycing for his recouerie. Diuerſe alſo went to meete him, crowned with garlands, and ſo did attend on him, caſting noſegaies and flowers vpon him. Thus was his Iorney the nobleſt ſight that euer was, all the way as he came: howbeit men thought alſo, that this was the chiefeſt cauſe of the beginning of the ciuill warres. For he fell into ſuch a pride, and glorious conceit of himſelfe, with the exceeding ioy he tooke to ſee himſelfe thus honored: that forgetting his orderly gouernment, which made all his former doings to proſper, he grew too bolde in deſpiſing of Cæſars power, as though he ſtood in no neede of other power or care to withſtand him, but that he could ouercome him as he would, farre more eaſily, then he could haue done before. Furthermore, Appius thereupon returned from GAVLE, that brought him his two legions back againe which he had lent vnto Cæſar, reproaching much his doings which he had done there, and giuing out many foule wordes againſt Cæſar. For he ſaid, that P*ompey* knew not his owne ſtrength and authoritie, that would ſeeke to make himſelfe ſtrong, by other power againſt him: conſidering that he might ouercome him with his owne legions he ſhould bring with him, ſo ſoone as they ſaw but P*ompey* in the face, ſuch ill will did Cæſars owne ſouldiers beare him, and were maruellous deſirous beſides to ſee himſelf. Theſe flattering tales ſo puffed vp P*ompey*, and brought him into ſuch a ſecuritie and truſt of himſelfe, that he mocked them to ſcorne which were affraide of warres. And to thoſe alſo which ſaid, that if Cæſar came to ROME, they ſaw not how they could reſiſt his power: he ſmilingly aunſwered them againe, and bad them take no thought for that: for as ofte ſaid he as I do but ſtampe with my foote vpon the ground of ITALY, I ſhall bring men enough out of euery corner, both footemen and horſemen. In the meane time, Cæſar gathered force ſtill vpon him, and thenceforth drew neerer vnto ITALY, and ſent of his ſouldiers daily to ROME to be preſent at the election of the magiſtrates, and many of them that were in

And Curio the Tribune of the people, whom he diſcharged of an infinite debt he ought: and Marke Antony alſo, who for Curioes ſake, was diſcharged likewiſe for part of the debt which Curio ought, being alſo bound as him ſelfe. Furthermore, it was found that a Captaine or Centurion ſent from Cæſar, being neare vnto the Senate, vnderſtanding that the councell would not prolong Cæſars gouernment which he required, clapping his hand vpon the pummell of his ſword: well ſaid he, this ſhall giue it him. and in garboyle, not looking for him ſo ſoone: rather then to giue them time to be prouided, and to fight with him when they were ready. For when he was come to the riuer ſide of Rubicon, (which was the vtmoſt confine of the prouince he had in charge towardes ITALY) he ſtayed ſodainely, weying with him ſelfe the great enterpriſe he tooke in hand. At the laſt, as men that being of a maruellous height from the ground do hedlong throw themſelues down cloſing of their eyes, and withdrawing their mindes from the thought of the daunger: crying out theſe wordes only vnto them that were by, in the Greeke tongue, ἀνεῤῥίφθω κύβος: in engliſh, let the die be caſt (meaning hereby to put all in hazard, and according to our prouerbe, to ſet all on ſix and ſeuen) he paſſed ouer with his army. Now, the newes of his comming being caried to ROME, they were in ſuch a maruellous feare, as the like was neuer ſeene. For all the Senate ranne immediatly vnto Pompey, and all the other magiſtrates of the city fled vnto him alſo. Tullus asking Pompey what power he had to reſiſt them, he anſwered him, faltring ſomewhat in his ſpeach: that he had the two legions ready which Cæſar ſent him backe againe, and that he thought with the number of them which hee had leauied, in haſt, he ſhould make vp the number of thirty thouſand fighting men. Then Tullus cried out openly: ah, thou haſt mocked vs Pompey: & thereupon gaue order they ſhould ſend ambaſſadors vnto Cæſar. There was one Phaonius in the company, who otherwiſe was no ill man, ſauing that he was ſomewhat too bolde, thinking to counterfeate Catoes plaine manner of ſpeach: he bad Pompey then ſtampe his foote vppon the ground, and make thoſe ſouldiers come which he had promiſed them. Pompey gently bare with Phaonius mocke. But when Cato told him alſo, what he had prophecied before hand of Cæſar, he anſwered him againe: in deed thou haſt prophecied more truly then I, but I haue dealt more friendly then he. Then Cato thought good that they ſhould make him lieutenant general of ROME with full and abſolute power to command all, ſaying: that the ſelfe ſame men which doe the greateſt miſchiefe, know beſt alſo how to remedy the ſame. So he immediatly departed into SICILE, hauing the charge and gouernment of that country: and alſo euery one of the other Senators went vnto the charge they were appointed. Thus all ITALY being in armes, no man knew what was beſt to be done. For they that were out of ROME, came flying thither from all parts: and thoſe on the other ſide that were within ROME, went out as faſt, and forſooke the city in this trouble and diſorder. That which might ſerue being willing to obey, was found very weake: and that on the other ſide which by diſobedience did hurt, was too ſtrong and il to be gouerned by the magiſtrats, hauing law to command. For there was no poſſibility to pacifie their feare, neither would they ſuffer Pompey to offer things as he would: but euery man followed his owne fancy, euen as hee found him ſelfe grieued, afraied, or in doubt, and in one day they were in diuers minds. Pompey could heare nothing of certainty of his enemies. For ſome, one while would bring him newes one way, and then againe an other way: and then if he would not credit them, they were angry with him. At the length, when he ſaw the tumult and confuſion ſo great at ROME, as there was no mean to pacifie it: he commaunded all the Senators to follow him, telling all them that remained behinde, that he would take them for Cæſars friends, and ſo at night departed out of the city. Then the two Conſuls fled alſo, without doing any ſacrifice to the goddes, as they were wont to do before they went to make any warres. So Pompey, euen in his greateſt trouble and moſt daunger, might thinke him ſelfe happy to haue euery mans good will as he had. For, though diuers miſliked the cauſe of this warre, yet no man hated the Captaine: but there were moe found that could not forſake Pompey for the loue they bare him, then there were that followed him to fight for their liberty. Shortly after Pompey was gone out of ROME, Cæſar was come to ROME, who poſſeſſing the city, ſpake very gently vnto all them he found there, and pacified their feare: ſauing that he threatned Metellus, one of the Tribunes of the people to put him to death, becauſe he would not ſuffer him to take any of the treaſure of the common wealth. Vnto that cruell threate, he added a more bitter ſpeach alſo, ſaying: that it was not ſo hard a thing for him to doe it, as to ſpeake it. Thus hauing put downe Metellus, and taken that hee needed to ſerue his turne, he tooke vpon him to follow Pompey, thinking to driue him out of ITALY, before that his army hee had in SPAINE ſhould come to him. Pompey in the meane time, hauing taken the city of BRVNDVSIVM, and gotten ſome ſhippes together: he made the two Conſuls preſently imbarke with thirty enſignes of footemen, which he ſent beyond the ſea before vnto DYRRACHIVM. And incontinently after that, he ſent his father in law Scipio, and Cneus Pompey his ſonne, into SYRIA, to prouide him ſhips. Him ſelfe on the other ſide, fortified the rampers of the city, and placed the lighteſt ſouldiers he had vpon the walles, and commanded the BRVNDVSIANS not to ſtur out of their houſes: and further, he caſt trenches within the city, at the end of the ſtreetes in diuerſe places, and filled thoſe trenches with ſharpe pointed ſtakes, ſauing two ſtreetes onely, which went vnto the hauen. Then the third day after, hauing imbarked all the reſt of his ſouldiers at his pleaſure, he ſodainly lifting vp a ſigne into the aire, to giue them warning which he had left to gard the rampers: they ſtraight ranne to him with ſpeede, and quickly receiuing them into his ſhippes, he weied ancker, and hoiſed ſaile. Cæſar perceiuing the wals naked without ward, he ſtraight miſtruſted that Pompey was fled: who haſting after him, had almoſt run vpon the ſharpe ſtakes, and fallen into the trenches, had not the BRVNDVSIANS giuen him warning of them. So he ſtaied, and ranne not ouerthwart the city, but fetched a compaſſe about to goe to the hauen: where he found that all the ſhippes were vnder ſaile, two ſhippes onely excepted, vppon the which were left a few ſouldiers. Some thinke that this departure of Pompey, was one of the beſt ſtratagems of warre that euer he vſed. Notwithſtanding, Cæſar maruelled much, that he being in a ſtrong citie, and looking for his army to come out of SPAINE, and being maſter of the ſea beſides, that he would euer forſake ITALY. Cicero alſo reproued him, for that he rather followed Themiſtocles counſel, then Pericles: conſidering that the troubleſome time was rather to be likened vnto Pericles, then Themiſtocles time. Yea Cæſar himſelfe ſhewed, that he was affraid of the time. For when he had taken Numerius one of Pompeyes frends, he ſent him vnto Pompey at BEVNDVSIVM, to offer him reaſonable conditions of peace: But Numerius followed Pompey, & ſailed away with him. By this means, Cæſar in three ſcore daies being lord of al ITALY without any bloud ſhed: he was very deſirous to follow with ſpeede after Pompey. But becauſe he had no ſhips ready, he let him goe, and haſted towards SPAINE, to ioyne Pompeys army there vnto his. Now Pompey in the meane ſpace, had gotten a maruellous great power together both by ſea and by land. His army by ſea was wonderfull. For he had fiue hundred good ſhips of war, and of galliots, foiſts, and pinnaſes, an infinit number. By land, he had all the flower of the horſemen of ROME, and of all ITALY, to the number of ſeuen thouſand horſe, all rich men of great houſes, and valiant minds. But his footmen, they were men of all ſorts, and raw ſouldiers vntrained, whom Pompey cõtinually exerciſed, lying at the city of BERROEE, not ſitting idlely, but taking pains, as if he had bin in the prime of his youth. Which was to gret purpoſe to incorage others ſeeing Pompey being eight and fifty yeare old, fight a foote armed at al peeces, and then a horſebacke, quickly to draw out his ſword while his horſe was in his full career, and eaſily to put it vp againe, and to throw his dart from him, not onely with ſuch agility to hit pointe blacke, but alſo with ſtrength to caſt it ſuch a way from him, that few young men could doe the like. Thither came diuers, kings, princes, and great lordes of countries, and yeelded them ſelues vnto him: and of ROMAINE captaines that had borne office, he had of them about him, the number of a whole Senat. Amongſt them came vnto him Labienus alſo, who before was Cæſars frend, and had alwaies bene with him in his warres in GAVLE. There came vnto him alſo, Brutus, the ſonne of that Brutus which was ſlaine in GAVLE, a valiant man, and which had neuer ſpoken vnto Pompey vntil that day, becauſe he took him for a murderer of his father: but then willingly followed him as defendor of the liberty of ROME. Cicero him ſelfe alſo, though he had both written and giuen counſell to the contrary, thought it a ſhame to him not to be amongeſt the number of them that would hazard their liues for defence of their countrey. There came vnto him alſo Tidius Sextius euen into MACEDON, notwithſtanding that he was an old man, and lame of one of his legs: whom others laughing to ſcorne to ſee him come, when Pompey ſaw him, he roſe and went to meete him, iudging it a good token of their goodwils vnto him, when ſuch old men as he, choſe rather to be with him in daunger, then at home with ſafety. Hereupon they ſate in councell, and following Catoes opinion, decreede that they ſhould put no citizen of ROME to death but in battell, and ſhould ſacke no city that was ſubiect to the Empire of ROME the which made Pompeys part the better liked. For they that had nothing to do with the wars, either becauſe they dwelt far off, or els for that they were ſo poore, as otherwiſe they were not regarded: did yet both in deede and word fauour Pompeys part, thinking him an enemy both to the gods and men, that wiſhed not Pompey victory. Cæſar alſo ſhewed him ſelfe very mercifull and curteous, where he ouercame. For when he had won all Pompeys army that was in SPAINE, he ſuffered the captaines that were taken to go at liberty, and only reſerued the ſouldiers. Then comming ouer the ALPES againe, he paſſed through all ITALY, and came to the city of BRVNDVSIVM in the winter quarter: and there paſſing ouer the ſea, he went vnto the city of ORICVM, and landed there. Now Cæſar hauing Vibius, one of Pompeys familiar friends with him, whom he had taken priſoner: he ſent him vnto Pompey to pray againe that they might meete, and both of them diſperſe their armies within three daies, & being reconciled (giuing their faith one to an other) ſo to returne into ITALY like good friends together. Pompey thought againe, that theſe were new deuiſes to intrap him. Thereupon he ſodainly went down to the ſea, and tooke all the places of ſtrength by the ſea ſide, ſafely to lodge his campe in, and all the ports, creekes and harbors for ſhips to lie in rode: ſo that what winde ſo euer blew on the skie, it ſerued his turne, to bring him either men, victuals, or money. Cæſar on the other ſide was ſo diſtreſſed both by ſea and by land, that he was driuē to procure battell, and to aſſaile Pompey euen in his owne forts, to make him come out to fight with him: of whom moſt times he euer had the better in all skirmiſhes, ſauing once, when he was in danger to haue loſt all his army. For Pompey had valiantly repulſed his men, and made them flie, and had ſlain two thouſand of them in the field: but he durſt not enter pel mel with them into their campe as they fled. Whereupon Cæſar ſaied to his friends, that his enemy had won the victory that day, if he had knowen how to ouercome. This victory put Pompeys men in ſuch courage, that they would needs hazard battell. And Pompey him ſelfe alſo though he wrote letters vnto ſtrange kings, captains, and cities of his confederacy, as if he had already won all: was yet afraied to fight an other battell, thinking it better by tract of time, and diſtreſſe of victuals, to ouercome him. For Cæſars men being old and expert ſouldiers, and wont euer to haue the victory when they fought together: he knew they would be loth to be brought to fight any other kinde of way, to be driuen to often remouing of their campe from place to place, and ſtill to fortifie and intrench them ſelues, and therefore that they would rather put it to aduenture out of hand, and fight it out. But notwithſtanding that Pompey had before perſwaded his men to be quiet, and not to ſturre, perceiuing that after this laſt bickering Cæſar being ſcanted with victuals raiſed his campe, and departed thence to goe into THESSALY, through the country of the ATHAMANIANS: then he could no more bridle their glory and courage, which cried, Cæſar is fled, let vs follow him. And others, let vs returne home againe into ITALY. And others alſo ſent their friends and ſeruants before to ROME, to hire them houſes neare the market place: intending when they came thither to ſue for offices in the common wealth. Some there were alſo that in a iollity would needs take ſhip, and ſaile into the Ile of LESBOS, vnto Cornelia (whom Pompey had ſent thither) to cary her that good newes, that the warre was ended. Thereupon aſſembling the councell, Africanus thought it beſt to winne ITALY, for that was the chiefeſt marke to be ſhot at in this warre: for whoſoeuer obtained that, had ſtraight all SICILE, SARDINIA, CORSICA, SPAINE, and GAVLE at commaundement. Furthermore, that it was a diſhonour to Pompey (which in reaſon ſhould touch him aboue all things) to ſuffer their countrey to be in ſuch cruell bondage and ſubiection vnto ſlaues and flatterers of tyrants, offering it ſelfe as it were into their handes. But Pompey neither thought it honorable for him, once againe to flie from Cæſar, and to make him follow him, ſith fortune had giuen him oportunity to haue Cæſar in chaſe: nor lawfull alſo before the gods, to forſake his father in law Scipio, and many other alſo that had bene Conſuls, diſperſed abroad in GREECE and THESSALY, which ſhould immediatly fall into Cæſars hands, with all their riches and armies they had. Furthermore, he ſaid, that they had care enough for the city of ROME, which drew the wars fartheſt off from them: ſo as, they remaining ſafe and quiet at home, (neither hearing nor feeling the miſery of warres) might in the end peaceably receiue and welcome him home, that remained conquerour. With this determination, he marched forward to follow Cæſar, being determined not to giue him battell, but to beſiege him, & only to compaſſe him in ſtill being neare vnto him, and ſo to cut him off from victuals. There was alſo an other reaſon that made him to follow that determination. For it was reported to him, that there was a ſpeech giuen out among the ROMAINE knights, that ſo ſoone as euer they had ouercome Cæſar, they muſt alſo bring Pompey to be a priuate man againe. Some ſay therefore, that Pompey would neuer afterwards imploy Cato in any greater matters of waight in all this warre, but when he followed Cæſar, he left him captaine of his army to keepe his cariage by ſea, fearing that ſo ſonne as Cæſar were once ouercome, he would make him ſtraight alſo reſigne his authority. Pompey following Cæſar in this maner, faire and ſoftly they cried out vpon him, that he made no warre with Cæſar, but againſt his country and the Senat, becauſe he might be ſtill in authority: and that he would neuer leaue to haue them for his ſeruaunts and guard about him, which ſhould rule and commaund the world. Furthermore, Domitius Aenobarbus, calling him continually Agamemnon, and king of kings: made him much to be enuied. Phaonius alſo mocked him as much as the other, that ſpake moſt boldeſt: for hee went crying vp and downe, my maiſters, I giue you warning, you are like to eate no THVSCVLAN figges this yeare. And Lucius Afranius alſo, he that had loſt the army which he had in SPAINE, and was alſo ſuſpected for a traitour, ſeeing Pompey then refuſed to come to battell: I maruaile, ſaied he, that they which accuſe mee, doe not luſtely goe to finde him out, whom they call the marchaunt and common buyer of prouinces, to fight with him preſently. With theſe and many ſuch other lewd ſpeaches, they compelled Pompey in the end (who could not abide to be ill ſpoken of, and would not deny his friendes any thing) to follow their vaine hope and deſires, and to forſake his owne wiſe determination: the which thing, no good ſhippe maiſter, and much leſſe a chiefe and ſoueraigne captaine, ouer ſo many nations and ſo great armies, ſhould haue ſuffered and conſented vnto. Now, he that did alwaies commend the phiſitions, that would not follow the fond deſire of the ſicke patients: was him ſelfe contented to obey the worſt part of his army, fearing their diſpleaſure, where their life or health ſtoode in hazard. For who would thinke or iudge them to be wiſe men, and in their wittes, who walking vp and downe their campe, did already ſue to be Conſuls and Prætors? conſidering that Spinther, Domitius, and Scipio, were at ſtrife together, making friendes to be high Biſhoppe, (which office Cæſar had) as if they ſhould haue fought with Tigranes king of ARMENIA, or with the king of the NABATHEIANS, which had camped by them, and not with Cæſar and his army: who had taken a thouſand townes by aſſault, had ſubdued aboue three hundred ſeueral nations, and had wonne infinite battels of the GERMAINES and GAVLES, and was neuer ouercome: had alſo taken a million of men priſoners, and had likewiſe ſlaine ſo many at diuers battels. All this notwithſtanding, they of Pompeys ſide ſtill being importunate of him, & troubling him in this ſort: in fine, when they were come into the fields of PHARSALIA, they compelled Pompey to call a councell. There Labienus, generall of the horſemen ſtanding vp, ſware before them all, that he would not returne from the battell, before he had made his enemies to flie. The like oath all the reſt did take. The next night following, Pompey thought in his dreame, that he came into the Theater, and that the people to honor him, made a maruellous great clapping of their handes: and that he him ſelfe did ſet forth the temple of Venus the conqueror with many ſpoiles. This viſion partly put him in good corage, and partly againe made him doubt: for that he was afraied, becauſe Cæſars family was diſcended from this goddeſſe Venus, that his dreame did ſignifie, that he ſhould haue the honour of the victory, with the ſpoiles he ſhould winne of him. Beſides all this, there ran ſodaine fearefull noiſes and tumults in his campe without any apparant cauſe, that waked all the campe vppon it. At the fourth watche, when the watch is renued in the morning, there was ſeene a maruellous great light ouer Cæſars camp, and they were all at reſt. Of that, there came as it were a torch of a burning fire, and fell in Pompeys campe. The which Cæſar himſelfe ſaid he ſaw, when he went to ſearch the watch. At the breake of the day, Cæſar being determined to raiſe his campe, and to goe to the city of SCOTVSA, as his ſouldiers were buſie about ouerthrowing of their tentes, and ſending away their bagges and baggage before: there came ſkoutes vnto him, that brought him word they ſaw a great deale of armour and weapon caried to and fro in their enemies campe, and heard a noiſe and buſling beſides, as of men that were preparing to fight. theſe came in other ſkowtes,that brought word alſo that their voward was already ſet in battell raye. Then Cæſar ſayed, that the day was now come they had longed for ſo ſore, and that they ſhould now fight with men,not with hunger,nor with want of victuals:and thereupon gaue order preſently that they ſhould put out the redde coates or armes vpon his tente, which was the ſigne all the ROMAINES vſed to ſhew that they would fight. The ſouldiers ſeing that out, left their cariage and tentes and with great ſhoutes of ioye ranne to arme themſelues. The Captaines of euery band alſo, beſtowed euery man in ſuch place as he ſhould fight, and ſo they conueyed themſelues into battell raye, without any tumult or diſorder, as quietly, as if they ſhould haue entred into a daunce. Pompey himſelfe ledde the left wing of his armie againſt Antony. The middle of the battell he gaue vnto Scipio his father in lawe being right againſt Domitius Caluinus. The left wing alſo was led by Lucius Domitius Aenobarbus, the which was garded with men of armes,for all the horſemen were placed on that ſide,to diſtreſſe Cæſar if they could, that was directly againſt them: and to ouerthrowe the tenth legion that was ſo much accounted of, being the valianteſt ſouldiers the enemie had in all his armie, amongſt the which Cæſar did euer vſe to fight in perſon. Cæſar then ſeing the lefte wing of his enemies ſo ſtrong with the gard of the horſemen, and being afrayed of the brightnes of their armor: brought forward ſix enſignes for ſupply, which he placed hard behind the tenth legion,commanding them that no man ſhould ſtur, leaſt their enemies ſhould diſcouer them. And furthermore,when the horſemen of the enemies ſhould come to giue charge vpon them, that then they ſhould runne with ſpeed on the one ſide of the formoſt rancks,and not to throw their dartes farre from them,as the valianteſt ſouldiers are wont to do, to come to the ſword the ſooner: but to throw them vpwards into their enemies eyes and faces. For, ſayd he, theſe braue fellowes and fine dauncers, will neuer abide to haue their faces marred. And this was Cæſars deuiſe at that time. Pompey being a horſebacke, rode vp and downe to conſider the ordinance of both battels: and perceiuing that his enemies ſtood ſtill in their ranckes, looking for the ſignall of battell, and that his owne battell on the other ſide waued vp and downe diſorderly,as men vnskilfull in warres: he was afrayd they would flie before they were charged. Thereupon he ſtraightly commaunded them in the voward, that they ſhould ſteadily keepe their ranckes,and ſtanding cloſe together ſhould ſo defend themſelues, receiuing the charge of the enemy. But Cæſar diſliked of that deuiſe, for thereby, ſayd he,the force of their blowes was leſſened, and in withholding them from giuing the charge, he not only tooke away that courage which the aſſailant carieth with him that commeth with furie: but made them moreouer faint harted,in receiuing the charge of the enemies. In Cæſars armie,there were about two and twentie thouſand fighting men: and in Pompeyes armie, ſomewhat aboue twiſe as many. Now, when the word of battell was giuen of either ſide, and that the trumpets did ſound the allarme: euery man beganne to looke to himſelfe. But a fewe of the chiefeſt of the ROMAINS, and certaine GRECIANS that were there alſo out of the ſet battell, perceiuing the imminent danger, began to bethinke them, to what paſſe the ambition and wil full contention betwene theſe two men, had brought the ſtate of ROME. For the weapons of kinſemen, the bands of bretheren, the enſignes all alike, the flower of ſo many valiant men of one citie, did ſerue for a notable example, to ſhew how mans nature prickt forward with couetouſnes, is quite blind and without reaſon. For if they could haue beene contented quietly to haue gouerned that which they had conquered: the greateſt and beſt part of the world, both by ſea and by land, was ſubiect vnto them. Or otherwiſe, if they could not haue quenched their vnſatiable deſire of victorie and triumph,they had occaſion of warre enough offered them againſt the PARTHIANS & GERMAINS. Furthermore they had enough to do beſides to conquer SCYTHIA, and the INDIANS: and withall, they had had an honeſt colour to haue cloked their ambitious deſires, if it had bene but to haue brought the barbarous people to a ciuill life. For what horſemen of SCYTHIA, or arrowes of PARTHIA, or riches of Indians, could haue abidden the power of three ſcore and tenne thouſand ROMAINE ſouldiers, and ſpecially being led by two ſo famous Captaines, as Pompey, and Cæſar? whoſe names, theſe ſtrange and far nations vnderſtoodl long before the name of the ROMAINS: ſo great were their victories, hauing conquered ſo many wilde and barbarous people. They both being then in armes the one againſt

the other, not regarding their honor which made them ſo ambitious: did not ſpare their own country, who had vntill that time remained vnuincible, both in fame and prowes. For, the alliance that was made betwene them, the loue of Iulia, & marying with her, was ſuſpected frō the beginning to be but a deceit, & a pledge as it were of a conſpiracie made betwene them, for a priuate benefit, more then for any true friendſhip. Now whē the fields of PHARSALIA were couered ouer with men, with horſe and armor, and that the ſignall of battell was giuen on either ſide: the firſt man of Cæſars army that aduanced forward to giue charge, was Caius Craſsinius, captaine of ſixe ſcore and fiue men, to performe a great promiſe which he had made vnto Cæſar. For Cæſar, when he came out of his tent in the morning, ſeeing him, called him to him by his name, and asked him what he thought of the ſucceſſe of this battell? Craſsinius holding out his right hand vnto him, courageouſly cryed: Oh Cæſar, thine is the victorie, and this day thou ſhalt cōmend me either aliue or dead. Then remēbring theſe words, he brake out of the rankes, and many following after him, ranne amongſt the middeſt of his enemies. Straight they came to the ſword, and made great ſlaughter. But he preſſing forwarde ſtill, one with a thruſt ran him through the mouth, that the ſwords point came through at his neck. Thereupon Craſsinius being ſlain, the battel was equall. Pompey did not make his left wing march ouer ſodainly, but ſtaied, and caſt his eyes abroad to ſee what his horſemen would doe, the which had alreadie deuided their companies, meaning to compaſſe in Cæſar, and to make the ſmall number of horſemen which he had before him to giue backe vpon the ſquadron of his footemen. On the other ſide, as ſoone as Cæſar had giuen the ſignall of battell, his horſemen retired backe a litle, and the ſixe enſeignes which he had placed ſecretly behinde them, (being three thouſand fighting men) ranne ſodainely to aſſaile the enemie vpon the flancke, and when they came neere vnto the horſemen, they threw the points of their dartes vpwardes according to Cæſars commaundement, and hyt the young gentlemen full in their faces. They being vtterly vnskilfull to fight, and leaſt of all looking for ſuch maner of fight: had not the hearts to defend themſelues, nor to abide to be hurt as they were in their faces, but turning their heads, & clapping their hands on their faces, ſhamefully fled. They being ouerthrowen, Cæſars men made no account to follow them, but went and gaue charge vppon the battell of footemen, in that place ſpecially where they had no guard of horſemen, wherby they might the eaſilier be compaſſed about. Thus, they being charged by them in the flancke, and in the voward alſo by the tenth legion, perceiuing themſelues (contrarie to their expectation) compaſſed about by their enemies, where they thought to haue enuironed them: they could make no longer reſiſtance. They alſo being likewiſe driuen to flie, when Pompey ſaw the duſt in the element, and coniectured the flying of his horſemen: what minde he was of then, it was hard to ſay. For by his countenance, a man might well thinke he was like a man amazed, and at his wits end, forgetting that he was Pompey the great: for that he went ſtraight into his campe, and ſpake neuer a word to any man, rightly verifying Homers verſes to this effect.

In this eſtate Pompey entred into his tent, and ſate him downe there a great while, and ſpake neuer a word: vntill ſuch time as many of the enemies entred pell mell with his men that fled into his campe. And then, he ſaid no more: but what, euen into our campe? and ſo riſing vp, he put a gowne on his backe euen fit for his miſfortune, and ſecretly ſtale out of the campe. The other legions alſo fled: and great ſlaughter was made of the tent keepers, and their ſeruantes that guarded the campe. For Aſinius Pollio writeth (who was at that battell on Cæſars ſide) that there were ſlaine onely but ſixe thouſand ſouldiers. Howbeit at the taking of their campe, Cæſars ſouldiers then found plainly the madnes & vanity of Pompeys men. For, all their tents and pauilions were full of noſegayes and garlands of mirtle, and their couches al couered with flowers, their tables full of bowles of wine, & men prepared readie to do ſacrifice for ioy, rather then to arme themſelues to fight. Thus went they to battel, caried away with this vaine and fooliſh hope. When Pompey was gone a litle way from his campe, he forſooke his horſe, hauing a very few with him: & perceiuing that no man purſued him, he went a foot faire and ſoftly, his head full of ſuch thoughts and imaginations, as might be ſuppoſed a man of his like calling might haue, who for foure and thirty yeares ſpace together, was wont continually to carie victorie away, and beganne then euen in his laſt caſt, to proue what it was to flie, and to be ouercome: and who thought then with himſelfe, how in one houres ſpace he had loſt the honor and riches which he had gotten in ſo many foughten fields and battels, wherby he was not long before followed and obeyed of ſo many thouſand men of warre, of ſo many horſemen, and of ſuch a great fleete of ſhippes on the ſea, and then to goe as he did in ſuch poore eſtate, and with ſo ſmall a traine, that his very enemies who ſought him, knew him not. Thus when he was paſſed the citie of LARISSA, and comming to the vallie of Tempé: there being a thirſt, he fell downe on his belly and dranke of the riuer. Then riſing vp againe, he went his way thence and came to the ſea ſide, and tooke a fiſhers cotage where he lay all night. The next morning by breake of the day, he went into a litle bote vppon the riuer, and tooke the free men with him that were about him: and as for the ſlaues, he ſent them backe againe, and did counſell them boldly to goe to Cæſar, and not to be affraide. Thus rowing vp and downe the ſhore ſide, in this litle bote, he ſpyed a great ſhippe of burden in the maine ſea, riding at anker, which was readie to weigh anker, and to ſaile away. The maſter of the ſhippe was a ROMAINE, who, though he was not familiarly acquainted with Pompey, yet knewe him by ſight very well. He was called Petitius, who had dreamed the night before, that he ſawe Pompey ſpeake vnto him, not like the man he was wont to be, but in pouerty and in miſerie. So, he had tolde this dreame vnto the mariners which ſailed with him (as men commonly vſe to do, ſpecially when they dreame of ſuch weightie matters, and being at leaſure withall) and at the verie inſtant, there was one of the mariners that told him, he ſaw a litle bote on the riuer rowing towardes them, and that there were men in it that ſhooke their clokes at them, and helde out their hands. Thereupon Petitius ſtanding vp, knew Pompey ſtraight, euen in like caſe as he had dreamed of him the night before: and clapping his head for anger, commaunded his mariners to let downe his bote, and gaue him his hande, calling him Pompey by his name, miſtruſting (ſeeing him in that eſtate) what misfortune had happened to him. Thereupon, not looking to be intreated, nor that he ſhould tell him of his miſhap, he receiued him into his ſhippe, and all thoſe he would haue with him: and then hoiſed ſaile. With Pompey there were both the Lentuli and Faonius. Shortly after alſo, they perceiued king Deiotarus comming from the riuer to them, that beckened and made ſignes to receiue them: which they did. At ſupper time, the maſter of the ſhippe, made readie ſuch meate as he had abord. Faonius ſeeing Pompey for lacke of men to waite on him, waſhing of himſelfe: ranne vnto him, waſhed him, and annointed him, and afterwardes continued ſtill to waite vpon him, and to doe ſuch ſeruice about him, as ſeruants do to their maſters, euen to waſhing of his feete, and making ready of his ſupper. When a ſimple man ſaw him, that could no skill of ſeruice, he ſaid:

Good gods, how euery thing becommeth noble men?

The meeting of Pompey & his wife Cornelia. The words of Cornelia vnto Pompey.

Pompey paſſing then by the city of AMPHIPOLIS, coaſted from thence into the Ile of LESBOS, to goe fetch his wife Cornelia and his ſonne being then in the citie of MITYLENE. There hauing caſt out his ancker, and riding at rode, he put a meſſenger on the ſhore & ſent him into the citie to his wife: not according to her expectation, who was ſtill put in good hope by continuall letters and newes brought vnto her, that the warre was ended and determined by the citie of DYRRACHIVM. This meſſenger now finding her in this hope, had not the hart ſo much as to ſalute her, but letting her vnderſtand rather by his teares then wordes, the great misfortune Pompey had: told her, ſhe muſt diſpatch quickly, if ſhe would ſee Pompey with one ſhippe only, and none of his but borowed. The young Ladie hearing theſe newes, fell downe in a ſound before him, and neither ſpake nor ſturred of long time: but after ſhe was come to her ſelfe, remembring that it was no time to weepe and lament, ſhe went with ſpeede through the city vnto the ſea ſide. There Pompey meeting her, tooke her in his armes, & imbraced her. But ſhe ſincking vnder him, fell downe and ſaid: Out alas, woe worth my hard fortune, not thine (good husband) that I ſee thee now brought to one poore ſhippe, who before thou mariedſt thy vnfortunate Cornelia, wert wont to ſaile theſe ſeas with fiue hundred ſhips. Alas, why art thou come to ſee me, and why diddeſt thou not leaue me to curſed fate and my wicked deſtenie: ſith my ſelfe is cauſe of all this thy euill? Alas, how happy a woman had I bene, if I had bene dead before I heard of the death of my firſt husband Publius Craſſus, whom the wretched PARTHIANS ſlew? And how wiſe a woman had I bene, if (according to my determination) I had killed my ſelfe immediatly after him: where now I liue to bring yet this misfortune vnto Pompey the great? It is reported that Cornelia ſpake theſe words, and that Pompey alſo anſwered her in this maner. Peraduenture, Cornelia mine, thou haſt knowen a better fortune, which hath alſo deceiued thee, becauſe ſhe hath continued longer with me then her maner is. But ſince we are borne men, we muſt patiently beare theſe troubles, and proue fortune againe. For it is no impoſſible matter for vs againe to come into proſperitie out of this preſent miſerie, as to fall out of late proſperitie into preſent calamitie. When Cornelia heard him ſay ſo, ſhe ſent backe into the citie for her ſtuffe & family. The MITYLENIANS alſo came openly to ſalute Pompey, and praied him to come into the citie, and to refreſh himſelfe: but Pompey would not, & gaue them counſell to obey the conqueror, & not to feare any thing, for Cæſar was a iuſt man, and of a curteous nature. Then Pompey turning vnto Cratippus the Philoſopher, who came amōg the citizens alſo to ſee him: made his complaint vnto him, and reaſoned a litle with him about diuine prouidence. Cratippus courteouſly yeelded vnto him, putting him ſtill in better hope, fearing leaſt he would haue growen too hot & troubleſome, if he would haue holden him hard to it. For Pompey at the length might haue asked him, what prouidence of the gods there had bene in his doings? And Cratippus might haue anſwered him, that for the ill gouernment of the common wealth at ROME, it was of neceſſity that it ſhould fall into the handes of a ſoueraigne prince. Peraduenture Cratippus might then haue asked him: how, and whereby Pompey wouldeſt thou make vs beleeue, if thou hadſt ouercome Cæſar, that thou wouldeſt haue vſed thy good fortune better then he? But for diuine matters, referre them to the goddes as it pleaſeth them. Pompey taking his wife and friends with him, hoiſed ſaile, and landed no where, but compelled to take freſh acates and water. The firſt citie he came vnto, was ATTALIA in the country of PAMPHYLIA. Thither came to him certain gallies out of CILICIA, & many ſouldiers alſo, inſomuch he had a three ſcore Senators of ROME againe in his company. Then, vnderſtanding that his army by ſea was yet whole, and that Cato had gathered together a great number of his ſouldiers after the ouerthrowe, whom he had tranſported with him into AFRICKE: he lamented, and complained vnto his friends, that they had compelled him to fight by land, & not ſuffred him to helpe himſelfe with his other force wherin he was the ſtronger: and that he kept not ſtill neere vnto his army by ſea, that if fortune failed him by land, he might yet preſently haue prepared to his power ready by ſea, to haue reſiſted his enemy. To confeſſe a truth, Pompey committed not ſo great a fault in all this warre, neither did Cæſar put foorth a better deuiſe, then to make his enemie fight farre from his army by ſea. Thus Pompey being driuen to attempt ſomewhat according to his ſmall abilitie, he ſent Ambaſſadors vnto the cities. To others, he went himſelfe in perſon alſo to require money, wherewith he manned and armed ſome ſhips. This notwithſtanding, fearing the ſodaine approach of his enemy, leaſt he ſhould preuent him before he could put any reaſonable force in readineſſe for to reſiſt him: he bethought himſelfe what place he might beſt retyre vnto for his moſt ſafetie. When he had cōſidered of it, he thought that there was neuer a prouince of the ROMAINES that could ſaue and defend them. And for other ſtrange realmes, he thought PARTHIA aboue all other, was the beſt place to receiue them into at that preſent, hauing ſo ſmall power as they had: and that was better able to helpe & aide them with more power then they. Other of his councell were of mind to go into AFRICKE, vnto king Iuba. But Theophanes LESBIAN ſaid, he thought it a great folly, to leaue ÆGYPT which was but three daies ſailing from thence, and king Ptolomy, (being but lately come to mans ſtate, and bound vnto Pompey for the late friendſhippe and fauour his father found of him) and to goe put himſelfe into the handes of the PARTHIANS, the vileſt, and vnfaithfulleſt nation in the world, & not to proue the modeſty of a ROMAINE, that had bene his father in law, whoſe proſperity if he could haue endured, he might haue bene the chiefeſt man: and now to put himſelfe to Arſaces good will, who could not away with Craſſus when he liued. Further, he thought it an ill part alſo, for him to go carie his young wife of the noble houſe of Scipio, amongſt the barbarous people, who thinke it lawful for thē to vſe what villany and inſolency they liſt to any. For, admit ſhe haue no villany offered her by them: yet is it an vndecent thing, to thinke ſhe might haue bene diſhonoured, they hauing her in their power to doe it. There was no perſwaſion (as they ſay) but this only that turned Pompey vnto Euphrates: for it ſeemeth that Pompeys counſell, and not his fortune, made him take that way. Being determined therefore to flie into ÆGYPT, he departed out of CYPRVS in a gally of SELEVCIA with his wiſe Cornelia. The reſidue of his traine imbarked alſo, ſome into gallies, and others into marchants ſhippes of great burden, and ſo ſafely paſſed the ſea without daunger. When Pompey heard newes that king P*tolomie* was in the city of PELVSIVM with his army, making warre againſt his ſiſter: he went thither, and ſent a meſſenger before vnto the king, to aduertiſe him of his arriuall, and to intreate him to receiue him. King P*tolomy* was then but a young man, inſomuch as one P*othinus* gouerned all the whole realme vnder him. He aſſembled a councell of the chiefeſt and wiſeſt men of the court, who had ſuch credite & authoritie as it pleaſed him to giue them. They being aſſembled, he commanded euery man in the kings name to ſay his mind touching the receiuing of Pompey, whether the king ſhould receiue him or not. It was a miſerable thing to ſee P*othinus*, an eunuch of the kings, and Theodotus of CHIO, an hyred ſchoolemaſter to teach the young king rethoricke, and Achillas ÆGYPTIAN to conſult among themſelues what they ſhould doe with Pompey the great. Theſe were the chiefeſt councellors of all his eunuches, and of thoſe that had brought him vp. Now did Pompey ride at ancker vpon the ſhore ſide, expecting the reſolution of this councell: in the which the opinions of other were diuers, for they would not haue receiued him: the other alſo, that he ſhould be receiued. But the Rethoritian Theodotus to ſhew his eloquence, perſwaded them, that neither the one nor the other was to be accepted. For, ſaid he, if we receiue him, we ſhall haue Cæſar our enemy, & P*ompey* our Lord: and if they do deny him on the other ſide, Pompey will blame them for refuſing of him, and Cæſar for not keeping of him. Therefore, this ſhould be the beſt reſolution, to ſend to kill him: for thereby they ſhould winne the good will of the one, and not feare the diſpleaſure of the other: and ſome ſay moreouer, that hee added this mocke withall: a dead man bites not. They being determined of this among themſelues gaue Achillas commiſſion to doe it. He taking with him Septimius (who had charge afore time vnder P*ompey*) and Saluius an other Centurion alſo, with three or foure ſouldiers beſides, they made towards P*ompeys* gallie, about whom were at that time, the chiefeſt of his traine, to ſee what would become of this matter. But when they ſaw the likelihood of their entertainment, and that it was not in Princely ſhew and manner, nor nothing anſwerable to the hope which Theophanes had put them in, ſeeing ſo few men come to them in a fiſher bote: they began then to miſtruſt the ſmall account that was made of them, & counſelled P*ompey* to returne backe, and to launch againe into the ſea, being out of the daunger of the hurling of a dart. In the meane time, the fiſher bote drew neere, and Septimius roſe & ſaluted Pompey in the ROMAINE tongue, by the name of Imperator, as much as ſoueraigne Captaine: and Achillas alſo ſpake to him in the Greeke tongue, and bad him come into his bote, becauſe that by the ſhore ſide, there was a great deale of mudde and ſande bankes, ſo that his gallie ſhould haue no water to bring him in. At the very ſame time, they ſaw a farre off diuers of the kings gallies which were arming with all ſpeed poſſible, and all the ſhore beſides full of ſouldiers. Thus, though P*ompey* and his company would haue altered their minds, they could not haue told how to haue eſcaped; and furthermore, ſhewing that they had miſtruſted them, then they had giuen the murtherer occaſion to haue executed his crueltie. So taking his leaue of his wife Cornelia, who lamented his death before his end: he commanded two Centurions to go downe before him into the ÆGYPTIANS bote, and P*hilip* one of his ſlaues infranchiſed, with an other ſlaue called Scynes. When Achillas reached out his hand to receiue him into his bote, he turned him to his wife and ſonne, and ſaid theſe verſes of Sophocles vnto them:

The man that into Court comes free,
Muſt there in ſtate of bondage be.

Theſe were the laſt words he ſpake vnto his people, when he left his owne gally & went into the ÆGYPTIANS bote. The land being a great way off from his gally, when he ſaw neuer a man in the bote ſpeake friendly vnto him, beholding Septimius, he ſaid vnto him: me thinkes my friend I ſhould know thee, for that thou haſt ſerued with me heretofore. The other nodded with his head that it was true, but gaue him no anſwere, nor ſhewed him any courteſie. Pompey ſeeing that no man ſpake to him, tooke a litle booke he had in his hand, in the which he had written an oration that he ment to make vnto king Ptolomy, & beganne to read it. When they came neere the ſhore, Cornelia with her ſeruants and friendes about her, ſtoode vp in her ſhippe in great feare, to ſee what ſhould become of Pompey. So, ſhe hoped well, when ſhe ſawe many of the kings people on the ſhore, comming towards Pompey at his landing, as it were to receiue and honor him. But euen as Pompey tooke Philip his hande to ariſe more eaſily, Septimius came firſt behind him and thruſt him through with his ſword. Next vnto him alſo, Saluius and Achillas drew out their ſwords in like maner. Pompey then did no more but tooke vp his gowne with his handes and hidde his face, and manly abidde the wounds they gaue him, onely ſighing a litle. Thus being nine and fiftie yeare olde, he ended his life the next day after the day of his birth. They that rode at ancker in their ſhippes, when they ſaw him murthered, gaue ſuch a fearfull crie, that it was heard to the ſhore: then weying vp their ankers with ſpeed, they hoiſed ſaile, and departed their way, hauing winde at will that blew a luſty gale, as ſoone as they had gotten the maine ſea. The ÆGYPTIANS which prepared to rowe after them, when they ſaw they were paſt their reach, and vnpoſſible to be ouertaken: they let them go. Then hauing ſtriken off Pompeys head, they threwe his bodie ouer borde, for a miſerable ſpectacle to all thoſe that were deſirous to ſee him. Philip his infranchiſed bondman remained euer by it, vntill ſuch time as the ÆGYPTIANS had ſeene it their bellies full. Then hauing waſhed his bodie with ſalt water, and wrapped it vp in an old ſhirt of his, becauſe he had no other ſhift to lay it in: he ſought vpon the ſands, and found at the length a peece of an old fiſhers bote, enough to ſerue to burne his naked body with, but not all fully out. As he was buſie gathering the broken peeces of this bote together, thither came vnto him an old ROMAINE, who in his youth had ſerued vnder Pompey, and ſaid vnto him: O friend, what art thou that prepareſt the funerals of Pompey the great? Philip anſwered, that he was a bondman of his infranchiſed. Well, ſaid he, thou ſhalt not haue all this honor alone, I pray thee yet let me accompany thee in ſo deuout a deede, that I may not altogether repent me to haue dwelt ſo long in a ſtrange country, where I haue abidden ſuch miſerie and trouble: but that to recompence me withall, I may haue this good happe, with mine owne hands to touch Pompeys bodie, and to helpe to burie the only and moſt famous Captaine of the ROMAINES. The next day after, Lucius Lentulus not knowing what had paſſed, comming out of CYPRVS, ſailed by the ſhore ſide, and perceiued a fire made for funerals, and Philip ſtanding by it, whom he knew not at the firſt. So he asked him, what is he that is dead and buried there? But ſtraight fetching a great ſigh, alas, ſaid he, perhappes it is Pompey the great. Then he landed a litle, and was ſtraight taken and ſlaine. This was the end of Pompey the great. Not long after, Cæſar alſo came into ÆGYPT that was in great warres, where Pompeys head was preſented vnto him: but he turned his head aſide and would not ſee it, and abhorred him that brought it as a deteſtable murtherer. Then taking his ring wherewith he ſealed his letters, whereupon was grauen a Lyon holding a ſword: he burſt out a weeping. Achillas and Pothinius he put to death. King Ptolomy himſelfe alſo, being ouerthrowen in battell by the riuer of Nilus, vaniſhed away, and was neuer heard of after. Theodotus the Rhetoritian eſcaped Cæſars hands, and wandred vp & downe ÆGYPT in great miſerie, deſpiſed of euery man. Afterwards, Marcus Brutus (who ſlew Cæſar) conquering ASIA, met with him by chance, and putting him to all the torments he could poſſibly deuiſe, at the length ſlew him. The aſhes of Pompeys bodie were afterwardes brought vnto his wife Cornelia, who buried them in a towne of hers by the citie of ALBA.

THE COMPARISON OF Pompey with Ageſilaus.

ΑΓΗΣΙΛΑΟΥ

How Pompey and Ageſilaus came to their greatneſſe.

The faultes of Ageſilaus and Pompey.

Now that we haue declared vnto you, the liues of Ageſilaus and Pompey: let vs compare their maners and conditions together, which are theſe. Firſt, Pompey came to his honor and greatneſſe, by his integrity and ſo aduanced himſelfe: and was a great aide vnto Sylla, doing many noble exploits, helping him to rid thoſe tirãts out of Italy, who held it in bondage. But Ageſilaus vſurped the kingdom of Lacedæmon, againſt the law of gods and men, condemning Leotychides for a baſtard, whom his brother auowed to be his lawfull ſonne: and contemned beſides the oracle of the gods, which gaue warning of a lame king. Furthermore, Pompey did honor Sylla while he liued, & when he was dead, gaue his bodie honorable buriall in deſpight of Lepidus: & maried his daughter vnto Fauſtus the ſonne of Sylla. Ageſilaus contrarily did diſhonor Lyſander vpon light occaſion: but Pompey had done no leſſe for Sylla, than Sylla had done for him. Lyſander on the other ſide, had made Ageſilaus king of Lacedæmon, and Lieutenant generall of all Grece. Thirdly, the iniuries that Pompey did vnto the common weale, were done of neceſſitie to pleaſe Cæſar and Scipio, both of them his fathers in law. Ageſilaus alſo, to ſatisfie his ſonnes loue, ſaued Sphodrias life that had deſerued death, for the miſchiefe he had done the Athenians: and he willingly alſo tooke part with Phœbidas, not ſecretly, but openly, becauſe he had broken the peace made with the Thebans. To cõclude, what hurt Pompey did vnto the Romaines, either through ignorance, or to pleaſure his frends: the ſame did Ageſilaus vnto the Lacedæmonians, through anger & ſelf wil, in renuing warre with the Bœotians, vpon a full peace concluded. If we ſhall recken of the fortune of the one and the other, in the faults they committed: Pompeys fortune vnto the Romains was vnlooked for. But Ageſilaus would not ſuffer the Lacedæmonians to auoid the lame kingdom, though they knew it before. For though Leotychides had bene proued a baſtard ten thouſand times, yet had not the race of the Eurytiontides failed, but they could haue found an other lawfull king among them, that ſhould haue gone vpright: had not Lyſander, fauoring Ageſilaus, kept the true meaning of the oracle from the Lacedæmonians. On the other ſide againe for matters of gouernment, there was neuer ſuch an excellent deuiſe found out, as was done by Ageſilaus: to helpe the feare and danger the Lacedæmonians were in, for thoſe that fled at the battell of Leuctres, when he counſelled them to let the lawe ſleepe for that day. Neither can any man match Pompeys with the like: who, to ſhew his friends what power he was of, did breake the lawes which himſelfe had made. For Ageſilaus being driuen of neceſſitie to aboliſh the lawe, to ſaue the life of his citizens, found ſuch a deuiſe that the law was not hurtfull to the common wealth, neither yet was put downe for feare it ſhould doe hurt.

I muſt needes commende this for a great vertue and ciuilitie in Ageſilaus, who ſo ſoone as he receiued the Scytala (or ſcrowle of parchement from the Ephori) returned into his country, and left the warre of ASIA. He did not as Pompey, who made himſelfe great to the benefite of the common wealth, and for the common wealthes ſake, did forſake ſuch honour and ſo great authoritie, as neuer Captaine before him, but Alexander the great, had the like in thoſe partes. But now to other matter.

Touching their battels and exploits in warres, the multitude of victories and triumphes that Pompey obtained, and the great armies that he led: Xenophon himſelfe if he were aliue, could not compare Ageſilaus victories vnto his: although for the ſingular vertues and qualities he had in him, for recompence thereof he had libertie graunted him, to write and ſpeake of Ageſilaus what he thought good. Me thinkes alſo, there was great difference betwixt Pompey and Ageſilaus, in their equitie and clemencie towardes their enemies. For, whileſt Ageſilaus went about to conquer THEBES, and vtterly to race and deſtroy the citie of MESSINA, the one being an auncient citie of his country, and the other the capitall citie of BOEOTIA: he had almoſt loſt his owne citie of SPARTA, for at the leaſt he loſt the commaundement and rule he had ouer the reſt of GRECE.

The other contrarily gaue cities vnto pirates to dwell in, which were willing to chaunge their trade and maner of life: and when it was in his choiſe to lead Tigranes king of ARMENIA, in triumphe at ROME, he choſe rather to make him a confederat of the ROMAINES, ſaying, that he preferred perpetuall honour before one dayes glory. But ſince it is reaſon we ſhould giue the firſt place and honour of the diſcipline of warres, vnto a Captaine of the greateſt skill and experience in warres: the LACEDÆMONIAN then leaueth the ROMAINE far behind. For firſt of all Ageſilaus neuer forſooke his citie, though it was beſieged with three ſcore & ten thouſand men, and that there were very few within the ſame to defend it, the which alſo a litle before had bene ouerthrowen at the battell of LEVCTRES.

And Pompey on the other ſide, hearing that Cæſar with fiue thouſand footemen onely had taken a towne in ITALIE: fled from ROME in very feare. And therein he can not be excuſed of one of theſe two: either that he fled cowardly for ſo few men, or elſe that he had a falſe imagination of more. For he conueyed his wife and children away, but he left all the reſt without defence, and fled: where indeede he ſhould either haue ouercome, valiantly fighting for defence of his country, or elſe haue receiued the conditions of peace which the conquerours ſhould haue offered him. For, he was a citizen and allied vnto him. For he that thought it an vntollerable thing to prolong the terme of his gouernement, or to graunt him a ſecond Conſulſhip: did now giue him oportunitie, ſuffering him to take the city of ROME, to ſay vnto Metellus the Tribune, & the reſt, that they were all his priſoners.

Sith therefore it is the chiefeſt point of an excellent Captaine, to compell his enemies to fight when he findeth himſelfe the ſtronger, and alſo to keepe himſelfe from compulſion of fight when he is the weaker: Ageſilaus excelling in that, did euer keepe him ſelfe inuincible. Cæſar alſo had great skill therein, to keepe himſelfe from daunger being the weaker, and againe could tell how to compell Pompey to hazard battell, to his vtter deſtruction by land, where he was the weaker: and by this meanes he made himſelfe Lord of the treaſure, victuals, and alſo of the ſea, which his enemies had in their handes, without fighting. That which they alledge in his excuſe, is that which moſt doth condemne him, ſpecially for ſo great and skilfull a Captaine. For as it is likely enough, that a young Generall of an armie may eaſily be brought from his wiſe and ſafe counſell, with rumour and tumult of a few fearefull men, that ſhould perſwade him it were a ſhame and diſhonour for him if he did otherwiſe: yet were this no ſtraunge matter, but a fault to be pardoned. But for Pompey the great, whoſe campe the ROMAINES called their country, and his tent the Senate, & called all the Prætors and Conſuls that gouerned at ROME, rebels and traitors to the common wealth of ROME: who could excuſe him (who was neuer ſeene commaunded by other then him ſelfe, but had bene alwayes chiefe Captaine and Generall in any warre he made, and euer had the vpper hand) but that he was drawen on by the ſcoffes of Faonius, and Domitius, to hazard battell, to endaunger the whole Empire and libertie of ROME, onely for feare they ſhould call him king Agamemnon? Who, if he had ſo much regarded preſent infamie, he ſhould haue fought from the beginning for defence of the citie of ROME, and not to haue taken example of Themiſtocles policie by flying, and afterwards to thinke it a ſhame as he did, to lye in THESSALIE a time without fighting. Neither did God appoint them the fields of Pharſalia for a Theater, or cloſe campe, of neceſsitie to fight which of them ſhould haue the Empire of ROME. Further, there was no Herauld to ſummon him to fight, as there are at games of price, where he muſt aunſwere to his name, and come and fight, or elſe to looſe the honour of the crowne vnto an other. But there were infinite other fields and townes (and as a man would ſay the whole earth) which the commoditie of his armie by ſea gaue him choiſe to conquer if he would rather haue followed the ſteppes of Fabius Maximus, of Marius, of Lucullus, or of Ageſilaus himſelfe: who did patiently abide no leſſe tumultes within the citie ſelfe of SPARTA, when the THEBANS went to ſummon him to come out to fight, for all the reſt of his country. And in ÆGYPT alſo, he did abide many falſe accuſations againſt him, wherewith the king himſelfe did burthen him, praying him alwayes to haue a litle patience. In fine, hauing followed the beſt counſell which he had determined with himſelfe from the beginning, he ſaued the ÆGYPTIANS againſt their willes: and furthermore, he did not onely keepe the citie of SPARTA from ſo great a daunger, but did alſo ſet vp tokens of triumphe in the ſame againſt the THEBANS, whereby, he was not compelled at that time to lead them out to the ſlaughter, and beſides that, gaue his citizens occaſion to obtaine victorie afterwardes. Hereupon Ageſilaus was highly prayſed of them, whoſe liues he had ſaued againſt their wils. And P*ompey* contrarily was blamed by themſelues, through whom he had offended: yet ſome ſay, that he was deceiued by his father in law Scipio. For he meaning to keepe the moſt part of the money to himſelfe which he had brought out of ASIA, did haſten and perſwade Pompey to giue battell, telling him that there was no money left. The which though it had bene true, a worthy Captaine ſhould not ſo lightly haue bene brought into errour, vpon a falſe account, to hazard himſelfe to looſe all. Thus may we ſee what both of them were, by comparing them together. Furthermore for their iourneys into ÆGYPT, the one fled thither by force: the other willingly went thither with ſmall honour, for moneys ſake to ſerue the barbarous people, with intent afterwardes to make warre with the GRECIANS. Laſtly, in that which we accuſe the ÆGYPIANS for P*ompeys* ſake: for the like matter do they againe accuſe Ageſilaus. For, the one was cruelly put to death, and betrayed by them whom he truſted: and Ageſilaus forſooke them which truſted him, and went to the enemies, hauing brought aide to fight againſt them.

Ageſilaus conſtanter then Pompey.

Alexander the great.

HAuing determined in this volume to write the life of king Alexander, and of Iulius Cæſar, that ouercame Pompey: hauing to ſpeake of many things, I will vſe none other preface, but onely deſire the readers not to blame me though I do not declare all things at large, but briefly touch diuers, chiefly in thoſe their nobleſt acts & moſt worthy of memory. For they muſt remember, that my intent is not to write hiſtories, but onely liues. For, the nobleſt deedes do not alwayes ſhew mens vertues & vices, but oftentimes a light occaſion, a word, or ſome ſport makes mens naturall diſpoſitions & manners appeare more plaine, then the famous battels wonne, wherein are ſlaine ten thouſand men, or the great armies, or cities won by ſiege or aſſault. For like as painters or drawers of pictures, which make no account of other partes of the body, do take the reſemblances of the face and fauour of the countenance, in the which conſiſteth the iudgement of their manners and diſpoſition: euen ſo they muſt giue vs leaue to ſeeke out the ſignes and tokens of the minde onely, and thereby ſhew the life of either of them, referring you vnto others to write the warres, battels, and other great things they did. It is certaine that Alexander was deſcended from Hercules by Caranus, and that of his mothers ſide, he came of the bloud of the AEacides by Neoptolemus. They ſay alſo, that king P*hilip* his father when he was a young man, fell in fancie with his mother Olympias, which at that time alſo was a young maiden, and an orphan without father or mother, in the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA, where they were both receiued into the miſterie and fraternity of the houſe of the religious: and that afterwardes, he did aske her in mariage of her brother Arymbas, with whoſe conſent they were maried together. The night before they lay in wedded bed, the bride dreamed, that lightning fell into her belly, and that withall, there was a great light fire that diſperſed it ſelfe all about into diuers flames. King P*hilip* her husband alſo, ſhortly after he was maried, dreamed that he did ſeale his wiues belly, and that the ſeale wherewith he ſealed, left behind the printe of a Lyon. Certaine wiſards and ſoothſayers, told P*hilip* that this dreame gaue him warning to looke ſtraightly to his wife. But Ariſtander TELMESIAN aunſwered againe, that it ſignified his wife was conceiued with child, for that they do not ſeale a veſſell that hath nothing in it: and that ſhe was with child with a boy, which ſhould haue a

Lions hart. It is reported alſo, that many times as ſhe lay a ſleepe in her bed, there was ſeene a ſerpent lying by her, the which was the chiefeſt cauſe (as ſome preſuppoſe) that withdrew Philips loue and kindneſſe from her, & cauſed him that he lay not ſo oft with her, as before he was wont to do: either for that he feared ſome charme or enchantment, or elſe for that he thought himſelfe vnmeete for her company, ſuppoſing her to be beloued of ſome god. Some do alſo report this after an other ſort: as in this maner. That the women in thoſe parts of long time, haue bene commonly poſſeſt with the ſpirite of Orpheus, and the diuine fury of Bacchus, whereupon they are called Clodones, and Mimallones (as much as warlike, and fierce) and do many things like vnto the womẽ of EDONIA, & THRACIA, dwelling about the mountaine Æmus. Hereby it appeareth, that this word Threskeuin (ſignifying in the Greeke toung, too ſuperſtitiouſly giuen to the ceremonies of the gods) came from them. For Olympias aboue other womẽ, louing to be inſpired with ſuch diuine madnes & fury: did celebrate their ſolemne ſacrifices with a certaine horrible & barbarous manner. For in theſe dances to Bacchus, ſhe caried a great number of tame ſnakes about her, the which gliding vpon the Iuie wherewith the women were dreſſed in thoſe ceremonies, & winding thẽſelues about the litle iauelings they had in their hands, & the garlands about their heads: thereby they made men the more afrayed of them. Whereupon Philip after this dreame, ſent Charo MEGALOPOLITAN vnto the oracle of Apollo at DELPHES, to inquire what it ſignified. Anſwere was giuen him, that he ſhould do ſacrifice vnto Iupiter Hammon, & honor him aboue all gods: & that he had loſt one of his eyes, with the which he peeping in at a crany of his chamber doore, ſaw the god in forme of a ſnake lye by his wife. Furthermore, Olympias (as Eratoſthenes writeth) bidding her ſon farewell whẽ he went to conquer ASIA, after ſhe had ſecretly told him alone, by whom he was begotten: ſhe prayed him to be valiant, & to ſhew himſelfe worthy his ſonne, that begat him. Others tell alſo, that ſhe was angry with this report, ſaying: will Alexander neuer leaue to make me ſuſpected of Iuno? So it is, that Alexander was borne on the ſixt day of the month of Hecatombæon, (in Engliſh, Iune) which the MACEDONIANS call Lous. On the very ſame day, the temple of Diana in the city of EPHESVS was burnt, as Hegeſias MAGNESIAN doth witnes, whoſe cry & exclamation was ſo terrible and cold, that it was enough to haue quenched that fire. It is not to be wondred at, that Diana ſuffred her temple to be burnt, being like a midwife, buſie about Alexanders birth. But this is true, that all the Prieſts, Magitians & Soothſayers, which were at that time in EPHESVS, iudging that this did prognoſticate ſome maruellous great miſſfortune to come, like men beſtraught of their wits, they ran vp & down the city, ſmiting of their faces, & crying that ſome great plague & miſchief was borne that day vnto ASIA. Shortly after that king Philip had won the city of POTIDÆA, three meſſengers came to him the ſame day that brought him great newes. The firſt, that Parmenio had wonne a notable battell of the ILLYRIANS: the ſecond, that his horſe onely wan the bell & price at the Olympian games: & the third, that his wife had brought him a ſonne called Alexãder. Philip being maruellous glad to heare theſe newes, the ſoothſayers did make his ioy yet greater: aſſuring him that his ſonne which was borne with three victories all together, ſhould be inuincible. Now for his ſtature and perſonage, the ſtatues and images made of him by Lyſippus do beſt declare it, for that he would be drawen of no man but him only. Diuers of his ſucceſſors & friends did afterwards counterfeit his image, but that excellent workeman Lyſippus onely, of all other the chiefeſt, hath perfectly drawen and reſembled Alexanders manner of holding his necke, ſomwhat hanging down towards the left ſide, & alſo the ſweet looke & caſt of his eyes. But when Apelles painted Alexander, holding lightning in his hand, he did not ſhew his freſh colour, but made him ſomewhat blacke & ſwarter, then his face indeed was: for naturally he had a very fayre white colour mingled alſo with red, which chiefly appeared in his face & in his breſt. I remember I red alſo in the commẽtaries of Ariſtoxenus, that his skin had a maruellous good ſauour, & that his breath was very ſweet, in ſomuch that his body had ſo ſweet a ſmell of it ſelfe, that all the apparell he wore next vnto his body, tooke thereof a paſsing delightfull ſauour, as if it had bene perfumed. And the cauſe hereof peraduenture might be, the very temperature and conſtitution of his body, which was hot and burning like fire. For Theophraſtus is of opinion, that the ſweet ſauour commeth by meanes of the heate that dryeth vp the moyſture of the body. By which reaſon alſo it appeareth, that the dry & hot countryes parched with heate of the ſunne, are thoſe that deliuer vnto vs the beſt ſpices: becauſe that the ſunne drieth vp the moyſture of the outward parts, as a matter of corruption. This naturall heate that Alexander had, made him (as it appeareth) to be giuen to drinke, & to be haſty. Euen from his childhood they ſaw that he was giuen to be chaſt. For though otherwiſe he was very hot & haſty, yet was he hardly moued with luſt or pleaſure of the body, & would moderately vſe it. But on the other ſide, the ambitiō & deſire he had of honor, ſhewed a certaine greatnes of minde & noble courage, paſsing his yeares. For he was not (as his father Philip) deſirous of all kinde of glory: who like a Rethoritian had a delight to vtter his eloquence, & ſtāped in his coynes, the victories he had won at the Olympian games, by the ſwift running of his horſe & coches. For when he was asked one day (becauſe he was ſwift of ſoote) whether he would aſſay to run for victory at the Olympian games: I could be content, ſaid he, ſo I might run with kings. And yet to ſpeake generally, he miſliked all ſuch contentiō for games. For it ſeemeth that he vtterly miſliked all wreſtling & other exerciſe for priſe, where men did vſe all their ſtrēgth: but otherwiſe he himſelf made certain feſtiuall dayes & games of priſe, for common ſtage players, muſitians, & ſingers, & for the very Poets alſo. He delighted alſo in hunting of diuers kinds of beaſts, and playing at the ſtaffe. Ambaſſadours being ſent on a time from the king of PERSIA, whileſt his father was in ſome iourney out of his realme: Alexander familiarly entertaining of them, ſo wan them with his curteous entertainment, (for that he vſed no childiſh queſtions vnto them, nor asked them trifling matters, but what diſtance it was frō one place to an other, & which way they went into the high coūtrys of ASIA, & of the king of PERSIA himſelf, how he was towards his enemies, & what power he had) that he did rauiſh them with delight to heare him, in ſomuch that they made no more account of Philips eloquence & ſharpe wit, in reſpect of his ſonnes courage, & noble minde, to attempt great enterpriſes. For when they brought him newes that his father had taken ſome famous citie, or had won ſome great battell, he was nothing glad to heare it, but would ſay to his playfellowes: ſirs, my father will haue all, I ſhall haue nothing left me to conquer with you, that ſhalbe ought worth. For he delighting neither in pleaſure nor riches, but onely in valiantnes & honour, thought, that the greater conqueſtes & realmes his father ſhould leaue him, the leſſe he ſhould haue to do for himſelfe. And therfore, ſeeing that his fathers dominions & Empire increaſed dayly more and more, perceiuing all occaſion taken from him to do any great attempt: he deſired no riches nor pleaſure, but warres & battels, & aſpired to a ſignory where he might win honour. He had diuers men appointed him (as it is to be ſuppoſed) to bring him vs: as ſchoolemaſters, gouernours, & groomes of his chamber to attend vpon him: & among thoſe, Leonidas was the chiefeſt man that had the gouernement & charge of him, a man of a ſeuere diſpoſition, & a kinſeman alſo vnto the Queene Olympias. He miſliked to be called a maſter or tutor, though it be an office of good charge, wherupō the others called him Alexanders gouernour, becauſe he was a noble mā, & allied to the Prince. But he that bare the name of his ſchoolemaſter, was Lyſimachus, an ACARNANIAN borne, who had no other maner of ciuility in him, ſauing that he called himſelf Phœnix, Alexander Achilles, & Philip Peleus: & therfore he was well thought of, and was the ſecond perſon next vnto Leonidas. At what time Philonicus THESSALIAN had brought Bucephall the horſe to ſell vnto king Philip, asking thirteen talents, they went into the field to ryde him. The horſe was found ſo rough & churliſh that the ryders ſaid he would neuer do ſeruice, for he would let no man get vp on his backe, nor abide any of the gentlemens voyces about king Philip; but would yerke out at them. Thereupon, Philip being afrayed, commaunded them to cary him away as a wild beaſt, & altogether vnprofitable; the which they had done, had not Alexander that ſtood by ſayd, O gods, what a horſe do they turne away, for lacke of ſkill & hart to hādle him. Philip heard what he ſaid, but held his peace. Alexander oft repeating his words, ſeeming to be ſory that they ſhould ſend backe the horſe againe: why, ſaid Philip, doeſt thou controll them that haue more experience than thou, & that know better then thou how to handle a horſe? Alexander anſwered, & yet me thinkes I ſhould hādle him better thē all they haue done. But if thou canſt not, no more thē they, replied Philip: what wilt thou forfeit for thy folly? I am content (quoth Alexander) to ieopard the price of the horſe. Euery mā laughed to heare his anſwere: & the wager was layed betweene thē. Then ran

But the chiefeſt cauſe that prouoked Alexander, was Attalus at the mariage of Cleopatra, whom P*hilip* maried a maiden, falling in fancie with her when himſelf was paſt mariage. This was the matter: Attalus being vncle vnto this Cleopatra, fell drunke at the mariage, and hauing in his cups, he perſuaded the MACEDONIANS that were at the feaſt, to pray to the goddes, that they might haue a lawfull heire of P*hilip* and Cleopatra, to ſucceed him in the kingdome of MACEDON. Alexander being in a rage therewith threw a cup at his head, and ſaid vnto him: why, traytor, what am I: doſt thou take me for a baſtard? P*hilip* ſeeing that, roſe from the bourd, and drew out his ſword, but by good fortune for them both, being troubled with choller and wine, he fell downe on the ground.

Then Alexander mocking him, loe, ſaid he, to the MACEDONIANS, here is the man that prepared to go out of EVROPE into ASIA, and ſtepping onely from one bed to an other, yee ſee him laide alongſt on the ground. And furthermore, he baniſhed out of Macedon, Harpalus, Nearchus, Phrygius, & Ptolomy, his ſonnes companions: whom Alexander afterwards called home againe and placed them in great authority about him. Shortly after, P*auſanias* ſuſteining villany by the counſell and commandement of Attalus & Cleopatra, crauing iuſtice of P*hilip*, and finding no amends: he conuerted all his anger againſt him, and for ſpight ſlue him himſelfe. Of this murther, moſt men accuſed Queene Olympias, who (as it is reported) allured this young man, hauing iuſt cauſe of anger, to kill him. And Alexander alſo went not cleare from ſuſpition of this murther. For ſome ſay, that P*auſanias* after this villanie was done him, complained vnto Alexander, and told him how he had bene abuſed: who recited theſe verſes to him of Euripides, in the tragedie of Medea, where ſhe ſaid in anger, that ſhe would be reuenged:

Notwithſtanding, afterwards he cauſed diligent ſearche to be made, and all them to be ſeuerely puniſhed that were of the conſpiracie: and was angrie alſo that his mother Olympias had cruelly ſlaine Cleopatra. So he came to be king of Macedon at twenty yeares of age, and found his realme greatly enuied and hated of dangerous enemies, and euery way full of danger. For, the barbarous nations that were neere neighbors vnto Macedon, could not abide the bondage of ſtrangers, but deſired to haue their naturall kings. Neither had P*hilip* time enough to bridle and pacifie Grece, which he had conquered by force of armes: but hauing a litle altered the gouernements, had through his inſolencie left them all in great trouble and ready to rebell, for that they had not long bene acquainted to obey. Thereupon Alexanders counſell of Macedon, being affraid of the troubleſome time, were of opinion, that Alexāder ſhould vtterly forſake the affaires of Grece, & not to follow them with extremitie, but that he ſhould ſeeke to winne the barbarous people by gentle meanes, that had rebelled againſt him, and wiſely to remedy theſe new ſturres. But he farre otherwiſe determined to ſtabliſh his ſafetie by courage and magnanimitie: perſuading himſelfe, that if they ſaw him ſtoope and yeelde at the beginning, how litle ſo euer it were, euery one would be vpon him. Thereupon, he ſtraight quenched all the rebellion of the barbarous people, inuading them ſodainly with his armie, by the riuer of Danuby, where in a great battell he ouerthrew Syrmus, king of the Triballians. Furthermore, hauing intelligence that the Thebans were reuolted, & that the Athenians alſo were confederate with them: to make thē know that he was a man, he marched with his armie towards the ſtreight of Thermopiles, ſaying that he would make Demoſthenes the Orator ſee (who in his orations, whilſt he was in Illyria, & in the country of the Triballians, called him child) that he was growne a ſtripling paſſing through Theſſaly, & ſhould finde him a man before the walles of Athens. When he came with his armie vnto the gates of Thebes, he was willing to giue them of the citie occaſion to repent them: and therefore onely demanded Phœnix and P*rothytes*, authors of the rebellion. Furthermore, he proclaimed by trumpet, pardon and ſafetie vnto all them that would yeeld vnto him. The Thebans on the other ſide, demanded of him P*hilotas*, & Antipater, two of his chiefeſt ſeruants, & made the crier proclaime in the city, that al ſuch as would defēd the liberty of Grece ſhould ioyne with them. Then did Alexander leaue the Macedonians at libertie to make warre with all crueltie. Then the Thebans fought with greater courage and deſire then they were able, conſidering that their enemies were many againſt one. And on the other ſide alſo, when the garriſon of the Macedonians which were within the caſtell of Cadmia, made a ſalie vpon them, and gaue them charge in the rereward: then they being enuironned of all ſides, were ſlaine in maner euery one of them, their citie taken, deſtroied, and raſed euen to the hard ground. This he did, ſpecially to make all the reſt of the people of Grece afraide by example of this great calamitie & miſerie of the Thebans, to the end none of them ſhould dare from thenceforth once to riſe againſt him. He would cloke this crueltie of his vnder the complaints of his confederates, the Phocians and Plateians: who complaining to him of the iniuries the Thebans had offred, could not deny them iuſtice. Notwithſtāding, excepting the prieſts, and the religious, & all ſuch as were friends vnto any of the Lords of Macedon, all the friends and kinſmen of the poet Pindarus, and all thoſe that had diſſuaded them which were the rebels: he ſold all the reſt of the citie of Thebes for ſlaues, which amounted to the number of thirtie thouſand perſons, beſides them that were ſlaine at the battell, which were ſix thouſand moe. Now amongſt the other miſeries and calamities of the poore citie of Thebes, there were certaine Thracian ſouldiers, who hauing ſpoiled and defaced the houſe of Timoclea, a vertuous ladie and of noble parentage, they deuided her goods among them: and their captaine hauing rauiſhed her by force, asked her, whether ſhe had any where hidden any golde or ſiluer. The ladie told him, ſhe had. Then leading him into her garden, ſhe brought him vnto a well: where ſhe ſaid ſhe had caſt all her iewels & precious things, when ſhe heard the citie was taken. The barbarous Thracian ſtouped to looke into the well: ſhe ſtanding behind him, thruſt him in, and then threw ſtones enough on him, and ſo killed him. The ſouldiers when they knew it, tooke and bound her, and ſo caried her vnto Alexander. When Alexander ſaw her countenance, and marked her gate: he ſuppoſed her at the firſt to be ſome great lady, ſhe followed the ſoldiers with ſuch a maieſtie and boldneſſe. Alexander then asking her what ſhe was: She aunſwered, that ſhe was the ſiſter of Theagenes, who fought a battell with king Philip before the citie of Chæronea, where being generall he was ſlaine, valiantly fighting for the defenſe of the libertie of Grece. Alexander wondering at her noble aunſwer and couragious deed, commanded no man ſhould touche her nor her children, and ſo freely let her go whither ſhe would. He made league alſo with the Athenians, though they were very ſory for their miſerable fortune. For the day of the ſolemne feaſt of their miſteries being come, they left it off, mourning for the Thebans: courteouſly enterteining all thoſe, that flying from Thebes came to them for ſuccour. But whether it was for that his anger was paſt him, following therein the nature of lyons: or becauſe that after ſo great an example of crueltie, he would ſhew a ſingular clemencie again: he did not only pardon the Athenians of all faults committed, but did alſo counſell them to looke wiſely to their doings, for their citie one daie should command all Grece, if he chaunſed to die. Men report, that certainly he oftentimes repented him that he had dealt ſo cruelly with the Thebans, and the griefe he tooke vpon it was cauſe that he afterwards ſhewed himſelfe more mercifull vnto diuerſe others. Afterwards alſo he did blame the furie of Bacchus, who to be reuenged of him, made him kill Clitus at the table being druncke, and the Macedonians alſo to refuſe him to go any further to conquer the Indians, which was an imperfection of his enterpriſe, and a miniſhing alſo of his honour. Beſides, there was neuer Theban afterwards, that had eſcaped the furie of his victorie, and did make any peticion to him, but he had his ſute. Thus was the ſtate of Thebes as you haue heard. Then the Grecians hauing aſſembled a generall councell of all the ſtates of Grece within the ſtraights of Peloponneſus: there it was determined that they would make warre with the Persians. Wherupon they choſe Alexander generall for all Grece. Then diuers men comming to viſite Alexander, aswell philoſophers, as gouernours of ſtates, to congratulate with him for his electiō, he looked that Diogenes Sinopiā (who dwelt at Corinth) would likewiſe come as the reſt had done: but when he ſaw he made no reckoning of him, & that he kept ſtill in the ſuburbes of Corinthe, at a place called Cranium, he went himſelfe vnto him, and found him laide all a long in the ſunne. When Diogenes ſaw ſo many comming towards him, he ſate vp a litle, and looked full vpon Alexander. Alexander courteouſly ſpake vnto him, and asked him, if he lacked any thing. Yea ſaid he, that I do: that thou ſtand out of my ſunne a litle. Alexander was ſo well pleaſed with this aunſwere, and maruelled ſo much at the great boldneſſe of this man, to ſee how ſmall account he made of him: that when he wēt his way from him, Alexanders familiars laughing at Diogenes, & mocking him, he told them: maiſters ſay what you liſt, truly if I were not Alexander, I would be Diogenes. Alexander being deſirous to heare what the oracle of Apollo Delphian would ſay vnto him touching the ſucceſſe of his iorney into Asia: he went vnto the citie of Delphes. It chanſed ſo, that he came thither in the dayes which they call vnfortunate, on which dayes no man vſed to aske Apollo any thing. This notwithſtanding, he ſent firſt vnto the Nunne which pronounced the oracles to pray her to come to him But ſhe refuſed to come, alledging the cuſtome which forbad her to go. Thereupon, Alexander went thither himſelfe in perſon, and brought her out by force into the temple. She ſeeing then that he would not be denied, but would needs haue his will: tolde him, My ſonne, for that I ſee thou art inuincible. Alexander hearing that, ſaid he deſired no other oracle, and that he had as much as he looked for. Afterwards when he was euen ready to go on with his voyage, he had diuers ſignes and tokens from the gods: and amongſt other, an image of the Poet Orpheus made of cyprus, in the city of LEBETHRES, in thoſe daies did ſweate maruellouſly. Many men fearing that ſigne, Ariſtander the ſoothſaier bad Alexander be of good cheere, and hope well, for he ſhould obtaine noble victories that ſhould neuer be forgotten, the which ſhould make the Poets and muſicians ſweate to write and ſing them. Then, for his armie which he led with him, they that do ſet downe the leaſt number, ſay that they were thirtie thouſand footmen, and fiue thouſand horſemen: and they that ſay more, do write, foure and thirtie thouſand footemen, and foure thouſand horſemen. Ariſtobulus writeth, that Alexander had no more but three ſcore and tenne talents to pay his ſouldiers with: and Duris writeth, that he had no more prouiſion of victuals, then for thirtie dayes onely. And Oneſicritus ſaith moreouer, that he did owe two hundred talents. Now, notwithſtanding that he began this warre with ſo ſmall ability to maintaine it, he would neuer take ſhippe before he vnderſtood the ſtate of his friends, to know what abilitie they had to go with him, and before he had giuen vnto ſome, lands, and vnto other, a towne, and to others againe, the cuſtome of ſome hauen. Thus by his bountie, hauing in maner ſpent almoſt the reuenues of the crowne of MACEDON, Perdiccas asked him: my Lord, what will you keep for your ſelf? hope, ſaid he. Then, quoth Perdiccas againe, we will alſo haue ſome part, ſince we go with you: and ſo refuſed the reuenue which the king had giuen him for his penſion. Many others did alſo the like. But ſuch as were contented to take his liberalitie, or would aske him any thing, he gaue them very franckly, and in ſuch liberalitie ſpent all the reuenue he had. With this deſire & determination, he went on to the ſtraight of HELLESPONT, & going to the city of ILIVM he did ſacrifice vnto Diana, and made funerall effuſions vnto the demy gods (to wit, vnto the princes which died in the warre of TROIA, whoſe bodies were buried there) and ſpecially vnto Achilles, whoſe graue he annointed with oyle, and ran naked round about it with his familiars, according to the auncient cuſtome of funerals. Then he couered it with noſegayes and flowers, ſaying, that Achilles was happy, who while he liued had a faithfull friend, & after his death an excellent herauld to ſing his praiſe. When he had done, and went vp and downe the citie to ſee all the monuments and notable things there: one asked him, if he would ſee Paris harpe. He aunſwered againe, he would very faine ſee Achilles harpe, who plaied and ſung vpon it all the famous acts done by valiant men in former times. In the meane time, Darius king of PERSIA, hauing leauied a great armie, ſent his captaines and lieutenants to tary Alexander at the riuer of GRANICVS. There was Alexander to fight of neceſſitie, being the only barre to ſtop his entrie into ASIA. Moreouer, the captaines of his councell about him, were afraid of the depth of this riuer, and of the height of the banck on the other ſide, which was verie high and ſteep, & could not be wonne without fighting. And ſome ſaid alſo, that he ſhould haue ſpeciall care of the auncient regard of the moneth: becauſe the kings of MACEDON did neuer vſe to put their armie into the field in the moneth of Daſon, which is Iune. For that, ſaid Alexander, we will remedy ſoone: let them call it the ſecond moneth, Artemiſium, which is Maye. Furthermore Parmenio was of opinion, that he ſhould not medle the firſt day, becauſe it was very late. Alexander made anſwer againe, that HELLESPONT would bluſh for ſhame, if he were now affraid to paſſe ouer the riuer, ſince he had already come ouer an arme of the ſea. Thereupon he himſelfe firſt entred the riuer with thirteene guidons of horſmen, and marched forwards againſt an infinite number of arrowes which the enemies ſhot at him, as he was comming vp the other banck, which was very high and ſteepe, and worſt of all, full of armed men and horſemen of the enemies: which ſtaied to receiue him in battell raye, thruſting his men downe into the riuer, which was very deepe, and ranne ſo ſwifte, that it almoſt caried them downe the ſtreame: inſomuch that men thought him more raſhe than wiſe, to lead his men with ſuch danger. This notwithſtanding, he was ſo wilfully bent that he would needs ouer, and in the end with great a do recouered the other ſide, ſpecially becauſe the earth ſlidde away, by reaſon of the mud. So when he was ouer, he was driuen to fight pel mel one vpon an other, becauſe his enemies did ſet vpon the firſt that were paſſed ouer, before they could put themſelues into battell raie, with great cries, keeping their horſes very cloſe together, and fought firſt with their dartes, and afterwards came to the ſworde when their dartes were broken. Then many of them ſet vpon him alone, for he was eaſily to be knowne aboue the reſt by his ſhield & the hinder part of his helmet, about the which, there hung frō the one ſide to the other, a maruelous faire white plume. Alexāder had a blow with a dart on his thigh but it hurt him not. Thereupon Roeſaces & Spithbridates, both two chiefe captains of the PERSIANS, ſetting vpon Alexāder at once, he left the one, and riding ſtraight to Roeſaces, who was excellently armed, he gaue him ſuch a blow with his launce, that he brake it in his hand, and ſtraight drew out his ſword. But ſo ſoone as they two had cloſed together, Spithbridates comming at the one ſide of him, raiſed himſelfe vpon his ſtirrops and gaue Alexander with all his might ſuch a blow on his head with a battell axe, that he cut the creaſt off his helmet, & one of the ſides of his plume, and made ſuch a gaſhe, that the edge of his battell axe touched the very haire of his head. And as he was lifting vp his hand to ſtrike Alexander againe, great Clitus preuenting him, thruſt him through with a partiſan, and at the very ſame inſtant, Roeſaces alſo fell dead from his horſe with a wound which Alexander gaue him with his ſworde. Now whileſt the horſemen fought with ſuch furie, the ſquadron of the battell of footemen of the MACEDONIANS had paſſed the riuer, and both the battels began to marche one againſt the other. The PERSIANS ſtucke not manfully to it any long time, but ſtraight turned their backs and fled, ſauing the GRECIANS which tooke paie of king Darius: they drew together vpon a hill, and craued mercy of Alexander. But Alexander ſetting vpon them, more of will then diſcretion, had his horſe killed vnder him, being thruſt through the flanke with a ſword. This was not Bucephal, but an other horſe he had. All his men that were ſlaine or hurt at this battell, were hurte amongſt them valiantly fighting againſt deſperate men. It is reported that there were ſlaine at this firſt battell, twenty thouſand footmen of theſe barbarous people, and two thouſand fiue hundred horſemen Of Alexanders ſide, Ariſtobulus writeth, that there were ſlaine foure and thirty men in all, of the which, twelue of them were footemen. Alexander to honor their valiantnes, cauſed euery one of their images to be made in braſſe by Lyſippus. And becauſe he would make the GRECIANS partakers of this victorie, he ſent vnto the ATHENIANS three hundred of their targettes, which he had wonne at the battell, and generally vpon all the other ſpoiles, he put this honorable inſcription. Alexander the ſonne of Philip, and the Grecians, excepting the Lacedæmonians haue wonne this ſpoile vpon the barbarous Aſians. As for plate of gold or ſiluer, alſo purple ſilkes, or other ſuch precious ware which he gat among the PERSIANS: he ſent them all vnto his mother, a few except. This firſt victorie of Alexander, brought ſuch a ſodaine change amongſt the barbarous people in Alexanders behalfe, that the citie ſelfe of SARDIS, the chiefe citie of the Empire of the barbarous people, or at the leaſt through all the lowe countries and coaſts vpon the ſea, they yeelded ſtraight vnto him, ſauing the cities of HALICARNASSVS and MILETVM, which did ſtill reſiſt him: howbeit at length he tooke them by force. When he had alſo conquered all thereabouts, he ſtood in doubt afterwards what he were beſt to determine. Somtime he had a maruellous deſire, wholly to follow Darius wherſoeuer he were, and to venture all at a battell. An other time againe, he thought it better firſt to occupy himſelfe in conquering of theſe low countries, & to make himſelf ſtrong with the money and riches he ſhould finde among them, that he might afterwards be the better able to follow him. In the countrie of LYDIA neere vnto the citie XANTHVM, they ſay there is a ſpring that brake of it ſelfe, and ouerflowing the banckes about it, caſt out a litle table of copper from the bottome, vpon the which were graued certaine caracters in old letters, which ſaid: that the kingdome of the PERSIANS ſhould be deſtroied by the GRECIANS. This did further ſo encourage Alexander, that he made haſt to cleere all the ſea coaſt, euen as farre as CILICIA and PHOENICIA. But the wonderfull good ſucceſſe he had, running a longſt all the coaſt of PAMPHILIA, gaue diuerſe hiſtoriographers occaſion to ſet foorth his doings with admiration, ſaying that it was one of the wonders of the worlde, that the furie of the ſea, which vnto all other was extreame roughe, and many times would ſwell ouer the toppes of the high rockes vpon the cliffes, fell calme vnto him. And it appeareth that Me-

Yet Alexander himſelfe ſimply writeth in his epiſtles (without any great wonder) that by ſea he paſſed a place called the ladder, and that to paſſe there, he tooke ſhippe in the citie of PHASELIDES. There he remained many daies, & when he ſaw the image of Theodectes PHASELITAN, ſtanding in the market place: he went in a daunce thither one euening after ſupper, and caſt flowers and garlands vpon his image, honoring the memorie of the dead, though it ſeemed but in ſport, for that he was his companion when he liued, by meanes of Ariſtotle and his philoſophie. After that he ouercame alſo the PISIDIANS, who thought to haue reſiſted him, and conquered all PHRYGIA beſides. There in the citie of GORDIVS, which is ſaid to be the ancient ſeat of king Midas: he ſaw the charret that is ſo much ſpoken of, which is bound with the barcke of a cornell tree, and it was told him for a troth, of the barbarous people, that they beleeued it as a prophecy: that whoſoeuer could vndoe the bande of that barke, was certainly ordeined to be king of all the world. It is commonly reported, that Alexander prouing to vndoe that bande, and finding no ends to vndoe it by, they were ſo many folde wreathed one within the other: he drew out his ſworde, and cut the knot in the middeſt. So that then many ends appeared. But Ariſtobulus writeth, that he had quickly vndone the knot by taking the bolt out of the axtree, which holdeth the beame and body of the charret and ſo ſeuered them a ſunder. Departing thence, he conquered the PAPHLAGONIANS & CAPPADOCIANS, and vnderſtood of the death of Memnon, that was Darius generall of his army by Sea, and in whom was all their hope to trouble and withſtand Alexander: whereupon he was the bolder to go on with his determination to leade his army into the high countries of ASIA. Then did king Darius himſelfe come againſt Alexander, hauing leauied a great power at SVSA, of ſix hundred thouſand fighting men, truſting to that multitude, and alſo to a dreame, the which his wiſards had expounded rather to flatter him, then to tell him truly. Darius dreamed that he ſaw all the armie of the MACEDONIANS on a fire, and Alexander ſeruing of him in the ſelfe ſame attire that he himſelfe wore when he was one of the chamber vnto the late king his predeceſſor: and that when he came into the temple of Belus, he ſodainely vaniſhed from him. By this dreame it plainly appeared, that the gods did ſignifie vnto him, that the MACEDONIANS ſhould haue noble ſucceſſe in their doings, and that Alexander ſhould conquer all ASIA, euen as king Darius had done, when he was but Aſgandes vnto the king: and that ſhortly after, he ſhould end his life with great honour. This furthermore made him bolde alſo, when he ſawe that Alexander remained a good while in CILICIA, ſuppoſing it had bene for that he was afraide of him. Howbeit it was by reaſon of a ſickneſſe he had the which ſome ſay he got, by extreame paines and trauell, and others alſo, becauſe he waſhed himſelfe in the riuer of Cydnus, which was colde as Iſe. Howſoeuer it came, there was none of the other phiſitians that durſt vndertake to cure him, thinking his diſeaſe vncurable, and no medicines to preuaile that they could giue him, and fearing alſo that the MACEDONIANS would laie it to their charge, if Alexander miſcaried. But P*hilip* ACARNANIAN, conſidering his maiſter was very ill, and bearing himſelfe of his loue and good will towards him, thought he ſhould not doe that became him, if he did not proue (ſeeing him in extremitie and danger of life) the vtmoſt remedies of phiſicke, what danger ſo euer he put himſelfe into: and therefore tooke vpon him to miniſter phiſicke vnto Alexander, and perſuaded him to drinke it boldly if he would quickly be whole, and go to the warres. In the meane time, P*armenio* wrote him a letter from the campe, aduertiſing him, that he ſhould beware of P*hilip* his phiſitian, for he was bribed and corrupted by Darius, with large promiſes of great riches, that he would giue him with his daughter in mariage, to kill his maiſter. Alexander when he had redde this letter, laide it vnder his beds head, and made none of his neareſt familiars acquainted therewith. When the hower came that he ſhould take his medicine, Philip came into his chamber with other of the kings familiars, and brought a cup in his hand with the potion he ſhould drinke. Alexander then gaue him the letter, and withall, chearefully tooke the cup of him, ſhewing no maner of feare or miſtruſt of any thing. It was a wonderfull thing and worth the ſight, how one reading the letter, and the other drinking the medicine both at one inſtant, they looked one vpon an other, howbeit not both with like chearefull countenaunce. For Alexander looked merily vpon him, plainly ſhewing the truſt he had in his phiſitian Philip, and how much he loued him: and the phiſitian alſo beheld Alexander like a man perplexed and amazed, to be ſo falſely accuſed, and ſtraight lift vp his handes to heauen, calling the goddes to witneſſe that he was innocent, and then came to Alexanders bed ſide, and prayed him to be of good cheare, and boldly to doe as he would aduiſe him. The medicine beginning to worke, ouercame the diſeaſe, and draue for the time, to the loweſt partes of his body, all his naturall ſtrength and powers: in ſomuch as his ſpeach failed him, and he fell into ſuch a weakenes, and almoſt ſooning, that his pulſe did ſcant beat, and his ſences were wel-neare taken from him. But that being paſt, Philip in few dayes recouered him againe. Now, when Alexander had gotten ſome ſtrength, he ſhewed him ſelfe openly vnto the MACEDONIANS: for they would not be pacified, nor perſwaded of his health vntill they had ſeene him. In king Darius campe, there was one Amyntas a MACEDONIAN, & baniſht out of his country, who knew Alexanders diſpoſition very wel. He finding that Darius ment to meete with Alexander within the ſtraightes and vallies of the mountains: beſought him to tary rather where he was, being a plaine open countrey round about him, conſidering that he had a great hoaſt of men to fight with a few enemies, and that it was moſt for his aduantage to meete with him in the open field. Darius aunſwered him againe, that he was afraid of nothing but that he would flie, before he could come to him. Amyntas replied, for that, O king, I pray you feare not: for I warrant you vpon my life he will come to you, yea and is now onwards on his way comming towards you. Al theſe perſwaſions of Amyntas could not turn Darius from making his campe to march towardes CILICIA. At the ſelfe ſame time alſo, Alexander went towardes SYRIA to meete with him. But it chanced one night that the one of them miſſed of the other, and when day was come, they both returned backe againe: Alexander being glad of this happe, and making haſt to meete with his enemy within the ſtraightes. Darius alſo ſeeking to win Alexanders lodging from whence he came, and to bring his army out of the ſtraights: began then to finde the fault and error committed, for that he had ſhut him ſelfe vp in the ſtraights, (holden in on the one ſide with the mountaine, and on the other with the Sea, and the riuer of Pindarus that ran betweene both) and that he was driuen to diſperſe his army into diuers companies, in a ſtony and ill fauored country, ill for horſemen to trauell, being on the contrary ſide a great aduantage for his enemies, which were excellent good footemen, and but few in number. But now, as fortune gaue Alexander the field as he would wiſhe it to fight for his aduantage: ſo could he tell excellently well how to ſet his men in battell ray to winne the victory. For albeit that Alexander had the leſſe number by many then his enemy, yet he had ſuch policy and caſt with him, that he foreſaw all, and would not be enuironned: For he did put out the right wing of his battell a great deale further, then he did his left wing, and fighting him ſelfe in the left wing in the formoſt ranckes, he made all the barbarous people flie that ſtood before him: howbeit, he was hurt on his thigh with a blow of a ſword. Chares writeth, that Darius ſelfe did hurt him, and that they fought together man to man. Notwithſtanding Alexander ſelfe writing of this battell vnto Antipater ſayeth, that in deede he was hurt on the thigh with a ſword, howbeit he did put him in no daunger: but he writeth not that Darius did hurt him. Thus hauing wonne a famous victory, and ſlaine aboue a hundred and tenne thouſand of his enemies, he could not yet take Darius becauſe he fled, hauing ſtill foure or fiue furlongs vantage before him: howbeit it tooke his charriot of battell wherein he fought, and his bow alſo. Then he returned from the chaſe, and found the MACEDONIANS ſacking and ſpoiling all the reſt of the campe of the barbarous people, where there was infinite riches (although they had left the moſt part of their cariage behinde them in the city of DAMAS, to come lighter to the battell) but yet reſerued for him ſelfe all king Darius tent, which was full of a great number of officers, of rich moueables, and of gold and ſiluer. So, when he was come to the campe, putting off his armour, he entred into the bathe and ſayed: come on, lette vs goe and waſhe off the ſweate of the battell in Darius owne bathe. Nay, replied one of his familiars againe, in Alexanders bath: for the goodes of the vanquiſhed are rightly the vanquiſhers. When he came into the bathe, and ſaw the baſons and yewers, the boxes, and violles for perfumes, all of cleane gold, excellently wrought, all the chamber perfumed paſſing ſweetly, that it was like a paradiſe: then going out of his bathe, and comming into his tent, ſeeing it ſo ſtately and large, his bedde, the table, and ſupper, and all ready in ſuch ſumptuous ſort, that it was wonderfull, he turned him vnto his familiars and ſaied: this was a king in deede, was he not thinke ye? As he was ready to goe to his ſupper, word was brought him, that they were bringing vnto him amongeſt other Ladies taken priſoners, king Darius mother and his wiſe, and two of his daughters vnmaried: who hauing ſeene his chariot and bow, burſt out into lamentable cries, and violent beating of them ſelues thinking Darius had bene ſlaine. Alexander pawſed a good while and gaue no aunſwer, pittying more their misfortune, then reioyſing at his owne good happe. Then he preſently ſent one Leonatus vnto them, to let them vnderſtand, that Darius was aliue, and that they ſhould not neede to be afraied of Alexander, for he did not fight with Darius, but for his kingdome onely: and as for them, that they ſhould haue at his handes all that they had of Darius before, when he had his whole kingdome in his handes. As theſe wordes pleaſed the captiue Ladies, ſo the deedes that followed, made them finde his clemency to be no leſſe. For firſt hee ſuffered them to bury as many of the PERSIAN Lords as they would, euen of them that had bene ſlain in the battell, and to take as much ſilkes of the ſpoiles, iewels, and ornaments, as they thought good to honor their funerals with: and alſo did leſſen no part of their honor, nor of the number of their officers and ſeruaunts, nor of any iotte of their eſtate which they had before, but did allow them alſo greater penſions, then they had before. But aboue all, the princelyeſt grace, and moſt noble fauor that Alexander ſhewed vnto theſe captiue princeſſes, which had alwaies liued in honorable fame and chaſtity, was this: That they neuer heard word, or ſo much as any ſuſpition that ſhould make them afrayed to be diſhonored or deflowred: but were priuately among them ſelues vnuiſited or repayred vnto by any man, but of their owne, not as if they had bene in a campe of their enemies, but as if they had bene kept in ſome cloſe monaſterie: although Darius wife (as it is written) was paſſing faire, as Darius alſo was a goodly prince, and that his daughters likewiſe did reſemble their father and mother. Alexander thinking it more princely for a king, as I ſuppoſe to conquer him ſelfe, then to ouercome his enemies: did neither touch them nor any other, maide or wife, before he maried them, Barſine onely excepted, who being left Memmons widow (generall of king Darius by ſea) was taken by the city of DAMAS. Shee being excellently well learned in the Greeke tongue, and of good entertainement (being the daughter of Artabazus, who came of a kings daughter) Alezander was bolde with her by Parmenioes procurement, (as Ariſtobulus writeth) who intiſed him to embrace the company of ſo excellent a woman, and paſſing faire beſides. Furthermore, beholding the other PERSIAN Ladies beſides which were priſoners, what goodly faire women they were: hee ſpake it pleaſantly, that the Ladies of PERSIA made mens eyes ſore to behold them. Notwithſtanding, preferring the beauty of his continency, before their ſweete faire faces: hee paſſed by without any ſparke of affection towardes them, more then if they had bene images of ſtone without life. To confirme this, Philoxenus whom he had left his lieutenaunt in the low countries vppon the ſea coaſt, wrote vnto him on a time, that one Theodorus a marchaunt of TARENTVM, had to ſell two goodly young boies, maruellous faire: and therefore that he ſent vnto him to know his pleaſure, if he would buy them. Therewith he was ſo offended, that many times he cried out aloud: O, my friendes, what villany hath euer Philoxenus ſeene in me, that he ſhould deuiſe (hauing nothing to doe there) to purchaſe me ſuch infamy? whereuppon he wrote vnto him from the campe, with reprochfull wordes, that he ſhould ſend that vile TARENTINE marchant Theodorus and his marchandiſe to the Deuill. Hee ſharpely puniſhed alſo one Agnon, that wrote vnto him he would buy a young boy called Crobylus (who for beauty bare the onely name in CORINTHE,) and bring him to him. An other time alſo, when he heard that Damon and Timotheus MACEDONIANS, vnder Parmenioes charge, had deflowred two of the ſouldiers wiues that were ſtrangers, and waged of him: he wrote vnto Parmenio to looke vnto it, and to examine the matter. And if he found them guilty of the rape, that then hee ſhould put them both to death, as bruite beaſtes borne to deſtroy mankinde. And in that letter he wrote thus of him ſelfe. For my ſelfe, ſaid he, I haue neither ſeene, nor deſired to ſee Darius wife: neither haue I ſuffered any ſpeach of her beauty before me. Moreouer he ſaied, that he did vnderſtand that he was mortall by theſe two things: to wit, ſleepe, and luſt: for, from the weakeneſſe of our nature proceedeth ſleepe and ſenſuality. He was alſo no greedy gutte, but temperate in eating, as he ſhewed by many proofes: but chiefely in that he ſaid vnto the princeſſe Ada, whom he adopted for his mother, and made her Queene of CARIA. For when (for the loue ſhee bare him) ſhee daily ſent him ſundry delicate diſhes of meate, tarts, and marchpaines, and beſides the meate it ſelfe, the paſtlers and cookes to make them, which were excellent workemen: he aunſwered that he could not tell what to doe with them, for he had better cookes then thoſe appointed him by his gouernour Leonidas, to witte for his dinner, to riſe before day, and to march by night: and for his ſupper, to eate litle at dinner. And my gouernour, ſayed he, would oftentimes open the cheſtes where my bedding and apparell lay, to ſee if my mother had put any fine knackes or conceites among them. Furthermore, he was leſſe giuen to wine, then men would haue iudged. For hee was thought to be a greater bibber then he was, becauſe he ſate long at the bourd, rather to talke then drinke. For euer when he dranke, he would propound ſome tedious matter, and yet but when he was at leyſure. For hauing matters to doe, there was neither feaſt, bancket, play, mariage, nor any paſtime that could ſtay him: as they had done other captaines. The which appeareth plainely by the ſhortneſſe of his life, and by the wonderfull and notable deedes he did, in that litle time he liued. When he had leyſure, after he was vp in the morning, firſt of all he would doe ſacrifice to the goddes, and then would goe to dinner, paſſing away all the reſt of the day, in hunting, writing ſome thing, taking vp ſome quarrell betweene ſouldiers, or elſe in ſtudying. If he went any iourney of no haſty buſineſſe, he would exerciſe him ſelfe by the way as he went, ſhooting in his bow, or learning to get vp or out of his charret ſodainely as it ranne. Oftentimes alſo for his paſtime he would hunt the foxe, or catch birdes, as appeareth in his booke of remembrances for euery day. Then when he came to his lodging, he would enter into his bath, and rubbe and noint him ſelfe: and would aske his pantelers and caruers if his ſupper were ready. He would euer ſuppe late, and was very curious to ſee, that euery man at his bourde were a like ſerued, and would ſit long at the table, becauſe he euer loued to talke, as we haue told you before. Otherwiſe he was as noble a prince and gracious to waite vppon, and as pleaſant, as any king that euer was. For he lacked no grace nor comelineſſe to adorne a prince, ſauing that hee would be ſome thing ouer buſie in glorying in his owne deedes, much like vnto a bragging ſouldier: neither was he contented him ſelfe to pleaſe his own humor that way, but would alſo ſuffer his familiars to ſooth him euen to his teeth. And this was many times the deſtruction of honeſt men about him, the which would neither praiſe him in his preſence, hating the flatterers, nor yet durſt ſay leſſe of the praiſes which they gaue him. For of the firſt they were aſhamed, and by the ſecond they fell in daunger. After ſupper, he would waſhe him ſelfe againe, and ſleepe vntill noone the next day following, and oftentimes all day long. For him ſelfe, he was nothing curious of dainty diſhes: for when any did ſend him rare fruites, or fiſh, from the countries neare the ſea ſide, he would ſend them abroad vnto his friendes, and ſeldome keepe any thing for him ſelfe. His table notwithſtanding was alwayes very honourably ſerued, and did ſtill increaſe his fare, as he did enlarge his conqueſtes: till it came to the ſumme of tenne thouſand drachmas a day. But there he ſtayed, and would not exceede that ſumme, and moreouer commaunded all men that would feaſt him, that they ſhould not ſpend aboue that ſumme. After this battell of ISSVS, he ſent vnto the city of DAMAS, to take all the gold and ſiluer, the cariage, and all the women and children of the PERSIANS which were left there, where the men of armes of the THESSALIANS ſpedde them full well. For therefore did he ſend them thither, becauſe he ſaw that they had fought valiantly at the day of the battell: and ſo were the reſt of his army alſo well ſtored with money. There the MACEDONIANS hauing taſted firſt of the gold, ſiluer, women, and barbarous life: as dogges by ſent doe follow the tracke of beaſtes, euen ſo were they greedy to follow after the goodes of the PERSIANS. Firſt Alexander thought it beſt to winne all the ſea coaſt. Thither came the kings of CYPRVS, and PHOENICIA, and deliuered vp to him the whole Iland and al PHOENICIA, ſauing onely the city of TYRE. That city he beſieged ſeauen monethes together by land, with great bulwarkes and diuerſe engines of battery, and by ſea, with two hundred gallies. During this ſiege, Alexander dreamed one night, that Hercules held out his hand vnto him ouer the walles of the city, and called him by his name: and there were diuerſe TYRIANS alſo that dreamed in likewiſe, that Apollo told them that he would goe vnto Alexander, becauſe he was not pleaſed with their doings in the city. Thereupon they bound his image, (which was of a wonderfull bigneſſe) with great chaines, and nailed him downe faſt to the baſe, as if he had bene a traitour that would haue yeelded him ſelfe vnto their enemies, and called him Alexandrine, as much as fauoring Alexander. Alexander had there alſo another dreame. For he dreamed that he ſaw a Satyre a far off ſporting with him, and when he thought to haue comme neare to haue taken him, hee ſtill eſcaped from him: vntill at the length, after he had runne a good while after him, and intreated him, he fell into his hands. The ſoothſayers being asked what this dreame ſhould ſignifie, aunſwered probably, by deuiding Satyros into two, and then it is Σὰ τύρος: which ſignifieth the city of TYRE ſhall be thine. And they doe yet ſhew vnto this day, the fountaine where Alexander thought he ſaw the Satyre. Continuing this ſiege, he went to make warre with the ARABIANS, that dwell vpon the mountaine Antiliban, where he was in great daunger of being caſt away, onely becauſe he heard his tutor Lyſimachus that followed him, ſay boaſtingly, that he was not inferior, nor older then the Phœnix. For when they came at the foote of the mountaine, they left their horſes, and went vp a foote: and Alexander was of ſo curteous a nature, that he would not leaue his tutor Lyſimachus behinde him (who was ſo weary that he could goe no further) but becauſe it was darke night, and for that the enemies were not farre from them, hee came behinde to encorage his tutor, and in manner to carie him. By this meanes, vnwares, he was farre from his army with very few men about him, and benighted beſides: moreouer, it was very cold, and the way was very ill. At the length, perceiuing diuerſe fires which the enemies had made, ſome in one place, and ſome in an other, truſting to his valiantnes, hauing alwaies prouided remedy in extremity, when the MACEDONIANS were diſtreſſed, him ſelf euer putting to his owne hand: he ranne vnto them that had made the fires next him, and killing two of the barbarous people that lay by the fire ſide, he ſnatched away a fire brand, and ranne with it to his owne men, who made a great fire. At this the barbarous people were ſo affraied, that they ranne their way as faſt as they could. Other alſo thinking to come and ſet vppon him, hee ſlue them euery man, and ſo lay there that night, him ſelfe and his men without daunger. Thus Chares reporteth this matter. Now for the ſiege of TYRE, that fell out thus. Alexander cauſed the moſt part of his army to take reſt, being ouerharried and wearied with ſo many battels as they had fought: and ſent a few of his men onely to giue aſſault vnto the city, to keepe the TYRIANS occupied, that they ſhould take no reſt. One day the Soothſayer Ariſtander ſacrificing vnto the goddes, hauing conſidered of the ſignes of the intralles of the beaſtes: did aſſure them that were preſent, that the city ſhoulde bee taken by the later end of the moneth. Euery body laughed to heare him: for that day was the very laſt day of the moneth. Alexander ſeeing him amated, as one that could not tell what to ſay to it, ſeeking euer to bring thoſe tokens to effect, which the Soothſayers did prognoſticate: commanded them that they ſhould not reckon that day the thirty day, but the ſeauen and twenty, and immediatly vppon it made the trumpet ſound the allarme, and giue a hotter aſſault to the walle, then he had thought to haue done before. They fought valiantly on both ſides, in ſo much as they that were left in the camp, could not keepe in, but muſt needs run to the aſſault to helpe their companions. The TYRIANS ſeeing the aſſault ſo hot on euery ſide, their hearts began to faile them, and by this meanes was the citie taken the ſelfe ſame day.

An other time alſo, when Alexander was before Gaza, the chiefe city of Syria, there fell a clodde of earth vppon his ſhoulder, out of the which there flew a bird into the aire. The birde lighting vppon one of the engines of his battry, was caught with the nettes made of ſinewes which couered ouer the ropes of the engines. Ariſtander did prognoſticate, that it ſignified he ſhould bee hurt in his ſhoulder, notwithſtanding, that he ſhould yet take the towne. And in deede ſo it came to paſſe. When he ſent great preſentes of ſpoiles which hee wanne at the ſacke of this city, vnto his mother Olympias, Cleopatra, and diuerſe others of his friends: among other things, he ſent vnto Leonidas his gouernour, fiue hundred talentes waight of frankenſence, and a hundred talents waight of myrre: remembring the hope he put him vnto when he was a childe. For, as Alexander was vppon a day ſacrificing vnto the goddes, he tooke both his handes full of frankenſence to caſt into the fire, to make a perfume thereof. When his gouernour Leonidas ſaw him, he ſaied thus vnto him: When thou haſt conquered the countrey where theſe ſweete things grow, then be liberall of thy perfume: but now, ſpare that litle thou haſt at this preſent. Alexander calling to minde at that time his admonition, wrote vnto him in this ſort: we doe ſend thee plenty of frankenſence and myrre, becauſe thou ſhouldeſt no more be a niggard vnto the goddes. There was brought vnto him a litle coffer alſo, which was thought to be the precioueſt thing and the richeſt, that was gotten of all the ſpoiles and riches, taken at the ouerthrow of Darius. When he ſaw it, hee asked his familiars that were about him, what they thought fitteſt, and the beſt thing to be put into it. Some ſaid one thing, ſome ſaied an other thing: but he ſaied, he would put the Iliades of Homer into it, as the worthieſt thing. This is confirmed by the beſt hiſtoriographers. Now if that which the Alexandrians report vpon Heraclides wordes, be true: then it appeareth that he did profite him ſelfe much by Homer in this iourney. For it is reported that when he had conquered Egypt, hee determined to builde a great city, and to repleniſh it with a great number of Grecians, and to call it after his name. But as hee was about to incloſe a certaine ground, which hee had choſen by the aduiſe of his engineers, and workemaiſters: the night before he had a maruellous dreame, that he ſaw an old man ſtanding before him, full of white haires, with an honourable preſence, and comming towardes him ſaied theſe verſes.

As ſoone as he roſe the next morning, he went to ſee this Ile of Pharos, the which at that time was a litle aboue the mouth of the riuer of Nylus, called Canobia, howbeit it is now ioyned vnto firme land, being forced by mans hand. This, he thought the meeteſt place that could be, to build the city which he had determined. For it is as a tongue or a great barre of earth, broad enough, that ſeparateth a great lake on the one ſide, and the ſea on the other, the which doeth ioyne hard to a great hauen. Then he ſaied that Homer was wonderfull in all his things, but that amongeſt others, he was an excellent Architecture: and commaunded, that ſtraight they ſhould caſt the platforme of the city, according to the ſituation of the place. Now they found at that time, no chalke, nor white earth there to marke withall, wherefore they were driuen to take meale, and with that did marke out vpon the earth being black, the compaſſe of the towne that was round and circular, and being deuided into two equall partes, either of them reſembled the skirts and faſhion of the Macedonian cloke. Alexander liked this draught paſſingly well. But there roſe vpon the ſodaine out of the riuer or lake, ſuch an infinite multitude of great fowle of all ſortes, that they couered the element as it had bene a cloud, and lighting within this circuite, did eate vp all the meale, and left not a crum. Alexander liked not theſe ſignes. Notwithſtanding, his Soothſayers bad him not be diſcouraged, for they told him it was a ſigne that hee ſhould build a city there, ſo plentifull of all things, that he ſhould maintaine all ſortes of people. Then he commaunded them, vnto whom hee had giuen the charge of the building, that they ſhould goe forward with their worke, and he him ſelfe in the meane time, tooke his iourney to goe viſite the temple of Iupiter Hammon. The iourney was long, and there were many troubles by the way, but two dangers aboue all the reſt moſt ſpeciall. The firſt, lacke of water, becauſe they had to trauell many dayes iourney through a great deſert. The ſecond was, the daunger of the riſing of the ſouth winde by the way, to blow the ſand abroad, which was of a wonderfull length. And it is reported, that on a time there roſe ſuch a tempeſt in that deſert, that blew vp whole hilles of ſand, which ſlue fifty thouſand men of Cambyſes army. Euery man in Alexanders traine did know theſe daungers very well: howbeit it was hard to diſſwade Alexander from any thing which he had a deſire vnto. For, fortune fauouring him in all his attemptes, made him conſtant and reſolute in his determinations: and his noble corage beſides, made him inuincible in all things he tooke in hand, in ſomuch as he did not only compell his enemies, but he had power alſo of time and place. In that voyage, in ſtead of theſe former daungers ſpoken of, he had many helps, the which are ſuppoſed were ſent him from the goddes, by the oracles that followed afterwardes. For in a certaine ſort, they haue beleeued the oracles that were written of him. Firſt of all, the wonderfull water and great ſhowers that fell from the element did keepe him from feare of the firſt danger, and did quench their thirſt, and moyſted the drieneſſe of the ſand in ſuch ſort, that there came a ſweete freſh aire from it. Furthermore, when the markes were hidden from the guides to ſhew them the way, and that they wandred vp and downe, they could not tell where: there came crowes vnto them that did guide them flying before them: flying faſt when they ſaw them follow them, and ſtayed for them when they were behinde.

But Calliſthenes writeth a greater wonder then this, that in the night time, with the very noiſe of the crowes, they brought them againe into the right way which had loſt their way. Thus Alexander in the end, hauing paſſed through this wilderneſſe, he came vnto the temple he ſought for: where, the prophet or chiefe prieſt ſaluted him from the god Hammon, as from his father. Then Alexander asked him, if any of the murtherers that had killed his father, were left aliue. The prieſt aunſwered him, and bad him take heede he did not blaſpheme, for his father was no mortall man. Then Alexander againe rehearſing that he had ſpoken, asked him, if the murderers that had conſpired the death of P*hilip* his father were all puniſhed. After that, he asked him touching his kingdome, if he would graunt him to bee king ouer all the world. The god aunſwered him by the mouth of his prophet, he ſhould: and that the death of P*hilip* was fully reuenged. Then did Alexander offer great preſents vnto the god, and gaue money large to the prieſts, and miniſters of the temple. This is that the moſt part of writers doe declare, touching Alexanders demand, and the oracles giuen him. Yet did Alexander him ſelfe write vnto his mother, that he had ſecret oracles from the god, which hee would onely impart vnto her, at his returne into MACEDON. Others ſay alſo, that the prophet meaning to ſalute him in the Greeke tongue to welcome him the better, would haue ſaid vnto him, O P*aidion*, as much as deare ſonne: but that he tripped a litle in his tongue, becauſe the Greeke was not his naturall tongue, and placed an s, for an n, in the later end, ſaying, O P*ai dios*, to wit, O ſonne of Iupiter: and that Alexander was glad of that miſtaking. Whereupon there ran a rumor ſtraight among his men, that Iupiter had called him his ſonne.

The ſaying of Pſammon the philoſopher of the prouidence of God.

It is ſaied alſo, that he heard P*ſammon* the philoſopher in EGYPT, and that he liked his words very well, when he ſaied that god was king of all mortall men. For (q. he) he that commandeth all things, muſt needes be god. But Alexander ſelfe ſpake better, and like a philoſopher, when he ſaid: That god generally was father to all mortall men, but that particularly he did elect the beſt ſort for him ſelfe. To conclude, he ſhewed him ſelfe more arrogant vnto the barbarous people, and made as though he certainely beleeued that he had bene begotten of ſome god: but vnto the GRECIANS he ſpake more modeſtly of diuine generation.

For in a letter hee wrote vnto the ATHENIANS touching the city of SAMOS, he ſaid: I gaue ye not that noble free city but it was giuen you, at that time by him whom they called my Lord and father: meaning P*hilip*. Afterwardes alſo being ſtriken with an arrow, and feeling great paine of it: My frends ſaid he, This bloud which is ſpilt, is mans bloud, and not as Homer ſaied,

No ſuch as from the immortall gods doth flow.

And one day alſo in a maruellous great thunder, when euery man was afraied, Anaxarchus the Rethoritian being preſent, ſaid vnto him: O thou ſonne of Iupiter, wilt thou doe as much? no ſaid he, laughing on him, I will not be ſo fearefull to my friends, as thou wouldeſt haue me: diſdaining the ſeruice of fiſh to my bord, becauſe thou ſeeſt not princes heades ſerued in.

And the report goeth alſo, that Alexander vpon a time ſending a litle fiſh vnto Hephaſtion, Anaxarchus ſhould ſaye as it were in mockery, that they which aboue others ſeeke for fame with great trouble and hazard of life, haue either ſmall pleaſure in the worlde, or elſe as litle as others haue. By theſe proofes and reaſons alleadged, we may thinke that Alexander had no vaine nor preſumptuous opinion of himſelfe, to thinke that he was otherwiſe begotten of a god, but that he did it in policie to keepe other men vnder obedience, by the opinion conceiued of his godhead. Returning out of PHOENICIA into EGYPT, he made many ſacrifices, feaſtes, and preceſſions in honor of the goddes, ſundry dances, Tragedies and ſuch like paſſetimes goodly to behold: not onely for the ſumptuous ſetting out of them, but alſo for the good will and diligence of the ſetters forth of them, which ſtriued euery one to exceede the other. For the kings of the CYPRIANS were the ſetters of thẽ forth, as at ATHENS they draw by lotte a citizen of euery tribe of the people, to defraie the charges of theſe paſt imes. Theſe kings were very earneſt who ſhould doe beſt, but ſpecially Nicocreon, king of SALAMINA, in CYPRVS: and Paſicrates, Lord of the citie of SOLES. For it fell to their lot to furniſh two of the excellenteſt players, Paſicrates furniſhed Athenodorus, and Nicocreon Theſſalus: whom Alexander loued ſingularly well, though he made no ſhew of it, vntill that Athenodorus was declared victor, by the iudges deputed to giue ſentence. For when he went from the plaies, he told them he did like the iudges opinion well, notwithſtanding, he would haue bene contented to haue giuen the one halfe of his realme, not to haue ſeene Theſſalus ouercome. Athenodorus being condemned vpon a time by the ATHENIANS, becauſe he was not in ATHENS at the feaſtes of Bacchus, when the Comedies and Tragedies were plaied, and a fine ſet on his head for his abſence: he beſought Alexander to write vnto them in his behalf, that they would releaſe his penalty. Alexander would not ſo doe, but ſent thither his money whereof he was condemned, and paide it for him of his owne purſe. Alſo when Lycon SCARPHIAN, an excellent ſtage plaier had pleaſed Alexander well, and did foiſte in a verſe in his comedie, conteyning a petition of tenne talents: Alexander laughing at it, gaue it him. Darius at that time wrote vnto Alexander, and vnto certaine of his friends alſo, to pray him to take tenne thouſand tallentes for the ranſome of all thoſe priſoners he had in his handes, and for all the countries, landes and ſigniories on this ſide the riuer of Euphrates, and one of his daughters alſo in mariage, that from thenceforce he might be his kinſman and friend. Alexander imparted this to his councell. Amongſt them Parmenio ſaid vnto him: if I were Alexander, ꝙ he, ſurely I would accept this offer. So would I indeed, ꝙ Alexander againe, if I were Parmenio. In fine, he wrote againe vnto Darius, that if he would ſubmit himſelfe, he would vſe him courteouſly: if not, that then he would preſently march towardes him. But he repented him afterwardes, when king Darius wife was dead with childe: for without diſſimulation it greeued him much, that he had loſt ſo noble an occaſion to ſhew his courteſie and clemencie. This notwithſtanding, he gaue her body honourable buriall, ſparing for no coſt. Amongeſt the Eunuches of the queenes chamber, there was one Tireus taken priſoner, among the women: who ſtealing out of Alexanders campe, taking his horſe backe, rode vnto Darius to bring him news of the death of his wife. Then Darius beating of his head, and weeping bitterly, cried out aloud: Oh gods? what wretched hap haue the PERSIANS? that haue not onely had the wife and ſiſter of their king taken priſoners euen in his life time, but now that ſhee is dead alſo in trauell of child, ſhee hath bene depriued of princely buriall? Then ſpake the Eunuch to him, and ſaied: For her burial, moſt gracious king, & for all due honor that might be wiſhed her, PERSIA hath no cauſe to complaine of her hard fortune. For, neither did Queene Statira your wife whilſt ſhee liued priſoner, nor your mother, nor daughters, want any part or iotte of their honour they were wont to haue before, ſauing onely to ſee the light of your honour, the which, god Oromaſdes graunt to reſtore againe (if it be his will) vnto your maieſty: neither was there any honour wanting at her death (to ſet forth her ſtately funeralles) that might be gotten, but more, was lamented alſo with the teares of your enemies. For Alexander is as mercifull in victory, as he is valiaunt in battell. Darius hearing the Eunuches wordes, being vexed in minde for very griefe: tooke the Eunuche aſide into the ſecreteſt place of his tent, and ſaied vnto him. If thou be not, with the misfortune of the PERSIANS, become a MACEDONIAN, but doeſt in thy hart acknowledge Darius, for thy ſoueraine Lord and maiſter: I pray thee, and do alſo coniure thee, by the reuerence thou beareſt vnto this bright light of the ſunne, and to the right hand of the king, that thou doe tell me truely. Are theſe the leaſt euilles which I lament in Statira, her impriſonment and death? And did ſhe not in her life make vs more miſerable by her diſhonor, then if we had diſhonorably fallen into the handes of a cruell enemie? For, what honeſt communication I pray thee, can a young victorious Prince haue with his enemies wife a priſoner: hauing done her ſo much honor as he hath done? Darius going on with theſe ſpeeches, Tireus the eunuch fell downe on his knees, and beſought him not to ſay ſo, neither to bleamiſh the vertue of Alexander in that ſorte, nor yet ſo to diſhonor his ſiſter and wife deceaſed, and thereby alſo to depriue himſelfe of the greateſt comfort he could wiſh to haue in this calamitie, which was, to be ouercome by an enemie that had greater vertues than a man could poſſibly haue: but rather that he ſhould wonder at Alexanders vertue, who had ſhewed himſelfe chaſter to the Ladies, than valiant againſt the PERSIANS. And therewithall, the eunuch confirmed the great honeſtie, chaſtitie, and noble minde of Alexander, by many great and deepe othes. Then Darius comming out among his friendes againe, holding vp his hands vnto the heauens, made this prayer vnto the gods. O heauenly gods, creators of men, and protectors of kings and realmes: firſt, I beſech you grant me, that reſtoring the PERSIANS againe to their former good ſtate, I may leaue the realme vnto my ſucceſſors, with that glorie and fame I receiued it of my predeceſſors: that obtaining victory, I may vſe Alexander with that great honor and curteſie, which he hath in my miſery ſhewed vnto thoſe I loued beſt in the world. Or otherwiſe if the time appointed be come, that the kingdome of PERSIA muſt needs haue end, either through diuine reuenge, or by naturall change of earthly things: Then, good goddes yet graunt, that none but Alexander after me, may ſit in Cyrus throne. Diuers writers do agree, that theſe things came euen thus to paſſe. Now Alexander hauing conquered all ASIA on this ſide of the riuer of Euphrates, he went to meete with Darius, that came downe with ten hundred thouſand fighting men. It was told him by ſome of his friendes to make him laugh, that the ſlaues of his armie had deuided themſelues in two partes, and had choſen them a Generall of either part, naming the one Alexander, and the other Darius: and that at the firſt, they beganne to skirmiſh only with cloddes of earth, and afterwardes with fiſtes, but at the laſt, they grew ſo hot, that they came to plaine ſtones and ſtaues, ſo that they could not be parted. Alexander hearing that, would needes haue the two Generals fight hande to hande one with the other: and Alexander ſelfe did arme him that was called Alexander, & Philotas the other which was called Darius. All the army thereupon was gathered together to ſee this combat betwene thē, as a thing that did betoken good or ill lucke to come. The fight was ſharp betwene them, but in the end, he that was called Alexander ouercame the other: & Alexander to reward him, gaue him twelue villages, with priuiledge to goe after the PERSIAN maner. Thus it is written by Eratoſthenes. The great battel that Alexander fought with Darius, was not (as many writers report) at Arbeles, but at Gauſameles, which ſignifieth in the PERSIAN tongue, the houſe of the cammell. For ſome one of the ancient kings of PERSIA that had eſcaped from the handes of his enemies, flying vpon a drumbledary cammell, lodged him in that place, and therefore appointed the reuenues of certaine villages to keepe the cammell there. There fell out at that time an eclipſe of the moone, in the moneth called Bœdromion (now Auguſt) about the time that the feaſt of the miſteries was celebrated at ATHENS. The eleuenth night after that, both their armies being in ſight of the other, Darius kept his men in battell ray, and went him ſelfe by torch light viewing his bands and companies. Alexander on the other ſide whileſt his MACEDONIAN ſouldiers ſlept, was before his tent with Ariſtander the Soothſayer, and made certaine ſecret ceremonies and ſacrifices vnto Apollo. The auncient Captaines of the MACEDONIANS, ſpecially Parmenio, ſeeing all the valley betwixt the riuer of Miphates, and the mountaines of the GORDIEIANS, all on a bright light with the fires of the barbarous people, and hearing a dreadfull noiſe as of a confuſed multitude of people that filled their campe with the ſound thereof: they were amazed, and conſulted, that in one day it was in maner vnpoſſible to fight a battell with ſuch an incredible multitude of people. Thereupon they went vnto Alexander after he had ended his ceremonies, and did counſell him to giue battell by night, becauſe the darkenes thereof ſhould helpe to keepe all feare from his men, which the ſight of their enemies would bring them into. But then he gaue them this notable anſwer: I will not ſteale victorie quoth he. This anſwer ſeemed very fonde and arrogant to ſome, that he was ſo pleaſant, being neere ſo great danger. Howbeit others thinke that it was a preſent noble courage, and a deepe conſideration of him, to thinke what ſhoulde happen: thereby to giue Darius no manner of occaſion (if he were ouercome) to take hart againe, and to proue an other battell, accuſing the darkenes of the night as cauſe of his ouerthrowe: as he had done at the firſt conflict, imputing his ouerthrowe to the mountaines, the ſtraights, and the ſea. For, ſayed he, Darius will neuer leaue to make warres with vs for lacke of men, nor munition, hauing ſo large a realme as he hath, & ſuch a world of people beſides: but then he will no more hazard battell, when his hart is done, and all hope taken from him, and that he ſeeth his army at noone daies ouerthrowen by plaine battell. After his Captaines were gone from him, he went into his tent, and layed him downe to ſleepe, and ſlept all that night more ſoundly than he was wont to doe before: inſomuch as the Lordes and Princes of his campe comming to waite vpon him at his vpriſing, maruelled when they found him ſo ſound a ſleepe, and therefore of themſelues they cõmaunded the ſouldiers to eate. Afterwardes, perceiuing that time came faſt vpon them, Parmenio went into Alexanders chamber, and comming to his beddes ſide, called him twiſe or thriſe by name, till at the laſt he awaked him, and aſked him how it chanced that he ſlept ſo long, like one that had alreadie ouercome, and that did not thinke he ſhould fight as great and daungerous a battell as euer he did in his life. Why, ſaid Alexander, laughing on him: doeſt thou not thinke we haue already ouercome, being troubled no more with running after Darius vp and downe a country vtterly deſtroyed, as we ſhould otherwiſe haue bene compelled to haue done, if he would not haue come to battell, and deſtroyed the country before vs?

Now Alexander did not only ſhew himſelfe before the battell, but euen at the very inſtant of battell, a noble man of courage, and of great iudgement. For Parmenio leading the left wing of his battell, the men of armes of the BACTRIANS gaue ſuch a fierce onſet vpon the MACEDONIANS, that they made them giue backe: and Mazeus alſo, king Darius Lieutenant, ſent certaine troupes of horſemen out of their battell, to giue charge vpon them that were left in the campe to garde the cariage. Parmenio being amazed with either of both attempts, ſent immediatly to aduertiſe Alexander, that all their campe and cariage would be loſt, if he did not ſend preſently to aide the rereward. When theſe newes came to Alexander from Parmenio, he had already giuen the ſignall of battell vnto his men for to giue charge. Whereupon he anſwered the meſſenger that brought him theſe newes, that he ſhould tell Parmenio he was a mad man and out of his wits, not remembring that if they wanne the battell, they ſhould not onely ſaue their owne cariage, but alſo winne the cariage of their enemies: and if it were their chance to loſe it, then that they ſhould not neede to care for their cariage, nor for their ſlaues, but only to thinke to die honorably, valiantly fighting for his life. Hauing ſent this meſſage vnto Parmenio, he put on his helmet.

The reſt of his armor for his body, he had put it on before in his tent, which was, a SICILIAN caſſocke, and vpon that a brigandine made of many foldes of canuas with oylet holes, which was gotten among the ſpoiles at the battell of ISSVS. His head peece was as bright as ſiluer, made by Theophilus the armorer: his coller ſutelike to the ſame, all ſet full of precious ſtones, and he had a ſworde by his ſide maruellous light, and of excellent temper, which the king of the CITIEIANS had giuen him, vſing commonly to fight with his ſword at any ſet battel. His coat armor was maruellous rich, and of ſumptuous workemanſhippe, far aboue all the reſt he wore. It was of the workemanſhippe of Hellicon, the which the RHODIANS gaue him for a preſent, and this he commonly wore when he went to battell. Now when he did ſet his men in battell ray, or made any oration vnto them, or did ride alongeſt the bands to take view of them: he alwayes vſed to ride vpon an other horſe to ſpare Bucephal, becauſe he was then ſomewhat old: notwithſtanding, when he ment in deede to fight, then Bucephal was brought vnto him, and as ſoone as he was gotten vp on his backe, the trumpet ſounded, & he gaue charge. Then, after he had made long exhortations to encorage the men of armes of the THESSALIANS, and the other GRECIANS alſo, and when they had all promiſed him they would ſticke to him like men, and prayed him to lead them, and giue charge vppon the enemies: he tooke his launce in his left hande, and holding vp his right hande vnto heauen: beſought the goddes (as Calliſthenes writeth) that it it were true, he was begotten of Iupiter, that it would pleaſe them that daye to helpe him, and to encorage the GRECIANS. The Soothſayer Ariſtander was then a horſebacke hard by Alexander, apparelled all in white, & a crown of gold on his head, who ſhewed Alexander when he made his prayer, an Eagle flying ouer his head, and pointing directly towards his enemies.

This maruellouſly encoraged all the armie that ſaw it, and with this ioy, the men of armes of Alexanders ſide, encoraging one another, did ſet ſpurres to their horſe to charge vpon the enemies. The battell of the footemen of the PERSIANS, beganne a litle to giue way, and before the foremoſt could come to giue them charge, the barbarous people turned their backes, and fled. The chaſe was great, Alexander driuing them that fled vppon the middeſt of their owne battell, where Darius ſelfe was in perſon. He eſpied him a farre off ouer the foremoſtranckes in the middeſt of his battell, being a goodly tall prince, ſtanding in a chariot of warre, compaſſed in round with great troupes of horſemen, all ſette in goodly ordinance to receiue the enemy. But when they ſaw Alexander at hand with ſo grimme a looke, chaſing them that fled, through thoſe that yet kept their rancks: there fell ſuch a feare among them, that the moſt part diſperſed themſelues. Notwithſtanding, the beſt and moſt valianteſt men fought it out to the death before their king, and falling dead one vpon another, they did lette them that the enemies could not ſo well follow Darius. For they lying one by another on the ground, drawing on to the laſt gaſpe, did yet take both men and horſes by the legges to hinder them. Darius then ſeeing nothing but terror and deſtruction before his eyes, and that the bandes which he had ſet before him for ſafegard, came backe vpon him, ſo as he could not deuiſe how to turne his charriot forward nor backward, the wheeles were ſo hindered and ſtayed with the heapes of dead bodies, and that the horſe alſo being ſet vpon and hidde in manner in this conflict, fell to leaping and plunging for feare, ſo that the charrettiers could no longer guide nor driue them: he got vp vpon a mare that lately had fole, and ſo ſaued himſelfe flying vpon her.

And yet had he not thus eſcaped, had not Parmenio once againe ſent vnto Alexander to pray him to come and aide him: becauſe there was yet a great ſquadron whole together that made no countenance to flie. Somewhat there was in it, that they accuſed Parmenio that day to haue delt but ſlackely and cowardly, either becauſe his age had taken his courage from him, or elſe for that he enuied Alexanders greatnes & proſperitie, who againſt his will became ouer great as Calliſthenes ſaid. In fine, Alexander was angry with the ſecond meſſage, and yet told not his men truely the cauſe why, but faining that he would haue them leaue killing, and becauſe alſo night came on: he cauſed the trumpet ſound retreate, and ſo went towards his army, whom he thought to be in diſtreſſe. Notwithſtanding, newes came to him by the way, that in that place alſo, they had giuen the enemies the ouerthrowe, and that they fled euery way for life.

Alexanders third victory of Darius, and liberality to all men.

The battell hauing this ſucceſſe, euery man thought that the kingdome of the PERSIANS was vtterly ouerthrowen, and that Alexander likewiſe was becom only king of all ASIA: whereupon he made ſumptuous ſacrifices vnto the goddes, and gaue great riches, houſes, landes and poſſeſſions vnto his friendes and familiars. Furthermore, to ſhew his liberality alſo vnto the GRECIANS, he wrote vnto them, that he would haue all tyrannies ſuppreſſed through out all GREECE, and that all the GRECIANS ſhould liue at liberty vnder their owne lawes. Particularly alſo he wrote vnto the PLATÆIANS, that hee would reedifie their city againe, becauſe their predeceſſors in time paſt, had giuen their countrey vnto the GRECIANS, to fight againſt the barbarous people for the defence of the common liberty of all GREECE. He ſent alſo into ITALY vnto the GROTONIANS, part of the ſpoile, to honor the memory of the valiantnes, and good will of Phayllus their citizen, who in the time of the wars with the MEDES (when all the GRECIANS that dwelt in ITALY had forſaken their naturall country men of GREECE it ſelfe, becauſe they thought they could not otherwiſe ſcape) went with a ſhip of his vnto SALAMINA, which hee armed and ſet forth at his owne charges, becauſe he would be at the battell and partake alſo of the common daunger with the GRECIANS: ſuch honor did Alexander bear vnto prowes, that he loued to reward and remember the worthy deeds of men. Then Alexander marching with his army into the country of BABYLON, they al yeelded ſtraight vnto him. When he came into the country of the Ecbatanians, he maruelled when he ſaw an opening of the earth, out of the which there came continuall ſparkes of fire as out of a well: and that hard by alſo the earth ſpued out continually a kind of * maund or chalkie clay ſomewhat lyquid, of ſuch abundance, as it ſeemed like a lake. This maund or chalke is like vnto a kind of lyme or clay, but it is ſo eaſie to be ſet a fire, that not touching it with any flame, by the brightnes only of the light that commeth out of the fire, it is ſet a fire, and doth alſo ſet the aire a fire which is betwene both. The barbarous people of that country, being deſirous to ſhewe Alexander the nature of that Naptha, ſcattered the ſtreete that led to his lodging, with ſome of it. Then the day being ſhut in, they fired it at one of the endes, and the firſt droppes taking fire, in the twinckling of an eye, all the reſt from one end of the ſtreete to the other was of a flame, and though it was darke and within night, lightned all the place thereabout. Alexander being in bath at that time, and waited vpon by a page called Steuen: (a hard fououred boy, but yet that had an excellent ſweete voice to ſing) one Athenophanes an Athenian, that alwaies nointed and bathed the king, and much delighted him with his pleaſant conceits, asked him if he would ſee the triall of this Naptha vpon Steuen: for if the fire tooke and went not out, then he would ſay it had a wonderfull force, and was vnquenchable. The page was contented to haue it proued vpon him. But ſo ſoone as they had laide it on him, and did but touch it onely, it tooke ſtraight of ſuch a flame, and ſo fired his bodie, that Alexander himſelfe was in a maruellous perplexitie withall. And ſure had it not bene by good hap, that there were many by ready with veſſels full of water to put into the bath, it had bene vnpoſſible to haue ſaued the boy from being burnt to nothing: and yet ſo he eſcaped narrowly, and beſides was ſicke long after. Now ſome apply this Naptha vnto the fable of Medea, ſaying that therwith ſhe rubbed the crowne and lawne ſhe gaue vnto the daughter of Creon at her mariage, ſo much ſpoken of in the tragedies. For neither the crowne nor the lawne could caſt fire of themſelues, neither did the fire light by chaunce. But by oyling them with this Naptha ſhe wrought a certaine aptnes to receiue more forcibly the operation of the fire, which was in place where the bride ſate. For the beames which the fire caſteth out, haue ouer ſome bodies no other force, but to heat and lighten them. But ſuch as haue an oyly drie humor, and thereby a ſimpathy and proportionable conformitie with the nature of the fire: it eaſily enflameth and ſetteth a fire, by the forcible impreſſion of his beames. Howbeit they make a great queſtion of the cauſe of this naturall force of Naptha, * or whether this liquid ſubſtance and moiſt humor that taketh fire ſo eaſily, doth come of the earth that is fatty and apt to conceiue fire. For this country of Babylonis very hot, inſomuch as oftentimes barley being put into the ground, it bloweth it vp againe, as if the earth by vehement inflammation had a ſtrong blaſt to caſt it out: and men in the extreameſt heate of the ſummer, do ſleepe there, vppon great leather budgets filled full of freſh water. Harpalus, whom Alexander left there his lieutenant & gouernor of that countrie, deſiring to ſet forth and beautifie the gardens of the kings pallace and walks of the ſame, with all manner of plants of Greece: he brought all the reſt to good paſſe, ſauing Iuy only, which the earth could neuer abide, but it euer died, becauſe the heate and temper of the earth killed it, and the Iuy of it ſelfe liketh freſh aire and a could ground. This digreſſion is ſomwhat from the matter, but peraduenture the reader will not thinke it troubleſome, how hard ſoeuer he finde it, ſo it be not ouer tedious. Alexander hauing wonne the city of Susa, he found within the caſtell foure thouſand talents in ready coine, gold and ſiluer, beſides other infinite treaſure and ineſtimable, amongeſt the which (it is ſayed) he found to the value of fiue thouſand talents weight of * purple Hermiona ſilke which they had ſafe locked vp and kept the ſpace of two hundred yeares ſaue ten, and yet the colour kept as freſh as if it had bene newly made. Some ſay that the cauſe why it was ſo well kept, came by meanes of the dying of it, with honny, in ſilkes which before had bene died redde, and with white oile in white ſilkes. For, there are ſilkes ſeene of that colour of as long a time, that keepe colour as well as the other. Dino writeth furthermore, that the kings of Persia made water to bee brought from the riuers of Nylus and Iſter (otherwiſe called Danuby) which they did locke vp with their other treaſure for a confirmation of the greatnes of their Empire, and to ſhew that they were Lordes of the world. The wayes to enter into Persia being very hard of paſſage, and in maner vnpaſſable,

(both for the ilneſſe of the waies, as alſo for the gard that kept them, which were the choiſeſt men of PERSIA) Darius alſo being fled thither: there was one that ſpake the Greeke and PERSIAN toong (whoſe father was borne in the coūtry of LYCIA, & his mother a PERSIAN) that guided Alexander into PERSIA, by ſome compaſſe fetched about not very long, according to the Oracles anſwere of Alexander giuen by the mouth of Nunne Pythias, when hee was a child: that a LYCIAN ſhould guide and lead him againſt the PERSIANS. There was then great ſlaughter made in PERSIA of the priſoners that were taken. For Alexander himſelfe writeth, that he commanded the men ſhould be put to the ſword, thinking that the beſt way to ſerue his turne. It is ſaid alſo, that there he found a maruellous treaſure of gold and ſiluer in readie money, as he had done before in the citie of SVSA: the which he caried away with all the reſt of the kings rich wardroppe, and with it laded tenne thouſand moyles, and fiue thouſande camels. Alexander entring into the caſtle of the chiefe citie of PERSIA, ſawe by chance a great image of Xerxes lye on the ground, the which vnwares was throwen down by the multitude of the ſouldiers that came in, thronging one vpon an other. Thereupon he ſtayed, and ſpake vnto it as if it had bene aliue, ſaying: I can not tell whether I ſhould paſſe by thee, and let thee lye, for the warre thou madeſt ſometime againſt the GRECIANS: or whether I ſhould lift thee vp, reſpecting the noble mind & vertues thou haddeſt. In the end, when he had ſtood mute a long time, conſidering of it, he went his way: and meaning to refreſh his weary army, becauſe it was the winter quarter, he remained there foure monethes together. The report goeth that the firſt time that Alexander ſate vnder the cloth of ſtate of king Darius, all of rich golde: Demarathus CORINTHIAN (who firſt beganne to loue him euen in his father Philips time) burſt out in teares for ioy, good olde man ſaying, that the GRECIANS long time dead before, were depriued of this bleſſed happe to ſee Alexander ſet in king Xerxes princely chayr. After that, preparing againe to goe againſt Darius, he would needes make mery one day, and refreſh himſelfe with ſome banquet. It chanced ſo, that he with his companions was bidden to a priuate feaſt priuately, where was aſſembled ſome fine curtiſans of his familiars, who with their friends taried at the banquet. Amongſt them was that famous Thais, borne in the coūtry of ATTICA, & then concubine to Ptolomy, king of EGYPT after Alexanders death. She finely praiſing Alexander, and partly in ſporting wiſe, began to vtter matter in affection of her coūtrie, but yet of greater importance than became her mouth: ſaying, that that daye ſhe found her ſelfe fully recompenced to her great good liking, for all the paines ſhe had taken, trauelling through all the countries of ASIA, following of his armie, now that ſhe had this fauor & good happe to be mery and pleaſant, in the proude and ſtately pallace of the great kings of PERSIA. But yet it would doe her more good, for a recreation to burne Xerxes houſe with the fire of ioy, who had burnt the citie of ATHENS: and herſelfe to giue the fire to it, before ſo noble a Prince as Alexander. Becauſe euer after it might be ſaid, that the women following his campe had taken more noble reuenge of the PERSIANS, for the wrongs and iniuries they had done vnto GREECE: then all the Captaines of GREECE that euer were had done, either by land or ſea. When ſhe had ſayd, Alexanders familiars about him, clapped their hands and made great noiſe for ioy, ſaying: that it were as good a deede as could be poſſible, and perſwaded Alexander vnto it. Alexander yeelding to their perſwaſions, roſe vp, and putting a garland of flowers vpon his head, went formoſt him ſelfe: and all his familiars followed after him, crying and dauncing all about the caſtel. The other MACEDONIANS hearing of it alſo, came thither immediatly with torches light and great ioy, hoping that this was a good ſigne that Alexander ment to returne again into MACEDON, and not to dwell in the country of the barbarous people, ſith he did burne and deſtroy the kings caſtell. Thus, and in this ſort it was thought to be burnt. Some writers thinke otherwiſe: that it was not burnt with ſuch ſport, but by determination of the councell. But howſoeuer it was, all they graunt, that Alexander did preſently repent him, and commaunded the fire to be quenched ſtraight. For his liberality, that good will and readineſſe to giue, increaſed with his conqueſtes: and when he did beſtow giftes of any, he would beſides his gift, euer giue them good countenance, on whom he beſtowed his grace and fauor. And here I will recite a few examples thereof. Ariſto being Collonell of the PÆONIANS, hauing ſlaine one of his enemies, he brought him his head, and ſayd: ſuch a preſent, O king, by vs, is euer rewarded with a cup of gold. Yea quoth Alexander, ſmiling vpon him with an emptie cuppe. But I drinke to thee this cuppe full of good wine, and doe giue thee cup and all. An other time, he met with a poore MACEDONIAN that led a moyle loden with gold of the kings: and when the poore moyle was ſo wearie that ſhe could no longer carie her burden, the moyletter put it vpon his owne backe, and loded himſelfe withall, carying it ſo a good prety way: howbeit in the end being ouerloden, was about to throwe it downe on the ground. Alexander perceiuing it, asked him what burthen he caried. When it was told him: well, ꝙ he to the moyletter, be not weary yet, but carie it into the tent, for I giue it thee. To be ſhort, he was angrier with them that would take nothing of him, then he was with thoſe that would ask him ſomwhat. He wrote alſo vnto Phocion, that he would take him no more for his friend, if he would refuſe his giftes. It ſeemed that he had giuen nothing vnto a young boy called Serapion (who euer did ſerue them the ball that playd at tenis) becauſe he asked him nothing. Wherfore, the king playing on a time, this young boy threw the ball to others that played with him, and not to himſelfe. The king maruelling at it, at the length ſayed vnto him: why, my boy, doeſt thou not giue me the ball? Becauſe your maieſtie doth not aske it me, ꝙ he. Alexander then vnderſtanding his meaning, laughed at the boy, & did much for him afterwards. There was attending on him alſo one Proteas, a pleaſant conceited man, and that could ſlent finely. It chanced vpon ſome occaſion that Alexander fell out with him: whereuppon ſome of his friends were interceſſors to the king for him, & beſought him to pardon him: and Proteas himſelfe alſo being preſent, craued pardon with teares in his eyes. Alexander thereupon forgaue him. Then pleaſantly replied Proteas, I deſire it may pleaſe your grace, that I may receiue ſome teſtimonie to aſſure me I am in your fauor. Thereuppon the king ſtraight commaunded one to geue him fiue talentes. The goods and riches he gaue vnto his familiars and gard about him, were very great, as it appeareth plainly by a letter which his mother Olympias wrote vnto him, to this effect: I know thou ſpareſt not to geue thy frends large giftes, and that thou makeſt much of them: but thereby thou makeſt them kings fellowes, they get many friends, and leaue the poſte alone without any. His mother did many times write ſuch like matters vnto him, the which Alexander kept very ſecret, ſauing one day when he opened one of them, Hephæſtion being preſent drew nere, and read the letter with him, as he was wont to do. Alexander did let him alone, but when he had read it, he pluckt the ſeale of armes from his finger, wherewith he did vſe to ſeale his letters, and put it to Hephæſtions mouth. He gaue alſo vnto the ſonne of Mazeus, (that was the chiefeſt man about Darius) a ſecond gouernment, beſides that which he had before, and greater than the firſt. This young noble man refuſed it, ſaying: why, and it pleaſe your grace, before there was but one Darius, but you now make many Alexanders. He gaue vnto Parmenio alſo, Bagoas houſe, where (as it is reported) he found a thouſand talents worth, of the ſpoyles and goods of the SVSIANS. He wrote alſo vnto Antipater, that he ſhould keepe a gard about his perſon, for he had many enemies that laye in wait for him. He did ſend alſo many goodly preſents vnto his mother, but withall he wrote vnto her, that ſhe would meddle no more with his matters nor gifts, taking vpon her the office of a Captaine. She ſtorming at it, he patiently did brooke her anger. Antipater another time, writing a long letter vnto him againſt his mother Olympias, when he had red it ouer: loe, ſaid he, Antipater knoweth not, that one teare of the mothers eye will wipe out tenne thouſande ſuch letters. Furthermore, Alexander perceiuing on a time, that his friendes became very diſſolute & licentious in dyet and life, and that Agnon TEIAN had his corked ſhooes nailed with ſiluer nailes, that Leonatus alſo cauſed diuers cammelles to be loden amongſt his cariage with powder of EGYPT, to put vpon him when he wreſtled or vſed any other exerciſe of body & that alſo they caried after Philotus, toyles for chaſe and hunting, of a hundreth furlong long, and that there were alſo that vſed pretious perfumes & ſweete ſauors when they bathed them ſelues, more then there were that rubbed themſelues with plaine oyle, and that they had fine chamberlaines to rubbe them in the bath, and to make their beddes ſoft and delicate: he wiſely and courteouſly rebuked them and ſaid. I maruell, ſayd he, that you which haue fought in ſo often and great battelles, doe not remember that they which trauell, doe ſleepe more ſweete and ſoundly, than they that take their eaſe and doe nothing: and that you doe not marke, that comparing your life, with the manner of the life of the PERSIANS, to liue at pleaſure is a vile thing, and to trauell is Princelie. And howe I pray you, can a man take paine to dreſſe his owne horſe, or to make cleane his launce or helmet, that for ſlothfull curioſities ſake, diſdaineth to rubbe his owne bodie with his fine fingers? Are you ignorant that the type of honor in all our victorie conſiſteth, in ſcorning to doe that which we ſee them doe, whom we haue vanquiſhed and ouercome? To bring them therefore by his example, to acquaint themſelues with hardnes: he tooke more paines in warres and in hunting, and did hazard himſelfe more dangerouſly, then euer he had done before. Whereupon an Ambaſſador of LACEDÆMON being preſent to ſee him fight with a Lyon, and to kill him, ſayed vnto him: truly your grace hath fought well with this Lyon, and tried which of you two ſhould be king. Craterus after that, cauſed this hunting to be ſet vp in the temple of Apollo in DELPHES: where are the images of the Lyon, of the dogs, and of the king fighting with the Lyon, and of himſelfe alſo that came to helpe him, all thoſe images being of copper, ſome made by Lyſippus, the reſt by Leochares. Thus Alexander did put himſelf vnto all ieopardies, as well to exerciſe his ſtrength & courage, as alſo to allure his men to doe the like. This notwithſtanding his friends and familiars hauing wealth at will, as men exceeding rich, they would needes liue delicately and at eaſe, and would take no more paines, miſliking vtterly to goe vp and downe the countries to make warre here and there, and thereupon beganne a litle to finde fault with Alexander, and to ſpeake euill of him. Which at the firſt Alexander tooke quietly ſaying, that it was honor for a king to ſuffer himſelfe to be ſlaundered and ill ſpoken of, for doing of good. And yet the leaſt good turnes he did vnto his friendes, did ſhewe his hartie loue and honor he bare them, as ſhall appeare vnto you by ſome examples that followe. Peuceſtas being bitten by a beare, did let his friendes vnderſtand by letters, but he wrote nothing thereof vnto Alexander. Alexander was offended therewith, and wrote vnto him thus. Send me worde at the leaſt yet how thou doeſt, and whether any of thy fellowes did forſake thee at the hunting, to the end they may be puniſhed. Hephæſtion being abſent about certaine buſineſſe he had, Alexander wrote vnto him, that as they were hunting a beaſt called Ichnewmon, Craterus vnfortunately croſſing Perdiccas darte, was ſtricken through both his thighes. Peuceſtas being cured of a great diſeaſe, Alexander wrote vnto Alexippus his Phiſitian that had cured him, and gaue him thankes. Craterus alſo being ſicke, he dreamed of him one night, and therefore made certaine ſacrifices for the recouery of his health, and ſent vnto him, willing him to doe the like. And when the Phiſitian Pauſanias ment to giue him a drinke of Elleborum, he wrote letters vnto him, telling him what danger he was in, and prayed him to be carefull how he receiued that medicine. He did alſo put Ephialtes and Ciſſus in priſon, who brought him the firſt newes of Harpalus flying, becauſe they did wrongfully accuſe & ſlander him. When he had cōmanded there ſhould be a bill made of all the olde mens names, and diſeaſed perſons that were in his camp, to ſend them home againe into their countrie: there was one Eurylochus ÆGEIAN that made his name be billed among the ſicke perſons, & it was found afterwards that he was not ſicke, and confeſſed that he did it onely to follow a young woman called Teleſippa, with whom he was in loue, who was returning homewards towards the ſea ſide. Alexander asked him, whether this woman were free or bond: he anſwered him, that ſhe was a curtiſan free borne. Then ſayed Aexander vnto Eurylochus, I would be glad to further thy loue, yet I cannot force her to tarrie: but ſeeke to winne her by giftes and fayer wordes to be contented to tarie, ſithence ſhe is a free woman. It is a wonderfull thing to ſee what paines he would take, to write for his friendes, euen in ſuch trifles as he did. As when he wrote into CILICIA for a ſeruant of Seleucus that was fled from his maiſter, ſending ſtraight commandement, that they ſhould carefully lay for him. And by another letter he commendeth Peuceſtas, for that he had ſtayed and taken one Nicon, a ſlaue of Craterus. And by one other letter alſo vnto Megabizus, touching another bondman that had taken ſanctuarie in a temple, he commaunded him alſo to ſeeke to intiſe him out of the ſanctuarie, to laye hold on him if he could, but otherwiſe not to meddle with him in any caſe. It is ſayed alſo, that at the firſt when he vſed to ſit in iugdement to heare criminall cauſes, whileſt the accuſer went on with his complaint and accuſation: he alwayes vſed to laye his hand vppon one of his eares to keepe that cleane from the matter of accuſation, thereby reſeruing it to heare the purgation and iuſtification of the perſon condemned. But afterwardes, the number of accuſations that were brought before him, did ſo prouoke and alter him, that he did beleeue the falſe accuſations, by the great number of the true that were brought in. But nothing put him more in rage, then when he vnderſtoode they had ſpoken ill of him: and then he was ſo fierce, as no pardon would be granted, for that he loued his honor, more then his kingdome or life. Then at that time he went againſt Darius, thinking that he ment to fight againe: but vnderſtanding that Beſſus had taken him, then he gaue the THESSALIANS leaue to departe home into their countrie, and gaue them two thouſand talentes, ouer and aboue their ordinarie paye. Alexander had then a maruellous long, hard, and painefull iorney in following of Darius: for in eleuen dayes, he rode three thouſand and three hundreth furlong, inſomuch as the moſt part of his men were euen wearie, and done, for lacke of water. It chaunced him one daye to meete with certen MACEDONIANS that caried (vppon moyles) goate ſkinnes full of water, which they had fetched from a riuer. They ſeeing Alexander in manner dead for thirſt, being about noone: ranne quickly to him, and in a head peece brought him water. Alexander asked them, to whom they caried this water. They anſwered him againe, that they caried it to their children, but yet would haue your grace to liue: for though we loſe them, we may gette more children. When they had ſayd ſo, Alexander tooke the helmet with water, and perceiuing that the men of armes that were about him, and had followed him, did thruſt out their neckes to looke vpon this water, he gaue the water backe againe vnto them that had giuen it him, and thanked them, but dranke none of it. For ſayd he, if I drinke alone, all theſe men heere will faint. Then they ſeeing the noble courage and curteſie of Alexander: cried out that he ſhould leade them: and therewithall beganne to ſpurre their horſes, ſaying, that they were not weary nor a thirſt, nor did thinke themſelues mortall, ſo long as they had ſuch a king. Euery man was alike willing to follow Alexander, yet had he but threeſcore onely that entred with him into the enemies campe. There, paſſing ouer much golde and ſiluer which was ſcattered abroade in the market place, and going alſo by many chariottes full of women and children, which they found in the fields, flying away at all aduenture: they ranne vpon the ſpurre vntill they had ouertaken the foremoſt that fledde, thinking to haue founde Darius amongſt them. But at the length, with much a doe, they found him layed along in a coche, hauing many woundes vpon his bodie, ſome of darts and ſome of ſpeares. So he being almoſt at the laſt caſt, called for ſome drinke, and dranke colde water, which Polyſtratus gaue him. To whom when he had drunke, he ſayed: this is my laſt miſhappe my friend, that hauing receiued this pleaſure, I cannot requite thee: howbeit Alexander will recompence thee, and the goddes Alexander, for the liberality and curteſy which he hath ſhewed vnto my wife and children, whom I pray thee embrace for my ſake. At theſe laſt wordes, he tooke Polyſtratus by the hande, and ſo gaue vp the goaſt. Alexander came immediatly after, and plainely ſhewed that he was ſorie for his death and miſfortune: and vndoing his owne cloke, he caſt it vpon the body of Darius. After that, hauing by good happe gotten Beſſus into his hands, he tare him in peces with two high ſtraight trees which he bowed downewards, and tyed his legs to each of them: ſo that when the trees were let goe, they gaue a ſodaine cruell ierke vp and caried either tree, a peece of his bodie with it. Then Alexander hauing giuen Darius corſe princely buriall, and embalmed him: he ſent it vnto his mother, and receiued his brother Exathres for one of his friends. From thence he went into the country of HYRCANIA with all the flower of his armie, where he ſawe the gulfe of the ſea Caſpium, which he thought of no leſſe greatneſſe, then the ſea of PONTVS, howbeit calmer then the other ſeaes be. He could not then certainly find out what it was, nor from whence it came: but of likelyhoode he thought it was ſome breaking out of the lake or marriſh of Meotin. Yet ſome ancient naturall Philoſophers ſeemed to knowe truely what it was. For many yeares before Alexanders voyage and conqueſt, they wrote, that of the foure chiefeſt gulfes of the ſea, that commeth from the Ocean, and doe enter within maine land, that which is more northerly, is the ſea Caſpium, which they call alſo Hyrcanium. As Alexander went through the countrie, certen barbarous people ſodainely ſette vpon them that led Bucephal his horſe, and tooke him: but with that he was in ſuch a rage, that he ſent a Herauld into their countrie to proclaime open warres vppon them, and that he would put man, woman and childe to the ſword, if they brought him not his horſe againe. Whereuppon, when his horſe was returned home, and that they yeelded vp their citties and fortes into his hands: he did vſe them all very courteouſly, and moreouer did giue them money for the ranſome of his horſe, which they reſtored. Departing thence, he entred into the countrie of PARTHIA. There hauing leaſure enough, he beganne to apparell himſelfe after the faſhion of the barbarous people, becauſe he thought thereby the better to winne the harts of the countriemen, framing himſelfe vnto their owne faſhions: or elſe to trye the harts of the MACEDONIANS, to ſee how they would like the manner of the PERSIANS (which he ment to bring them vnto) in reuerencing of him as they did their king, by litle and little acquainting them to alow the alteration and change of his life. This notwithſtanding, he would not at the firſt take vp the apparell of the MEDES, which was very ſtrange, and altogether barbarous. For he went not without breeches, nor did weare a long gown trayling on the ground, nor a high coptanct hat, but tooke a meane apparell, betwixt the MEDES & the PERSIANS, more modeſt then theirs: and more coſtly then the laſt: and yet at the firſt he did not weare it, but when he would talke with the barbarous people, or elſe priuately amongſt his friends and familiars. Afterwards notwithſtanding, he ſhewed himſelfe openly to the people in that apparell, whē he gaue them audience. This ſight grieued the MACEDONIANS much: but they had his vertues in ſuch admiration, that they thought it meete in ſome things he ſhould take his owne pleaſure, ſithence he had bene often hurt in the warres, and not long before had his legge broken with an arrow, and another time, had ſuch a blow with a ſtone full in his necke, that it made him ſpurre-blinde a great while after, and yet neuertheleſſe he neuer eſchewed any bodily daunger. For he paſſed ouer the riuer of Oraxartes, which he tooke to be Tanais, and hauing in battell ouerthrowen the SCYTHIANS, he followed them in chaſe aboue a hundreth furlong, notwithſtanding that at that inſtant he had a looſeneſſe of body. Thither came vnto him (as it is reported) the queene of the AMAZONES, as many writers doe teſtifie: among the which are theſe, Clitarchus, Polycritus, Oneſicritus, Antigenes and Hiſter. But Chares, Ptolomy, Anticlides, & Philō THEBAN, Philip the hiſtoriographer, Hecateus ERETRIAN, Philip CHALCIDIAN, and Duris SAMIAN, all theſe doe write that it was not true: and it ſeemeth alſo that Alexander ſelfe doth confirme it. For, writing all things particularly vnto Antipater as they happened vnto him, he wrote vnto him that the king of SCYTHIA offred him his daughter in mariage: but there he maketh no mention at all of any AMAZON. It is alſo ſayed, that Oneſicritus long time after that did reade vnto king Lyſimachus, the fourth booke of his hiſtorie, where he did ſpeake of the AMAZON. Lyſimachus ſmiling, ſayd vnto him: why, and where was I then? But for that matter, to credit or not credit it, Alexanders eſtimation thereby is neither impaired nor aduanced. Furthermore, Alexander fearing that the MACEDONIANS, being wearie with this long warre, would goe no further: he left all the reſt of his armie behinde, and tooke onely twentie thouſand footemen, and three thouſand horſemen of the choiceſt men of his armie, and with them inuaded the countrie of HYRCANIA. There he made an oration vnto them, and told them, that the barbarous people of ASIA had but ſeene them as it were in a dreame, and if they ſhould now returne backe into MACEDON, hauing but onely ſturred them, and not altogether ſubdued ASIA: the people offended with them, would ſette vppon them as they went home, as if they were no better than women. Neuertheleſſe, he gaue any man leaue to returne that woulde, proteſting therewith againſt them that would goe, how they did forſake him, his frends, and thoſe who had ſo good harts towards him, as to follow him in ſo noble a iorney, to conquer the whole earth vnto the MACEDONIANS. This ſelfe matter is reported thus in a letter which Alexander wrote vnto Antipater: and there he writeth furthermore, that hauing made this oration vnto them, they all cryed out, and bad him leade them into what part of the world he would. When they had granted their good willes, it was no hard matter afterwardes, to winne the reſt of the common ſorte who followed the example of the chiefeſt. Thereuppon he did frame himſelfe the more to liue after the faſhion of the countrie there, and enterchangeably alſo to bring the men of that countrie vnto the manner of the MACEDONIANS: being perſwaded that by this mixture

and enterchange of manners one with another, he ſhould by friendſhippe more then force, make them agree louingly together, when that he ſhould be ſo far from the countrie of Persia. For this purpoſe therefore, he choſe thirty thouſand of their children of that countrie, & ſet them to learne the Greek tongue, and to be brought vp in the diſcipline of warres, after the Macedonians maner: and gaue them ſchoolemaſters and Captains to traine them in each facultie. And for the marying of Roxane, he fancied her, ſeing her at a feaſt where he was: which fell out as well for his turne, as if he had with better aduiſe and counſell loued her. For the barbarous people were very proude of this match when as they ſawe him make alliance with them in this ſorte, inſomuch as they loued him better then they did before, becauſe they ſaw in thoſe things he was alwaies ſo chaſt and continent, that notwithſtanding he was maruellouſly in loue with her, yet he would not diſhonorably touch this young Ladie, before he was maried vnto her. Furthermore, Alexander conſidering that of the two men which he loued beſt, Hephæſtion liked well of his match, and went apparelled as himſelfe did, and that Craterus, contrarily did ſtill vſe the Macedonian maner: he delt in all affaires with the barbarous people, by Hephæſtion, & with the Grecians and Macedonians, by Craterus. To be ſhort, he loued the one, and honored the other: ſaying that Hephæſtion loued Alexander, and Craterus loued the king. Hereuppon theſe two perſons bare one another grudge in their hartes, and oftentimes brake out in open quarrell: inſomuch as on a time being in India, they drewe their ſwords and fought together, and diuers of their friendes ranne to take part with either ſide. Thither came Alexander ſelfe alſo, who openly before them all, bitterly tooke vp Hephæſtion, and called him foole and bedlem, ſaying, doſt thou not know, that whatſoeuer he be that ſhould take Alexander from me, he ſhould neuer liue? Priuatly alſo, he ſharply rebuked Craterus, and calling them both before him, he made them friendes together, ſwearing by Iupiter Hammon, and by all the other gods, that he loued them two of all men liuing, neuertheles if euer he founde that they fell out together againe, they ſhould both dye for it, or him at the leaſt that firſt beganne to quarrell. So euer after that, they ſay there was neuer foule word nor deede betwene them, not ſo much as in ſport only. There was alſo one Philotas, the ſonne of Parmenio, a man of great authority among the Macedonians, who next vnto Alexander was the moſt valiant man, the patienteſt to abide paine, the liberalleſt, and one that loued his men and frends better then any noble man in the campe whatſoeuer. Of him it is reported, that a frend of his came to him on a time to borow money: and he commanded ſtraight one of his men to let him haue it. His purſebearer anſwered him, that he had none. Why, ſayed his maſter, doeſt thou tell me ſo? Haſt thou not plate, and apparell to ſell or gage to helpe him to ſome? Howbeit otherwiſe, he had ſuch a pride and glorie to ſhew his riches, to apparel himſelf ſo ſumptuouſly, and to be more fine and princked then became a priuate man, that this made him to be hated: becauſe he tooke vpon him to be a great man, and to looke big on the matter, which became him ill fauoredly, and therfore euery man through his owne folly, fell in miſliking with him. Inſomuch as his owne father ſayd one day vnto him: ſon I pray thee be more humble & lowly. This Philotas had long before bene cõplained vpon vnto Alexander becauſe that when the cariage of king Darius armie (which was in the citie of Damas) was taken after the battell of Cilicia, among many priſoners that were taken and brought vnto Alexanders campe, there was one Antigona, a paſſing faier young curtiſan, born in the citie of Pidna. Philotas founde meanes to get her, and like a young man that was in loue with her, making merie with her at the table, fondely lette fall braue wordes and boaſtes of a ſouldier ſaying that what notable things were done, they were done by himſelfe and his father: and called Alexander at euerie word, young man, and ſayed that by their meanes he helde his name and kingdome. This curtiſan tolde one of his friendes what he ſayed, and that friend tolde an other friende, and ſo went from man to man (as commonly it doeth) till at the length it came to Craterus eares. He tooke the curtiſan, and brought her vnto Alexander, vnto whom ſhe told as much as ſhe had ſayd before. Alexander bad her ſtill make much of Philotas, and to tell him euery word what he ſayd of him. Philotas knowing nothing that he was thus circũuented, did euer frequent her companie, and would be bold commonly to ſpeake many fooliſh and vndiſcreet words againſt the king, ſomtime in anger, and ſomtime again in a brauery

Alexander this notwithſtanding, though he had maniſeſt proofe and cauſe to accuſe Philotas, yet he diſſembled it for that time, and would not be knowen of it: either for that he knew Parmenio loued him, or elſe for that he was affrayed of their great power and authoritie. About that time there was one Limnus Chalæſtrian a MACEDONIAN, that layd great and ſecret wait to kill Alexander: and being in loue with a young man called Nicomachus, entiſed him to help him to doe this deed. The young man wiſely denied it, & told the ſame to his brother called Balinus. He went vnto Philotas, and prayed him to bring them both before Alexãder, for they had a matter of great importance to impart vnto him. Philotas would not let him ſpeake with the king (but why no man could tell) telling them that the king had greater matters in hand, and was not at leaſure. Then they went vnto another, and he brought them vnto Alexander, vnto whom firſt they opened the treaſon of Limnus conſpired againſt him: and by the waye they tolde alſo, how they had bene twiſe before with Philotas, who would not let them come in, nor ſpeake with them. That angred Alexander greatly, and he was the more offended alſo when Limnus was ſlaine by him, whom he ſent to apprehend him, reſiſting him for that he would not be taken: and thought that by his death he had loſt a great meanes to come to the light of this treaſon and conſpiracie. Then Alexander frowning vppon Philotas, brought all his enemies vpon his backe, that of long time had hated him. For they beganne to ſpeake boldly, that it was time for the king to looke about him, for it was not to be ſuppoſed that this Limnus Chalæſtrian of himſelfe durſt haue entred into that treaſon, but rather that he was a miniſter, and a chiefe inſtrument, ſet on by a greater perſonage then he: and therefore that it ſtood Alexander vpon to examine them ſtraightly, which had cauſe to keepe this treaſon ſecret. After Alexander once gaue eare vnto ſuch wordes and vehement preſumptions, there was ſtraight brought a thouſand accuſations againſt Philotas. Thereuppon he was apprehended, and in the preſence of diuers Lordes and familiars of the king put to the torture, Alexander ſelfe being behinde a hanging, to heare what he would ſay. It is reported, that when he heard howe faintly and pittiefully he beſought Hephæſtion to take pittie on him, he ſayed vnto himſelfe: alas, poore Philotas, thou that haſt ſo faint a hart, howe durſt thou take vppon thee ſo great matters? In fine, Philotas was put to death, and immediatly after he was executed, Alexander ſent alſo with ſpeed vnto the realme of MEDIA to kill Parmenio, who was his Lieutenaunt there, and one that had ſerued king Philippe his father, in his greateſt affaires, and he onely of all other the olde ſeruantes of his father had procured Alexander to take in hande the conqueſt of ASIA: and who alſo of three ſonnes which he brought out with him, had ſeene two of them dye before him, and afterwardes was ſlaine himſelfe with the third. This crueltie of Alexander made his friends affraied of him and ſpecially Antipater: who ſecretly ſent Ambaſſadors vnto the ÆTOLIANS, to make league with them, becauſe they themſelues alſo were affrayed of Alexander, for that they had put the Oeniades to death. Alexander hearing that, ſayed, that he himſelfe, and not the ſonnes of the Oeniades, would be reuenged on the ÆTOLIANS. Not long after that, followed the murther of Clitus, the which to heare it ſimplie tolde, would ſeeme much more cruell than the death of Philotas. But reporting the cauſe and the time together in which it chaunced: it will be found that it was not of ſette purpoſe, but by chaunce and vnfortunately, that Alexander being ouercome with wine, did vnluckely wreake his anger vpon Clitus. The manner of his miſfortune was this. There came certaine men of the low countries from the ſea ſide, that brought apples of GRECE vnto Alexander. Alexander, wondering to ſee them ſo greene and fayer, ſent for Clitus to ſhew him them, and to giue him ſome of them. Clitus by chaunce did ſacrifice at that time vnto the goddes, and left his ſacrifice to goe vnto Alexander: howbeit, there were three weathers that followed him, on whom the accuſtomed ſprincklings had bene done alreadie to haue ſacrificed them. Alexander vnderſtanding that, tolde it to his Soothſayers, Ariſtander, and Cleomantis LACONIAN, both did aunſwere him, that it was an ill ſigne. Alexander thereuppon gaue order ſtraight, that they ſhoulde doe ſacrifice for the health of Clitus, and ſpecially for that three dayes before he dreamed one night that he ſaw Clitus in a mourning gowne, ſitting amongeſt the ſonnes of Parmenio, the which were all dead before. This notwithſtanding, Clitus did not make an ende of his ſacrifice, but came ſtraight to ſupper to the king, who had that day ſacrificed vnto Caſtor and Pollux. At this feaſt there was old drinking, and all the ſupper time there were certaine verſes ſong and made by a Poet, called Pranichus, (or as others ſay, of one Pierion) againſt certaine Captaines of the MACEDONIANS, which had not long before bene ouercome by the barbarous people, and onely to ſhame them, and to make the companie laugh. With theſe verſes, auncient men that were at this feaſt, became much offended, and grew angrie with the Poet that made them, and the minſtrell that ſong them. Alexander on the other ſide, and his familiars liked them verie well, and commaunded the minſtrell to ſing ſtill. Clitus there withall being ouertaken with wine, and beſides of a churliſh nature, proude and arrogant, fell into greater choller, and ſayd: that it was neither well nor honeſtlie done in that ſort to ſpeake ill of thoſe poore MACEDONIAN Captaines (and ſpecially amongſt the barbarous people their enemies) which were farre better men then they, that laughed them to ſcorne, although their fortune much worſe then theirs. Alexander then replied, and ſayd, that ſaying ſo, he pleaded for himſelfe, calling cowardlineſſe, misfortune. Then Clitus ſtanding vp, ſayd againe: but yet this my cowardlineſſe ſaued thy life, that calleſt thy ſelfe the ſonne of the goddes, when thou turnedſt thy backe from Spithridates ſword: & the bloud which theſe poore MACEDONIANS did ſhed for thee, and the woundes which they receiued of their bodies fighting for thee, haue made thee ſo great, that thou diſdaineſt now to haue king Philip for thy father, and wilt needes make thy ſelfe the ſonne of Iupiter Hammon. Alexander being moued with theſe wordes, ſtraight replied: O, villen, thinkeſt thou to ſcape vnpuniſhed for theſe proude wordes of thine, which thou vſeſt continually againſt me, making the MACEDONIANS rebell againſt Alexander? Clitus aunſwered againe, too much are we puniſhed, Alexander, for our paines and ſeruice to receiue ſuch reward: nay, moſt happy thinke we them that long ſince are dead and gone, not now to ſee the MACEDONIANS ſcourged with rods of the MEDES, and compelled to curry fauour with the PERSIANS, to haue acceſſe vnto their king. Thus Clitus boldly ſpeaking againſt Alexander, and Alexander againe aunſwering and reuiling him: the graueſt men ſought to pacifie this ſturre and tumult. Alexander then turning himſelfe vnto Xenodochus CARDIAN, and Artemius COLOPHONIAN: do you not thinke (ſayd he) that the GRECIANS are amongſt the MACEDONIANS, as demy goddes that walke among brute beaſtes? Clitus for all this would not giue ouer his impudencie and malapertneſſe, but cried out, and bad Alexander ſpeake openly what he had to ſay, or elſe not to bidde free men come to ſuppe with him that were wont to ſpeake franckely: if not, to keepe with the barbarous ſlaues that honoured his PERSIAN girdle, and long white garment. Then could Alexander no longer hold his choller, but tooke an apple that was vpon his table, and threw it at Clitus, and looked for his ſword, the which Ariſtophanes, one of his gard that waited on him, had of purpoſe taken from him. And when euery man came ſtraight about him to ſtay him, and to pray him to be contented: he immediatly roſe from the borde, and called his gard vnto him in the MACEDONIAN toung, (which was a ſigne of great trouble to follow after it) and commaunded a trumpeter to ſound the allarme. But he drawing backe, would not ſound: whereupon Alexander ſtrake him with his fiſt. Notwithſtanding, the trumpetter was greatly commended afterwards, for that he onely kept the campe that they roſe not. All this could not quiet Clitus, whereupon his friendes with much a do thruſt him out of the hall: but he came in againe at an other doore, and arrogantly and vnreuerently rehearſed this verſe of the Poet Euripides, out of Andromaches tragedie:

Are into Græce crept now a dayes.

The malapertneſſe of Clitus againſt Alexander.

Then Alexander taking a partiſan from one of his gard, as Clitus was comming towardes him, and had lift vp the hanging before the doore, he ranne him through the body, ſo that Clitus fell to the ground, and fetching one grone, dyed preſently. Alexanders choller had left him ſtraight, and he became maruellous ſorowfull: and when he ſaw his friends round about him ſay neuer a word, he pluckt the partiſan out of his body, & would haue thruſt it into his owne throte. Howbeit his gard about him caught him by the hands, & caried him perforce into his chamber: & there he did nothing all that night but weepe bitterly, & the next day following, vntill ſuch time as he was able to crie no more, but lying on the ground, onely lay ſighing. His friendes hearing his voyce no more, were afrayed, and came into his chamber by force to comfort him. But Alexander would heare none of them, ſauing Ariſtander the Soothſayer, who remembred him of his dreame he had of Clitus before, which was, a prognoſtication of that which had happened: whereby it appeared that it was his deſtenie before he was borne. This ſeemed to comfort Alexander. Afterwards they brought in Calliſthenes the Philoſopher, a kinſman of Ariſtotles, and Anaxarchus borne in ABDERA. Of theſe two, Calliſthenes ſought by gentle talke, not mouing any matter offenſiue to comfort Alexanders ſorow. But Anaxarchus that from the beginning had taken a way by himſelfe in the ſtudie of Philoſophie, being accounted a braine ſicke man, and one that deſpiſed his companions: he comming into Alexanders chamber alſo with him, cryed out at the doore as he came in: See, yonder is Alexander the great whom all the world lookes vpon, and is afrayed of. See where he lyes, weeping like a ſlaue on the ground, that is afrayed of the law, and of the reproche of men: as if he himſelfe ſhould not giue them law, and ſtabliſh the boundes of iuſtice or iniuſtice, ſithence he hath ouercome to be Lord and maiſter, and not to be ſubiect and ſlaue to a vaine opinion. Knoweſt thou not that the Poets ſay, that Iupiter hath Themis, to wit, right and iuſtice placed of either hand on him? what ſignifieth that, but all that the prince doth, is wholy right, and iuſt? Theſe wordes of Anaxarchus did comfort the ſorowfull hart of king Alexander at that time, but there withall, they made Alexanders manners afterwardes more fierce and diſſolute. For, as he thereby did maruellouſly grow in fauour with the king, euen ſo did he make the company of Calliſthenes, (who of himſelfe was not very pleaſaunt: becauſe of his grauitie and ſowreneſſe) much more hatefull and miſliked then before. It is written alſo that there was certaine talke one night at king Alexanders borde touching the ſeaſons of the yeare, & temperatneſſe of the ayre, and that Calliſthenes was of their opinion which mainteined, that the country they were in at that time was much colder, and the winter alſo ſharper then in GRECE. Anaxarchus held the contrary opinion, and ſtifly mainteined it, in ſomuch as Calliſthenes ſayd vnto him: and yet muſt thou graunt, that it is colder here then there. For there all the winter time thou couldeſt go with a ſingle cloke on thy backe onely, and here thou muſt haue three or foure garments vpon thee when thou art at thy borde. This galled Anaxarchus to the quicke, and made him more angry then before: and for the other rethoritians and flatterers, they did alſo hate him, becauſe they ſaw him followed of young men for his eloquence, and beloued alſo of old men for his honeſt life, the which was very graue, modeſt, and contented with his owne, deſiring no mans elſe. Whereby men found, that the reaſon he alledged for following of Alexander in this voyage, was true: for he ſayd that he came to be an humble ſuter to the king to reſtore his baniſhed citizens into their country againe, and to repleniſh their citie with inhabitants. Now, though his eſtimation made him chiefly to be enuyed, yet did he himſelfe giue his enemies occaſion to accuſe him. For oftentimes being inuited by the king to ſupper, either he would not come, or if he came, he would be mute, and ſay nothing, ſhewing by his grauitie and ſilence, that nothing pleaſed him that was either ſayd or done. Whereupon Alexander ſelfe ſayd on a time vnto him:

The cauſe why Calliſthenes was enuyed.

I can not thinke that perſon wiſe,
That in his owne caſe hath no eyes.

It is reported of him alſo, that being at ſupper on a time with the king, diuers requeſting him to make an Oration on the ſodaine in commendation of the MACEDONIANS: he made ſuch an eloquent Oration vpon that matter, that all they that heard him, roſe from the borde, and clapping their handes for ioy, caſt noſegayes and flowers vpon him. But yet Alexander at that time ſayd vnto him that, which the Poet Euripides ſayd:

It is no maiſtrie to be eloquent,
In handling of a plenteous argument.

Nay, but vtter then thy eloquence in reprouing of the MACEDONIANS, that hearing their faultes, they may learne to amend. Then Calliſthenes chaunging copie, ſpake boldly many things againſt the MACEDONIANS. Declaring, that the diſſention amongſt the GRECIANS did increaſe king Philips power, alledging theſe verſes:

VVhere diſcord reignes in Realme or towne,
Euen wicked folke do win renowne.

But by this occaſion, he purchaſed himſelfe great ill will of the MACEDONIANS: inſomuch, as Alexander ſelfe ſaid at that time, that he had not ſo much ſhewed his eloquence, as the malice he bare vnto the MACEDONIANS. Hermippus the hiſtoriographer writeth that one Stræbus a clearke of Calliſthenes did afterwards tell it vnto Ariſtotle in this ſort: and that Calliſthenes ſeeing king Alexander offended with him, did recite theſe verſes of Homer three or foure times as he went.

Patroclus who farre paſſed thee,
VVas ſlaine as thou art like to be.

Ariſtotle thought Calliſthenes eloquent, but not wiſe.

And therefore very wiſely ſaid Ariſtotle, that Calliſthenes was eloquent, but not wiſe. For like a philoſopher, he ſtoutly ſtood againſt kneeling to the king, and ſaid that openly, which the nobleſt & ancienteſt men amõg the MACEDONIANS durſt but whiſper one in an others eare, though they did all vtterly miſlike it: whereby hee did yet deliuer GRECE from open ſhame, & Alexander from a greater, bringing him from that maner of adoration of his perſon. This notwithſtanding, he vndid himſelfe becauſe he would ſeeme rather by preſumption to bring him to it, then by reaſon to perſwade him. Chares MITYLENIAN hath writen, that Alexander hauing drunke at a certaine feaſt where he hapned to be, reached his cuppe vnto one of his friendes, who after he had taken it of him, roſe vp firſt on his feete, and dranke alſo, turning him towards the goddes, and firſt making ſolemne reuerence, hee went and kiſſed Alexander, and then ſate him downe againe. All the reſt that were at the feaſt, did the like one after an other, and Calliſthenes alſo, who tooke the cuppe when it came to his turne (the king not looking on him, but talking with Hephæſtion) after he had drunke, came to the king to kiſſe him as others had done. Howbeit one Demetrius called Phidon, ſaid vnto the king: kiſſe him not, I pray your grace, for he of all men hath done you no reuerence. Alexander turned his head a ſide, and would not kiſſe him. Then cryed Calliſthenes out aloud: well, quoth he, then I will go my way, with leſſe then others, by a kiſſe. And thus beganne Alexanders grudge firſt againſt Calliſthenes, by meanes whereof Hephæſtion was credited the better, when he ſaid that Calliſthenes had promiſed him to reuerence Alexander, although that he had broken promiſe. After him alſo Lyſimachus, Agnon, and diuers others beganne to play their partes againſt him, ſaying, that this Sophiſter went bragging vp and downe, as if he had deſtroyed a whole tyrannie, and that all the young men followed him to honor him, as if among ſo many thouſand ſouldiers, neuer a man of them had ſo noble a heart as he. And therefore, when the treaſon of Hermolaus againſt Alexanders perſon was diſcouered, they found the accuſation probable, the which ſome falſe detracters had informed againſt Calliſthenes: who had anſwered Hermolaus that asked him, how he could come to be famous aboue all men, thus: in killing the famouſeſt perſon. And to animate him to goe forward with this treaſon, he had told him further, that he ſhould not be affraide of a golden bedde, but remember that he had to doe with a man, which was ſometime ſicke & hurt as other men were. This notwithſtanding, there was neuer a one of Hermolaus confederates, that would once name Calliſthenes, what tormentes ſoeuer they abidde, to bewray who were their companions. And Alexander ſelfe alſo writing of this treaſon immediatly after, vnto Craterus, Attalus, and Alcetas ſaid, that their ſeruantes which had bene racked and put to the torter, did conſtantly affirme that they onely had conſpired his death, and no man els was priuie vnto it. But afterwardes, he ſent an other letter vnto Antipater, wherein he directly accuſed Calliſthenes, and ſaide, that his ſeruantes had alreadie bene ſtoned to death by the MACEDONIANS, howbeit that he himſelfe would afterwardes alſo puniſh the maſter, and thoſe that had ſent vnto him, and that had receiued the murtherers into their cities, who came of purpoſe to kill him. And therein he plainely ſhewed the ill will he bare vnto Ariſtotle, for that Calliſthenes had bene brought vp with him, being his kinſman, and the ſonne of Hero, Ariſtotles neece. Some ſay, that Alexander truſſed Calliſthenes vp. Others againe report, that he died of ſickneſſe in priſon. Neuertheles Chares writeth, that Calliſthenes was kept priſoner ſeuen moneths together, becauſe he ſhould haue had his iudgement in open councell euen in the preſence of Ariſtotle himſelfe: howbeit, being very fatte,

he was eaten in the end by lyce, and ſo dyed, about the time that Alexander was hurt, fighting againſt the MALLIANS OXYDRACIANS, in the cõqueſt of INDIA, but theſe things chanced a good while after. Demaratus CORINTHIAN being very old, had a great deſire to go ſee Alexander: and when he had ſeene him, he ſayd that the GRECIANS which were dead long before, were depriued of that bliſſe and happineſſe, that they could not ſee Alexander ſit in the royall ſeate of king Darius. Howbeit, he did not long enioy the kings good will vnto him, for he died of a ſicknes ſoone after he came vnto his campe, & Alexander did honour his funerals: for all the army in their armour did caſt vp a mount of earth faſhioned like a tombe, which was a great compaſſe about, and foure ſcore cubits high. His aſhes afterwardes were brought with an honourable conuoy, vnto the ſea ſide, in a charriot with foure horſes richly ſet out. Alexander being ready to take his iourney to go conquer INDIA, perceiuing that his armie was very heauy & vnwildſom to remoue, for the wonderfull cariage & ſpoiles they had with them: the cartes one morning being loden, he firſt burnt his owne cariage, & next his friends, & then commaunded that they ſhould alſo ſet the cariage of the MACEDONIANS a fire, which counſell ſeemed more daungerous to be reſolued of, then the proofe of the execution fell out difficulte. For there are very few of them that were angry therewith, & the moſt part of them (as if they had bene ſecretly moued by ſome god) with loude cryes of ioy, one of them gaue vnto an other ſuch neceſſary things as they had neede of, and afterwardes of themſelues did burne and ſpoyle all the reſt. This made Alexander much more rigorous then he was before, beſides that he was already become cruell enough, and without mercy or pardon, did ſharpely puniſh euery man that offended. For hauing commaunded Menander one of his friends, to keepe him a ſtrong hold: he put him to death, becauſe he would not remaine there. Furthermore, he himſelfe ſlue Orſodates (a Captaine of the barbarous people) with a dart, for that he rebelled againſt him. About that time, there was an eawe that had eaned a lambe, which had vpon her head, the forme and purple colour of the kings hat, after the PERSIAN manner called Tiara, hauing two ſtones hanging on ech ſide of it. Alexander abhorred this monſtrous ſigne, in ſomuch as he purged himſelfe by certaine BABILONIAN Prieſts, which he alwayes caried about with him for that purpoſe, and ſayd vnto his friends: that this monſter did not ſo much moue him for reſpect of himſelfe, as it did for them, fearing that the goddes after his death had predeſtined the force and power of his kingdome to fall into the hands of ſome baſe cowardly perſon. This notwithſtanding, an other ſigne and token which chaunced in the necke of that, did take away this feare and diſcouragement he had. For a MACEDONIAN called Proxenus, that had charge of the kings cariage, as he digged in a certaine place by the riuer of Oxus, to ſet vp the kings tent and his lodging, he found a certaine fat and oylie vaine, which after they had drawen out the firſt, there came out alſo an other clearer, which differed nothing, neither in ſmell, taſt, nor ſauour: from naturall oyle, hauing the gloſſe and fatneſſe ſo like, as there could be diſcerned no difference between them: the which was ſo much more to be wõdred at, becauſe that in all that coũtry there were no olyues. They ſay alſo, that the water of the riuer ſelfe of Oxus is very ſoft, and maketh their skinnes fat, which waſh or bath them ſelues therein. And yet it appeareth by that which Alexander ſelfe wrote vnto Antipater, that he was very glad of it, putting that amongſt the greateſt ſignes which the goddes had ſent vnto him. The Soothſayers did interprete this wonder, that it was a ſigne, that he ſhould haue a noble, but yet a painfull voyage: for the goddes, ſayd they, haue giuen oyle vnto men to refreſh their weartneſſe. And truly ſo did he ſuſteine many daungers in thoſe warres, and was oftentimes hurt in fight. But the greateſt loſſe he had of his men, was for lacke of victuals, and by the infection of the ayre. For he, ſtriuing to ouercome fortune by valiantneſſe, and her force by vertue, thought nothing impoſsible for a valiant man, neither any thing able to withſtand a noble hart. It is reported, that when he went to beſiege a ſtrong hold which Siſimethres kept, being thought vnſaltable, and that his ſouldiers were in diſpaire of it: he asked one Oxyarthes, what hart Siſimethres had. Oxyarthes anſwered him, that he was the verieſt coward in the world. O, that is well, quoth Alexander: then it is to be wonne, if that be true thou ſayeſt ſithence the Captaine of the peece is but a coward. So he tooke it of a ſodaine, by putting Siſimethres in a great feare. After that alſo, he did beſiege an other peece of as great ſtrength, and difficultie to aſſault as the other, and making the yong ſouldiers of the MACEDONIANS to go to the aſſault, he called one of them vnto him, whoſe name alſo was Alexander, vnto whom he ſaid thus. Alexander, this day thou muſt fight like a man, and it be but for thy name ſake. The yong man did not forget his words, for he fought ſo valiantly, that he was ſlaine, for whom Alexander was very ſory. Another time whẽ his men were affraid, & durſt not come neere vnto the city of NISA to aſſault it, becauſe there ranne a very deepe riuer hard by the walles: he came to the riuers ſide, and ſaid: oh, what a coward am I, that neuer learned to ſwimme? and ſo prepared himſelfe to ſwimme ouer vpon his ſhield. After he had cauſed them to retire from the aſſault, there came ambaſſadors vnto him from the cities beſieged, to craue pardon of him. They wondered at him at the firſt, when they ſaw him armed, without any pompe or other ceremonie about him: but much more, when a chaire was brought him to ſit downe on, that he commaunded the oldeſt man amongſt them called Acuphis, to take it to him, and ſit him downe. Acuphis maruelling at Alexanders great courteſie, asked him: what they ſhould do for him, thenceforth to be his good friends. I will, ſaid Alexander, that they from whom thou comeſt as ambaſſador vnto vs, do make thee their King: and withall that they do ſend me a hundred of their beſt men for hoſtages. Acuphis ſmiling, anſwered him again: but I ſhall rule them better, O king, if I ſend you the worſt, and not the beſt. There was a king called Taxiles a very wiſe man, who had a great country in INDIA, no leſſe in bigneſſe and circuit then all ÆGYPT, and as full of good paſture and frutes as any country in the worlde could be: who came on a time to ſalute Alexander, and ſaid vnto him. What ſhould we neede, Alexander, to fight, and make warres one with an other, if thou comeſt not to take away our water, and our neceſſary commoditie to liue by: for which things, men of iudgement muſt needes fight? As for other goods, if I be richer then thou, I am readie to giue thee of mine: and if I haue leſſe, I will not thinke ſcorne to thanke thee, if thou wilt giue me ſome of thine. Alexander being pleaſed to heare him ſpeake thus wiſely, imbraced him, and ſaid vnto him. Thinkeſt thou this meeting of ours can be without fight, for all theſe goodly faire wordes? no, no, thou haſt wonne nothing by that: for I will fight and contend with thee in honeſtie and courteſie, becauſe thou ſhalt not exceede me in bountie and liberalitie. So Alexander taking diuers giftes of him, but giuing more vnto Taxiles: he dranke to him one night at ſupper, and ſaid, I drinke to thee a thouſand talents in gold. This gift miſliked Alexanders friends: but in recompence thereof, he wanne the hearts of many of thoſe barbarous Lordes and Princes of that countrie. There was a certaine number of ſouldiers of the INDIANS, the warlikeſt men of all that countrie: who being mercenary ſouldiers, were euer entertained in ſeruice of the great free cities, which they valiantly defended, and did great hurt vnto Alexander in diuers places. Alexander hauing made peace with them in a citie where they were kept in: when they came abroad vpon ſuertie of this peace which they had made, hee met with them as they went their way, and put them all to the ſword. There was but this only fault, to blemiſh the honor of his noble deedes in all his warres: for in all things elſe, he ſhewed mercie and equitie. Furthermore, the graue Philoſophers and wiſe men of INDIA did greatly trouble him alſo. For they reproued the kings and princes of the INDIANS for that they yeelded vnto Alexander, and procured the free cities to take armes againſt him. But by their occaſion, he tooke diuers of their cities. For king Porus, Alexander ſelfe writeth in his Epiſtles, all his actes at large which he did againſt him. For he ſaith, that both their campes lying on either ſide of the riuer of Hydaſpes, king Porus ſet his Elephants vpon the banke of the riuer with their heades towardes their enemies, to keepe them from paſſing ouer: and that he himſelfe did continually make a noiſe and tumult in his campe, to acquaint his men not to be affraid of the barbarous people. Furthermore, that in a darke night when there was no moone light, he tooke part of his footemen, & the choice of his horſemen, and went farre from his enemies to get ouer into a litle Ilande. When he was come into the Ilande, there fell a wonderfull ſhower of raine, great windes, lightnings and thunders vppon his campe, inſomuch as he ſawe many of his men burnt by lightning in this litle Ilande. This notwithſtanding, he did not leaue to get ouer to the other ſide of the riuer. The riuer being ſwollen with the great flud of raine that fell the night before, ouerflowing the bankes, it did eate into the ground where the water ranne: ſo that Alexander when he had paſſed ouer the riuer, and was come to the other ſide, found himſelfe ill very in caſe, for that he could hardly keepe his feete, becauſe the earth was very ſlippery vnder him, and the rage of the water had eaten into it, and broke it downe on euery ſide. It is written of him that then he ſaid vnto the ATHENIANS: O ATHENIANS, could ye thinke that I could take ſuch paines, and put my ſelfe into ſo many dangers, onely to be praiſed of you? Thus Oneſicritus reporteth it. But Alexander ſelfe writeth, that they left their rafters or great peeces of tymber pinned together whereuppon they had paſſed ouer the ſtreame of the mayne riuer: and that they waded thorow the other arme or gut of the water which had broken the earth, vppe to their breaſts with their harneſſe on their backes. Furthermore, when he had paſſed ouer both waters, he rode with his horſemen twenty furlongs before the battell of his footemen: thinking that if his enemies came to giue him charge with their men of armes, that he was the ſtronger: and if they would alſo aduance their footemen forwarde, that his footemen alſo ſhould come time enough. One of the twaine fell out as he had geſſed. For, a thouſande horſemen and three ſcore charrets armed with his enemies, gaue him charge before their great company, whom he ouerthrew, and tooke all their charrets, & ſlew foure hundred of the men of armes in the field. King Porus then knowing by thoſe ſignes that Alexander was there in perſon, and had paſſed ouer the riuer: he marched towardes him with all his armie in battell ray, ſauing a few which he left behind to reſiſt the MACEDONIANS, if they ſhewed force to paſſe ouer the riuer. Alexander being affraid of the great multitude of his enemies, and of the terror of the Elephants, did not giue charge vpon the middeſt of the battell, but being himſelfe in the left wing, gaue charge vpon the corner of the enemies left wing, and alſo commaunded them that were in the right wing to doe the like. So, both the endes of the enemies armie were broken and put to flight: and they that fled, ranne vnto the Elephants, & gathered themſelues together about them. Thus the battell being begun, the conflict continued long, inſomuch as the enemies were ſcantly all ouerthrowen by three of the clocke in the afternoone. Many writers doe agree, that Porus was foure cubites and a ſhaft length hier and bigger then the Elephant, although the Elephant was very great, and as bigge as a horſe: and beſides that the Elephant did ſhew great wit and care, to ſaue the king his maſter. For whileſt he perceiued his Maiſter was ſtrong enough, he luſtily repulſed thoſe which came to aſſaile him: but when he found that he began to faint, hauing many woundes vpon his body, and arrowes ſticking in it: then being affraid leſt his Maiſter ſhould fall downe from his backe, he ſoftly fell on his knees, and gently taking his dartes and arrowes with his truncke, which he had in his bodie, he pluckt them all from him one after an other. Porus being taken, Alexander asked him, how he ſhould handle him, princely, anſwered Porus. Alexander asked him againe, if he would ſay any thing elſe. I comprehend all, ſaid he, in this word princely. Thereupon Alexander did not onely leaue him his prouinces and Realmes, whereof before he was king, by the name of his Lieutenant: but gaue him many other countryes alſo. When he had ſubdued all the free people, of the which there were fifteene ſeuerall nations, fiue thouſande of no ſmall cities, beſides an infinite number of villages, and thriſe as many other countries: hee made Philip one of his friendes, his Lieutenant of all thoſe countries. His horſe Bucephall died at this battell, not in the field, but afterwardes whileſt he was in cure for the woundes he had on his bodie: but as Oneſicritus ſaieth, he dyed euen worne for very age. Alexander was as ſorie for his death, as if he had loſt any of his familiar friends: and for proofe thereof, he built a great citie in the place where his horſe was buryed, vppon the riuer of Hydaſpes, the which he called after his name, Bucephalia. It is reported alſo, that hauing loſt a dogge of his called Peritas, which he had brought vppe of a whelpe, and loued very dearely: he built alſo a citie, and called it after his name. Sotion writeth, that he heard it reported thus of Potamon LESBIAN. This laſt battell againſt king Porus, killed the MACEDONIANS hearts, and made them that they had no deſire to goe any further to conquere INDIA. For, finding that they had ſuch a doe to ouercome them, though they were but twentie thouſande footemen, and two thouſand horſe, they ſpake ill of Alexander when he went about to compell them to paſſe ouer the riuer of Ganges, vnderſtanding by the country men that it was two and thirtie furlong ouer, and a hundred fadam deepe: and howe that the banke of the riuer was full of ſouldiers, horſemen, & Elephants. For it was reported, that the kings of the GANGARIDES, & the PRÆSIANS were on the other ſide with foure ſcore thouſand horſemen, two hundred thouſand footemen, eight thouſand charrets or carts of warre well armed, and ſix thouſand Elephants of warre. This was no fable, nor friuolous tale. For, a king called Androcottus (who raigned not long after,) gaue vnto Seleucus, fiue hundred Elephants at one time, & conquered all INDIA with ſix hundred thouſand fighting men. Alexander then offended with his mens refuſall, kept cloſe in his tent for certaine dayes, and lay vpon the ground, ſaying, that he did not thanke them, for all that they had done thitherunto, vnleſſe they paſſed ouer the riuer of Ganges alſo, and that to returne backe againe, it was as much as to confeſſe that he had bene ouercome. At the length, when he ſaw and conſidered that there was great reaſon in his friends perſwaſions which laboured to comfort him, and that his ſouldiers came to the doore of his tent, crying and lamenting, humbly beſeeching him to lead them backe againe: in the end he tooke pitie of them, and was contented to returne. This notwithſtanding, before he departed from thoſe parties, he put forth many vaine and falſe deuiſes to make his name immortall among that people. He made armours of greater proportion then his owne, and mangers for horſes, higher then the common ſort: moreouer, he made byts alſo farre heauier then the common ſort, and made them to be throwen and ſcattered abroad in euery place. He built great aultars alſo in honor of the gods, the which the kings of the PRÆSIANS haue in great veneration at this day: and paſsing ouer the riuer, do make ſacrifices there, after the manner of the GRECIANS. Androccotus at that time was a very young man, and ſaw Alexander himſelfe, and ſayd afterwards, that Alexander had well neare taken & wonne all the country, the king which then raigned, was ſo hated of all his ſubiectes, for his wicked life, and baſe parentage he came of. Departing thence, he went to ſee the great ſea Oceanum, and made diuers botes with ores, in the which he eaſily went downe the riuers at his pleaſure. Howbeit, this his pleaſant going by water, was not without warre: for he would land oftentimes, and did aſſaile cities, and conquered all as he went. Yet in aſſailing the citie of the MALLIANS, (which they ſay are the warlikeſt mē of all the INDIANS) he was almoſt ſlaine there. For, hauing with darts repulſed the enemies from the wall, he himſelfe was the firſt man that ſet foote on a ladder to get vp, the which brake aſſoone as euer he was gotten vpon the ramper. Then the barbarous people comming together againſt the wall, did throw at him from beneath, and many times lighted vpon him. Alexander hauing few of his men about him, made no more a do, but leaped downe from the wall in the middeſt of his enemies, and by good hap lighted on his feete. His harneſſe making a great noyſe with the fall, the barbarous people were afrayed, thinking they had ſeene ſome light or ſpirite go before him: ſo that at the firſt they all betooke them to their legges, and ranne ſcatteringly here and there. But after that, when they came againe to themſelues, and ſaw that he had but two gentlemen onely about him, they came and ſet vpon him of all handes, and fought with him at the ſword or puſh of the pyke, and ſo hurt him very ſore through his armour: but one among the reſt, being ſomewhat farther off, gaue him ſuch a terrible blow with an arrow, that he ſtrake him through his curats, and ſhot him in at the ſide vnder his breſt. The blow entred ſo into his body, that he fell downe on one of his knees. Whereupon, he that had ſtriken him with his arrow, ran ſodainly to him with a cimiter drawen in his hand. Howbeit as Peuceſt and Limnæus ſtepped before him, and were both hurt: Limnæus was ſlaine preſently, and Peuceſtas fought it out, till at the length, Alexander ſelfe ſlue the barbarous man with his owne hand, after he had many greeuous woundes vpon his body. At the length he had a blow with a dart on his necke that ſo aſtonied him, that he leaned againſt the wall looking vpon his enemies. In the meane time, the MACEDONIANS compaſsing him round about, tooke him, and caried him into his tent halfe in a ſound, and was paſt knowledge: Whereupon, there ranne a rumour ſtraight in the campe, that Alexander was dead. They had much a do to cut the arrow aſunder that was of wood: ſo his curats being plucked off with great paine, yet were they to plucke the arrow head out of his body, which ſtucke in one of his bones: the which as it is reported, was foure fingers long, and three fingers broad. So that when they plucked it out, he ſounded ſo oft, that he was almoſt dead. This notwithſtanding, he ouercame the daunger, and eſcaped. Being very weake, he kept diet a long time to recouer himſelfe, and neuer came out of his tent: vntill he heard the MACEDONIANS cry, & made great noyſe about his tent, deſirous to ſee him. Then he put on a night gowne, and came out amongſt them all: and after he had done ſacrifice vnto the goddes for recouery of his health, he went on his iourney againe, and in the ſame did conquer many great countryes, and tooke diuers goodly cities. He did alſo take ten of the wiſe men of the country, which men do all go naked, and therfore are called GYMNOSOPHISTÆ, (to wit, Philoſophers of INDIA) who had procured Sabbas to rebell againſt him, & had done great hurt vnto the MACEDONIANS. And becauſe they were taken to be the ſharpeſt & readieſt of anſwer, he did put them (as he thought) many hard queſtions, and told them he would put the firſt man to death, that aunſwered him worſt, and ſo the reſt in order: and made the eldeſt among them Iudge of their anſwers. The queſtion he asked the firſt man, was this:

Alexanders queſtions propounded to the ten Philoſophers of India.

Whether the dead or the liuing, were the greater number. He aunſwered, the liuing. For the dead ſayd he, are no more men.

The ſecond man he asked: whether the earth, or the ſea brought forth moſt creatures. He
1 aunſwered, the earth. For the ſea ſayd he, is but a part of the earth.
2 To the third man: which of all beaſtes was the ſubtileſt. That (ſayd he) which man hi-
3 therto neuer knew.

4 To the fourth: why he did make Sabbas rebell? becauſe ſayd he, he ſhould liue honourably, or dye vilely.

5 To the fift, which he thought was firſt, the day, or the night? He anſwered, the day, by a day. The king finding his aunſwer ſtraunge, added to this ſpeach: ſtraunge queſtions, muſt needes haue ſtraunge aunſwers.

6 Comming to the ſixt man, he asked him: how a man ſhould come to be beloued: If he be a good man ſayd he, not terrible.

7 To the ſeuenth, how a man ſhould be a god? In doing a thing, ſaid he, impoſsible for a man.

8 To the eight, which was the ſtrõger: life or death? life, ſaid he, that ſuffreth ſo many troubles.

9 And vnto the ninth and laſt man: how long a man ſhould liue? vntill ſayd he, he thinke it better to dye, then to liue.

Alexander rewarded the ten wiſe men, and did let thẽ go.
Oneſicritus a Philoſopher.

When Alexander had heard theſe anſwers, he turned vnto the Iudge, & bad him giue his iudgemẽt vpon thẽ. The Iudge ſaid, they had all anſwered one worſe then another. Then ſhalt thou dye firſt, ſaid Alexander, becauſe thou haſt giuẽ ſuch ſentence: not ſo, O king, quoth he, if thou wilt not be a lyer: becauſe thou ſaidſt, that thou wouldeſt kill him firſt, that had anſwered worſt. In fine, Alexander did let them go with rewards. He ſent Oneſicritus alſo vnto the other wiſe mẽ of the INDIANS, which were of greateſt fame amõg thẽ, & that led a ſolitary & quiet life: to pray thẽ to come vnto him. This Oneſicritus the Philoſopher, was Diogenes the Ciniks ſcholler. It is reported, that Calanus one of theſe wiſe mẽ, very ſharply & proudly bad him put off his cloths, to heare his words naked: or otherwiſe that he would not ſpeake to him, though he came from Iupiter himſelfe. Yet Dandamis anſwered him more gently. For he hauing learned what manner of men Socrates, Pythagoras, & Diogenes were, ſaid: that they ſeemed to haue bene wiſe men, & well borne, notwithſtanding that they had reuerenced the law too much in their life time. Others write notwithſtãding, that Dandamis ſaid nothing els, but asked why Alexãder had takẽ ſo painful a iourney in hãd, as to come into INDIA. For Calanus, (whoſe right name otherwiſe was Sphines) king Taxiles perſwaded him to go vnto Alexãder: who becauſe he ſaluted thoſe he met, in the INDIAN toung, ſaying Cale, as much to ſay, as God ſaue ye: the GRECIANS named him Calanus. It is reported, that this Calanus did ſhew Alexãder a figure & ſimilitude of his kingdom, which was this. He threw down before him a dry ſeare peece of leather, & then put his foote vpõ one of the ends of it. The leather being trodẽ down on that ſide, roſe vp in all parts elſe, & going vp & down with all ſtill treading vpõ the ſides of the leather: he made Alexãder ſee, that the leather being trodẽ down on the one ſide, did riſe vp of all ſides elſe, vntill ſuch time as he put his foote in the middeſt of the leather, and then all the whole leather was plaine alike. His meaning thereby, was to let Alexãder vnderſtand, that the moſt part of his time he ſhould keepe in the middeſt of his country, & not to go farre from it. Alexander continued ſeuen months trauelling vpon the riuers, to go ſee the great ſea Oceanum. Then he

tooke ſhip,& ſailed into a litle Iland called SCYLLVSTIS,howbeit others call it PSITVLCIS. There he landed, made ſacrifices vnto the gods, & viewed the greatnes & nature of the ſea Oceanum,and all the ſituation of the coaſt vpon that ſea,as far as he could go. Then he made his prayers vnto the gods,that no cõquerour liuing after him ſhould go beyond the bounds of his iourney & conqueſt,& ſo returned homward. He cõmaunded his ſhips ſhould fetch a cõpaſſe about,& leaue INDIA on the right hand:& made Nearchus Admirall of all his fleete, & Oneſicritus chiefe Pilote. He himſelf in the meane time went by land through the country of the ORITES,& there he found great ſcarſitie of victuals,& loſt many of his mẽ: ſo that he caried not out of INDIA the fourth part of his mẽ of war which he brought thither,which were in all, ſix ſcore thouſand footemẽ,& fifteen thouſand horſemen. Some of thẽ died of greeuous diſeaſes, others, by ill diet,others, by extreme heat & drought,and the moſt of them by hunger,trauailing through this barren country,where the poore men liued hardly,& had only a few ſheepe which they fed with ſea fiſh,that made their fleſh ſauor very ill fauoredly. At the lẽgth,when in three ſcore dayes iourney he had painfully trauelled through this countrey, he thẽ entred into the coũtry called GEDROSIA,where he foũd great plẽty of all kind of victuals,which the gouernours,kings,& princes,neighbours vnto the ſame,did ſend vnto him. After he had refreſhed his army there a litle, he went through the coũtry of CARMANIA, where he continued ſeuen dayes together banketing,going ſtill through the coũtry. For night & day,he was feaſting cõtinually with his friends vpon a ſcaffold lõger then broad, riſing vp of height, & drawen with eight goodly horſe. After that ſcaffold followed diuers other charrets couered ouer,ſome with goodly rich atras,& purple ſilke, others with trim freſh boughes which they renued at euery fields end:& in thoſe were Alexanders other friends & Captaines with garlands of flowers vpon their heades,which dranke & made mery together. In all this army, there was neither helmet,pike,dart,nor target ſeene:but gold & ſiluer bowles,cups, & flagons in the ſouldiers hãds, all the way as they went, drawing wine out of great pipes and veſſels which they caried with them,one drinking to another,ſome marching in the fields going forward,& others alſo ſet at the table. About thẽ were the minſtrels playing & piping on their flutes & ſhalmes, & women ſinging & daunſing,& fooling by the way as they wẽt. In all this diſſolute marching through the coũtry,& in the middeſt of their drunkẽnes,they mingled with it ſport:that euery man did ſtriue to coũterfeit all the inſolẽcies of Bacchus,as if god Bacchus himſelf had bene there in perſon,& had led the mommery. When he came vnto the kings caſtle of GEDROSIA,he ſtayed there alſo certaine dayes to refreſh his army with feaſting & banqueting. It is ſayd, that one day when he had drunke hard,he went to ſee the games for daunſing & amongſt them, the games which a young man called Bagoas had ſet forth,(with whom Alexander fell in liking,and bare the bell. This Bagoas being in his daunſing garments, came through the Theater,and ſat him downe by Alexander. The MACEDONIANS were ſo glad of it, that they ſhouted and clapped their hands for ioy,crying out aloud,to kiſſe him:So that in fine he tooke him in his armes, & kiſſed him,before them all. Thither came Nearchus his Admirall vnto him: who made report what he had ſeene and done in his nauigatiõ. Alexander was ſo glad of that,as he was deſirous to ſayle by ſea himſelfe:and ſo,entring into the ſea Oceanum by the mouth of Euphrates,with a great fleete of ſhips,to cõpaſſe in all the coaſts of ARABIA & AFRICKE,& thence into Mare Mediterraneũ,by the ſtraights of the pillers of Hercules. To this intent he built a great nũber of ſhips in the citie of THAPSACVS,& ſent for mariners,ſhipmaſters,& Pilotes, out of all parts. But now, the difficultie of the iourney which he tooke vpon him for the conqueſt of INDIA, the danger he was in whẽ he fought with the MALLIANS,& the nũber of his men which he loſt beſides which was very great,all theſe things cõſidered together,making mẽ beleeue that he ſhould neuer returne with ſafetie:they made all the people (which he had conquered) bold to riſe againſt him,& gaue his gouernours & Lieutenãts of prouinces occaſion to cõmit great inſolẽcies,robberies,& exactiõs of people. To be ſhort,it put all his kingdome in broile & ſeditiõ. In ſomuch as Olympias & Cleopatra riſing againſt Antipater, they deuided his gouernemẽt betweene thẽ: Olympias choſing for her,the kingdome of EPIRVS: & Cleopatra,the kingdome of MACEDON. Which when Alexander had heard,he ſaid his mother was the wiſeſt: for the realme of MACEDON would neuer haue ſuffred a womã to raigne ouer thẽ. Therupõ he ſent

Nearchus backe again to the ſea, determining to fill all the ſea coaſts with war. As he trauelled through the countrys far frõ the ſea, he put his Captaines & gouernors to death, which had reuolted againſt him: & of thoſe he ſlue Oxyarthes, one of Abulites ſons, by his own hãd, running him through with a pike. And whẽ Abulites ſelf alſo had brought Alexãder iij. thouſand talẽts only, without any other prouiſion made for victuals for his army: he made him put the money before his horſe, which would not once touch it. Then ſayd he vnto him: I pray thee to what purpoſe ſerueth this prouiſiõ? & therewithall immediatly cõmitted him to priſon. As he came through the country of PERSIA, he firſt renued the old cuſtome there, which was: that as oftẽ times as the kings did returne home frõ any far iourney, they gaue vnto euery womã a crown a peece. It is ſayd therefore that for this cauſe, ſome of their naturall kings many times did not returne againe into their coũtry: & that Ochus amõgſt others did not ſo much as once returne backe againe, willingly baniſhing himſelf out of his coũtry, of niggardlines, becauſe he would not be at this charge. After that, Cyrus tombe (king of PERSIA) being foũd & brokẽ vp, he put him to death that did it, although he were a MACEDONIAN of the citie of PELLA, (and none of the meaneſt) called Polymachus. Whẽ he had read the inſcription writtẽ vpon it in the Perſian toung, he would needes alſo haue it written in the Greeke toung: and this it was. O man, what ſo thou art, and whenceſoeuer thou cõmeſt, for I know thou ſhalt come: I am Cyrus that conquered the Empire of Perſia, I pray thee enuie me not for this litle earth that couereth my body. Theſe wordes pearced Alexanders hart, when he conſidered the vncertaintie of worldly things. There alſo, Calanus the INDIAN Philoſopher, hauing had a flixe a litle while, praied that they would make him a ſtacke of wood, ſuch as they vſe to burne dead bodies on, & then rode thither a horſe backe: & after he had made his prayer vnto the goddes, he caſt thoſe ſprincklings vpõ him, which were vſed to be ſprinckled at the funerals of the dead. Then cutting off a lock of his haire before he went vp on the woodſtacke, he bad all the MACEDONIANS that were there farewell, and ſhooke them by the hands, praying thẽ that day to be mery, and drinke freely with the king, whom he would ſee ſhortly after in the citie of BABYLON. Whẽ he had ſayd theſe wordes, he layd him down vpon the woodſtacke, couered his face, & neuer ſturred hand nor foote, nor quenched when the fire tooke him, but did ſacrifice himſelfe in this ſort, as the maner of his country was, that the wiſe mẽ ſhould ſo ſacrifice themſelues. An other INDIAN alſo, who followed Iulius Cæſar, did the like many yeares after in the citie of ATHENS: & there is his tombe yet to be ſeene, cõmonly called the INDIANS tombe. When Alexander came frõ ſeeing this ſacrifice of Calanus, he did bid diuers of his friends & Captaines to ſupper to him, & there did bring forth a crown for a reward vnto him that dranke beſt. He that dranke moſt of all other, was one Promachus, that dranke foure gallons of wine, & wan the crowne worth a talent: but he liued not aboue three dayes after. And of other alſo that fell in ſport to quaffing, who ſhould drink moſt, there died of thẽ (as Chares writeth) one & forty perſons: of an extreme cold that tooke them in their drunkenneſſe & wine. When they were in the citie of SVSA, he married certaine of his friends, & himſelfe alſo married Statira, one of king Darius daughters, diſpoſing alſo of the other PERSIAN Ladies (according to their eſtate and birth) vnto his beſt friends. He made alſo a ſolẽne feaſt of cõmon mariages amongſt the MACEDONIANS, of them that had bene maried before. At which feaſt, it is writtẽ, that nine thouſãd perſons ſitting at the bords, he gaue vnto euery one of them a cup of gold to offer wine in honor of the gods. And there alſo amongſt other wõderfull gifts, he did pay all the debts the MACEDONIANS ought vnto their creditors, the which amounted vnto the ſumme of ten thouſand talẽts ſauing a hundred & thirtie leſſe. Wherupõ Antigenes with one eye, falſly putting in his name amongſt the nũber of the debters, & bringing in one that ſaid he had lent him money: Alexãder cauſed him to be payd. But afterwardes, when it was proued to his face, that there was no ſuch matter: Alexander then was ſo offended with him, that he baniſhed him his court, & depriued him of his Captainſhip, notwithſtanding that he had before ſhewed himſelfe a valiant man in the warres. For whẽ he was but a yong mã, he was ſhot into the eye, before the citie of PERINTHE, which king Philip did beſiege, and at that preſent time they would haue pluckt the arrow out of his eye, but he neuer fainted for it, neither would ſuffer them to pull it out, before he had firſt driuẽ his enemies within the wals of their city. He tooke this infamy very inwardly, & he was ſo ſory

ry for it,that euery mā might ſee he was like to die for ſorow. Thē Alexander fearing he ſhould die,did pardō him,& bad him beſides keep the money which was giuē him. Now the 30000. young boyes which Alexander had left to the gouernement of Captaines , to traine & exerciſe them in the diſcipline of warre: they being growen ſtrong men, and luſty youthes, excellently well trained & ready in armes: Alexander reioyced when he ſaw them. This notwithſtanding did much diſcourage the MACEDONIANS,& made thē greatly afrayd, becauſe they thought that from thenceforth the king would make leſſe account of thē. For when Alexander would haue ſent the ſicke and impotent perſons, which had bene maimed in the warres , into the low countrey, to the ſea ſide: they aunſwered him, that ſo doing he ſhould do them great wrong, to ſend theſe poore men from him in that ſort,(after they had done him all the ſeruice they could) home to their country & friends, in worſe caſe thē he tooke them from thence. And therefore they ſaid, if he would ſend away ſome, let him ſend them all away as men vnſeruiceable , ſpecially ſithence he had now ſuch goodly yoūg daunſers about him, with whom he might go cōquer the world. Alexāder was maruellouſly offended with their proud words, inſomuch that in his anger he reuiled them all, put away his ordinary gard, & tooke other PERSIANS in their place, making ſome the gard about his owne perſon, others, his vſhers, heraulds, and miniſters to execute his will and commaundement. The poore MACEDONIANS ſeeing Alexander thus waited on, & themſelues ſo ſhamefully reiected: they let fall their ſtoutneſſe , and after they had commoned of the matter together, they were ready to teare themſelues for ſpite & malice . In fine when they had layd their heads together , they conſented to go vnto his tent and without weapons , naked in their ſhirts to yeeld thēſelues vnto him weeping and howling, beſeeching him to do with thē what pleaſed him, & to vſe them like wretched vnthankfull creatures . But Alexander, though his anger was now ſomwhat pacified, did not receiue thē the firſt time, neither did they alſo go their wayes, but remained there two dayes & nights together, in this pitifull ſtate, before the doore of his tent, lamenting vnto him , & calling him their ſoueraigne and king, vntill that he came himſelfe out of his tent the third day , and ſeeing the poore wretches in this greeuous and pitifull ſtate, he himſelfe fell a weeping a long time. So, after he had a litle rebuked thē, he called thē curteouſly, & gaue the impotēt & ſick perſons leaue to depart home, rewarding thē very honorably. Furthermore, he wrote vnto Antipater his Lieutenant, that he ſhould alwayes giue them the higheſt place in all cōmon ſports and aſſemblies , and that they ſhould be crowned with garlands of flowers . Moreouer, he commaunded that the orphans whoſe parents were ſlaine in the wars, ſhould receiue the pay of their fathers. After Alexander was come vnto the city of ECBATANA, in the kingdome of MEDEA, & that he had diſpatched his waightieſt cauſes: he gaue himſelfe againe vnto publike ſports, feaſts, and paſtimes, for that there were newly come vnto him out of GRECE, three thouſand excellent maiſters & deuiſers of ſuch ſports. About that time it chaunced , that Hephæſtion fell ſicke of an agew. But he being a young man of warre , did not regard his mouth as he ſhould haue done , but hauing ſpyed oportunitie that his Phiſitian Glaucus was gone vnto the Theater , to ſee the ſports & paſtimes: He went to dinner, & eate a roaſted Capon whole, and dranke a great pot full of wine , which he had cauſed to be ſet in water : whereupon his feuer tooke him ſo ſorely , that he liued not long after. Alexander vnwiſely tooke the chaunce of his death , & commaunded all the haires of his horſe and mules to be preſently ſhorne in token of mourning, and that all the battlemēts of the wals of cities ſhould alſo be ouerthrowen , and hung vp poore Glaucus his Phiſitian vpon a croſſe , and commaunded that no minſtrell ſhould be heard play of any kinde of inſtrument within his campe: vntill that there was brought him an oracle from Iupiter Hammon, commaunding that Hephæſtion ſhould be worſhipped and ſacrificed vnto , as a demy god . In the end, to paſſe ouer his mourning and ſorow , he went vnto the warres, as vnto a hunting of men, & there ſubdued the people of the COSSÆIANS, whom he pluckt vp by the rootes , and ſlue man, woman, and child . And this was called the ſacrifice of Hephæſtions funerals . Alexander furthermore being deſirous to beſtow ten thouſand talents coſt vpon his obſequies and fenerals , and alſo to exceede the charge by the rareneſſe and excellencie of workemanſhip : amongeſt all other excellent workemaiſters , he deſired one Staſicrates , for he had euer paſing inuention , and his worke was alwayes ſtately and ſumptuous in any new things he tooke in hand. For he talking one day with Alexander, told him, that of all the mountaines he knew in the world, he thought there was none more excellent to reſemble the ſtatue or image of a man, then was mount Atho in THRACIA: and that if it were his pleaſure, he would make him the nobleſt and moſt durable image, that ſhould be in the world, which in his left hand ſhould hold a city to conteine ten thouſand perſons, and out of his right hand, there ſhould runne a great riuer into the ſea. Yet Alexander would not harkẽ to him, but then was talking with other workemen of more ſtraunge inuentions, & far greater coſt Now as he was ready to take his iourney to go vnto BABYLON: Nearchus his Admirall came againe vnto him from the great ſea Oceanum, by the riuer of Euphrates, and told him, how certaine CHALDEAN Soothſayers came vnto him, who did warne him that he ſhould not go into BABYLON. Howbeit Alexander made no reckoning of it, but went on. But when he came hard to the wals of BABYLON, he ſaw a great number of crowes fighting & killing one of an other, & ſome of them fell down dead hard by him. Afterwardes being told him that Apollodorus the gouernour of the citie of BABYLON, hauing ſacrificed vnto the goddes, to know what ſhould happẽ to him he ſent for the ſoothſayer Pythagoras, to know of him if it were true. The ſoothſayer denied it not. Then Alexander asked him, what ſignes he had in the ſacrifice. He aunſwered, that the liuer of the beaſt had no head. O gods, ſayd Alexander then, this is an ill ſigne: notwithſtanding he did Pythagoras no hurt, but yet he repẽted him that he did not beleeue Nearchus wordes. For this reſpect therfore Alexander lay much abroad in the country from BABYLON, and did take his pleaſure rowing vp and downe the riuer of Euphrates. Yet had he many other ill ſignes and tokens one vpon an other, that made him afrayed. For there was a tame aſſe that killed one of the greateſt & goodlieſt Lions in all BABYLON, with one of his feete. An other time when Alexander had put off his clothes, to be nointed to play at tennis: When he ſhould put on his apparell again, the young gẽtlemen that played with him, found a man ſet in his chaire of eſtate, hauing the kings diademe on his head, & his gowne on his back, & ſayd neuer a word. Then they asked him what he was? It was long before he made them aunſwer, but at the lẽgth comming to himſelf, he ſaid his name was Dionyſius, borne in MESSINA: & being accuſed for certaine crimes committed, he was ſent from the ſea thither, where he had bene a long time priſoner, & alſo that the god Serapis had appeared vnto him, & vndone his irons, & that he commaunded him to take the kings gowne, & his diademe, and to ſit him down in his chaire of eſtate, & ſay neuer a word. When Alexander heard it, he put him to death according to the counſell of his Soothſayers: but then his minde was troubled, & feared that the gods had forſakẽ him, & alſo grew to ſuſpect his friends. But firſt of all, Alexãder feared Antipater & his ſonnes, aboue all other. For one of them called Iolas, was his firſt cupbearer: & his brother called Caſſander, was newly come out of GRECE vnto him. The firſt time that Caſsãder ſaw ſome of the barbarous people reuerẽcing Alexander, he hauing bene brought vp with the libertie of GRECE, & had neuer ſeene the like before: fell into a loude laughing very vnreuerẽtly. Therewith king Alexãder was ſo offended, that he tooke him by the haire of his head with both his hands, & knocked his head & the wall together. An other time alſo whẽ Caſſander did anſwer ſome that accuſed his father Antipater: king Alexander tooke him vp ſharply, & ſaid vnto him. What ſaieſt thou, ſaid he? Doeſt thou thinke that theſe mẽ would haue gone ſo lõg a iourney as this, falſly to accuſe thy father, if he had not done them wrõg? Caſſander againe replyed vnto Alexãder, & ſaid, that that was a manifeſt proofe of their falſe accuſatiõ, for that they did now accuſe him being ſo farre off, becauſe they thought they could not ſodainly be diſproued. Alexander thereat fell a laughing a good, and ſayd, lo, theſe are Ariſtotles quiddities to argue pro & cõtra: but this will not ſaue you frõ puniſhment, if I find that you haue done theſe men wrong. In fine, they report that Caſſander tooke ſuch an inward feare & conceit vpon it, that lõg time after when he was king of MACEDON, and had all GRECE at his commaundement: going vp & down the citie of DELPHES, and beholding the monuments and images that are there, he found one of Alexander, which put him into ſuch a ſodaine feare, that the haires of his head ſtood vpright, and his body quaked in ſuch ſort, that it was a great time before he could come to himſelfe againe. Now after that Alexander had left his truſt and confidence in the goddes, his minde was ſo troubled and afrayed, that no ſtraunge thing happened vnto him, how litle ſo euer it was) but he tooke it ſtraight for a ſigne and prediction from the goddes: ſo that his tent was alwayes full of Prieſtes and Soothſayers that did nothing but ſacrifice and purifie, and tend vnto diuinements. So horrible a thing is the miſtruſt and contempt of the gods, when it is begotten in the hearts of men, and ſuperſtition alſo ſo dreadfull, that it filleth the guilty conſciences and fearefull harts like water diſtilling from aboue: as at that time it filled Alexander with all folly, after that feare had once poſſeſſed him. This notwithſtanding, after that he had receiued ſome anſwers touching Hephaſtion from the oracle of Iupiter Hammon he left his ſorrow, and returned againe to his bankets and feaſting. For he did ſumptuoſly feaſt Nearchus, and one day when he came out of his bathe according to his manner, being ready to goe to bed, Medius one of his Captaines beſought him to come to a banket to him to his lodging. Alexander went thither, and dranke there all that night and the next day, ſo that he got an ague by it. But that came not (as ſome write) by drinking vppe Hercules cuppe all at a draught: neither for the ſodaine paine he felt betweene his ſhoulders, as if hee had bene thruſt into the backe with a ſpeare. For all theſe were thought to be written by ſome, for lies and fables, becauſe they would haue made the end of this great tragedy lamentable and pittifull. But Ariſtobulus writeth, that he had ſuch an extream feuer and thirſt withall, that he drank wine, and after that fell a rauing, and at the length died the thirty day of the moneth of Iune. In his houſhold booke of things paſſed daily, it is written, that his feuer being vpon him, he ſlept at his hotte-houſe on the eighteenth day of Iune. The next morning after he was come out of his hotte-houſe, he went into his chamber, and paſſed away all that day with Medius, playing at dice: and at night very late, after he had bathed him ſelfe and ſacrificed vnto the goddes, he fell to meate, and had his feuer that night. And the twentieth day alſo, bathing him ſelfe againe, and making his ordinary ſacrifice to the goddes, he did ſitte downe to eate within his ſtooue, harkening vnto Nearchus that told him ſtrange things he had ſeene in the great ſea Oceanum. The one and twenty day alſo hauing done the like as before, hee was much more inflamed then he had bene, and felt him ſelfe very ill all night, and the next day following in a great feuer: and on that day he made his bed to be remoued, and to be ſet vp by the fiſhe pondes, where he commoned with his captaines touching certaine roomes that were voide in his army, and commaunded them not to place any men that were not of good experience. The three & twentieth day hauing an extream feuer vpon him, he was caried vnto the ſacrifices, and commanded that his chiefeſt Captaines onely ſhould remaine in his lodging, and that the other meaner ſort, as centiniers or Lieutenaunts of bandes, that they ſhould watch and ward without. The foure and twentieth day, he was caried vnto the other pallace of the kings, which is on the other ſide of the lake, wher he ſlept a litle, but the feuer neuer left him: & when his Captaines and noble men came to doe him humble reuerence, and to ſee him, he lay ſpeachles. So did he the fiue & twentieth day alſo: inſomuch as the MACEDONIANS thought he was dead. Then they came and knocked at the pallace gate, and cried out vnto his friendes and familiars, and threatned them, ſo that they were compelled to open them the gate. Thereupon the gates were opened, and they comming in their gowns went vnto his bed ſide to ſee him. That ſelf day Python and Seleucus were appointed by the kings friends to go to the temple of the god Serapis, to know if they ſhould bring king Alexander thither. The god anſwered them, that they ſhould not remoue him from thence. The eight and twentieth day at night Alexander died. Thus it is written word for word in manner, in the houſhold booke of remembrance. At that preſent time, there was no ſuſpition that he was poiſoned. Yet they ſay, that ſix yeares after, there appeared ſome proofe that he was poyſoned. Wherupon his mother Olympias put many men to death, and caſt the aſhes of Iolas into the wind, that was dead before, for that it was ſaid he gaue him poyſon in his drinke. They that thinke it was Ariſtotle that counſelled Antipater to doe it, by whoſe meane the poiſon was brought: they ſay that Agnothemis reported it, hauing heard it of king Antigonus own mouth. The poyſon (as ſome ſay) was cold as Iſe, & falleth from a rock in the territory of the city of NONACRIS, & it is gathered as they would gather a dew into the horne of the foote of an aſſe, for there is no other kinde of thing that will keepe it, it is ſo extreame cold and pearcing. Others defend it, and ſay, that the report of his poyſoning is vntrue: and for proofe thereof they alledge this reaſon, which is of no ſmall

importance,that is: That the chiefeſt Captaines fell at great variance after his death,ſo that the corps of Alexander remained many daies naked without buriall,in a whot dry country, and yet there neuer appeared any ſigne or token vpon his bodie,that he was poiſoned,but was ſtill a cleane and faire corps as could be. Alexander left Roxane great with child, for the which the MACEDONIANS did her great honor: but ſhe did malice Statira extremely, & did finely deceiue her by a counterfaite letter ſhe ſent,as if it had come from Alexander,willing her to come vnto him.But when ſhe was come,Roxane killed her & her ſiſter, and then threw their bodies into a well,and filled it vp with earth,by Perdiccas helpe & conſent.Perdiccas came to be king, immediatly after Alexanders death, by meanes of Aridæus, whom he kept about him for his gard and ſafety.This Aridæus,being borne of a ſtrumpet & common woman, called Philinna, was halfe lunaticke,not by nature nor by chance: but as it is reported,put out of his wits when he was a young towardly boy, by drinkes which Olympias cauſed to be giuen him,and thereby continued franticke.

Iulius Cæſar.

AT what time Sylla was made lord of all,he would haue had Cæſar put away his wife Cornelia,the daughter of Cinna Dictator: but when he ſaw, he could neither with any promiſe nor threate bring him to it, he tooke her iointer away from him. The cauſe of Cæſars ill wil vnto Sylla,was by meanes of mariage: for Marius the elder, maried his fathers owyn ſiſter,by whom he had Marius the younger,whereby Cæſar and he were coſin germaines. Sylla being troubled in waightie matters,putting to death ſo many of his enemies,when he came to be conquetor,he made no reckoning of Cæſar: but he was not cõtented to be hidden in ſafetie, but came & made ſute vnto the people for the Prieſthoodſhip that was voide, when he had ſcant any haire on his face. Howbeit he was repulſed by Syllaes meanes, that ſecretly was againſt him. Who, when he was determined to haue killed him,ſome of his friends told him, that it was to no purpoſe to put ſo young a boy as he to death. But Sylla tolde them againe,that they did not conſider that there were many Marians in that young boy.Cæſar vnderſtanding that, ſtale out of ROME, and hid himſelfe a long time in the country of the SABINES, wandring ſtil from place to place. But one day being caried from houſe to houſe, he fell into the handes of Syllaes ſouldiers, who ſearched all thoſe places, and tooke them whom they found hidden. Cæſar bribed the Captaine, whoſe name was Cornelius, with two talents which he gaue him. After he had eſcaped them thus, he went vnto the ſea ſide and tooke ſhip, and ſailed into BITHYNIA to go vnto king Nicomedes. When he had bin with him a while, he tooke ſea againe, & was taken by pyrats about the Ile of PHARMACVSA: for thoſe pyrates kept all vpon that ſea coaſt, with a great fleete of ſhips and botes. They asking him at the firſt twenty talents for his ranſome, Cæſar laughed them to ſcorne, as though they knew not what a man they had taken, & of himſelfe promiſed them fiftie talents. Then he ſent his men vp and downe to get him this money, ſo that he was left in manner alone among theſe theeues of the CILICIANS, (which are the cruelleſt butchers in the world) with one of his friends, & two of his ſlaues only: & yet he made ſo litle reckoning of them, that when he was deſirous to ſleepe, he ſent vnto them to command them to make no noiſe. Thus was he eight & thirtie daies among them, not kept as priſoner, but rather waited vpon by them as a Prince. All this time he would boldly exerciſe himſelf in any ſport or paſtime they would go to. And other while alſo he would write verſes, and make orations, & call them together to ſay them before them: and if any of them ſeemed as though they had not vnderſtood him, or paſſed not for them, he called them blockheads and brute beaſts, and laughing, threatned them that he would hang them vp. But they were as merry with the matter as could be, and tooke all in good part, thinking that this his bold ſpeech came, through the ſimplicity of his youth. So whẽ his ranſome was come from the citie of MILETVM, they being paid their money, and he againe ſet at libertie: he then preſently armed, and manned out certaine ſhips out of the hauen of MILETVM, to follow thoſe theeues, whom he found yet riding at ancker in the ſame Iland. So he tooke the moſt of them, and had the ſpoile of their goods, but for their bodies, he brought thẽ into the city of PERGAMVM, & there committed them to priſon, whileſt he himſelfe went to ſpeake with Iunius, who had the gouernement of ASIA, as vnto whom the execution of theſe pirats did belong, for that he was Prætor of that cōtry. But this Prætor hauing a great fancy to be fingering of the money, becauſe there was good ſtore of it: anſwered, that he would conſider of theſe priſoners at better leaſure. Cæſar leauing Iunius there, returned againe vnto PERGAMVM, and there hung vp all theſe theeues openly vpon a croſſe, as he had oftentimes promiſed thẽ in the Ile he would do, when they thought he did but ieaſt. Afterwardes when Syllaes power began to decay, Cæſars friends wrote vnto him, to pray him to come home again. But he ſailed firſt vnto RHODES, to ſtudie there a time vnder Apollonius the ſonne of Molon, whoſe ſcholler alſo Cicero was, for he was a very honeſt man, and an excellent good Rethoritian. It is reported that Cæſar had an excellent natural gift to ſpeake well before the people, & beſides that rare gift, he was excellently well ſtudied, ſo that doubtleſſe he was counted the ſecond man for eloquence in his time, & gaue place to the firſt, becauſe he would be the firſt and chiefeſt man of warre and authoritie, being not yet come to the degree of perfection to ſpeake well, which his nature could haue performed in him, becauſe he was giuen rather to follow wars and to mannage great matters, which in the end brought him to be Lord of all ROME. And therefore in a booke he wrote againſt that which Cicero made in the praiſe of Cato, he praieth the readers not to compare the ſtile of a ſouldier, with the eloquence of an excellent Orator, that had followed it the moſt part of his life. When he was returned againe vnto ROME, he accuſed Dolabella for his ill behauior in the gouernment of his prouince, and he had diuers cities of GRECE that gaue in euidence againſt him. Notwithſtanding, Dolabella at the length was diſmiſſed. Cæſar, to requite the good will of the GRECIANS, which they had ſhewed him in his accuſation of Dolabella, tooke their cauſe in hand, when they did accuſe Publius Antonius before Marcus Lucullius, Prætor of MACEDON: and followed it ſo hard againſt him in their behalfe, that Antonius was driuen to appeale before the Tribunes at ROME, alleaging, to colour his appeale withall, that he could haue no iuſtice in GRECE againſt the GRECIANS. Now Cæſar immediatly wan many mens good wils at ROME, through his eloquence, in pleading of their cauſes: and the people loued him maruellouſly alſo, becauſe of the courteous maner he had to ſpeake to euery man, and to vſe them gentlely, being more ceremonious therin then was looked for in one of his yeares.

Furthermore, he euer kept a good boord, and fared well at his table, and was very liberall beſides: the which indeede did aduance him forward, and brought him in eſtimation with the people. His enemies iudging that this fauour of the cõmon people would ſoone quaile, when he could no longer hold out that charge and expence: ſuffered him to runne on, till by litle and litle he was growen to be of great ſtrength and power. But in fine, when they had thus giuen him the bridle to grow to this greatneſſe, and that they could not then pull him backe, though indeede in ſight it would turne one day to the deſtruction of the whole ſtate and common wealth of ROME: too late they found, that there is not ſo litle a beginning of any thing, but continuance of time will ſoone make it ſtrong, when through contempt there is no impediment to hinder the greatneſſe. Thereupon, Cicero like a wiſe ſhipmaſter that feareth the calmeneſſe of the ſea, was the firſt man that miſtruſting his maner of dealing in the common wealth, found out his craft & malice, which he cunningly cloked vnder the habit of outward curteſie and familiaritie. And yet, ſaide he, when I conſider how finely he combeth his faire buſh of haire, & how ſmooth it lieth, & that I ſee him ſcratch his head with one finger only: my mind giues me then, that ſuch a kind of man ſhould not haue ſo wicked a thought in his head, as to ouerthrow the ſtate of the common wealth. But this was long time after that. The firſt ſhew and proofe of the loue and good will which the people did beare vnto Cæſar, was: when he ſued to be Tribune of the ſouldiers (to wit, Colonell of a thouſand footemen) ſtanding againſt Caius Pompilius, at what time he was preferred and choſen before him. But the ſecond & more manifeſt proofe then the firſt, was at the death of his Aunt Iulia, the wife of Marius the elder. For being her nephew, he made a ſolemne oration in the market place in commendation of her, and at her buriall did boldly venture to ſhew forth the images of Marius: the which was the firſt time that they were ſeene after Syllaes victorie, becauſe that Marius and all his confederates had bin proclaimed traitors & enemies to the common wealth. For when there were ſome that cried out vpon Cæſar for doing of it: the people on the other ſide kept a ſturre, and reioyced at it, clapping of their hands and thanked him for that he had brought as it were out of hell, the remembrance of Marius honor againe into ROME, which had ſo long time beene obſcured & buried. And where it had bin an ancient cuſtome of long time that the ROMAINS vſed to make funerall orations in praiſe of old Ladies and matrons when they died, but not of young women: Cæſar was the firſt that praiſed his owne wife with funerall oration when ſhe was dead, the which alſo did increaſe the peoples good wils the more, ſeeing him of ſo kinde and gentle nature. After the buriall of his wife, he was made Treaſurer vnder Antiſtius Vetus Prætor, whom he honored euer after: ſo that when himſelfe came to be Prætor, he made his ſonne to be choſen Treaſurer. Afterwards, when he was come out of that office, he married his third wife Pompeia, hauing a daughter by his firſt wife Cornelia, which was married vnto Pompey the great. Now for that he was very liberall in expences, buying (as ſome thought) but a vaine and ſhort glory of the fauor of the people: (where indeede he bought good cheape the greateſt things that could be.) Some ſay, that before he bare any office in the common wealth, he was growen in debt, to the ſumme of thirteene hundred talents. Furthermore, becauſe he was made ouerſeer of the worke, for the high way going vnto Appius, he disburſed a great ſumme of his owne money towardes the charges of the ſame. And on the other ſide, when he was made Ædilis, for that he did ſhew the people the paſtime of three hundred & twentie couple of ſword plaiers, and did beſides exceede all other in ſumptuouſnes in the ſports & cõmon feaſts which he made to delight them withall: (& did as it were drowne all the ſtately ſhewes of others in the like, that had gone before him) he ſo pleaſed the people, and wanne their loue therwith, that they deuiſed daily to giue him new offices for to require him. At that time there were two factiõs in ROME, to wit, the faction of Sylla, which was very ſtrõg & of great power, and the other of Marius, which then was vnder foote and durſt not ſhew it ſelfe. But Cæſar becauſe he would renue it again, euen at that time when he being Ædilis, all the feaſts & cõmon ſports were in their greateſt ruffe: he ſecretly cauſed images of Marius to be made, & of victories that caried triumphs, & thoſe he ſet vp one night within the Capitoll. The next morning when euery man ſaw the gliſtering of theſe golden images excellently well wrought, ſhewing by the inſcriptions, that they were the victories which Marius had won vpon the CIMBRES:

euery one maruelled much at the boldneſſe of him that durſt ſet them vp there, knowing well enough who it was. Hereupon it ran ſtraight through all the citie, & euery man came thither to ſee them. Then ſome cried out vpon Cæſar, & ſaid it was a tyrannie which he ment to ſet vp, by renuing of ſuch honors as before had bene troden vnder foote, and forgotten, by common decree and open proclamation: and that it was no more but a baite to gage the peoples good wils, which he had ſet out in the ſtately ſhewes of his common plaies, to ſee if he had brought them to his lure, that they would abide ſuch parts to be plaid, and a new alteration of things to be made. They of Marius faction on the other ſide, incoraging one an other, ſhewed thẽſelues ſtraight a great number gathered together, and made the mount of the Capitoll ring againe with their cries and clapping of handes: inſomuch as the teares ranne downe many of their cheekes for very ioy, when they ſaw the images of Marius, & they extolled Cæſar to the skies, iudging him the worthieſt man of all the kinred of Marius. The Senate being aſſembled therupon, Catulus Luctatius one of the greateſt authoritie at that time in ROME, roſe, & vehemently inueighed againſt Cæſar, and ſpake that then which euer ſince hath bene noted much: that Cæſar did not now couertly go to worke, but by plaine force ſought to alter the ſtate of the cõmon wealth. Neuertheleſſe, Cæſar at that time anſwered him ſo that the Senate was ſatiſfied. Thereupon they that had him in eſtimation did grow in better hope than before, and perſwaded him, that hardily he ſhould giue place to no man, & that through the good will of the people, he ſhould be better than all they, and come to be the chiefeſt man of the citie. At that time, the chiefe Biſhoppe Metellus died, and two of the notableſt men of the citie, and of greateſt authoritie (Iſauricus and Catulus) contended for his roome: Cæſar notwithſtanding their contention, would giue neither of them both place, but preſented himſelfe to the people, and made ſute for it as they did. The ſute being equall betwixt either of them, Catulus, becauſe he was a man of greater calling and dignitie than the other, doubting the vncertaintie of the election: ſent vnto Cæſar a good ſumme of money, to make him leaue off his ſute. But Cæſar ſent him word againe, that he would lend a greater ſumme then that, to maintaine the ſute againſt him. When the day of the election came, his mother bringing him to the dore of his houſe, Cæſar weeping, kiſſed her, and ſaide: Mother, this day thou ſhalt ſee thy ſonne chiefe Biſhoppe of ROME, or baniſhed from ROME. In fine, when the voyces of the people were gathered together, and the ſtrife well debated: Cæſar wanne the victorie, and made the Senate and noble men all affraide of him, for that they thought that thenceforth he would make the people do what he thought good. Then Catulus and Piſo fell flatly out with Cicero, and condemned him for that he did not bewray Cæſar, when he knew that he was of conſpiracie with Catiline, and had oportunitie to haue done it. For when Catiline was bent and determined, not onely to ouerthrow the ſtate of the common wealth, but vtterly to deſtroy the Empire of ROME, he ſcaped out of the handes of iuſtice for lacke of ſufficient proofe, before his full treaſon and determination was knowen. Notwithſtanding he left Lentulus and Cethegus in the citie, companions of his conſpiracie: vnto whom, whether Cæſar did giue any ſecret helpe or comfort, it is not well knowen. Yet this is manifeſt, that when they were conuinced in open Senate, Cicero being at that time Conſul, asking euery mans opinion in the Senate, what puniſhment they ſhould haue, and euery one of them till it came to Cæſar, gaue ſentence they ſhould die: Cæſar then riſing vp to ſpeake, made an oration (penned and premeditated before) and ſaide, that it was neither lawefull, nor yet their cuſtome did beare it, to put men of ſuch nobilitie to death (but in an extremitie) without lawfull inditement and condemnation. And therefore, that if they were put in priſon in ſome citie of ITALY, where Cicero thought beſt, vntill that Catiline were ouerthrowen: the Senate then might at their pleaſure quietly take ſuch order therein, as might beſt appeare vnto their wiſedomes. This opinion was thought more gentle, and withall was vttered with ſuch a paſſing good grace and eloquence, that not onely they which were to ſpeake after him did approue it: but ſuch alſo as had ſpoken to the contrarie before, reuoked their opinion and ſtuck to his, vntill it came to Cato & Catulus to ſpeake. They both did ſharply inueigh againſt him, but Cato chiefly: who in his oration made Cæſar ſuſpected to be of the conſpiracie, and ſtoutly ſpake againſt him, inſomuch that the offenders were put into the hands of the officers to be put to death. Cæſar comming out of the Senate, a company of young men which guarded Cicero for the ſafetie of his perſon, did ſet vppon him with their ſwordes drawen. But ſome ſay, that Curio couered Cæſar with his gowne, and tooke him out of their handes. And Cicero ſelfe, when the young men looked vpon him, beckened with his head that they ſhould not kill him, either fearing the fury of the people, or elſe that he thought it too ſhamefull and wicked a part. But if that were true, I maruell why Cicero did not put it into his booke he wrote of his Conſulſhippe. But certainly they blamed him afterwardes, for that he tooke not the oportunitie offered him againſt Cæſar, onely for ouermuch feare of the people, that loued him very dearely. For ſhortly after, when Cæſar went into the Senate, to cleere himſelfe of certaine preſumptions and falſe accuſations obiected againſt him, and being bitterly taunted among them, the Senate keeping him longer than they were wont: the people came about the councell houſe, and called out aloude for him, bidding them let him out. Cato then fearing the inſurrection of the poore needie perſons, which were they that put all their hope in Cæſar, and did alſo moue the people to ſturre: did perſwade the Senate to make a franke diſtribution of corne vnto them, for a moneth. This diſtribution did put the common wealth to a new charge of fiue hundred and fifty Myriades. This counſell quenched a preſent great feare, and did in happie time ſcatter and diſperſe abroade the beſt part of Cæſars force and power, at ſuch time as he was made Prætor, and that for reſpect of his office he was moſt to be feared. Yet all the time he was officer, he neuer ſought any alteration in the common wealth, but contrarily he himſelfe had a great misfortune fell in his owne houſe, which was this. There was a yong noble mã of the order of the PATRICIANS, called Publius Clodius, who lacked neither wealth nor eloquence, but otherwiſe as inſolent and impudent a perſon, as any was elſe in ROME. He became in loue with Pompeia Cæſars wife, who miſliked not withall: notwithſtanding ſhe was ſo ſtraightly looked to, and that Aurelia (Cæſars mother) an honeſt gentlewoman had ſuch an eye of her, that theſe two louers could not meete as they would, without great perill & difficultie. The ROMAINES do vſe to honor a goddeſſe which they call the good goddeſſe, as the GRECIANS haue her whom they call Gynæcia, to wit, the goddeſſe of women. Her, the PHRYGIANS do claime to be peculiar vnto them, ſaying: that ſhe is king Midas mother. Howbeit the ROMAINES hold opinion, that it is a nimph of wood maried vnto god Faunus. The GRECIANS, they ſay alſo, that ſhe was one of the mothers of the god Bacchus, whom they dare not name. And for proofe hereof, on her feaſt day, the women make certaine tabernacles of vine twigges, and leaues of vine branches, and alſo they make as the tale goeth, a holy dragon for this goddeſſe, and doe ſet it by her: beſides, it is not lawfull for any man to be preſent at their ſacrifices, no not within the houſe it ſelfe where they are made. Furthermore, they ſay that the women in theſe ſacrifices doe many things amongſt thẽſelues, much like vnto the ceremonies of Orpheus. Now when the time of this feaſt came, the husband, (whether he were Prætor or Conſull) and all his men and the boyes in the houſe, doe come out of it, and leaue it wholly to his wife, to order the houſe at her pleaſure, & there the ſacrifices and ceremonies are done the moſt part of the night, and they doe beſides paſſe the night away in ſonges and muſicke. Pompeia Cæſars wife, being that yeare to celebrate this feaſt, Clodius who had yet no haire on his face, & therby thought he ſhould not be bewrayed: diſguiſed himſelfe in a ſinging wenches apparell, becauſe his face was very like vnto a young wench. He finding the gates open, being ſecretly brought in by her chamber maide that was made priuie vnto it: ſhe left him, and ranne to Pompeia her miſtreſſe, to tell her that he was come. The chamber maide taried long before ſhee came againe, inſomuch as Clodius being wearie waiting for her where ſhe left him, he tooke his pleaſure, and went from one place to an other in the houſe, which had very large roomes in it, ſtill ſhunning the light, and was by chance met withall by one of Aureliaes maides, who taking him for a woman, prayed her to play. Clodius refuſing to play, the maide pulled him forward, and asked him what he was: Clodius then anſwered her, that he taried for Abra one of Pompeiaes women. So, Aureliaes maide knowing him by his voyce, ranne ſtraight where the lightes and Ladies were, and cried out, that there was a man diſguiſed in womans apparell. The women therewith were ſo amazed, that Aurelia cauſed them preſently to leaue off the ceremonies of the ſacrifice, and to hide their ſecret things, and hauing ſeene the gates faſt locked, went immediatly vp and downe

the houſe with torch light to ſeeke out this man: who at the laſt was found out in the chamber of Pompeiaes maide, with whom he hid him ſelfe. Thus Clodius being found out, and knowen of the women: they thruſt him out of the dores by the ſhoulders. The ſame night the women tolde their husbandes of this chaunce as ſoone as they came home. The next morning, there ranne a great rumor through the city, how Clodius had attempted a great villany, and that he deſerued, not onely to be puniſhed of them whom he had ſlandered, but alſo of the common wealth and the goddes. There was one of the Tribunes of the people that did indite him, and accuſe him of high treaſon to the gods. Furthermore, there were alſo of the chiefeſt of the nobility and Senate, that came to depoſe againſt him, and burdened him with many horrible and deteſtable facts, and ſpecially with inceſt committed with his owne ſiſter, which was maried vnto Lucullus. Notwithſtanding, the people ſtoutly defended Clodius againſt their accuſations: and this did helpe him much againſt the Iudges, which were amazed, and afraid to ſtirre the people. This notwithſtanding, Cæſar preſently put his wife away, and thereupon being brought by Clodius accuſer to be a witnes againſt him, he anſwered, hee knew nothing of that they obiected againſt Clodius. This aunſwere being cleane contrary to their expectation that heard it, the accuſer asked Cæſar, why then he had put away his wife: becauſe I will not, ſaied he, that my wife be ſo much as ſuſpected. And ſome ſay, that Cæſar ſpake truely as he thoght. But others thinke, that he did it to pleaſe the common people, who were very deſirous to ſaue Clodius. So Clodius was diſcharged of this accuſation, becauſe the moſt part of the Iudges gaue a confuſed iudgement, for the feare they ſtoode one way of the daunger of the common people if they condemned him: and for the ill opinion of the other ſide of the nobility, if they did quit him. The gouernment of the prouince of SPAINE being fallen vnto Cæſar for that he was Prætor: his creditors came and cried out vpon him, and were importunate of him to be payed. Cæſar being vnable to ſatisfie them, was compelled to goe vnto Craſſus, who was the richeſt man of all ROME, and that ſtoode in neede of Cæſars boldnes and corage to withſtand Pompeys greatnes in the common wealth. Craſſus became his ſurety vnto his greedieſt creditors for the ſumme of eight hundred and thirty talentes: whereuppon they ſuffered Cæſar to depart to the gouernment of his prouince. In his iourney it is reported, that paſſing ouer the mountaines of the Alpes, they came through a litle poore village that had not many houſholdes, and yet poore cotages. There, his friendes that did accompany him, asked him merily, if there were any contending for offices in that towne, and whether there were any ſtrife there amongeſt the noble men for honor. Cæſar ſpeaking in good earneſt, aunſwered: I can not tell that ſaid he, but for my part, I had rather be the chiefeſt man here, then the ſecond perſon in ROME. An other time alſo when he was in SPAINE, reading the hiſtory of Alexanders acts, when he had red it, he was ſorrowful a good while after, and then burſt out in weeping. His friends ſeeing that, maruelled what ſhould be the cauſe of his ſorrow. He aunſwered them, doe ye not thinke ſayd hee, that I haue good cauſe to be heauy, when king Alexander being no older then my ſelfe is now, had in old time wonne ſo many nations and countries: and that I hithervnto haue done nothing worthy of my ſelfe? Therefore when hee was come into SPAINE, he was very carefull of his buſines, and had in few dayes ioyned tenne new enſignes more of footemen, vnto the other twenty which he had before. Then marching forward againſt the CALLÆCIANS and LVSITANIANS, he conquered all, and went as far as the great ſea Oceanum, ſubduing all the people which before knew not the ROMAINES for their Lordes. There he tooke order for pacifying of the war, and did as wiſely take order for the eſtabliſhing of peace. For he did reconcile the cities together, and made them friendes one with an other, but ſpecially hee pacified all ſutes of law, and ſtrife, betwixt the debtors and creditors, which grew by reaſon of vſury. For he ordained that the creditors ſhould take yearely two parts of the reuenue of their debtors, vntill ſuch time as they had payed them ſelues: and that the debtors ſhould haue the third part to them ſelues to liue with all. He hauing wonne great eſtimation by this good order taken, returned from his gouernment very rich, and his ſouldiers alſo full of rich ſpoiles, who called him Imperator, to ſay ſoueraine Captaine. Now the ROMAINS hauing a cuſtome, that ſuch as demaunded honor of triumphe, ſhould remaine a while without the city, & that they on the other ſide which ſued for the Conſulſhip, ſhould

of neceſſity be there in perſon: Cæſar comming vnhappily at that very time when the Conſuls were choſen, he ſent to pray the Senate to do him that fauor, that being abſent, hee might by his friends ſue for the Conſulſhippe. Cato at the firſt did vehemently inuey againſt it, vowching an expreſſe law forbidding the contrary. But afterwardes, perceiuing that notwithſtanding the reaſons he alleaged, many of the Senators (being wonne by Cæſar) fauoured his requeſt: yet he cunningly ſought all he could to preuent them, prolonging time, dilating his oration vntill night. Cæſar thereupon determined rather to giue ouer the ſute of his triumph, and to make ſute for the Conſulſhippe: and ſo came into the city, and had ſuch a deuiſe with him, as went beyond them all, but Cato onely. His deuiſe was this. Pompey and Craſſus, two of the greateſt perſonages of the city of ROME, being at iarre together, Cæſar made them friends, and by that meanes got vnto him ſelfe the power of them both: for, by colour of that gentle acte and friendſhippe of his, he ſubtilly (vnwares to them all) did greatly alter and chaunge the ſtate of the common wealth. For it was not the priuate diſcord betweene Pompey and Cæſar, as many men thought, that cauſed the ciuill warre: but rather it was their agreement together, who ioyned all their powers firſt to ouerthrow the ſtate of the Senate and nobility, and afterwardes they fell at iarre one with an other. But Cato, that then foreſaw and prophecied many times what would followe, was taken but for a vaine man: but afterwardes they found him a wiſer man, then happy in his counſell. Thus Cæſar being brought vnto the aſſembly of the election, in the middeſt of theſe two noble perſons, whom hee had before reconciled together: he was there choſen Conſull, with Calphurnius Bibulus, without gaine ſaying or contradiction of any man. Now when he was entred into his office, he beganne to put foorth lawes meeter for a ſeditious Tribune of the people, then for a Conſull: becauſe by them he preferred the deuiſion of landes, and diſtributing of corne to euery citizen, Gratis, to pleaſe them withall. But when the noble men of the Senate were againſt his deuiſe, he deſiring no better occaſion, began to crie out, and to proteſt, that by the ouerhardneſſe and auſterity of the Senate, they draue him againſt his will to leane vnto the people: and thereupon hauing Craſſus on the one ſide of him, and Pompey on the other, he asked them openly in the aſſembly, if they did giue their conſent vnto the lawes which he had put forth. They both aunſwered, they did. Then he prayed them to ſtand by him againſt thoſe that threatned him with force of ſword to let him. Craſſus gaue him his word, he would. Pompey alſo did the like, and added thereunto, that he would come with his ſword and target both, againſt them that would withſtand him with their ſwordes. Theſe words offended much the Senate, being farre vnmeete for his grauity, and vndecent for the maieſty and honour he caried, and moſt of all vncomely for the preſence of the Senate whom he ſhould haue reuerenced: and were ſpeaches fitter for a raſh light headed youth, then for his perſon. Howbeit the common people on the other ſide, they reioyced. Then Cæſar becauſe he would be more aſſured of Pompeys power and friendſhip, he gaue him his daughter Iulia in mariage, which was made ſure before vnto Seruilius Cæpio, and promiſed him in exchange Pompeis wife, the which was ſure alſo vnto Fauſtus the ſonne of Sylla. And ſhortly after alſo, Cæſar ſelfe did marie Calphurnia, the daughter of Piſo, whom he cauſed to be made Conſull, to ſucceede him the next yeare following. Cato then cried out with open mouth, and called the gods to witnes, that it was a ſhamefull matter, and not to be ſuffered, that they ſhould in that ſort make hauoke of the Empire of ROME, by ſuch horrible bawdie matches, diſtributing among them ſelues through thoſe wicked mariages, the gouernments of the prouinces, and of great armies. Calphurnius Bibulus, fellow Conſull with Cæſar, perceiuing that he did contend in vaine, making all the reſiſtaunce he could to withſtand this law, and that oftentimes hee was in daunger to be ſlaine with Cato, in the market place and aſſembly: hee kept cloſe in his houſe all the reſt of his Conſulſhippe. When Pompey had maried Iulia, he filled all the market place with ſouldiers, & by open force authoriſed the lawes which Cæſar made in the behalfe of the people. Further more, he procured that Cæſar had GAVLE on this ſide, and beyond the Alpes, and all ILLYRIA, with foure legions graunted him for fiue yeares. Then Cato ſtanding vp to ſpeake againſt it: Cæſar badde his officers lay holde on him, and carie him to priſon, thinking hee would haue appealed vnto the Tribunes. But Cato ſayd neuer a word, when he went his way. Cæſar perceiuing then, that not onely the Senators and nobility were offended, but that the common people alſo for the reuerence they bare vnto Catoes vertues, were aſhamed, and went away with ſilence: he him ſelfe ſecretly did pray one of the Tribunes that he would take Cato from the officers. But after he had played this part, there were few Senators that would be Preſident of the Senate vnder him, but left the city, becauſe they could not away with his doings. And of them, there was an old man called Conſidius, that on a time boldly told him, the reſt durſt not come to councell, becauſe they were afrayed of his ſouldiers. Cæſar aunſwered him againe: and why then, doeſt not thou keepe thee at home, for the ſame feare? Conſidius replied, becauſe my age taketh away feare from me: for hauing ſo ſhort a time to liue, I haue no care to prolong it further. The ſhamefulleſt part that Cæſar played while he was Conſull, ſeemeth to be this: when he choſe P. Clodius Tribune of the people, that had offred his wife ſuch diſhonor, and profaned the holy auncient myſteries of the women, which were celebrated in his owne houſe. Clodius ſued to be Tribune to no other end, but to deſtroy Cicero: and Cæſar ſelfe alſo departed not from ROME to his army before he had ſet them together by the eares, and driuen Cicero out of ITALY. All theſe things they ſay he did, before the warres with the GAVLES. But the time of the great armies and conqueſts he made afterwards, and of the war in the which he ſubdued al the GAVLS: (entring into an other courſe of life far contrary vnto the firſt) made him to be knowen for as valiant a ſouldier and as excellent a Captaine to lead men, as thoſe that afore him had bene counted the wiſeſt and moſt valianteſt Generals that euer were, and that by their valiant deedes had atchieued great honor. For whoſoeuer would compare the houſe of the Fabians, of the Scipioes, of the Metellians, yea thoſe alſo of his owne time, or long before him, as Sylla, Marius, the two Lucullians, and Pompey ſelfe,

Cæſar, a valiant ſouldier, and a skilfull captaine.

It will appeare that Cæſars prowes and deedes of armes, did excell them all together. The one, in the hard countries where he made wars: an other, in enlarging the realmes and countries which he ioyned vnto the Empire of ROME: an other, in the multitude and power of his enemies whom he ouercame: an other, in the rudeneſſe and auſtere nature of men with whom he had to doe, whoſe maners afterwardes he ſoftned and made ciuill: an other, in curteſie and clemency which he vſed vnto them whome hee had conquered: an other in great bounty and liberality beſtowed vpon them that ſerued vnder him in thoſe warres: and in fine, he excelled them all in the number of battels he had fought, and in the multitude of his enemies he had ſlaine in battell. For in leſſe then tenne yeares warre in GAVLE hee tooke by force and aſſault aboue eight hundred townes, he conquered three hundred ſeuerall nations: and hauing before him in battell thirty hundred thouſand ſouldiers, at ſundry times hee ſlue tenne hundred thouſand of them, and tooke as many more priſoners. Furthermore, he was ſo entirely beloued of his ſouldiers, that to doe him ſeruice (where otherwiſe they were no more then other men in any priuate quarrell) if Cæſars honour were touched, they were inuincible, and would ſo deſperatly venture them ſelues, & with ſuch fury, that no mã was able to abide them. And this appeareth plainly by the example of Acilius: who in a battell by ſea before the city of MARSELLES, bording one of his enemies ſhips, one cut off his right hand with a ſword, but yet he forſooke not his target which he had in his left hand, but thruſt it in his enemies faces, and made them flie, ſo that he wan their ſhip from them. And Caſſius Scæua alſo, in a conflict before the city of DYRRACHIVM, hauing one of his eyes put out with an arrow, his ſhoulder ſtriken through with a dart, and his thigh with an other, and hauing receiued thirty arrowes vpon his ſhield: he called to his enemies, and made as though he would yeelde vnto them. But when two of them came running to him, he claue one of their ſhoulders from his body with his ſword, and hurt the other in the face: ſo that he made him turne his backe, and at the length ſaued him ſelfe, by meanes of his companions that came to helpe him. And in BRITAYNE alſo, when the Captaines of the bandes were driuen into a marriſſe or bogge full of mire and durt, and that the enemies did fiercely aſſaile them there: Cæſar then ſtanding to view the battell, hee ſaw a priuate ſouldier of his thruſt in among the Captaines, and fought ſo valiantlie in their defence, that at the length hee draue the barbarous people to flie, and by his meanes ſaued the Captaines, which otherwiſe were in great daunger to haue bene caſt away.

The loue and reſpect of Cæſars ſouldiers vnto him.

Then this ſouldier being the hindemoſt man of all the Captaines, marching with great paine through the mire and durt, halfe ſwimming, and halfe a foote: in the end got to the other ſide, but left his ſhield behinde him. Cæſar wondering at his noble courage, ranne to him with ioy to imbrace him. But the poore ſouldier hanging downe his head, the water ſtanding in his eyes, fell downe at Cæſars feete, and beſought him to pardon him, for that he had lef his target behinde him. And in AFRICKE alſo, Scipio hauing taken one of Cæſars ſhippes, and Granius Petronius abord on her amongeſt other, not long before choſen Treaſurer: hee put all the reſt to the ſword but him, and ſayed he would giue him his life. But Petronius anſwered him againe: that Cæſars ſouldiers did not vſe to haue their liues giuen them, but to giue others their liues: and with thoſe wordes he drew his ſword, and thruſt him ſelfe through. Now Cæſars ſelfe did breede this noble courage and life in them. Firſt, for that he gaue them bountifully, and did honor them alſo, ſhewing thereby, that he did not heape vp riches in the wars to maintaine his life afterwardes in wantonneſſe and pleaſure, but that he did keepe it in ſtore, honourably to reward their valiant ſeruice: and that by ſo much hee thought him ſelfe rich, by how much he was liberall in rewarding of them that had deſerued it. Furthermore, they did not wonder ſo much at his valiantneſſe in putting him ſelfe at euery inſtant in ſuch manifeſt daunger, and in taking ſo extreame paines as he did, knowing that it was his greedy deſire of honor that ſet him a fire, and pricked him forward to doe it: but that hee alwaies continued all labour and hardneſſe, more then his body could beare, that filled them all with admiration. For, concerning the conſtitution of his body, hee was leane, white, and ſoft skinned, and often ſubiect to headache, and otherwhile to the falling ſicknes: (the which tooke him the firſt time, as it is reported, in CORDVBA, a city of SPAINE) but yet therefore yeelded not to the diſeaſe of his body, to make it a cloke to cheriſhe him withall, but contrarily, tooke the paines of warre, as a medicine to cure his ſicke body fighting alwayes with his diſeaſe, trauelling continually, liuing ſoberly, and commonly lying abroad in the field. For the moſt nights he ſlept in his coch or litter, and thereby beſtowed his reſt, to make him alwayes able to doe ſome thing: and in the day time, he would trauell vp and downe the country to ſee townes, caſtels, and ſtrong places. He had alwaies a ſecretarie with him in his coche, who did ſtill write as he went by the way, and a ſouldier behinde him that caried his ſword. He made ſuch ſpeede the firſt time he came from ROME, when he had his office: that in eight daies he came to the riuer of Rhone. He was ſo excellent a rider of horſe from his youth, that holding his handes behinde him, he would galloppe his horſe vppon the ſpurre. In his warres in GAVLE, he did further exerciſe him ſelfe to indite letters as he rode by the way, and did occupy two ſecretaries at once with as much as they could write: and as Oppius writeth, more then two at a time. And it is reported, that Cæſar was the firſt that deuiſed friendes might talke together by writing ciphers in letters, when he had no leyſure to ſpeake with them for his vrgent buſineſſe, and for the great diſtance beſides from ROME. How litle accompt Cæſar made of his diet, this example doth proue it. Cæſar ſupping one night in MILANE with his friend Valerius Leo, there was ſerued ſparrage to his borde, and oyle of perfume put into it in ſtead of ſallet oyle. He ſimply eate it, and found no fault, blaming his friendes that were offended: and told them, that it had bene enough for them to haue abſtained to eate of that they miſliked, and not to ſhame their friend, and how that he lacked good manner that found fault with his friend. An other time as he trauelled through the country, he was driuen by fowle weather on the ſodaine to take a poore mans cottage, that had but one litle cabin in it, and that was ſo narrow, that one man could but ſcarce lye in it. Then he ſayed to his friendes that were about him: greateſt roomes are meeteſt for greateſt men, and the moſt neceſſary roomes for the ſickeſt perſons. And thereuppon he cauſed Oppius that was ſicke to lie there all night: and he him ſelfe, with the reſt of his friends, lay with out dores, vnder the eaſing of the houſe. The firſt warre that Cæſar made with the GAVLES, was with the HELVETIANS and TIGVRINIANS, who hauing ſette fire of all their good cities, to the number of twelue, and foure hundred villages beſides, came to inuade that part of GAVLE which was ſubiect to the ROMAINES, as the CIMBRI and TEVTONS had done before: vnto whom for valiantneſſe they gaue no place, and they were alſo a great number of them (for they were three hundred thouſand ſoules in all) whereof there were a hundred, foure ſcore, and tenne thouſand fighting men. Of thoſe, it was not Cæſar him ſelfe that ouercame the TIGVRINIANS, but Labienus his Lieutenaunt, that ouerthrew them by the riuer of Arax. But the HELVETIANS themſelues came ſodainely with their army to ſet vpon him, as he was going towardes a city of his confederates. Cæſar perceiuing that, made haſt to get him ſome place of ſtrength, and there did ſette his men in battell ray. When one brought him his horſe to gette vp on which he vſed in battell, he ſayed vnto them: when I haue ouercome mine enemies, I will then get vp on him to follow the chaſe, but now lette vs giue them charge. Therewith he marched forward a foote, and gaue charge: and there fought it out a long time, before hee could make them flie that were in battell. But the greateſt trouble he had, was to diſtreſſe their campe, and to breake their ſtrength which they had made with their cartes. For there, they that before had fledde from the battell, did not onely put them ſelues in force, and valiantly fought it out: but their wiues and children alſo fighting for their liues to the death, were all ſlaine, and the battell was ſcant ended at midnight. Now if the act of this victory was famous, vnto that he alſo added an other as notable, or exceeding it. For of all the barbarous people that had eſcaped from this battell, hee gathered together againe aboue a hundred thouſand of them, and compelled them to returne home into their country which they had forſaken, and vnto their townes alſo which they had burnt: becauſe he feared the GERMAINES would come ouer the riuer of Rheyne, and occupie that countrey lying voide. The ſecond warre he made, was in defence of the GAVLES againſt the GERMAINES: although before, he him ſelfe had cauſed Ariouiſtus their king, to be receiued for a confederat of the ROMAINS. Notwithſtanding, they were growen very vnquiet neighbours, and it appeared plainely, that hauing any occaſion offered them to enlarge their territories, they woulde not content them with their owne, but ment to inuade and poſſeſſe the reſt of GAVLE. Cæſar perceiuing that ſome of his Captaines trembled for feare, but ſpecially the young gentlemen of noble houſes of ROME, who thought to haue gone to the warres with him, as only for their pleaſure and gaine: he called them to councell, and commaunded them that were afrayd, that they ſhould depart home, and not put them ſelues in daunger againſt their willes, ſith they had ſuch womaniſh faint hearts to ſhrinke when he had neede of them. And for him ſelfe, he ſayed, hee would ſet vppon the barbarous people, though he had left him but the tenth legion onely, ſaying, that the enemies were no valianter then the CIMBRI had bene, nor that he was a Captaine inferior vnto Marius. This oration being made, the ſouldiers of the tenth legion ſent their Lieutenaunts vnto him, to thanke him for the good opinion he had of them: and the other legions alſo fell out with their Captaines, and all of them together followed him many dayes iourney with good will to ſerue him, vntill they came within two hundred furlongs of the campe of the enemies. Ariouiſtus courage was well cooled, when he ſaw Cæſar was come, and that the ROMAINES came to ſeeke out the GERMAINES, where they thought, and made accompt, that they durſt not haue abidden them: and therefore nothing miſtruſting it would haue come ſo to paſſe, hee wondered much at Cæſars courage, and the more when he ſaw his owne army in a maze withall. But much more did their courages fall, by reaſon of the fooliſhe women propheciers they had among them, which did foretell things to come: who, conſidering the waues and trouble of the riuers, and the terrible noiſe they made running downe the ſtreame, did forewarne them not to fight, vntill the new moone. Cæſar hauing intelligence thereof, and perceiuing that the barbarous people thereuppon ſturred not: thought it beſt then to ſette vppon them, being diſcouragad with this ſuperſtitious feare, rather then looſing time, hee ſhould tarie their leyſure. So he did skirmiſhe with them euen to their fortes, and litle hilles where they lay, and by this meanes prouoked them ſo, that with great furie they came downe to fight. There he ouercame them in battell, and followed them in chaſe, with great ſlaughter, three hundred furlong, euen vnto the riuer of Rheyn: and hee filled all the fieldes thitherto with dead bodies and ſpoyles. Howbeit Ariouiſtus flying with ſpeede, gotte ouer the riuer of Rheyn, and eſcaped with a few of his men. It is ſayed that there were ſlaine foure ſcore thouſand perſons at this battell. After this exploite, Cæſar left his army amongeſt the SEQVANES to winter there:

and he him ſelfe in the meane time, thinking of the affaires at ROME, went ouer the mountaines into GAVLE about the riuer of Po, being part of his prouince which he had in charge. For there, the riuer called Rubico, deuideth the reſt of ITALY from GAVLE on this ſide the Alpes. Cæſar lying there, did practiſe to make friendes in ROME, becauſe many came thither to ſee him: vnto whom he graunted their ſutes they demaunded, and ſent them home alſo, partly with liberall rewards, and partly with large promiſes and hope. Now during all this conqueſt of the GAVLES. Pompey did not conſider how Cæſar enterchaungeably did conquer the GAVLES with the weapons of the ROMAINES, and wanne the ROMAINES againe with the money of the GAVLS. Cæſar being aduertiſed that the BELGÆ (which were the warlikeſt men of all the GAVLES, and that occupied the third part of GAVLE) were all vp in armes, and had raiſed a great power of men together: he ſtraight made towardes them with all poſſible ſpeede, and found them ſpoyling and ouerrunning the countrey of the GAVLES, their neighbours, and confederates of the ROMAINES. So he gaue them battell, and they fighting cowardly, he ouerthrew the moſt part of them which were in a troupe together, and ſlue ſuch a number of them, that the ROMAINES paſſed ouer deepe riuers and lakes a foote, vpon their dead bodies, the riuers were ſo full of them. After this ouerthrow, they that dwelt neareſt vnto the ſea ſide, and were next neighbours vnto the Ocean, did yeeld them ſelues without any compulſion or fight: whereupon, he led his army againſt the NERVIANS, the ſtouteſt warriers of all the BELGÆ. They dwelling in the wodde countrey, had conuayed their wiues, children and goods, into a maruellous great forreſt, as farre from their enemies as they could: and being about the number of ſix ſcore thouſand fighting men and more, they came one day and ſet vppon Cæſar, when his army was out of order, and fortifying of his campe, litle looking to haue fought that day. At the firſt charge, they brake the horſemen of the ROMAINES, and compaſſing in the twelfth and ſeauenth legion, they ſlue all the Centurions and Captaines of the bands. And had not Cæſar ſelfe taken his ſhield on his arme, and flying in amongſt the barbarous people, made a lane through them that fought before him: and the tenth legion alſo ſeeing him in danger, run vnto him from the toppe of the hill where they ſtoode in battell, and broken the ranckes of their enemies: there had not a ROMAINE eſcaped a liue that day. But taking example of Cæſars valiantnes, they fought deſperately beyond their power, and yet could not make the NERVIANS flie, but they fought it out to the death, till they were all in maner ſlaine in the field. It is written that of three ſcore thouſand fighting men, there eſcaped only but fiue hundred: and of foure hundred gentlemen and counſellers of the ROMAINS, but three ſaued. The Senate vnderſtanding it at ROME, ordained that they ſhould do ſacrifice vnto the goddes, and keepe feaſts and ſolemne proceſſions fifteene dayes together without intermiſſion, hauing neuer made the like ordinaunce at ROME, for any victory that euer was obtained. Becauſe they ſaw the danger had bene maruellous great, ſo many nations riſing as they did in armes together againſt him: and further, the loue of the people vnto him made his victory much more famous. For when Cæſar had ſet his affairs at a ſtay in GAVLE, on the other ſide of the Alpes: he alwayes vſed to lye about the riuer of Po in the winter time, to giue direction for the eſtabliſhing of things at ROME, at his pleaſure. For, not onely they that made ſute for offices at ROME were choſen Magiſtrates, by means of Cæſars money which he gaue them, with the which, bribing the people, they bought their voices, and when they were in office, did al that they could to increaſe Cæſars power and greatnes: but the greateſt and chiefeſt men alſo of the nobility, went vnto LVKE vnto him. As Pompey, Craſſus, Appius, Prætor of SARDINIA, and Nepos, Proconſull in SPAINE. Inſomuch that there were at one time, ſix ſcore ſergeaunts carying roddes and axes before the Magiſtrats: and aboue two hundred Senators beſides. There they fell in conſultation, and determined that Pompey and Craſſus ſhould againe be choſen Conſuls the next yeare following. Furthermore, they did appoint, that Cæſar ſhould haue money againe deliuered him to pay his army, and beſides, did proroge the time of his gouernment fiue yeares further. This was thought, a very ſtrange and an vnreaſonable matter vnto wiſe men. For they thẽ ſelues that had taken ſo much money of Cæſar, perſwaded the Senate to let him haue money of the common treaſure, as though he had had none before: yea to ſpeake more plainly, they compelled the Senate vnto it, ſighing & lamenting to ſee the decrees they

they paſſed. Cato was not there then, for they had purpoſly ſent him before into CYPRVS. Howbeit Faonius that followed Catoes ſteppes, when he ſaw that he could not preuaile, nor withſtand them: he went out of the Senate in choller, and cried out amongeſt the people, that it was a horrible ſhame. But no man did hearken to him: ſome for the reuerence they bare vnto Pompey, and Craſſus, and others fauouring Cæſars proceedings, did put all their hope and truſt in him: and therefore did quiet themſelues, and ſturred not. Then Cæſar returning into GAVLE beyond the Alpes vnto his armie, founde there a great warre in the country. For two great nations of GERMANIE had not long before paſſed ouer the riuer of Rheyn, to conquer new landes: and the one of theſe people were called IPES, and the other TENTERIDES. Now touching the battell which Cæſar fought with them, he himſelfe doth deſcribe it in his Commentaries, in this ſort. That the barbarous people hauing ſent Ambaſſadours vnto him, to require peace for a certaine time, they notwithſtanding, againſt law of armes, came and ſet vpon him as he trauelled by the way, inſomuch as eight hundred of their men of armes ouerthrew fiue thouſand of his horſemen, who nothing at all miſtruſted their comming. Againe, that they ſent him other Ambaſſadours to mocke him once more: but that he kept them, and therewith cauſed his whole armie to marche againſt them, thinking it a follie, and madneſſe, to keepe faith with ſuch traiterous barbarous breakers of leagues. Canutius writeth, that the Senate appointing againe to do new ſacrifice, proceſſions, and feaſtes, to giue thankes to the goddes for this victorie: Cato was of contrarie opinion, that Cæſar ſhould be deliuered into the handes of the barbarous people, for to purge their citie and common wealth of this breache of faith, and to turne the curſe vpon him, that was the authour of it. Of theſe barbarous people, which came ouer the Rheyn (being about the number of foure hundred thouſand perſons) they were all in manner ſlaine, ſauing a very few of them, that flying from the battell got ouer the riuer of Rheyn againe, who were receiued by the SICAMBRIANS, an other people of the GERMAINES. Cæſar taking this occaſion againſt them, lacking no good will of himſelfe beſides, to haue the honour to be counted the firſt ROMAINE that euer paſſed ouer the riuer of Rheyn with an army: he built a bridge ouer it. This riuer is maruellous broad, and runneth with great furie. And in that place ſpecially where he built his bridge, for there it is of a great breath from one ſide to the other, and it hath ſo ſtrong and ſwift a ſtreame beſides: that men caſting downe great bodies of trees into the riuer (which the ſtreame bringeth downe with it) did with the great blowes and force thereof maruellouſly ſhake the poſtes of the bridge he had ſet vp. But to preuent the blowes of thoſe trees, and alſo to breake the furie of the ſtreame: he made a pile of great wood aboue the bridge a good way, and did forciblie ramme them in to the bottome of the riuer, ſo that in ten dayes ſpace, he had ſet vp and finiſht his bridge of the goodlieſt carpenters worke, and moſt excellent inuention to ſee to, that could be poſsiblie thought or deuiſed. Then paſſing ouer his armie vpon it, he found none that durſt any more fight with him. For the SVVEVIANS, which were the warlikeſt people of all GERMANIE, had gotten themſelues with their goodes into wonderfull great valleys and bogges, full of woods and forreſts. Now when he had burnt all the coũtry of his enemies, & confirmed the league with the confederats of the ROMAINES: he returned backe againe into GAVLE after he had taried eighteen dayes at the moſt in GERMANIE, on the other ſide of the Rheyn. The iourney he made alſo into ENGLAND was a noble enterpriſe, & very commendable. For he was the firſt that ſailed the Weſt Ocean with an army by ſea, & that paſſed through the ſea Atlanticum with his army, to make warre in that ſo great & famous Iland. (which many auncient writers would not beleeue that it was ſo indeede, & did make them vary about it, ſaying that it was but a fable & a lye) and was the firſt that enlarged the ROMAINE Empire, beyond the earth inhabitable. For twiſe he paſſed ouer the narrow ſea againſt the firme land of GAVLE, and fighting many battels there, did hurt his enemies more, then enrich his owne men: becauſe, of men hardly brought vp, and poore, there was nothing to be gotten. Whereupon his warre had not ſuch ſucceſſe as he looked for, and therefore taking pledges onely of the king, and impoſing a yearely tribute vpon him, to be payed vnto the people of ROME: he returned againe into GAVLE. There he was no ſooner landed, but he founde letters ready to be ſent ouer the ſea vnto him:

in the which he was aduertiſed from ROME, of the death of his daughter, that ſhe was dead with child by Pōpey. For the which, Pompey & Cæſar both, were maruellous ſorowfull: & their friends mourned alſo, thinking that this alliance which mainteined the common wealth (that otherwiſe was very tickle) in good peace and concord, was now ſeuered, and broken a ſunder, and the rather likely, becauſe the child liued not long after the mother. So the common people at ROME tooke the corps of Iulia, in deſpight of the Tribunes, & buried it in the field of Mars. Now Cæſar being driuen to deuide his armie (that was very great) into ſundry garriſons for the winter time, and returning againe into ITALIE as he was wont: all GAVLE rebelled againe, and had raiſed great armies in euery quarter to ſet vpon the ROMAINES, and to aſſay if they could diſtreſſe their forts where they lay in garriſon. The greateſt number & moſt warlike men of theſe GAVLES, that entred into action of rebellion, were led by one Ambiorix: and firſt did ſet vpon the garriſons of Cotta and Titurius, whom they ſlue, & all the ſouldiers they had about them. Then they went with three ſcore thouſand fighting men to beſiege the garriſon which Quintus Cicero had in his charge, and had almoſt taken them by force, becauſe all the ſouldiers were euery man of them hurt: but they were ſo valiant & couragious, that they did more then men (as they ſay) in defending of themſelues. Theſe newes being come to Cæſar, who was farre from thence at that time, he returned with all poſsible ſpeede, and leuying ſeuen thouſand ſouldiers, made haſt to helpe Cicero that was in ſuch diſtreſſe. The GAVLES that did beſiege Cicero, vnderſtanding of Cæſars comming, raiſed their ſiege incontinently, to go and meete him: making account that he was but a handfull in their handes, they were ſo few. Cæſar to deceiue them, ſtill drew backe, and made as though he fled from them, lodging in places meete for a Captaine that had but a few, to fight with a great number of his enemies, and commaunded his men in no wiſe to ſturre out to skirmiſh with them, but compelled them to raiſe vp the rampers of his campe, and to fortifie the gates, as men that were affrayd, becauſe the enemies ſhould the leſſe eſteeme of them: vntill that at length he tooke opportunitie, by their diſorderly cōming to aſſaile the trenches of his campe, (they were growen to ſuch a preſumptuous boldneſſe and brauery) and then ſalying out vpon them, he put them all to flight with ſlaughter of a great number of them. This did ſuppreſſe all the rebellions of the GAVLES in thoſe parties, and furthermore, he himſelfe in perſon went in the middeſt of winter thither, where he heard they did rebell: for that there was come a new ſupply out of ITALIE of three whole legions in their roome, which he had loſt: of the which, two of them Pompey lent him, and the other legion, he himſelfe had leauyed in GAVLE about the riuer of Po. During theſe ſturres, brake forth the beginning of the greateſt & moſt daungerous warre that he had in all GAVLE, the which had bene ſecretly practiſed of long time by the chiefeſt & moſt warlike people of that country, who had leauied a wonderfull great power. For euery where they leauied multitudes of men, and great riches beſides, to fortifie their ſtrong holds. Furthermore the countrey where they roſe, was very ill to come vnto, & ſpecially at that time being winter, when the riuers were froſen, the woodes and forreſts couered with ſnow, the medowes drowned with fluddes, and the fieldes ſo deepe of ſnow, that no wayes were to be found, neither the mariſſes nor riuers to be diſcerned, all was ſo ouerflowen & drowned with water: all which troubles together were enough (as they thought) to keepe Cæſar from ſetting vpon the rebels. Many nations of the GAVLES were of this conſpiracy, but two of the chiefeſt were the ARVERNIANS and CARNVTES: who had choſen Vercingentorix for their Lieutenant generall, whoſe father the GAVLES before had put to death, becauſe they thought he aſpired to make himſelfe king. This Vercingentorix deuiding his armie into diuers partes, and appointing diuers Captaines ouer them, had gotten to take his part, all the people and countries there about, euen as far as they that dwell towards the ſea * Adriatick, hauing further determined (vnderſtāding that ROME did cōſpire againſt Cæſar) to make all GAVLE riſe in armes againſt him. So that if he had but taried a litle longer, vntill Cæſar had entred into his ciuill warres: he had put all ITALIE in as great feare and daunger, as it was when the CIMBRI did come and inuade it. But Cæſar, that was valiant in all aſſayes and daungers of warre, and that was very skilfull to take time and oportunitie: ſo ſoone as he vnderſtood the newes of the rebellion, he departed with ſpeede, and returned backe the ſelfe ſame way which he had gone, making the barbarous people know, that they ſhould deale with an army vnuincible, & which they could not poſsibly withſtand, conſidering the great ſpeede he had made with the ſame, in ſo ſharpe and hard a winter. For where they would not poſsibly haue beleeued, that a poſt or currer could haue come in ſo ſhort a time from the place where he was, vnto them: they wondred when they ſaw him burning & deſtroying the countrey, the townes & ſtrong forts where he came with his army, taking all to mercy that yeelded vnto him: vntill ſuch time as the HEDVI tooke armes againſt him, who before were wont to be called the brethrē of the ROMAINES, & were greatly honored of them. Wherfore Cæſars men whē they vnderſtood that they had ioyned with the rebels, they were maruellous ſory, and halfe diſcouraged. Therupon, Cæſar departing from thoſe parties, went through the cōtry of the LINGONES, to enter the cōtry of the *BVRGONIANS, who were confederats of the ROMAINES, & the neareſt vnto ITALY on that ſide, in reſpect of all the reſt of GAVLE. Thither the enemies came to ſet vpon him, and to enuironne him of all ſides, with an infinit number of thouſands of fighting mē. Cæſar on the other ſide taried their comming, & fighting with them a long time, he made them ſo affrayd of him, that at length he ouercame the barbarous people. But at the firſt, it ſeemeth notwithſtanding, that he had receiued ſome ouerthrow: for the ARVERNIANS ſhewed a ſword hanged vp in one of their temples, which they ſayd they had wonne from Cæſar. Inſomuch as Cæſar ſelfe comming that away by occaſion, ſaw it, and fell a laughing at it. But ſome of his friendes going about to take it away, he would not ſuffer them, but bad them let it alone, and touch it not, for it was a holy thing. Notwithſtanding, ſuch as at the firſt had ſaued themſelues by flying, the moſt of them were gotten with their king into the citie of ALEXIA, the which Cæſar went and beſieged, although it ſeemed inexpugnable, both for the height of the wals, as alſo for the multitude of ſouldiers they had to defend it. But now during this ſiege, he fell into a maruellous great daunger without, almoſt incredible. For an army of three hundred thouſand fighting men of the beſt men that were among all the nations of the GAVLES, came againſt him, being at the ſiege of ALEXIA, beſides them that were within the citie, which amounted to the number of three ſcore and ten thouſand fighting men at the leaſt: ſo that perceiuing he was ſhut in betwixt two ſo great armies, he was driuen to fortifie himſelfe with two wals, the one againſt them of the citie, and the other againſt them without. For if thoſe two armies had ioyned together, Cæſar had bene vtterly vndone. And therefore, this ſiege of ALEXIA, and the battell he wanne before it, did deſeruedly winne him more honour and fame, then any other. For there, in that inſtant and extreme daunger, he ſhewed more valiantneſſe & wiſedome, then he did in any battell he fought before. But what a wōderfull thing was this? that they of the citie neuer heard any thing of them that came to ayde them, vntill Cæſar had ouercome them: and furthermore, that the ROMAINES themſelues which kept watch vpon the wall that was built againſt the citie, knew alſo no more of it, then they, but when it was done, & that they heard the cryes & lamentations of men & women in ALEXIA, when they perceiued on the other ſide of the citie ſuch a nūber of gliſtering ſhields of gold and ſiluer, ſuch ſtore of bloudy corſlets and armours, ſuch a deale of plate and moueables, and ſuch a number of tents and pauilions after the faſhion of the GAVLES, which the ROMAINES had gotten of their ſpoyles in their campe. Thus ſodainly was this great army vaniſhed, as a dreame or viſion: where the moſt part of them were ſlaine that day in battell. Furthermore, after that they within the citie of ALEXIA had done great hurt to Cæſar, and them ſelues alſo: in the end, they all yeelded themſelues. And Vercingentorix (he that was their king and Captaine in all this warre) went out of the gates excellently well armed, and his horſe furniſhed with rich cappariſon accordingly, and rode round about Cæſar, who ſate in his chaire of eſtate. Then lighting from his horſe, he tooke off his cappariſon and furniture, and vnarmed himſelfe, and layed all on the ground, and went and ſate downe at Cæſars feete, and ſayd neuer a word. So Cæſar at length committed him as a priſoner taken in the warres, to lead him afterwardes in his triumph at ROME. Now Cæſar had of long time determined to deſtroy Pompey, & Pompey him alſo. For Craſſus being killed amōgſt the PARTHIANS, who onely did ſee, that one of them two muſt needes fall: nothing kept Cæſar from being the greateſt perſon, but becauſe he deſtroyed not Pompey, that was the greater: neither did any thing let Pōpey to withſtand that it ſhould not come to paſſe, but becauſe he did not firſt ouercome Cæſar, whom only he feared. For till then, Pompey had not long feared him, but alwayes before ſet light by him, thinking it an eaſie matter for him to put him downe when he would, ſith he had brought him to that greatnes he was come vnto. But Cæſar contrarily, hauing had that drift in his head from the beginning, like a wreſtler that ſtudieth for trickes to ouerthrow his aduerſary: he went farre from ROME, to exerciſe himſelfe in the warres of GAVLE, where he did trayne his armie, and preſently by his valiant deedes did increaſe his fame and honour. By theſe meanes became Cæſar as famous as Pompey in his doings, & lacked no more to put his enterpriſe in execution, but ſome occaſions of colour, which Pompey partly gaue him, & partly alſo the time deliuered him, but chiefly, the hard fortune and ill gouernement at that time of the common wealth at ROME. For they that made ſute for honour & offices, bought the voyces of the people with ready money, which they gaue out opẽly to vſury, without ſhame or feare. Therupõ, the common people that had ſold their voyces for money, came to the market place at the day of election, to fight for him that had hyred them: not with their voyces, but with their bowes, ſlings, and ſwords. So that the aſſembly ſeldome time brake vp, but that the pulpit for orations was defiled and ſprinckled with the bloud of them that were ſlaine in the market place, the citie remaining all that time without gouernement of Magiſtrate, like a ſhip left without a Pilote. In ſomuch, as men of deepe iudgement & diſcretion ſeeing ſuch furie and madneſſe of the people, thought themſelues happy if the cõmon wealth were no worſe troubled, then with the abſolute ſtate of a Monarchy & ſoueraign Lord to gouerne thẽ. Furthermore, there were many that were not affrayed to ſpeake it opẽly, that there was no other helpe to remedy the troubles of the cõmon wealth, but by the authority of one man only, that ſhould cõmand them all: and that this medicine muſt be miniſtred by the hands of him, that was the gentleſt Phiſition, meaning couertly Pompey. Now Pompey vſed many fine ſpeaches, making ſemblãce as though he would none of it, and yet cunningly vnder hand did lay all the irons in the fire he could, to bring it to paſſe, that he might be choſen Dictator. Cato finding the marke he ſhot at, & fearing leaſt in the end the people ſhould be compelled to make him Dictator: he perſwaded the Senat rather to make him ſole Conſull, that cõtẽting himſelf with that more iuſt & lawfull gouernmẽt, he ſhould not couet the other vnlawfull. The Senate following his counſell, did not only make him Conſull, but further did proroge his gouernemẽt of the prouinces he had. For he had two prouinces, all SPAYNE, & AFRICK, the which he gouerned by his Lieutenants: & further, he receiued yearely of the common treaſure to pay his ſouldiers a thouſand talents. Hereupon Cæſar tooke occaſion alſo to ſend his men to make ſute in his name for the Conſulſhip, & alſo to haue the gouernement of his prouinces proroged. Pompey at the firſt held his peace. But Marcellus and Lentulus (that otherwiſe hated Cæſar) withſtood them, and to ſhame & diſhonour him, had much needeleſſe ſpeach in matters of weight. Furthermore, they tooke away the freedome frõ the COLONYES which Cæſar had lately brought vnto the city of NOVVM COMVM in GAVLE towards ITALY, where Cæſar not lõg before had lodged them. And moreouer, when Marcellus was Conſull, he made one of the Senators in that citie to be whipped with rods, who came to ROME about thoſe matters: and ſayd, he gaue him thoſe markes, that he ſhould know he was no ROMAINE Citizen, & bad him go his way, & tell Cæſar of it. After Marcellus Conſulſhip, Cæſar ſetting open his cofers of the treaſure he had gotten among the GAVLES, did franckely giue it out amongſt the Magiſtrates at ROME, without reſtraint or ſpare. Firſt, he ſet Curio, the Tribune cleare out of debt: and gaue alſo vnto Paule the Conſull a thouſand fiue hundred talents, with which money he built that notable pallace by the market place, called Paules Baſilicke, in the place of Fuluius Baſilicke. Thẽ Pompey being affrayd of this practiſe, began openly to procure, both by himſelfe and his friends, that they ſhould ſend Cæſar a ſucceſſour: & moreouer, he ſent vnto Cæſar for his two legions of men of warre which he had lent him, for the conqueſt of GAVLE. Cæſar ſent him them againe, and gaue euery priuate ſouldier, two hundred and fifty ſiluer drachmas. Now, they that brought theſe two legions backe from Cæſar, gaue out ill and ſeditious wordes againſt him among the people, and did alſo abuſe Pompey with falſe perſwaſions and vaine hopes, informing him that he was maruellouſly deſired and wiſhed for in Cæſars campe: and that though in ROME, for the malice lice and ſecret ſpight which the gouernours there did beare him, he could hardly obteine that he deſired: yet in GAVLE he might aſſure himſelfe, that all the armie was at his commaundement. They added further alſo, that if the ſouldiers there did once returne ouer the mountaines again into ITALIE, they would all ſtraight come to him, they did ſo hate Cæſar: becauſe he wearied them with too much labour & continuall fight, and withall, for that they ſuſpected he aſpired to be king. Theſe words breeding ſecuritie in Pompey, & a vaine conceit of himſelf, made him negligent in his doings, ſo that he made no preparation for warre, as though he had no occaſion to be afrayed: but onely ſtudied to thwart Cæſar in ſpeach, & to croſſe the ſutes he made. Howbeit Cæſar paſſed not of all this. For the report went, that oue of Cæſars Captaines which was ſent to ROME to proſecute his ſute, being at the Senate doore, & hearing that they denied to proroge Cæſars time of gouernement which he ſued for: clapping his hand vpon his ſword, he ſaid, ſith you will not grant it him, this ſhall giue it him. Notwithſtāding, the requeſts that Cæſar propounded, caried great ſemblance of reaſon with them. For he ſayd, that he was contented to lay downe armes, ſo that Pompey did the like: & that both of them as priuat perſons ſhould come & make ſute of their Citizens to obtaine honorable recompence: declaring vnto them, that taking armes from him, & graunting them vnto Pompey, they did wrongfully accuſe him in going about to make himſelfe a tyrant, and in the meane time to graunt the other meanes to be a tyrant. Curio making theſe offers & perſwaſions opēly before the people, in the name of Cæſar. he was heard with great reioycing and clapping of hands, & there were ſome that caſt flowers and noſegayes vpon him when he went his way, as they commonly vſe to do vnto any man, when he hath obteined victorie, and wonne any games. Then Antonius one of the Tribunes, brought a letter ſent frō Cæſar, and made it openly to be read in deſpight of the Conſuls. But Scipio in the Senate, Pompeys father in law, made this motion: that if Cæſar did not diſmiſſe his army by a certaine day appointed him, the ROMAINES ſhould proclaime him an enemy vnto ROME. Then the Conſuls openly asked in the preſence of the Senatours, if they thought it good that Pompey ſhould diſmiſſe his armie: but few agreed to that demaund. After that againe they asked, if they liked that Cæſar ſhould diſmiſſe his armie: thereto they all in manner aunſwered, yea, yea. But when Antonius requeſted againe that both of them ſhould lay downe armes: then they were all indifferently of his minde. Notwithſtanding, becauſe Scipio did inſolently behaue himſelfe, and Marcellus alſo, who cryed that they muſt vſe force of armes, & not mens opinions againſt a theefe: the Senate roſe ſtraight vpon it without further determination, & men chaunged apparell through the citie becauſe of this diſſention, as they vſe to do in a common calamity. After that, there came other letters from Cæſar, which ſeemed much more reaſonable: in the which he requeſted that they would grant him GAVLE, that lyeth between the mountaines of the Alpes & ITALIE, & ILLYRIA, with two legiōs only, & then that he would requeſt nothing elſe, vntill he made ſute for the ſecōd Cōſulſhip. Cicero the Orator, that was newly come from his gouernement of CILICIA, trauelled to recōcile thē together, & pacified Pompey the beſt he could: who told him, he would yeeld to any thing he would haue him, ſo he did let him alone with his army. So Cicero perſwaded Cæſars friēds to be contented, to take thoſe two prouinces, and ſix thouſand men onely, that they might be friends & at peace together. Pompey very willingly yeelded vnto it, & granted them. But Lentulus the Conſull would not agree to it, but ſhamefully draue Curio and Antonius out of the Senate: whereby they themſelues gaue Cæſar a happy occaſion & colour, as could be, ſtirring vp his ſouldiers the more againſt them, whē he ſhewed them theſe two notable men & Tribunes of the people that were driuen to flie, diſguiſed like ſlaues, in a carriers cart. For, they were driuen for feare to ſteale out of ROME, diſguiſed in that manner. Now at that time, Cæſar had not in all about him, aboue fiue thouſand footemen, and three thouſand horſemen: for the reſt of his armie, he left on the other ſide of the mountaines to be brought after him by his Lieutenants. So, conſidering that for the executiō of his enterpriſe, he ſhould not neede ſo many men of warre at the firſt, but rather ſodainly ſtealing vpon them, to make them afrayed with his valiantneſſe, taking benefit of the oportunitie of time, becauſe he ſhould more eaſily make his enemies afrayed of him, comming ſo ſodainly when they looked not for him, then he ſhould otherwiſe diſtreſſe them, aſſailing them with his whole army, in giuing them leyſure to pro-

uide further for him: he commaunded his Captaines and Lieutenants to go before, without any other armour then their ſwords, to take the citie of ARIMINVM, (a great citie of GAVLE, being the firſt citie men come to, when they come out of GAVLE) with as litle bloudſhed and tumult, as they could poſsible. Then committing that force and army he had with him, vnto Hortenſius one of his friends: he remained a whole day together, openly in the ſight of euery man, to ſee the ſword players handle their weapons before him. At night he went into his lodging, and bathing his body a litle, came afterwards into the hall amongeſt them, and made mery with them a while, whom he had bidden to ſupper. Then when it was well forward night, and very darke, he roſe from the table, and prayed his company to be mery, and no man to ſturre, for he would ſtraight come to them againe: howbeit he had ſecretly before commaunded a few of his truſtieſt friends to follow him, not altogether, but ſome one way, and ſome an other way. He himſelfe in the meane time tooke a coche he had hyred, and made as though he would haue gone ſome other way at the firſt, but ſodainly he turned backe againe towardes the citie of ARIMINVM. When he was come vnto the litle riuer of Rubicon, which deuideth GAVLE on this ſide the Alpes from ITALIE: he ſtayed vpon a ſodaine. For, the nearer he came to execute his purpoſe, the more remorſe he had in his conſcience, to thinke what an enterpriſe he tooke in hand: & his thoughtes alſo fell out more doubtfull, when he entred into conſideration of the deſperatneſſe of his attempt. So he fell into many thoughts with himſelfe, and ſpake neuer a word, wauing ſometime one way, ſometime an other way, and oftentimes chaunged his determination, contrary to himſelfe. So did he talke much alſo with his friends he had with him, amongſt whom was Aſinius Pollio, telling them what miſchieues the beginning of this paſſage ouer that riuer would breed in the world, and how much their poſteritie and them that liued after them, would ſpeake of it in time to come. But at length, caſting from him with a noble courage, all thoſe perillous thoughts to come, & ſpeaking theſe words which valiant men commonly ſay, that attempt daungerous and deſperat enterpriſes, A deſperat man feareth no daunger, come on: he paſſed ouer the riuer, and when he was come ouer, he ranne with his coche and neuer ſtayed, ſo that before day light he was within the citie of ARIMINVM, and tooke it. It is ſaid, that the night before he paſſed ouer this riuer, he dreamed a damnable dreame, that he carnally knew his mother. The citie of ARIMINVM being taken, & the rumour therof diſperſed through all ITALIE, euen as if it had bene õpẽ warre both by ſea & land, & as if all the lawes of ROME, together with the extreme bounds and confines of the ſame had bene broken vp: a man would haue ſayd, that not onely the men and women for feare, as experience proued at other times, but whole cities themſelues leauing their habitations, fled from one place to an other through all ITALIE. And ROME it ſelfe alſo was immediatly filled with the flowing repaire of all the people their neighbours thereabouts, which came thither from all parties like droues of cattell, that there was neither officer nor Magiſtrate that could any more commaund them by authoritie, neither by any perſwaſion of reaſon bridle ſuch a confuſed and diſorderly multitude: ſo that ROME had in manner deſtroyed it ſelfe for lacke of rule and order. For in all places, men were of contrary opinions, & there were daungerous ſturres and tumultes euery where: becauſe they that were glad of this trouble, could keepe in no certaine place, but running vp and downe the citie, when they met with others in diuers places, that ſeemed either to be afrayed or angry with this tumult (as otherwiſe it is impoſsible in ſo great a citie) they flatly fell out with them, and boldly threatned them with that that was to come. Pompey himſelfe, who at that time was not a litle amazed, was yet much more troubled with the ill wordes ſome gaue him on the one ſide, and ſome on the other. For ſome of them reproued him, and ſayd that he had done wiſely, and had payd for his folly, becauſe he had made Cæſar ſo great and ſtrong againſt him and the common wealth. And other againe did blame him, becauſe he had refuſed the honeſt offers and reaſonable conditiõs of peace, which Cæſar had offered him, ſuffering Lentulus the Conſull to abuſe him too much. On the other ſide, Phaonius ſpake vnto him, & bad him ſtampe on the ground with his foote: For Pompey being one day in a brauerie in the Senate, ſayd openly: let no man take thought for preparation of warre, for when he liſted, with one ſtampe of his foote on the groũd, he would fill all ITALY with ſouldiers. This notwithſtãding, Pompey at that time had a greater number of ſouldiers then Cæſar: but they would neuer let him follow his owne determination. For they brought him ſo many lyes, and put ſo many examples of feare before him, as if Cæſar had bene already at their heeles, and had wonne all: ſo that in the end he yeelded vnto them, and gaue place to their furie and madneſſe, determining (ſeeing all things in ſuch tumult and garboyle) that there was no way but to forſake the citie, and thereupon commaunded the Senate to follow him, and not a man to tary there, vnleſſe he loued tyranny, more then his own libertie and the common wealth. Thus the Conſuls themſelues, before they had done their common ſacrifices accuſtomed at their going out of the citie, fled euery man of them. So did likewiſe the moſt part of the Senatours, taking their owne things in haſt, ſuch as came firſt to hand, as if by ſtealth they had taken them from an other. And there were ſome of them alſo that alwayes loued Cæſar, whoſe wits were then ſo troubled & beſides themſelues, with the feare they had conceiued: that they alſo fled, and followed the ſtreame of this tumult, without manifeſt cauſe or neceſsitie. But aboue all things, it was a lamentable ſight to ſee the citie it ſelfe, that in this feare & trouble was left at all aduenture, as a ſhip toſſed in ſtorme of ſea, forſaken of her Pilots, and diſpairing of her ſafetie. This their departure being thus miſerable, yet men eſteemed their baniſhment (for the loue they bare vnto Pompey) to be their naturall countrey, and reckoned ROME no better then Cæſars campe. At that time alſo Labienus, who was one of Cæſars greateſt friends, and had bene alwayes vſed as his Leutenant in the warres of GAVLE, and had valiantly fought in his cauſe: he likewiſe forſooke him then, and fled vnto Pompey. But Cæſar ſent his money and cariage after him, and then went and encamped before the citie of CORFINIVM, the which Domitius kept, with thirty cohorts or enſignes. When Domitius ſaw he was beſieged, he ſtraight thought himſelfe but vndone, and diſpayring of his ſucceſſe, he bad a Phiſition, a ſlaue of his, giue him poyſon. The Phiſition gaue him a drinke which he dranke, thinking to haue dyed. But ſhortly after, Domitius hearing them report what clemencie and wonderfull curteſie Cæſar vſed vnto them he tooke: repented him then that he had drunke this drinke, and began to lament & bewayle his deſperate reſolution taken to dye. The Phiſition did comfort him againe, & told him, that he had taken a drinke, onely to make him ſleepe, but not to deſtroy him. Then Domitius reioyced, and went ſtraight and yeelded himſelfe vnto Cæſar: who gaue him his life, but he notwithſtanding ſtale away immediatly, & fled vnto Pompey. When theſe newes were brought to ROME, they did maruellouſly reioyce and comfort them that ſtill remained there: and moreouer there were of them that had forſaken ROME, which returned thither againe. In the meane time, Cæſar did put all Domitius men in pay, and he did the like through all the cities, where he had taken any Captaines, that leauied men for Pompey. Now Cæſar hauing aſſembled a great & dreadfull power together, went ſtraight where he thought to finde Pompey himſelfe. But Pompey taried not his comming, but fled into the citie of BRVNDVSIVM, from whence he had ſent the two Conſuls before with that army he had, vnto DYRRACHIVM: and he himſelfe alſo went thither afterwardes, when he vnderſtood that Cæſar was come, as you ſhall heare more amply hereafter in his life. Cæſar lacked no good will to follow him, but wanting ſhips to take the ſeas, he returned forthwith to ROME: So that in leſſe thē three ſcore daies, he was Lord of all ITALIE, without any bloudſhed. Who when he was come to ROME, and found it much quieter then he looked for, and many Senatours there alſo, he curteouſly intreated them, and prayed them to ſend vnto Pompey, to pacifie all matters betweene them, vpon reaſonable conditions. But no man did attempt it, either becauſe they feared Pompey for that they had forſaken him, or elſe for that they thought Cæſar meant not as he ſpake, but that they were wordes of courſe, to collour his purpoſe withall. And when Metellus alſo, one of the Tribunes, would not ſuffer him to take any of the common treaſure out of the temple of Saturne, but told him that it was againſt the law: Tuſh, ſayd he, time of warre and law are two things. If this that I do, quoth he, do offend thee, then get thee hence for this time: for warre can not abide this francke and bold ſpeach. But when warres are done, and that we are all quiet againe, then thou ſhalt ſpeake in the pulpit what thou wilt: and yet I do tell thee this of fauour, impayring ſo much my right, for thou art mine, both thou, and all them that haue riſen againſt me, and whom I haue in my handes. When he had ſpoken thus vnto Metellus, he went to the temple doore where the treaſure lay : and finding no keyes there, he cauſed Smithes to be ſent for, and made them breake open the lockes. Metellus thereupon began againe to withſtand him, and certaine men that ſtood by prayſed him in his doing: but Cæſar at length ſpeaking biggely to him, threatned him he would kill him preſently, if he troubled him any more: and told him furthermore, young man, quoth he, thou knoweſt it is harder for me to tell it thee, then to do it. That word made Metellus quake for feare, that he got him away roundly: and euer after that, Cæſar had all at his commaundement for the warres.

From thence he went into SPAYNE, to make warre with Petreius and Varro, Pompeys Lieutenants: firſt to get their armies and prouinces into his handes which they gouerned, that afterwardes he might follow Pompey the better, leauing neuer an enemy behind him. In this iourney he was oftentimes himſelfe in daunger, through the ambuſhes that were layd for him in diuers ſtraunge ſortes and places, and likely alſo to haue loſt all his army for lacke of victuals. All this notwithſtanding, he neuer left following of Pompeys Lieutenants, prouoking them to battell, and intrenching them in: vntill he had gotten their campe and armies into his handes, albeit that the Lieutenants themſelues fled vnto Pompey. When Cæſar returned againe to ROME, Piſo his father in law gaue him counſell to ſend Ambaſſadours vnto Pompey, to treate of peace. But Iſauricus, to flatter Cæſar, was againſt it. Cæſar being then created Dictator by the Senate, called home againe all the baniſhed men, and reſtored their children to honour, whoſe fathers before had bene ſlaine in Syllaes time: and did ſomewhat cut off the vſuries that did oppreſſe them, and beſides, did make ſome ſuch other ordinaunces as thoſe, but very few.

Cæſar and Iſauricus Conſuls.

For he was Dictator but eleuen dayes onely, & then did yeeld it vp of himſelfe, and made himſelfe Conſull, with Seruilius Iſauricus, and after that determined to follow the warres. All the reſt of his armie he left comming on the way behind him, and went himſelfe before with ſix hundred horſe, and fiue legions onely of footemen, in the winter quarter, about the month of Ianuary, which after the ATHENIANS, is called POSIDEON.

Cæſar goeth into the kingdome of Epirus.

Then hauing paſt ouer the ſea Ionium, and landed his men, he wanne the cities of ORICVM and APOLLONIA. Then he ſent his ſhips backe againe vnto BRVNDVSIVM, to tranſport the reſt of his ſouldiers that could not come with that ſpeede he did.

Complaints of the old ſouldiers againſt Cæſar.

They as they came by the way, (like men whoſe ſtrength of body, & luſty youth, was decayed) being wearied with ſo many ſundry battels as they had fought with their enemies: cōplained of Cæſar in this ſort. To what end and purpoſe doth this man hale vs after him, vp and downe the world, vſing vs like ſlaues and drudges? It is not our armour, but our bodies that beare the blowes away: and what, ſhal we neuer be without our harnes on our backes, and our ſhieldes on our armes? ſhould not Cæſar thinke, at the leaſt whē he ſeeth our bloud & wounds, that we are all mortall men, and that we feele the miſerie & paines that other men do feele? And now euen in the dead of winter, he putteth vs vnto the mercy of the ſea and tempeſt, yea which the gods thēſelues can not withſtand: as if he fled before his enemies, & purſued thē not. Thus ſpending time with this talke, the ſouldiers ſtill marching on, by ſmall iourneys came at lēgth vnto the citie of BRVNDVSIVM. But when they were come, & found that Cæſar had already paſſed ouer the ſea, then they ſtraight chaunged their complaints and minds. For they blamed themſelues, & tooke on alſo with their Captaines, becauſe they had not made thē make more haſt in marching: & ſitting vpō the rocks & clyffes of the ſea, they looked ouer the mayne ſea, towards the realme of EPIRVS, to ſee if they could diſcerne the ſhips returning backe, to trāſport thē ouer. Cæſar in the meane time being in the citie of APOLLONIA, hauing but a ſmall army to fight with Pompey, it greeued him for that the reſt of his army was ſo lōg a comming, not knowing what way to take.

In the end he followed a daungerous determination, to imbarke vnknowen in a litle pynnaſe of twelue ores only, to paſſe ouer the ſea again vnto BRVNDVSIVM: the which he could not do without great danger, cōſidering that all that ſea was full of Pompeys ſhips & armies. So he tooke ſhip in the night apparelled like a ſlaue, & went abord vpon this litle pynnaſe, & ſaid neuer a word, as if he had bene ſome poore man of meane cōdition.

The pynnaſe lay in the mouth of the riuer of Anius, the which commonly was wont to be very calme & quiet, by reaſon of a litle wind that came frō the ſhore, which euery morning draue backe the waues farre into the maine ſea. But that night, by ill fortune, there came a great wind from the ſea that ouercame the land wind, in ſomuch as the force & ſtrength of the riuer fighting againſt the violence of the rage and waues of the ſea, the encounter was maruellous daungerous, the water of the riuer being driuen backe, and rebounding vpward, with great noyſe & danger in turning of the water. Therupon the Maiſter of the pynnaſe ſeeing he could not poſsibly get out of the mouth of this riuer, bad the Mariners to caſt about againe, & to returne againſt the ſtreame. Cæſar hearing that, ſtraight diſcouered himſelfe vnto the Maiſter of the pynnaſe, who at the firſt was amazed whẽ he ſaw him: but Cæſar thẽ taking him by the hãd ſayd vnto him, good fellow, be of good cheare, & forwards hardily, feare not, for thou haſt Cæſar & his fortune with thee. Then the Mariners forgetting the danger of the ſtorme they were in, layd on lode with ores & laboured for life what they could againſt the winde, to get out of the mouth of this riuer. But at length, perceiuing they laboured in vaine, and that the pynnaſe tooke in aboundance of water, & was ready to ſincke: Cæſar then to his great griefe was driuẽ to returne backe againe. Who when he was returned vnto his campe, his ſouldiers came in great companies vnto him, & were very ſory, that he miſtruſted he was not able with them alone to ouercome his enemies, but would put his perſon in danger, to go fetch them that were abſent, putting no truſt in them that were preſent. In the meane time Antonius arriued, and brought with him the reſt of his army frõ Brvndvsivm. Then Cæſar finding himſelfe ſtrõg enough, went & offered P*ompey* battell, who was paſsingly well lodged, for victualling of his campe both by ſea & land. Cæſar on the other ſide, who had no great plenty of victuals at the firſt, was in a very hard caſe: in ſomuch as his men gathered rootes, & mingled thẽ with milke, & eate them. Furthermore, they did make bread of it alſo, & ſometime when they skirmiſhed with the enemies, & came alõgeſt by them that watched & warded, they caſt of their bread into their trenches, & ſayd: that as long as the earth brought forth ſuch fruites, they would neuer leaue beſieging of P*ompey*. But P*ompey* ſtraightly commaunded them, that they ſhould neither cary thoſe wordes nor bread into their campe, fearing leaſt his mens harts would faile them, & that they would be affrayd, when they ſhould thinke of their enemies hardneſſe, with whom they had to fight, ſith they were weary with no paynes, no more then brute beaſts. Cæſars men did daily skirmiſh hard to the trenches of P*ompeys* campe, in the which Cæſar had euer the better, ſauing once only, at what time his men fled with ſuch feare, that all his campe that day was in great hazard to haue bene caſt away. For P*ompey* came on with his battell vpon them, and they were not able to abide it, but were fought with, and driuen into their campe, and their trenches were filled with dead bodies, which were ſlayne within the very gate and bulwarkes of their campe, they were ſo valiantly purſued. Cæſar ſtood before them that fled, to make them to turne head againe: but he could not preuaile. For when he would haue taken the enſignes to haue ſtayed them, the enſigne bearers threw them down on the ground: ſo that the enemies tooke two and thirtie of them, and Cæſars ſelfe alſo ſcaped hardly with life. For ſtriking a great bigge ſouldier that fled by him, commanding him to ſtay, and turne his face to his enemy: the ſouldier being affrayed, lift vp his ſword to ſtrike at Cæſar. But one of C*æſars* Pages preuenting him, gaue him ſuch a blow with his ſword, that he ſtrake off his ſhoulder. Cæſar that day was brought vnto ſo great extremitie, that (if Pompey had not either for feare, or ſpightfull fortune, left off to follow his victorie, and retired into his campe, being contented to haue driuen his enemies into their campe) returning to his campe with his friends, he ſayd vnto them: the victorie this day had bene our enemies, if they had had a Captaine, that could haue told how to haue ouercome. So when he was come to his lodging, he went to bed, and that night troubled him more, then any night that euer he had. For ſtill his minde ranne with great ſorow of the fowle fault he had committed in leading of his armie, of ſelfe will to remaine there ſo long by the ſea ſide, his enemies being the ſtronger by ſea: conſidering that he had before him a goodly country, riche and plentifull of all things, and goodly cities of Macedon and Thessalie, and had not the wit to bring the warre from thence, but to loſe his tyme in a place, where he was rather beſieged of his enemies for lacke of victuals, then that he did beſiege them by force of armes. Thus, fretting and chafing to ſee himſelfe ſo ſtraighted with victuals, and to thinke of his ill lucke, he raiſed his campe, intending to go ſet vpon Scipio, making account, that either he ſhould draw P*ompey* to battell againſt his will, whẽ he had not the ſea at his backe to furniſh him with plenty of victuals: or elſe that he ſhould eaſily ouercome Scipio, finding him alone, vnleſſe he were ayded. This remoue of Cæſars campe, did much encourage Pompeys army and his Captaines, who would needes in any caſe haue followed after him, as though he had bene ouercome, and had fled. But for Pompey himſelfe, he would in no reſpect hazard battell, which was a matter of ſo great importance. For finding himſelfe well prouided of all things neceſſary to tary time, he thought it better to draw this warre out in length, by tract of time, the rather to conſume this litle ſtrength that remained in Cæſars army: of the which, the beſt men were maruellous well trained and good ſouldiers, & for valiantneſſe, at one dayes battell, were incomparable. But on the other ſide again, to remoue here & there ſo oft, & to fortifie their campe where they came, and to beſiege any wall, or to keepe watch all night in their armour: the moſt part of thẽ could not do it, by reaſon of their age, being then vnable to away with that paines, ſo that the weakeneſſe of their bodies did alſo take away the life and courage of their harts. Furthermore, there fell a peſtilent diſeaſe among them that came by ill meates hunger draue them to eate: yet was not this the worſt. For beſides, he had no ſtore of money, neither could tell how to come by victuals: ſo that it ſeemed in all likelihood, that in very ſhort time he would come to nothing. For theſe reſpectes, Pompey would in no caſe fight, & yet had he but Cato onely of his mind in that, who ſtucke in it the rather, becauſe he would auoyd ſheding of his coũtry mens bloud. For when Cato had viewed the dead bodies ſlaine in the campe of his enemies, at the laſt skirmiſh that was betweene thẽ, the which were no leſſe then a thouſand perſons: he couered his face, & went away weeping. All other but he, contrarily fell out with him, & blamed him, becauſe he ſo long refrained from battell: and ſome prickt him forward, and called him Agamemnon, and king of kings, ſaying, that he delayed this warre in this ſort, becauſe he would not leaue his authoritie to commaund them all, and that he was glad alwayes to ſee many Captaines round about him, which came to his lodging to honour him, and wait vpon him. And Faonius alſo, a harebraynd fellow, frantickly counterfeiting the round and plaine ſpeach of Cato, made as though he was maruellous angry, and ſayd: is it not great pitie, that we ſhall not eate this yeare of TVSCVLVM figges, and all for Pompeys ambitious minde to raigne alone? & Afranius, who not long before was but lately come out of SPAYNE, (where, becauſe he had but ill ſucceſſe, he was accuſed of treaſon, that for money he had ſold his army vnto Cæſar:) he went buſily aſking, why they fought not with that Marchant, vnto whom they ſayd he had ſold the prouince of SPAYNE? So that Põpey with theſe kind of ſpeaches, againſt his will, was driuen to follow Cæſar, to fight with him. Then was Cæſar at the firſt, maruellouſly perplexed, & troubled by the way: becauſe he found none that would giue him any victuals, being deſpiſed of euery man, for the late loſſe and ouerthrow he had receiued. But after that he had taken the citie of GOMPHES in THESSALY, he did not onely meete with plenty of victuals to relieue his army with: but he ſtraungely alſo did rid them of their diſeaſe. For the ſouldiers meeting with plentie of wine, drinking hard, and making mery: draue away the infection of the peſtilence. For they diſpoſed thẽſelues vnto dauncing, masking, and playing the BACCHERIANS by the way: in ſomuch that drinking druncke they ouercame their diſeaſe, and made their bodies new againe. When they both came into the country of PHARSALIA, and both campes lay before the other: Pompey returned againe to his former determination, and the rather, becauſe he had ill ſignes & tokens of misfortune in his ſleepe. For he thought in his ſleepe that whẽ he entred into the Theater, all the ROMAINES receiued him with great clapping of hands. Whereupon, they that were about him grew to ſuch boldneſſe and ſecuritie, aſſuring themſelues of victorie: that Domitius, Spinther, and Scipio, in a brauerie contended betweene themſelues, for the chiefe Biſhoppricke which Cæſar had. Furthermore, there were diuers that ſent vnto ROME to hyre the neareſt houſes vnto the market place, as being the fitteſt places for Prætors, and Conſuls: making their account already, that thoſe offices could not ſcape them, incontinently after the warres. But beſides thoſe, the young Gentlemen, and ROMAINE Knights were maruellous deſirous to fight, that were brauely mounted, and armed with gliſtering gilt armours, their horſes fat and very finely kept, and themſelues goodly young men, to the number of ſeuen thouſand, where the Gentlemen of Cæſars ſide, were but one thouſand onely. The number of his footemen alſo were much after the ſame reckoning. For he had had fiue & forty thouſand againſt two & twenty thouſand. Wherefore Cæſar called his ſouldiers together, & told them how Cornificius was at hãd, who brought two whole legions, & that he had fifteen enſignes led by Calenus, the which he made to ſtay about MEGARA and ATHENS. Then he asked thẽ if they would tary for that ayde or not, or whether they would rather themſelues alone venture battell. The ſouldiers cryed out to him, and prayed him not to deferre battell, but rather to deuiſe ſome fetch to make the enemy fight aſſoone as he could. Then as he ſacrificed vnto the gods, for the purifying of his army: the firſt beaſt was no ſooner ſacrificed, but his Soothſayer aſſured him that he ſhould fight within three dayes. Cæſar asked him againe, if he ſaw in the ſacrifices, any lucky ſigne, or token of good lucke: The Soothſayer aunſwered, for that, thou ſhalt aunſwer thy ſelfe, better then I can do: for the gods do promiſe vs a maruellous great chaunge, & alteration of things that are now, vnto an other cleane contrary. For if thou beeſt well now, doeſt thou thinke to haue worſe fortune hereafter? & if thou be ill, aſſure thy ſelfe thou ſhalt haue better. The night before the battell, as he went about midnight to viſite the watch, men ſaw a great firebrand in the element, all of a light fire, that came ouer Cæſars campe, and fell downe in Pompeys. In the morning alſo when they relieued the watch, they heard a falſe allarme in the enemies campe, without any apparãt cauſe: which they commõly call, a ſodaine feare, that makes men beſides themſelues. This notwithſtanding, Cæſar thought not to fight that day, but was determined to haue raiſed his campe from thence, & to haue gone towardes the citie of SCOTVSA: and his tents in his campe were already ouerthrowen whẽ his ſcoutes came in with great ſpeed, to bring him newes that his enemies were preparing themſelues to fight. Thẽ he was very glad, & after he had made his prayers vnto the gods to helpe him that day, he ſet his men in battell ray, & deuided them into three ſquadrons: giuing the middle battell vnto Domitius Caluinus, and the left wing vnto Antonius, and placed himſelfe in the right wing, chooſing his place to fight in the tenth legion. But ſeeing that againſt that, his enemies had ſet all their horſemen: he was halfe affrayd when he ſaw the great number of them & ſo braue beſides. Wherfore he cloſely made ſix enſignes to come from the rereward of his battel, whom he had layd as an ambuſh behind his right wing, hauing firſt appointed his ſouldiers what they ſhould do, whẽ the horſemen of the enemies came to giue thẽ charge. On the other ſide, Pompey placed himſelfe in the right wing of his battell, gaue the left wing vnto Domitius, & the middle battel vnto Scipio his father in law. Now all the ROMAINE knights (as we haue told you before) were placed in the left wing, of purpoſe to enuiron Cæſars right wing behind, and to giue their hotteſt charge there, where the generall of their enemies was: making their account, that there was no ſquadrõ of footemẽ how thick ſoeuer they were, that could receiue the charge of ſo great a troupe of horſemen, and that at the firſt onſet, they ſhould ouerthrow them all, & march vpon their bellies. Whẽ the trumpets on either ſide did ſound the allarme to the battell, Pompey cõmanded his footemen that they ſhould ſtãd ſtill without ſturring, to receiue the charge of their enemies, vntill they came to throwing of their darts. Wherefore Cæſar afterwards ſayd, that Pompey had cõmitted a fowle fault, not to conſider that the charge which is giuen running with fury, beſides that it giueth the more ſtrength alſo vnto their blowes, doth ſet mẽs harts alſo a fire: for the cõmon hurling of all the ſouldiers that runne together, is vnto them as a boxe on the eare that ſets men a fire. Then Cæſar making his battell march forward to giue the onſet, ſaw one of his Captaines (a valiant man, and very skilfull in warre, in whom he had alſo great confidence) ſpeaking to his ſouldiers that he had vnder his charge, encouraging them to fight like men that day. So he called him aloude by his name, and ſayd vnto him: well, Caius Craſſinius, what hope ſhall we haue to day? how are we determined, to fight it out manfully? Then Craſſinius caſting vp his hand, aunſwered him aloud: this day, O Cæſar, we ſhall haue a noble victory, and I promiſe thee ere night thou ſhalt prayſe me alyue or dead. When he had told him ſo, he was himſelf the formoſt man that gaue charge vpon his enemies, with his band following of him, being about ſix ſcore men, and making a lane through the foremoſt ranckes, with great ſlaughter he entred far into the battell of his enemies: vntill that valiantly fighting in this ſort, he was truſt in at length in the mouth with a ſword, that the point of it came out againe at his necke. Now the footemen of both battels being come to the ſword, the horſemen of the left wing of Pompey, did march as fiercely alſo, ſpreading out their troupes, to compaſſe in the right wing of Cæſars battell. But before they began to giue charge, the ſix enſignes of footemen which Cæſar had layd in ambuſh behind him, they began to runne full vpon them, not throwing away their darts farre off as they were wont to do, neither ſtriking their enemies on the thighes nor on the legges, but to ſeeke to hit them full in the eyes, & to hurt them in the face, as Cæſar had taught them. For he hoped that theſe luſty young Gentlemen that had not bene often in the warres, nor were vſed to ſee themſelues hurt, & the which, being in the pryme of their youth and beautie, would be affrayd of thoſe hurts, aſwell for the feare of the preſent daunger to be ſlayne, as alſo for that their faces ſhould not for euer be deformed. As indeede it came to paſſe, for they could neuer abide that they ſhould come ſo neare their faces, with the points of their dartes, but hung downe their heads for feare to be hit with them in their eyes, and turned their backes, couering their face, becauſe they ſhould not be hurt. Then, breaking of themſelues, they began at length cowardly to flye, and were occaſion alſo of the loſſe of all the reſt of Pompeys armie. For they that had broken them, ranne immediatly to ſet vpon the ſquadron of the footemen behind, and ſlue them. Then Pompey ſeeing his horſemen from the other wing of his battell, ſo ſcattered and diſperſed, flying away: forgat that he was any more Pompey the great which he had bene before, but rather was like a man whoſe wits the goddes had taken from him, being affrayed and amazed with the ſlaughter ſent from aboue, and ſo retired into his tent ſpeaking neuer a word, and ſat there to ſee the end of this battell. Vntill at length all his army being ouerthrowen, and put to flight, the enemies came, and got vp vpon the rampers and defence of his campe, and fought hand to hand with them that ſtood to defend the ſame. Then as a man come to himſelfe againe, he ſpake but this onely word: What, euen into our campe? So in haſt, caſting off his coate armour and apparell of a generall, he ſhifted him, and put on ſuch, as became his miſerable fortune, and ſo ſtale out of his campe. Furthermore, what he did after this ouerthrow, and how he had put himſelfe into the handes of the ÆGYPTIANS, by whom he was miſerably ſlayne: we haue ſet it forth at large in his life. Then Cæſar entring into Pompeys campe, and ſeeing the bodies layed on the grounde that were ſlayne, and others alſo that were a killing, ſayd, fetching a great ſigh: it was their owne doing, and againſt my will. For Caius Cæſar, after he had won ſo many famous conqueſtes, and ouercome ſo many great battels, had bene vtterly condemned notwithſtanding, if he had departed from his army. Aſinius Pollio writeth, that he ſpake theſe words then in Latin, which he afterwards wrote in Greeke, and ſayth furthermore, that the moſt part of them which were put to the ſword in the campe, were ſlaues and bondmen, and that there were not ſlayne in all, at this battell, aboue ſix thouſand ſouldiers. As for them that were taken priſoners, Cæſar did put many of them amongſt his legions, and did pardon alſo many men of eſtimation, among whom Brutus was one, that afterwardes ſlue Cæſar himſelfe: and it is reported, that Cæſar was very ſory for him, when he could not immediatly be founde after the battell, and that he reioyced againe, when he knew he was aliue, and that he came to yeeld himſelfe vnto him. Cæſar had many ſignes and tokens of victorie before this battell: but the notableſt of all other that hapned to him, was in the citie of TRALLES. For in the temple of victorie, within the ſame citie, there was an image of Cæſar, and the earth all about it very hard of it ſelfe, and was paued beſides with hard ſtone: and yet ſome ſay that there ſprang vp a palme hard by the baſe of the ſame image. In the citie of PADVA, Caius Cornelius an excellent Soothſayer, (a country man and friend of Titus Liuius the Hiſtoriographer) was by chaunce at that time ſet to behold the flying of birdes. He (as Liuie reporteth) knew the very tyme when the battell began, and told them that were preſent, euen now they giue the onſet on both ſides, and both armies do meete at this inſtant. Then ſitting downe againe to conſider of the birdes, after he had bethought him of the ſignes: he ſodainly roſe vp on his feete, and cryed out as a man poſſeſſed with ſome ſpirit, oh, Cæſar, the victorie is thine. Euery man wondring to ſee him, he tooke the crowne he had on his head, and made an othe that he would neuer put it on againe, till the euent of his prediction had proued his art true. Liuie teſtifieth, that it ſo came to paſſe. Cæſar afterwardes giuing freedome vnto the THESSALIANS, in reſpect of the victory which he wan in their coũtry, he followed after Pompey. When he came into Asia, he gaue freedom alſo vnto the Gvidians for Theopompus ſake, who had gathered the fables together. He did releaſe Asia alſo, the third part of the tribute which the inhabitants paid vnto the Romaines. Furthermore, he curteouſly vſed all Pompeys friends & familiars, who wandring vp & downe the country, were taken of the King of Ægypt, and wan them all to be at his cōmandement. Continuing theſe courteſies, he wrote vnto his friends at Rome, that the greateſt pleaſure he tooke of his victorie, was, that he daily ſaued the liues of ſome of his country men that bare armes againſt him. And for the warre he made in Alexandria, ſome ſay, he needed not haue done it, but that he willingly did it for the loue of Cleopatra: Wherein he wan litle honor, and beſides did put his perſon in great danger. Wherefore Cæſar hearing an inckling of it, beganne thenceforth to ſpend all the night long in feaſting and banqueting, that his perſon might be in the better ſafety. But beſides all this, Pothinus the Eunuch ſpake many things openly not to be borne, onely to ſhame Cæſar, and to ſtirre vp the people to enuie him. For he made his ſouldiers haue the worſt and oldeſt wheate that could be gotten: then if they did complaine of it, he told them, they muſt be contented, ſeeing they eate at an other mans coſt. And he would ſerue them alſo at the table in treene & earthen diſhes, ſaying, that Cæſar had away all their gold and ſiluer, for a debt that the kings father (that then raigned) did owe vnto him: which was, a thouſande ſeuen hundred and fiftie Myriades, whereof Cæſar had before forgiuen ſeuen hundred & fiftie thouſand vnto his children. Howbeit then he asked a Myllion to pay his ſouldiers withall. Therto P*othinus* anſwered him, that at that time he ſhould do better to follow his other cauſes of greater importance, & afterwards that he ſhould at more leaſure recouer his debt, with the kings good will and fauour. Cæſar replyed vnto him, and ſaid, that he would not aske counſell of the Ægyptians for his affaires, but would be paid: and therupon ſecretly ſent for Cleopatra which was in the country to come vnto him. She only taking Apollodorus Sicilian of all her friends, tooke a litle bote, & went away with him in it in the night, and came and landed hard by the foote of the caſtle. Then hauing no other mean to come into the court without being knowen, ſhe laid her ſelfe down vpon a mattreſſe or flockbed, which Apollodorus her friend tied and bound vp together like a bundle with a great leather thong, & ſo tooke her vp on his backe, and brought her thus hamperd in this fardle vnto Cæſar, in at the caſtle gate. This was the firſt occaſion (as it is reported) that made Cæſar to loue her: but afterwardes, when he ſaw her ſweete conuerſation and pleaſant entertainment, he fell then in further liking with her, & did reconcile her againe vnto her brother the king, with condition, that they two ioyntly ſhould raigne together. Vppon this new reconciliation, a great feaſt being prepared, a ſlaue of Cæſars that was his barber, the fearfulleſt wretch that liued, ſtil buſily prying and liſtening abroad in euery corner, being miſtruſtfull by nature: found that Pothinus and Achillas did lie in waite to kill his maiſter Cæſar. This being proued vnto Cæſar, he did ſet ſuch ſure watch about the hall, where the feaſt was made, that in fine, he ſlew the Eunuch P*othinus* himſelfe. Achillas on the other ſide, ſaued himſelf and fled vnto the kings campe, where he raiſed a maruellous dangerous and difficult warre for Cæſar: becauſe he hauing then but a few men about him as he had, he was to fight againſt a great and ſtrong citie. The firſt danger he fell into, was for the lacke of water he had: for that his enemies had ſtopped the mouth of the pipes, the which conueyed the water vnto the caſtle. The ſecond danger he had, was, that ſeeing his enemies came to take his ſhippes from him, he was driuen to repulſe that danger with fire, the which burnt the arſenall where the ſhips lay, and that notable librarie of Alexandria withall. The third danger was in the battell by ſea, that was fought by the tower of Phar: where meaning to helpe his men that fought by ſea, he lept from the peere into a bote. It is ſaid, that then holding diuerſe bookes in his hand, he did neuer let them go, but kept them alwayes vpon his head aboue water, and ſwamme with the other hand, notwithſtanding that they ſhot maruellouſly at him, and was driuen ſomtime to ducke into the water: howbeit the bote was drowned preſently. In fine, the king comming to his men that made warre with Cæſar, he went againſt him, and gaue him battell, and wanne it with great ſlaughter, and effuſion of bloud. But for the king, no man could euer tell what became of him after. Thereupon Cæſar made Cleopatra his ſiſter, Queene of ÆGYPT, who being great with childe by him, was ſhortly brought to bed of a ſonne, whō the ALEXANDRIANS named Cæſarion. From thence he went into SYRIA, and ſo going into ASIA, there it was told him that Domitius was ouerthrowen in battell, by Pharnaces the ſonne of king Mithridates, & was fled out of the realme of PONTE, with a few men with him: and that this king Pharnaces greedily following his victorie, was not contented with the winning of BITHYNIA, and CAPPADOCIA, but further would needes attempt to win ARMENIA the leſſe, procuring all thoſe kings, princes, and gouernors of the prouinces thereabouts to rebell againſt the ROMAINES. Therupon Cæſar went thither ſtraight with three legions, and fought a great battell with king Pharnaces by the citie of ZELA, where he ſlew his armie, & draue him out of all the realme of PONTE. And becauſe he would aduertiſe one of his friends of the ſodainneſſe of this victorie, he onely wrote three words vnto Anitius at ROME: Veni, Vidi, Vici: to wit, I came, I ſaw, I ouercame. Theſe three wordes ending all with like ſound and letters in the Latin, haue a certaine ſhort grace, more pleaſant to the eare, then can be well expreſſed in any other tongue. After this, he returned againe into ITALY, and came to ROME, ending his yeare for the which he was made Dictator the ſecond time, which office before was neuer graunted for one whole yeare, but vnto him. Then he was choſen Conſull for the yeare following. Afterwards he was very ill ſpoken of, for that his ſouldiers in a mutine hauing ſlaine two Prætors, Coſconius and Galba, he gaue them no other puniſhment for it, but in ſtead of calling them ſouldiers, he named them citizens, and gaue vnto euery one of them a thouſand Drachmas a man, and great poſſeſſions in ITALIE. He was much miſliked alſo for the deſperate parts and madnes of Dolabella, for the couetouſneſſe of Anitius, for the drunkenneſſe of Antonius and Cornificius, which made Pompeys houſe be pulled downe and builded vp againe, as a thing not bigge enough for him, wherewith the ROMAINES were maruellouſly offended. Cæſar knew all this well enough, and would haue bene contented to haue redreſſed them: but to bring his matters to paſſe he pretended, he was driuen to ſerue his turne by ſuch inſtruments. After the battell of Pharſalia, Cato and Scipio being fled into AFRICKE, king Iuba ioyned with them, & leauied a great puiſant army. Wherefore Cæſar determined to make warre with them, & in the middeſt of winter, he tooke his iorney into SICILE. There, becauſe he would take all hope from his Captaines and ſouldiers to make any long abode there, he went and lodged vpon the very ſands by the ſea ſide, and with the next gale of winde that came, he tooke the ſea with three thouſand footemen, and a fewe horſemen. Then hauing put them a land, vnwares to them, he hoyſed ſaile againe, to go fetch the reſt of his armie, being affraid leaſt they ſhould meete with ſome daunger in paſſing ouer, and meeting them mid way, he brought them all into his campe. Where, when it was tolde him that his enemies truſted in an ancient Oracle, which ſaid, that it was predeſtined vnto the family of the Scipioes to be conquerors in AFRICK: either of purpoſe to mocke Scipio the Generall of his enemies, or otherwiſe in good earneſt to take the benefite of this name (giuen by the Oracle) vnto himſelfe, in all the skirmiſhes and battels fought, he gaue the charge of his army, vnto a man of meane qualitie and account, called Scipio Salutius, who came of the race of Scipio AFRICAN, & made him alwaies his Generall when he fought. For he was eftſoones compelled to wearie and harrie his enemies: for that neither his men in his campe had corne enough, nor his beaſts forrage, but the ſouldiers were driuen to take ſea weedes, called Alga: and (waſhing away the brackiſhneſſe thereof with freſh water, putting to it a litle herbe called dogges tooth) to caſt it ſo to their horſe to eate. For the NVMIDIANS (which are light horſemen, and very readie of ſeruice) being a great number together, would be on a ſodaine in euery place, and ſpred all the fieldes ouer thereabout, ſo that no man durſt peepe out of the campe to goe for forrage. And one day as the men of armes were ſtaying to beholde an AFRICAN doing notable things in dauncing and playing with the flute: they being ſet downe quietly to take their pleaſure of the view thereof, hauing in the meane time giuen their ſlaues their horſes to hold, the enemies ſtealing ſodainly vpon them, compaſſed them in round about, and ſlew a number of them in the field, and chaſing the other alſo that fled, followed them pell mell into their campe. Furthermore had not Cæſar himſelfe in perſon, and Aſinius Pollio with him gone out of the campe to the reſcue, and ſtaied them that fled: the warre that day had bene ended. There was alſo an other skirmiſh where his enemies had the vpper hand, in the which it is reported, that Cæſar taking the enſigne bearer by the coller that caried the Eagle in his hand, ſtayed him by force, and turning his face, told him: ſee, there be thy enemies. Theſe aduantages did lift vp Scipioes heart aloft, and gaue him courage to hazard battell: and leauing Afranius on the one hand of him, and king Iuba on the other hand, both their campes lying neere to other, he did fortifie himſelfe by the citie of THAPSACVS, aboue the lake, to be a ſafe refuge for them all in this battell. But whileſt he was buſie intrenching of himſelfe, Cæſar hauing maruellous ſpeedily paſſed through a great country full of wood, by bypathes which men would neuer haue miſtruſted: he ſtale vpon ſome behinde, and ſodainely aſſailed the other before, ſo that he ouerthrew them all, and made them flie. Then following this firſt good happe he had, he went forthwith to ſet vpon the campe of Afranius, the which he tooke at the firſt onſet, and the campe of the NVMIDIANS alſo, king Iuba being fled. Thus in a litle peece of the day only, he tooke three campes, and ſlew fifty thouſand of his enemies, & loſt but fiftie of his ſouldiers. In this ſort is ſet downe the effect of this battell by ſome writers. Yet others do write alſo, that Cæſar ſelfe was not there in perſon at the execution of this battell. For as he did ſet his men in battell ray, the falling ſickneſſe tooke him, whereunto he was giuen, and therefore feeling it comming, before he was ouercome withall, he was caried into a caſtle not farre from thence, where the battell was fought, and there tooke his reſt till the extremitie of his diſeaſe had left him. Now, for the Prætor and Conſuls that ſcaped from this battell, many of them being taken priſoners, did kill themſelues, and others alſo Cæſar did put to death: but he being ſpecially deſirous of all men elſe to haue Cato aliue in his hands, he went with all poſſible ſpeede vnto the citie of VTICA, whereof Cato was Gouernour, by meanes whereof he was not at the battell. Notwithſtanding being certified by the way that Cato had ſlaine himſelf with his own hands, he then made open ſhew that he was very ſory for it, but why or wherfore, no man could tell. But this is true, that Cæſar ſaid at that preſent time: O Cato, I enuie thy death, becauſe thou diddeſt enuy my glory, to ſaue thy life. This notwithſtanding, the booke that hee wrote afterwards againſt Cato being dead, did ſhew no very great affection nor pitifull hart towards him. For how could he haue pardoned him, if liuing he had had him in his hands: that being dead did ſpeake ſo vehemently againſt him? Notwithſtanding, men ſuppoſe he would haue pardoned him, if he had taken him aliue, by the clemencie he ſhewed vnto Cicero, Brutus, and diuers others that had borne armes againſt him. Some report, that he wrote that booke, not ſo much for any priuate malice he had to his death, as for ciuill ambition, vpon this occaſion. Cicero had written a booke in praiſe of Cato, which he intituled, Cato. This booke in likelihood was verie well liked of, by reaſon of the eloquence of the Orator that made it, and of the excellent ſubiect thereof. Cæſar therewith was maruellouſly offended, thinking that to praiſe him, of whoſe death he was author, was euen as much as to accuſe himſelfe: and therefore he wrote a letter againſt him, and heaped vp a number of accuſations againſt Cato, and intituled the booke Anticaton. Both theſe bookes haue fauourers vnto this day, ſome defending the one for the loue they bare to Cæſar, & others allowing the other for Catoes ſake. Cæſar being now returned out of AFRICKE, firſt of all made an oration to the people, wherein he greatly praiſed and commended this his laſt victorie, declaring vnto them, that he had conquered ſo many countries vnto the Empire of ROME, that he could furniſh the common wealth yearely, with two hundred thouſand buſhels of wheate, and twentie hundred thouſand pound weight of oyle. Then he made three triumphs, the one for ÆGYPT, the other for the kingdome of PONTE, and the third for AFRICKE; not becauſe he had ouercome Scipio there, but king Iuba. Whoſe ſonne being likewiſe called Iuba, being then a young boy, was led captiue in the ſhewe of this triumph. But this his impriſonment fell out happily for him: for where he was but a barbarous

NVMIDIAN, by the ſtudie he fel vnto when he was priſoner, he came afterwards to be reckoned one of the wiſeſt hiſtoriographers of the GRECIANS. After theſe three triumphes ended, he very liberally rewarded his ſouldiers: & to curry fauor with the people, he made great feaſts and common ſports. For he feaſted all the ROMAINES at one time, at two and twenty thouſand tables, and gaue them the pleaſure to ſee diuers ſword plaiers to fight at the ſharpe, & battels alſo by ſea, for the remembrance of his daughter Iulia, which was dead long before. Then after all theſe ſports, he made the people (as the manner was) to be muſtered: and where there were at the laſt muſters before, three hundred and twentie thouſande citizens, at this muſter only there were but a hundred and fiftie thouſand. Such miſery and deſtruction had this ciuill warre brought vnto the common wealth of ROME, and had conſumed ſuch a number of ROMAINES not ſpeaking at all of the miſchieues and calamities it had brought vnto all the reſt of ITALY, and to the other prouinces pertaining to ROME. After all theſe things were ended, he was choſen Conſull the fourth time, & went into SPAINE to make warre with the ſonnes of Pompey: who were yet but very young, but had notwithſtanding raiſed a maruellous great army together, and ſhewed to haue had manhoode and courage worthie to commaund ſuch an armie, inſomuch as they put Cæſar himſelfe in great daunger of his life. The greateſt battell that was fought betwene them in all this warre, was by the citie of MVNDA For then Cæſar ſeeing his men ſorely diſtreſſed, and hauing their hands full of their enemies: he ranne into the preaſe among his men that fought, and cried out vnto them: what, are ye not aſhamed to be beaten and taken priſoners, yeelding your ſelues with your owne handes to theſe young boyes? And ſo, with all the force he could make, hauing with much a doe put his enemies to flight: he ſlew aboue thirtie thouſand of them in the fielde, and loſt of his owne men a thouſand of the beſt he had. After this battell he went into his tent, and told his friends, that he had often before fought for victorie, but this laſt time now, that he had fought for the ſafety of his owne life. He wanne this battell on the very feaſt day of the BACCHANALIANS, in the which men ſay, that Pompey the great went out of ROME, about foure yeares before, to beginne this ciuill warre. For his ſonnes, the younger ſcaped from the battell: but within few dayes after, Diddius brought the head of the elder. This was the laſt warre that Cæſar made. But the triumph he made into ROME for the ſame, did as much offend the ROMAINES, and more, then any thing that euer he had done before: becauſe he had not ouercome Captaines that were ſtrangers, nor barbarous kings, but had deſtroyed the ſonnes of the nobleſt man in ROME, whom fortune had ouerthrowen. And becauſe he had plucked vp his race by the rootes, men did not thinke it meete for him to triumph ſo, for the calamities of his countrie, reioycing at a thing for the which he had but one excuſe to alleage in his defence, vnto the gods and men: that he was compelled to doe that he did. And the rather they thought it not meete, becauſe he had neuer before ſent letters nor meſſengers vnto the common wealth at ROME, for any victorie that he had euer wonne in all the ciuill warres: but did alwaies for ſhame refuſe the glorie of it. This notwithſtanding, the ROMAINES inclining to Cæſars proſperitie, and taking the bit in the mouth, ſuppoſing that to be ruled by one man alone, it would be a good meane for them to take breath a litle, after ſo many troubles and miſeries as they had abidden in theſe ciuill warres: they choſe him perpetuall Dictator. This was a plaine tyranny: for to this abſolute power of Dictator, they added this, neuer to be affraide to be depoſed: Cicero propounded before the Senate, that they ſhould giue him ſuch honors, as were meete for a man: howbeit others afterwards added to, honours beyonde all reaſon. For, men ſtriuing who ſhould moſt honor him, they made him hatefull and troubleſome to themſelues that moſt fauoured him, by reaſon of the vnmeaſurable greatnes and honors which they gaue him. Thereupon, it is reported, that euen they that moſt hated him, were no leſſe fauorers and furtherers of his honors, then they that moſt flattered him: becauſe they might haue greater occaſions to riſe, and that it might appeare they had iuſt cauſe and colour to attempt that they did againſt him. And now for himſelfe, after he had ended his ciuill warres, he did ſo honorably behaue him ſelfe, that there was no fault to be found in him: and therefore mee thinkes, amongſt other honors they gaue him, he rightly deſerued this, that they ſhould build him a temple of clemencie, to thanke him for his courteſie he had vſed vnto them in his victorie. For he pardoned many of them that had borne armes againſt him, and furthermore, did preferre ſome of them to honour and office in the common wealth: as amongſt others, Caſſius and Brutus, both the which were made Prætors. And where Pompeys images had bene throwen downe, he cauſed them to be ſet vp againe: whereupon Cicero ſaid then, that Cæſar ſetting vp Pompeys images againe he made his owne to ſtand the ſurer. And when ſome of his friends did counſell him to haue a guard for the ſafetie of his perſon, and ſome alſo did offer themſelues to ſerue him: he would neuer conſent to it, but ſaide, it was better to die once, then alwaies to be affraide of death. But to win himſelfe the loue and good will of the people, as the honorableſt guard and beſt ſafetie he could haue: he made common feaſts againe, and generall diſtributions of corne. Furthermore, to gratifie the ſouldiers alſo, hee repleniſhed many cities againe with inhabitantes, which before had bene deſtroyed, and placed them there that had no place to repaire vnto: of the which the nobleſt & chiefeſt cities were theſe two, CARTHAGE & CORINTH, and it chaunced alſo, that like as aforetime they had beene both taken and deſtroyed together, euen ſo were they both ſet a foote againe, and repleniſhed with people, at one ſelfe time. And as for great perſonages, he wanne them alſo, promiſing ſome of them, to make them Prætors and Conſuls in time to come, and vnto others, honors and preferrements, but to all men generally good hope, ſeeking all the waies he could to make euery man contented with his raigne. Inſomuch as one of the Conſuls called Maximus, chauncing to die a day before his Conſulſhippe ended, he declared Caninius Rebilius Conſull onely for the day that remained. So, diuers going to his houſe (as the maner was) to ſalute him, and to congratulate with him of his calling and preferrement, being newly choſen officer: Cicero pleaſantly ſaide, come, let vs make haſte, and be gone thither before his Conſulſhippe come out. Furthermore, Cæſar being borne to attempt all great enterpriſes, and hauing an ambitious deſire beſides to couet great honors: the proſperous good ſucceſſe he had of his former conqueſtes bred no deſire in him quietly to enioy the frutes of his labours, but rather gaue him hope of things to come, ſtill kindling more and more in him, thoughts of greater enterpriſes, and deſire of new glory, as if that which he had preſent, were ſtale and nothing worth. This humor of his was no other but an emulation with himſelfe as with an other man, and a certaine contention to ouercome the things he prepared to attempt. For he was determined, and made preparation alſo, to make warre with the PERSIANS. Then when he had ouercome them, to paſſe through HYRCANIA (compaſſing in the ſea Caſpium, and mount Caucaſus) into the realme of PONTVS, and ſo to inuade SCYTHIA: and ouerrunning all the countries, and people adioyning vnto high GERMANY, and GERMANY it ſelfe, at length to returne by GAVLE into ITALIE, and ſo to enlarge the ROMAINE Empire round, that it might be euery way compaſſed in with the great ſea Oceanum. But whileſt he was preparing for this voiage, he attempted to cut the barre of the ſtraight of PELOPONNESVS, in the place where the citie of CORINTH ſtandeth. Then he was minded to bring the riuers of Anienes and Tiber, ſtraight from ROME, vnto the citie of CIRCEES, with a deepe channell and high bankes caſt vp on either ſide, and ſo to fall into the ſea at TERRACINA, for the better ſafety and commoditie of the marchants that came to ROME to trafficke there. Furthermore, he determined to draine and ſeaw all the water of the mariſhes betwixt the cities of NOMENTVM and SETIVM, to make it firme lande, for the benefit of many thouſandes of people: and on the ſea coaſt next vnto ROME, to caſt great high bankes, and to clenſe all the hauen about OSTIA, of rockes and ſtones hidden vnder the water, and to take away all other impedimentes that made the harborough dangerous for ſhippes, and to make new hauens and arſenals meete to harbour ſuch ſhippes, as did continually trafficke thither. All theſe things were purpoſed to be done, but tooke no effect. But, the ordinance of the kalender, and reformation of the yeare, to take away all confuſion of time, being exactly calculated by the Mathematicians, and brought to perfection, was a great commoditie vnto all men. For the ROMAINES vſing then the ancient computation of the yeare, had not only ſuch incertainty and alteration of the moneth and times, that the ſacrifices and yearely feaſtes came by litle and litle to ſeaſons contrarie for the purpoſe they were ordained: but alſo in the reuolution of the ſunne (which is called Annus Solaris) no other nation agreed with them in account: and of the ROMAINES themſelues, only the prieſts vnder-ſtood it. And therefore when they liſted, they ſodainly (no man being able to controll them) did thruſt in a moneth aboue their ordinarie number, which they called in old time,* Mercedonius. Some ſay, that Numa Pompilius was the firſt, that deuiſed this way, to put a moneth betwene: but it was a weake remedie, and did litle helpe the correction of the errors that were made in the account of the yeare, to frame them to perfection. But Cæſar committing this matter vnto the Philoſophers, and beſt expert Mathematicians at that time, did ſet foorth an excellent and perfect kalender, more exactly calculated, then any other that was before: the which the ROMAINES doe vſe vntill this preſent day, and do nothing erre as others, in the difference of time. But his enemies notwithſtanding that enuied his greatneſſe, did not ſticke to finde fault withall. As Cicero the Orator, when one ſaide, to morow the ſtarre Lyra will riſe: yea, ſaid he, at the commandement of Cæſar, as if men were compelled ſo to ſay and thinke, by Cæſars edict.

But the chiefeſt cauſe that made him mortally hated, was the couetous deſire he had to be called king: which firſt gaue the people iuſt cauſe, and next his ſecret enemies, honeſt colour to beare him ill will. This notwithſtanding, they that procured him this honor & dignitie, gaue it out among the people, that it was written in the Sybiline prophecies, how the ROMAINES might ouercome the PARTHIANS, if they made warre with them, and were led by a king, but otherwiſe that they were vnconquerable. And furthermore they were ſo bold beſides, that Cæſar returning to ROME from the citie of ALBA, when they came to ſalute him, they called him king. But the people being offended, and Cæſar alſo angry, he ſaid he was not called king, but Cæſar. Then euery man keeping ſilence, he went his way heauy & ſorowfull. When they had decreed diuers honors for him in the Senate, the Conſuls and Prætors accõpanied with the whole aſſembly of the Senate, went vnto him in the market place, where he was ſet by the pulpit for orations, to tell him what honors they had decreed for him in his abſence. But he ſitting ſtill in his maieſtie, diſdaining to riſe vp vnto them when they came in, as if they had bene priuate men, anſwered them: that his honours had more neede to be cut off than enlarged. This did not onely offend the Senate, but the common people alſo, to ſee that he ſhould ſo lightly eſteeme of the Magiſtrates of the common wealth: inſomuch as euerie man that might lawfully goe his way, departed thence very ſorrowfully. Thereupon alſo Cæſar riſing, departed home to his houſe, and tearing open his dublet coller, making his necke bare, he cried out aloud to his friendes, that his throte was readie to offer to any man that would come and cut it. Notwithſtanding, it is reported, that afterwards to excuſe this follie, he imputed it to his diſeaſe, ſaying, that their wittes are not perfit which haue his diſeaſe of the falling euil, when ſtanding on their feete they ſpeake to the common people, but are ſoone troubled with a trembling of their bodie, and a ſodaine dimneſſe and guidineſſe. But that was not true. For he would haue riſen vp to the Senate, but Cornelius Balbus one of his friends (but rather a flatterer) would not let him, ſaying: what, doe you not remember that you are Cæſar, and will you not let them reuerence you, and doe their dueties? Beſides theſe occaſions and offences, there followed alſo his ſhame and reproach, abuſing the Tribunes of the people in this ſort.

At that time, the feaſt Lupercalia was celebrated, the which in olde time men ſay was the feaſt of ſheapheards or heard men, and is much like vnto the feaſt of the LYCÆIANS in ARCADIA. But howſoeuer it is, that day there are diuers noble mens ſonnes, young men, (and ſome of them Magiſtrates themſelues that gouerne then) which run naked through the citie, ſtriking in ſport them they meete in their way, with leather thongs, haire and all on, to make them giue place. And many noble women and gentle women alſo, goe of purpoſe to ſtand in their way, and doe put forth their handes to be ſtriken, as ſchollers hold them out to their ſchoolemaſter, to be ſtriken with the ferula: perſwading themſelues that being with childe, they ſhall haue good deliuerie, and alſo being barren, that it will make them to conceiue with childe. Cæſar ſate to beholde that ſport vpon the pulpit for orations, in a chaire of golde, apparelled in triumphing manner.

Antonius who was Conſull at that time, was one of them that ranne this holy courſe. So when he came into the market place, the people made a lane for him to runne at libertie, and he came to Cæſar, and preſented him a Diademe wreathed about with laurell. Whereupon there roſe a certaine cry of reioycing, not very great, done onely by a few, appointed for the purpoſe. But when Cæſar refuſed the Diademe, then all the people together made an outcery of ioy. Then Antonius offering it him again, there was a ſecond ſhout of ioy, but yet of a few. But when Cæſar refuſed it againe the ſecond time, then all the whole people ſhouted. Cæſar hauing made this proofe, found that the people did not like of it, and thereupon roſe out of his chaire, and commanded the crowne to be caried vnto Iupiter in the Capitoll. After that, there were ſet vp images of Cæſar in the city with Diadems vpon their heades, like kings. Thoſe, the two Tribunes, Flauius and Marullus, went and pulled downe: and furthermore, meeting with them that firſt ſaluted Cæſar as king, they committed them to priſon. The people followed them reioycing at it, and called them Brutes: becauſe of Brutus, who had in old time driuen the kings out of ROME, and that brought the kingdome of one perſon, vnto the gouernment of the Senate and people. Cæſar was ſo offended withall, that he depriued Marullus and Flauius of their Tribuneſhips, and accuſing them, he ſpake alſo againſt the people, and called them Bruti, and Cumani, to wit, beaſts, and fooles. Hereuppon the people went ſtraight vnto Marcus Brutus, who from his father came of the firſt Brutus, and by his mother, of the houſe of the Seruilians, a noble houſe as any was in ROME, and was alſo nephew and ſonne in law of Marcus Cato. Notwithſtanding, the great honors and fauor Cæſar ſhewed vnto him, kept him backe that of him ſelfe alone, hee did not conſpire nor conſent to depoſe him of his kingdome. For Cæſar did not onely ſaue his life, after the battell of Pharſalia when Pompey fled, and did at his requeſt alſo ſaue many moe of his friends beſides: but furthermore, he put a maruellous confidence in him. For he had already preferred him to the Pretorſhip for that yeare, and furthermore was appointed to be Conſull, the fourth year after that, hauing through Cæſars friendſhip, obtained it before Caſsius, who likewiſe made ſute for the ſame: and Cæſar alſo, as it is reported, ſayd in this contention, in deed Caſsius hath alleaged beſt reaſon, but yet ſhall he not be choſen before Brutus. Some one day accuſing Brutus while hee practiſed this conſpiracy, Cæſar would not heare of it, but clapping his hand on his body, told them, Brutus will looke for this skinne: meaning thereby, that Brutus for his vertue, deſerued to rule after him, but yet, that for ambitions ſake, hee would not ſhew him ſelfe vnthankefull or diſhonorable. Now they that deſired chaunge, and wiſhed Brutus onely their Prince and Gouernor aboue all other: they durſt not come to him them ſelues to tell him what they would haue him to doe, but in the night did caſt ſundry papers into the Prætors ſeate where hee gaue audience, and the moſt of them to this effect. Thou ſleepeſt Brutus, and art not Brutus in deede. Caſsius finding Brutus ambition ſturred vp the more by theſe ſeditious bils, did pricke him forward, and egge him on the more, for a priuat quarrell he had conceiued againſt Cæſar: the circumſtance whereof, we haue ſet downe more at large in Brutus life. Cæſar alſo had Caſsius in great gealouſie, and ſuſpected him much: whereuppon he ſayed on a time to his friends, what will Caſsius doe, thinke ye? I like not his pale looks. An other time when Cæſars friends complained vnto him of Antonius and Dolabella, that they pretended ſome miſchiefe towards him: he anſwered them againe, as for thoſe fat men and ſmooth comed heads, ꝙ hee, I neuer reckon of them: but theſe pale viſaged and carian leane people, I feare them moſt, meaning Brutus and Caſsius. Certainely, deſtiny may eaſier be foreſeene, then auoyded: conſidering the ſtrange and wonderfull ſignes that were ſayd to be ſeene before Cæſars death. For, touching the fires in the element, and ſpirites running vp and downe in the night, and alſo the ſolitary birdes to be ſeene at noone dayes ſitting in the great market place: are not all theſe ſignes perhappes worth the noting, in ſuch a wonderfull chaunce as happened. But Strabo the Philoſopher writeth, that diuers men were ſeene going vp and downe in fire: and furthermore, that there was a ſlaue of the ſouldiers, that did caſt a maruellous burning flame out of his hand, inſomuch as they that ſaw it, thought he had bene burnt, but when the fire was our, it was found he had no hurt. Cæſar ſelfe alſo doing ſacrifice vnto the goddes, found that one of the beaſtes which was ſacrificed had no heart: and that was a ſtrange thing in nature, how a beaſt could liue without a heart. Furthermore, there was a certaine Soothſayer that had giuen Cæſar warning long time afore, to take heede of the day of the Ides of March, (which is the fifteenth of the moneth) for on that day he ſhould be in great daunger. That day being come, Cæſar going vnto the Senate houſe, and ſpeaking merily vnto the Soothſayer, tolde him, the Ides of Marche be come: ſo be they, ſoftly aunſwered the Soothſayer, but yet are they not paſt. And the very day before, Cæſar ſupping with Marcus Lepidus, ſealed certaine letters as he was wont to do at the bord: ſo talke falling out amongeſt them, reaſoning what death was beſt: hee preuenting their opinions, cried out aloud, death vnlooked for. Then going to bed the ſame night as his maner was, and lying with his wife Calpurnia, all the windowes and dores of his chamber flying open, the noiſe awoke him, and made him afraied when he ſaw ſuch light: but more, when he heard his wife Calpurnia, being faſt a ſleepe, weepe and ſigh, and put forth many ſumbling lamentable ſpeaches. For ſhee dreamed that Cæſar was ſlaine, and that ſhee had him in her armes. Others alſo do deny that ſhee had any ſuch dreame, as amoneſt other, Titus Liuius writeth, that it was in this ſort. The Senate hauing ſet vpon the top of Cæſars houſe, for an ornament and ſetting forth of the ſame, a certaine pinnacle: Calpurnia dreamed that ſhee ſaw it broken down, and that ſhee thought ſhee lamented and wept for it. Inſomuch that Cæſar riſing in the morning, ſhee prayd him if it wer poſſible, not to go out of the dores that day, but to adiorne the ſeſſion of the Senate, vntill an other day. And if that hee made no reckoning of her dreame, yet that he would ſearch further of the Soothſayers by their ſacrifices, to know what ſhould happen him that day. Thereby it ſeemed that Cæſar likewiſe did feare and ſuſpect ſomewhat, becauſe his wife Calpurnia vntill that time, was neuer giuen to any feare or ſuperſtition: and then, for that he ſaw her ſo troubled in minde with this dreame ſhee had. But much more afterwards, when the Soothſayers hauing ſacrificed many beaſts one after an other, tolde him that none did like them: then he determined to ſend Antonius to adiorne the ſeſſion of the Senate. But in the meane time came Decius Brutus, ſurnamed Albinus, in whom Cæſar put ſuch confidence, that in his laſt will and teſtament he had appointed him to be his next heire, and yet was of the conſpiracy with Caſsius and Brutus: he fearing that if Cæſar did adiorne the ſeſſion that day, the conſpiracy would out, laughed the Soothſaiers to ſcorne, and reproued Cæſar, ſaying: that he gaue the Senate occaſion to miſlike with him, and that they might thinke hee mocked them, conſidering that by his commaundement they were aſſembled, and that they were ready willingly to graunt him all things, and to proclaime him king of all the prouinces of the Empire of ROME out of ITALY, and that he ſhould weare his Diadem in all other places both by ſea and land. And furthermore, that if any man ſhould tell them from him, they ſhould depart for that preſent time, and returne againe when Calpurnia ſhould haue better dreames: what would his enemies and ill willers ſay, and how could they like of his friends words? And who could perſwade them otherwiſe, but that they would thinke his dominion a ſlauery vnto them, and tyrannicall in him ſelfe? And yet if it be ſo, ſayd he, that you vtterly miſlike of this day, it is better that you goe your ſelfe in perſon, and ſaluting the Senate, to diſmiſſe them till an other time. Therewithall he tooke Cæſar by the hand, and brought him out of his houſe. Cæſar was not gone farre from his houſe, but a bondman, a ſtranger, did what hee could to ſpeake with him: and when he ſaw he was put backe by the great preaſe and multitude of people that followed him, he went ſtraight into his houſe, and put him ſelfe into Calpurniaes hands to be kept, till Cæſar came backe againe, telling her that he had great matters to impart vnto him. And one Artemidorus alſo borne in the Ile of GNIDOS, a Doctor of Rethoricke in the Greeke tongue, who by meanes of his profeſsion was very familiar with certaine of Brutus confederates, and therefore knew the moſt part of all their practiſes againſt Cæſar: came and brought him a litle bill written with his owne hand, of all that he ment to tell him. He marking how Cæſar receiued all the ſupplications that were offered him, and that hee gaue them ſtraight to his men that were about him, preſſed nearer to him, and ſayed: Cæſar, reade this memoriall to your ſelfe, and that quickly, for they be matters of great waight and touch you nearely. Cæſar tooke it of him, but could neuer read it, though he many times attempted it, for the number of people that did ſalute him: but holding it ſtill in his hand, keeping it to him ſelfe, went on withall into the Senate houſe. Howbeit other are of opinion, that it was ſome man elſe that gaue him that memoriall, and not Artemidorus, who did what he could all the way as he went to giue it Cæſar, but he was alwayes repulſed by the people. For theſe things, they may ſeeme to come by chaunce: but the place where the murther was prepared, and where the Senate were aſſembled, and where alſo there ſtood vp an image of Pompey dedicated by him ſelfe amongeſt other ornaments which he gaue vnto the Theater: all theſe were manifeſt proofes that it was the ordinaunce of ſome god, that made this treaſon to be executed, ſpecially in that very place. It is alſo reported, that Caſſius (though otherwiſe hee did fauour the doctrine of Epicurus) beholding the image of Pompey, before they entred into the action of their traiterous enterpriſe: hee did ſoftly call vppon it, to aide him. But the inſtant danger of the preſent time, taking away his former reaſon, did ſodainly put him into a furious paſſion, and made him like a man halfe beſides him ſelfe. Now Antonius, that was a faithfull friend to Cæſar, and a valiant man beſides of his handes, him, Decius Brutus Albinus entertained out of the Senate houſe, hauing begunne a long tale of ſet purpoſe. So Cæſar comming into the houſe, all the Senate ſtoode vp on their feete to doe him honor. Then part of Brutus company and confederates ſtoode round about Cæſars chayre, and part of them alſo came towardes him, as though they made ſute with Metellus Cimber, to call home his brother againe from baniſhment: and thus proſecuting ſtill their ſute, they followed Cæſar, till hee was ſet in his chaire. Who, denying their petitions, and being offended with them one after an other, becauſe the more they were denied, the more they preſſed vppon him, and were the earneſter with him: Metellus at length, taking his gowne with both his hands, pulled it ouer his necke, which was the ſigne giuen the confederats to ſet vppon him. Then Caſca behinde him ſtrake him in the necke with his ſword, howbeit the wound was not great nor mortall, becauſe it ſeemed, the feare of ſuch a deuiliſh attempt did amaze him, and take his ſtrength from him, that he killed him not at the firſt blow. But Cæſar turning ſtraight vnto him, caught hold of his ſword, and held it hard: & they both cried out, Cæſar in Latin: O vile traitor Caſca, what doeſt thou? And Caſca in Greeke to his brother, brother, helpe mee. At the beginning of this ſtur, they that were preſent, not knowing of the conſpiracy, were ſo amazed with the horrible ſight they ſaw: they had no power to flie, neither to helpe him, not ſo much, as once to make any outcry. They on the other ſide that had conſpired his death, cōpaſſed him in on euerie ſide with their ſwords drawen in their hands, that Cæſar turned him no where, but hee was ſtriken at by ſome, and ſtill had naked ſwords in his face, and was hacked and mangled among them, as a wilde beaſt taken of hunters. For it was agreede among them, that euery man ſhould giue him a wound, becauſe all their parts ſhould be in this murther: and then Brutus him ſelfe gaue him one wound about his priuities. Men report alſo, that Cæſar did ſtill defend him ſelfe againſt the reſt, running euery way with his body: but when he ſaw Brutus with his ſword drawen in his hand, then he pulled his gowne ouer his head, and made no more reſiſtaunce, and was driuen either caſually, or purpoſedly, by the counſell of the conſpirators, againſt the baſe whereupon Pompeys image ſtoode, which ran all of a goare bloud till he was ſlaine. Thus it ſeemed, that the image tooke iuſt reuenge of Pompeys enemy, being throwen downe on the ground at his feete, and yeelding vp his ghoſt there, for the number of wounds he had vpon him. For it is reported, that he had three and twenty wounds vpon his body: and diuers of the conſpirators did hurt themſelues, ſtriking one body with ſo many blowes. When Cæſar was ſlaine, the Senate (though Brutus ſtood in the middeſt amongſt them as though he would haue ſaied ſomewhat touching this fact) preſently ran out of the houſe, and flying, filled all the city with maruellous feare and tumult. Inſomuch as ſome did ſhut to their dores, others forſooke their ſhops and warehouſes, and others ranne to the place to ſee what the matter was: and others alſo that had ſeene it, ran home to their houſes again. But Antonius and Lepidus, which were two of Cæſars chiefeſt friends, ſecretly conueying them ſelues away, fled into other mens houſes, and forſooke their own. Brutus and his confederats on the other ſide, being yet hot with this murther they had committed, hauing their ſwords drawen in their hands, came all in a troupe together out of the Senate, and went into the market place, not as men that made countenaunce to flie, but otherwiſe boldly holding vp their heades like men of courage, and called to the people to defend their liberty, and ſtayed to ſpeake with euery great perſonage whom they met in their way. Of them, ſome followed this troupe, and went amongeſt them, as if they had bene of the conſpiracy, and falſely chalenged part of the honor with them: amongeſt them was Caius Octauius, and Lentulus Spinther. But both of them were afterwards put to death, for their vaine couetouſnes of honour, by Antonius, and Octauius Cæſar the younger: and yet had no part of that honor for the which they were put to death, neither did any man beleeue that they were any of the confederats, or of counſell with them. For they that did put them to death, tooke reuenge rather of the wil they had to offend, then of any fact they had committed. The next morning, Brutus and his confederates came into the market place to ſpeake vnto the people, who gaue them ſuch audience, that it ſeemed they neither greatly reproued, nor allowed the fact: for by their great ſilence they ſhewed, that they were ſory for Cæſars death, and alſo that they did reuerence Brutus. Now the Senate granted generall pardon for all that was paſt, and to pacifie euery man, ordained beſides, that Cæſars funerals ſhould bee honored as a god, and eſtabliſhed all things that he had done: and gaue certain prouinces alſo, and conuenient honors vnto Brutus and his confederates, whereby euery man thought all things were brought to good peace and quietnes againe. But when they had opened Cæſars teſtament, and found a liberall legacie of money, bequeathed vnto euery citizen of ROME, and that they ſaw his body (which was brought into the market place) all bemangled with gaſhes of ſwords: then there was no order to keepe the multitude and cōmon people quiet, but they plucked vp formes, tables, & ſtooles, and layed them all about the body, and ſetting them a fire, burnt the corſe. Then when the fire was well kindled, they tooke the firebrands, and went vnto their houſes that had ſlaine Cæſar, to ſet them a fire. Other alſo ran vp and downe the city to ſee if they could meete with anie of them, to cut them in peeces: howbeit they could meete with neuer a man of them, becauſe they had locked them ſelues vp ſafely in their houſes. There was one of Cæſars friends called Cinna, that had a maruellous ſtrange and terrible dreame the night before. He dreamed that Cæſar bad him to ſupper, and that he refuſed, & would not go: then that Cæſar tooke him by the hand, and led him againſt his will. Now Cinna hearing at that time, that they burnt Cæſars body in the market place, notwithſtanding that he feared his dreame, and had an ague on him beſides: he went into the market place to honor his funerals. When he came thither, one of the meane ſort asked him what his name was? He was ſtraight called by his name. The firſt man tolde it to an other, and that other vnto an other, ſo that it ranne ſtraight through them all, that hee was one of them that murdered Cæſar: (for in deede one of the traitors to Cæſar, was alſo called Cinna as him ſelfe) wherefore taking him for Cinna the murderer, they fell vppon him with ſuch fury, that they preſently diſpatched him in the market place. This ſturre and fury made Brutus and Caſsius more afraied, then of all that was paſt, and therefore within few dayes after, they departed out of ROME: and touching their doings afterwards, & what calamity they ſuffered till their deaths, we haue written it at large, in the life of Brutus. Cæſar died at ſix and fifty yeares of age: and Pompey alſo liued not paſſing foure yeares more then he. So he reaped no other fruite of all his raigne and dominion, which he had ſo vehemently deſired all his life, and purſued with ſuch extreame danger: but a vaine name only, and a ſuperficial glory, that procured him the enuy and hatred of his countrey. But his great proſperity and good fortune that fauored him al his life time, did cōtinue afterwards in the reuenge of his death, purſuing the murtherers both by ſea and land, till they had not left a man more to be executed, of all them that were actors or counſellers in the conſpiracy of his death. Furthermore, of all the chaunces that happen vnto men vpon the earth, that which came to Caſsius aboue all other, is moſt to be wōdred at. For he being ouercome in battel at the iorney of Philippes, ſlue him ſelfe with the ſame ſword, with the which he ſtrake Cæſar. Againe, of ſigns in the element, the great comet which ſeuen nights together was ſeene very bright after Cæſars death, the eight night after was neuer ſeene more. Alſo the brightnes of the ſun was darkened, the which all that yeare through roſe very pale, & ſhined not out, whereby it gaue but ſmall heat: therefore the aire being very cloudy and dark, by the weaknes of the heat that could not come forth, did cauſe the earth to bring forth but raw and vnripe fruit, which rotted before it could ripe. But aboue all, the ghoſt that appeared vnto Brutus ſhewed plainely, that the gods were offended with the murther of Cæſar. The viſion was thus. Brutus being ready to paſſe ouer his army from the city of ABYDOS, to the other coaſt lying directly againſt it, ſlept euery night (as his manner was) in his tent, and being yet awake, thinking of his affaires: (for by report hee was as carefull a Captaine, and liued with as litle ſleepe, as euer man did) he thought he heard a noiſe at his tent dore, and looking towards the light of the lampe that waxed very dimme, he ſaw a horrible viſion of a man, of a wonderfull greatnes, and dreadfull looke, which at the firſt made him maruellouſly afraid.

Predictions & foreſhewes of Cæſars death.

But when he ſaw that it did him no hurt, but ſtoode by his bed ſide, and ſayd nothing: at length he asked him what he was. The image aunſwered him: I am thy ill angell, Brutus, and thou ſhalt ſee me by the city of PHILIPPES. Then Brutus replied againe, and ſayed: well, I ſhall ſee thee then. Therewithall, the ſpirite preſently vaniſhed from him. After that time Brutus being in battell neare vnto the city of PHILIPPES, againſt Antonius and Octauius Cæſar, at the firſt battell he wan the victory, and ouerthrowing all them that withſtoode him, he draue them into young Cæſars campe, which he tooke. The ſecond battell being at hand, this ſpirit appeared againe vnto him, but ſpake neuer a word. Thereuppon Brutus knowing hee ſhould die, did put him ſelfe to all hazard in battell, but yet fighting could not be ſlaine. So ſeeing his men put to flight and ouerthrowen, he ranne vnto a litle rocke not farre off, and there ſetting his ſwordes point to his breſt, fell vpon it, and ſlue him ſelſe, but yet as it is reported, with the helpe of his friend that diſpatched him.

THE LIFE OF Phocion.

THe Orator Demades on a time floriſhed in ATHENS, becauſe in all his doings and ſayings in the adminiſtration and gouernment of the common wealth, he alwayes fauored the MACEDONIANS and Antipater: in reſpect whereof he was eftſoones compelled, both in his counſell and lawes, to preferre many things to the diſhonor of his city, ſaying, that they muſt pardon him, becauſe he gouerned the ſhippewracks of his country. This was an arrogant ſpeach: but yet referring it to the gouernment of Phocion he ſayd truely. For in deede Demades ſelfe was the ſhipwracke of the common weale, becauſe hee liued ſo inſolently, and gouerned ſo lewdly. Inſomuch as Antipater ſayd of him, after he was very old: that there was nothing left of him, no more then of a beaſt ſacrificed, but the tongue and belly. But the vertues of Phocion, which had to fight againſt the cruell and bitter enemy of the time, were ſo obſcured by the calamities of GREECE: that his fame was nothing ſo great as he deſerued. For we muſt not credit Sophocles words, making vertue of it ſelſe but weake, in theſe verſes.

VVhen ſtormes of ſore aduerſities (ô king) doe men aſſaile,
It daunts their corage, cuts their combs, and makes their hearts to quaile.

But we muſt onely giue place to fortune, who when ſhee frowneth vppon any good and vertuous men, her force is ſo great, that where they deſerue honor and fauor, ſhe violently heapeth falſe and malicious accuſations againſt them, which maketh their vertue lame, and not of that credite which in deede it deſerueth. And yet it ſeemeth to many, that free cities are moſt cruel vnto their good citizens in time of proſperity: becauſe they flow in wealth & liue at eaſe, which maketh them of haughty minds But it is cleane contrary. For aduerſity commonly maketh mens maners ſower, chollericke, and very haſty: beſides, ſlow to heare, churliſh, and offended with euery litle ſharpe word. For he that correcteth them that offend, ſeemeth to caſt their aduerſity in their teeth: and hee that telleth them plainely of their faultes, ſeemeth alſo to deſpiſe them. For like as honny ſweete by nature, applied vnto woundes, doth bring both ſmart and paine: euen ſo, ſharpe wordes, though profitable, doe bite the vnfortunate man, if they be not tempered with diſcretion & curteſie. And therefore Homer the Poet calleth ſweete and pleaſaunt things μενοεικῆ, as yeelding and not ſtriuing with contrariety, againſt that part of the minde, whereby we be angry and froward. For euen as ſore eyes doe like to looke on blacke and darke colors, and can not abide the bright and glaring: ſo in a city, where for want of foreſight and gouernment, things goe not well, men be ſo diuers and vnwilling to heare of their owne fault and eſtate, that they had rather continue in their folly and daunger, then by ſharpnes of words to be rebuked and reſtored. So that it being impoſſible to amend one fault with a greater, that common wealth muſt be in great danger, that when it hath moſt need of helpe, is lotheſt to receiue any: and he alſo hazardeth him ſelfe, that plainely telleth them their faultes. Like as therefore the Mathematician ſayeth, that the ſunne doth not altogether follow the motion of the higheſt heauen, nor yet is moued directly contrary, but fetching a compaſſe a litle ouerthwart, maketh an oblique circle, and by variety of approching and departing preſerueth all things, and keepeth the world in good temperature. Euen ſo, too ſeuere gouernment, contrarying the peoples mindes in all things, is not good: as alſo it is maruellous daungerous, not to correct offendors when they offend, for feare of the peoples diſpleaſure. But the meane, ſomtime to yeeld vnto the people to make them the more willing to obey, and to grant them things of pleaſure, to demaund of them againe things profitable: that is a good way to gouerne men the better by. For, by gentle meanes they are brought to doe many profitable things, when they ſeeke it not of them, by rigor and authority. In deed this meane is very hard to be obſerued, becauſe authority is hardly tempered with lenity. But when they meete together, there is no harmony more muſicall, nor concordance more perfit then that: and therefore it is ſaid, that thereby God doth gouerne the world, working rather a voluntary, then a forced obedience in men. But this fault of ſeuerenes was in Cato the younger, for he could not faſhion him ſelfe to the peoples maners, neither did they like his: neither did he win his eſtimation in the common wealth by flattering of them. And therefore Cicero ſayed, that he was put by the Conſulſhip, for that he behaued him ſelfe as though hee liued in the common wealth deuiſed by Plato, and not amongeſt the diſordered and corrupt poſterity of Romulus Me thinketh I can liken him properly vnto vntimely fruite: the which though men doe take pleaſure to ſee and wonder at, yet they eate them not. Euen ſo, the auncient ſimplicity of Catoes maner (hauing ſo long time bene out of vſe, and comming then to ſhew it ſelfe in that corrupt time & ill maners of the city) was in deede much praiſe worthy: but yet not the conuenienteſt, nor the fitteſt for him, becauſe it aunſwered nor reſpected not the vſe and manners of his time. For he found not his country (as Phocion did) vtterly deſtroyed, but toſſed in a dangerous tempeſt: and being not of authority like the pilot to take the ſterne in hand, and gouerne the ſhip: hee tooke him ſelfe to tricking the ſailes, and preparing the tacle, ſo to aſſiſt men of greater power. And yet being in no greater place, he ſo thwarted fortune (which ſeemed to haue ſworne the ouerthrowe of the eſtate of ROME) that with much a do, with great difficulty, and a long time after, ſhe executed her malice. And yet the common wealth had almoſt gotten the victory of her, by meanes of Cato and his vertue: with whom I do compare the vertue of Phocion, who yet in my opinion were not in all things alike, neither in their honeſty, nor policy of gouernment. For there is

difference betwixt manhood and manhood,as there was betwixt that of Alcibiades, & that of Epaminondas : betwixt wiſdom and wiſdom,as betwixt that of Ariſtides, & that of Themiſtocles:& betwixt iuſtice and iuſtice, as betwixt that of Numa,& that of Ageſilaus.But the vertues of theſe men(to him that ſhall ſuperficially regard, and lightly conſider them) ſeeme all one in qualitie,in maner,& vſe,both alike in temperance of curteſy with ſeueritie,& manhood with wiſdom:a vigilant care for others, with preſence of corage & ſecuritie of mind for thẽſelues, abhorring all filthines & corruptiõ,and imbraſing cõſtancy & loue of iuſtice : that for any mã to diſcerne the difference betwene thẽ, it requireth an excellent good wit & iudgment. Now touching Cato,euery man knoweth that he was of a noble houſe,as we wil ſhew you hereafter in his life:but for Phocion,I geſſe he came of no baſe parentage. For if he had bene the ſonne of a ſpoonmaker, as Idomeneus teſtifieth : Glaucippus the ſon of Hyperides,hauing in an inuectiue he wrote againſt him,rehearſed all the miſchiefs he could of him,he would not haue forgottẽ to haue vpbraid him with his baſe parẽtage, neither he himſelf alſo(if that had bene true)had bene ſo well brought vp as he was.For when he was but a yong man,he was Platoes ſcholler, and afterwards Xenocrates ſcholler,in the ſchoole of Academia : and ſo,euen from his firſt beginning, he gaue himſelfe to followe them that were learned. For as Duris writeth , neuer ATHENIANS ſaw him weepe nor laugh,nor waſh himſelfe in any common bath,nor his hands out of his ſleeues when he wore a long gown. For when he went to the warres,he would alwaies goe a foote,and neuer wore gowne, vnles it were extreame cold : and then the ſouldiers to mocke him withall, would ſay it was a ſigne of a ſharpe winter, when they ſawe Phocion in his gowne. Now, though in deede he was very courteous and gentle of nature , yet he had ſuch a grymme looke withall,that no man had any deſire to talke with him,but ſuch as were of his familiar acquaintance . And therefore when Chares the Orator one day mocked him for the bending of his browes , and that the ATHENIANS fell in a laughter withall : My Maſters, ꝙ Phocion,the bending of my browes haue done you no hurt, but the foolery and laughing of theſe flatterers , haue made ye oftentimes to weepe. Furthermore, his maner of ſpeech was very profitable, for the good ſentences and counſels he vttered : but it was mixed with an imperious, auſtere, and bitter ſhortnes. For as Zeno the Philoſopher ſaieth , that the wiſe man ſhould temper his wordes with wit and reaſon , before he vtter them : euen ſo was Phocions ſpeech,the which in few words comprehended much matter. And thereupon it ſeemeth that Polyeuctus SPHETTIAN ſaid, that Demoſthenes was an excellent Orator, but in ſpeech, Phocion was very wittie. For like as coynes of gold or ſiluer,the lighter they weigh,the finer they be of goodneſſe : euen ſo the excellencie of ſpeech conſiſteth in ſignifying much by fewe wordes. And touching this matter, it is reported that the Theater being full of people, Phocion walked all alone vpon the ſcaffold where the players played , and was in a great muſe with himſelfe : whereupon, one of his friendes ſeeing him ſo in his muſes, ſaid vnto him , Surely Phocion, thy minde is occupied about ſomewhat. Indeed it is ſo ſayed he : for I am thinking with my ſelfe , if I could abridge any thing of that I haue to ſay to the people. For Demoſthenes ſelfe litle eſteeming all other Orators , when Phocion roſe vp to ſpeake, he would round his friendes in the eares,and told them: See,the cutter of my wordes riſeth. Peraduenture he ment it by his manners alſo: For when a good man ſpeaketh,not a word only,but a wincke of an eie, or a nod of his head, doth counteruaile many artificiall words & ſpeeches of Rethoricians. Furthermore, when he was a young man,he went to the wars vnder Captaine Chabrias,and followed him: of whom he learned to be a perfit ſouldier, and in recompence thereof, hee reformed many of his Captaines imperfections,and made him wiſer then he was. For Chabrias otherwiſe being very dull and ſlothfull of him ſelfe, when he came to fight, he was ſo hot and couragious, that he would thruſt him ſelfe into danger,with the deſperateſt perſons:and therefore for his raſhenes,it afterwards coſt him his life,in the city of CHIO , where lanching out with his gally before the reſt, he preſſed to land in deſpite of his enemies.But Phocion being wiſe to looke to him ſelfe,and very quicke to execute: on the one ſide quickned Chabrias ſlownes , and on the other ſide alſo,by wiſdome cooled his heate and fury. Chabrias therefore,being a good man and curteous,loued Phocion very well,and did preferre him in matters of ſeruice, making him famous amongeſt the GRECIANS, and employed him in his hardieſt enterpriſes. For by his meanes

he atchieued great fame and honor in a battell by ſea, which he wanne by the Ile of Naxos, giuing him the left wing of his armie, on which ſide the fight was ſharpeſt of all the battell, and there he ſooneſt put the enemies to flight. This battell being the firſt which the citie of Athens wanne with their owne men onely, after it had bene taken: gaue the people cauſe to loue Chabrias, and made them alſo to make account of Phocion, as of a noble ſoldier, and worthy to haue charge. This victory was gotten on the feaſt day of the great miſteries, in memory whereof Chabrias did yerely on the ſixtenth day of the moneth Boedromion (now called Auguſt) make all the people of Athens drinke. After that time Chabrias ſending Phocion to receiue the tribute of the Ilanders, their confederates, and the ſhippes which they ſhould ſend him: he gaue him twentie gallies to bring him thither. But Phocion then (as it is reported) ſaid vnto him: if he ſent him to fight with his enemies, he had need to haue more ſhips: but if he ſent him as an Ambaſſador vnto his friendes, then that one ſhippe would ſerue his turne. So he went with one galley onely: and after he had ſpoken with the cities, and courteouſly dealt with the gouernors of euery one of them, he returned backe, furniſhed of their confederates, with a great fleete of ſhippes and money, to carie vnto Athens. So Phocion did not onely reuerence Chabrias while he liued, but after his death alſo he tooke great care of his friends and kinſmen, and ſought to make his ſonne Cteſippus, an honeſt man: whom though he ſaw very wilde and vntoward, yet he neuer left to reforme him, and hide his fault. It is ſayed alſo, that when this yong man did trouble him much with vaine friuolous queſtions, ſeruing then vnder him, he being Captaine, and taking vpon him to giue him counſell, to reproue him, and to teach him the dutie of a Captaine: he could not but ſay, O Chabrias Chabrias: nowe doe I pay for the loue thou diddeſt beare me when thou wert aliue, in bearing with the folly of thy ſonne. But when he ſaw that the heads of the citie of Athens had as it were by lot deuided among themſelues the offices of warre and peace, and that ſome of them, as Eubulus, Ariſtophon, Demoſthenes, Lycurgus, and Hyperides were common ſpeakers and preferrers of matters in councels and Senate: and that others, as Diopithes, Meneſtheus, Leoſthenes, and Chares, became great men by the warres, and had charge of armies: he determined rather to follow the manner of gouernment, of Pericles, Ariſtides, and Solon, as being mingled of both. For either of them ſeemed (as the Poet Archilochus ſaith)

To be both champions ſtout, of Marſis warlike band,
And of the Muſes eke, the artes to vnderſtand.

He knew alſo, that Pallas the goddeſſe and protector of Athens, was called Polemica, and Politica: to wit, ſkilfull to rule both in warre and peace. So, hauing thus diſpoſed of himſelfe in gouernment, he alwaies perſwaded peace and quietnes, and yet was often choſen Captaine, and had charge of armies, being the onely man that of all the Captaines afore him, and in his time, did neuer ſue for charge, neither yet refuſed it at any time, when he was called to ſerue the common wealth. It is certaine that hee was choſen fiue and forty times Prætor, and was alwaies abſent at the elections, but yet ſent for. Whereuppon all the wiſe men wondered to ſee the manner of the people towards him, conſidering that Phocion had neuer done nor ſayed any thing to flatter them withall, but commonly had bene againſt their deſires: and how they vſed other gouernours notwithſtanding, that were more pleaſant and delightfull in their orations, like men to ſport at, as it is ſayed of kings, who after they haue waſhed their handes to go to their meate, doe vſe to haue Ieſters and flatterers to make them merry: but on the other ſide when they had occaſion of warres in deed, how then like wiſe men they could bethinke themſelues, and chooſe the wiſeſt and ſtouteſt man of the city, and that moſt would withſtand their mindes and deſires. For on a time an oracle of Apollo Delphias, being openly red before them, which ſayd, that all the other Athenians being agreed, yet there was one among them that was contrary to all the reſt of the city: Phocion ſtepping forth before them all, bad them neuer ſeeke further for the man, for it was he that liked none of al their doings. An other time he chaunced to ſay his opinion before all the people, the which they all praiſed and approued: but he ſaw they were ſo ſodainely become of his minde, he turned backe to his friends, and aſked them: alas, hath not ſome euill thing ſlipped my mouth vnwares? An other time a generall collection being gathered of the people at Athens, towards the ſolemnizing of a ſacrifice:

fice: other men of his ſtate hauing payed their parte, he was often alſo called vpon to pay his. But he anſwered them againe, aske them that be rich, for it were a ſhame for me to giue you any thing, being yet in this mans debt: pointing to Callicles the vſurer, who had lent him money. But when they left him not for all this, to cry out vpon him for the contribution, he begã to tell them this tale: that on a time there was a coward preparing to goe to the warres, and as he was readie to depart, he heard the rauens what a crying they made, and taking it for an ill ſigne, he put off his harnes, and kept him at home. After that he put on his harnes again, and went on his way towardes the campe: the rauens beganne againe to make a goodlier crie behind him. But thereupon he ſtaied ſtraight, and at length ſayed: ye ſhall crooke as loude as ye liſt, before ye feede on my carkas. Another time the ATHENIANS being in warre vnder his charge, would needes haue him to leade them to giue charge vppon their enemies, but he would not: thereupon they called him coward, and ſayed he durſt not. Well ſayd he againe, it is not you can make me valiant, no more then my ſelfe can make you cowards: and yet one of vs know an other. Another time in a maruellous dangerous time, the people handled him very churliſhly, and would needes haue him preſently deliuer account of his charge: but he anſwered them, O my friendes, firſt ſaue your ſelues. Furthermore, the people being very lowly and humble, for feare, in time of warres: and preſently in peace againe waxing braue in words againſt Phocion, charging him that he had taken the victorie out of their handes: he onely ſaid this to them, you are happy that haue a Captaine that knowes you, elſe you would ſing a new ſong. An other time there was a quarrell betwixt the BOEOTIANS, and them, about their bounds and fronters: the which they would not trie by law, but by battell. But Phocion told them, they did they wiſt not what, & counſelled them rather to fight it out in words, in which they were the ſtronger, & not with weapons, where they were the weaker. Another time they ſo much miſliked his opinion in the aſſembly, that they would not abide to heare him, nor ſuffer him to ſpeak. Well, my Maiſters, ꝙ he then, you may make me do that which is not to be done: but you ſhall neuer compell me againſt my minde, to ſay that which is not to be ſpoken. He would as gallantly alſo gird the Orators his aduerſaries, when they were buſie with him. As on a time he anſwered Demoſthenes, that ſaid vnto him: the people, Phocion will kill thee one day, and if it take them in the heads. Yea thee, ꝙ he, if they be wiſe. Againe, when Polyeuctus SPHETTIAN, in a hot day perſwaded the people of ATHENS to make warre with king Philip, ſweating, and with much a doe fetching his breath, being a fatte man, that he was driuen oftentimes to drinke water, to end his oration: ſurely ſaide Phocion, yee ſhall doe maruellous wiſely, to make warre at ſuch a mans motion. Why, what thinke ye will he do, when he hath his curates and his target vpon him, and that the enemies be ready to fight: that now in making an oration onely before you, which he hath ſtudied long before, is almoſt ſtifled? Another time alſo whẽ Lycurgus in his oratiõ had openly reproued him for many things before the people, and among the reſt, for that Alexander demaunding tenne Citizens of ATHENS to do with them what he thought good, that he had counſelled them to deliuer them: Phocion aunſwered him, I haue oftentimes counſelled them for the beſt, but they would neuer follow my counſell. There was one Archibiades at that time in ATHENS, that counterfeated the LACEDÆMONIAN, with a maruellous long beard, a beggerly cloke, & a ſower looke. Phocion being checkt one day before the people, appealed vnto Archibiades for a witneſſe, to confirme that he ſpake. But he riſing vp, counſelled the people contrarily, to flatter them withall. Phocion perceiuing it, took him by the beard, and ſaid vnto him: alas Archibiades, why diddeſt thou not then clippe thy beard, ſeeing thou wouldeſt needes flatter? There was an other great pleader, one Ariſtogiton, that in all the aſſemblies of the city, did nothing but buze wars continually in their eares. Afterwards when men were to be leauied and muſtered, and their names entred that ſhould goe to the warres: Ariſtogiton came halting into the market place with a ſtaffe in his hand, and both his legs bound vp, to make the people beleeue that he was ſicke and diſeaſed. Phocion ſpying Ariſtogiton far off, cried out to the Clearke that wrote the billes: put in Ariſtogiton, lame, and impudent. So that oftentimes it makes me muſe, how, or wherefore ſo ſharpe and ſeuere a man (as by theſe examples it appeareth hee was) could come to the ſurname of good. Notwithſtanding, in the end I finde it a hard thing, but not impoſſible, that a man ſhould be like wine, both ſweet and ſharpe together: as there are others to the contrary, that at the firſt ſight, ſeeme very courteous and gentle of conuerſation, and vpon better acquaintance, proue churliſh and dogged. It is reported alſo, that Hyperides the Orator one day ſhould ſay to the Athenians: I pray you (my Lords) note me not for my ſharpenes, but conſider if my ſharpenes be without profit. As who ſhould ſay, men are not troubleſom, but for couetouſnes only, and as if the people did not rather feare and hate them, that of inſolencie and malice, did abuſe & contemne their authoritie. Phocion on the other ſide, he neuer did Citizen hurt, for any priuate malice he bare him: but was euer ſharpe and cruell to them, which were againſt any matter he preferred, for the benefit of the common wealth. For in all other things, he ſhewed himſelfe maruellous lowly and curteous to euery bodie, & would be familiar with his aduerſaries, and helpe them if they wanted, or were otherwiſe in danger of diſpleaſure with the ſtate. Inſomuch as his friends therefore reproued him on a time, when he ſpake in the behalfe of a naughtie man, an offender: O ſayed he, honeſt men neede no helpe. An other time, Ariſtogiton the Sycophant, being clapped vp in priſon, ſent vnto Phocion to pray him to come and ſpeake with him, after he was condemned. Phocion went into the priſon to him, though his friends perſwaded him to the contrary, and anſwered them: O let me alone, ſaid he, for where could I ſee Ariſtogiton more gladly then in priſon? Furthermore, when there went any army to ſea out of Athens, if there were any other choſen generall but Phocion: the townes and Ilandes all alongeſt the ſea coaſt, (which were friends and confederates of the Athenians) fortified their wals, filled vp their hauens, and brought their wiues, ſlaues, and cattell, and all their goods into their townes and cities, as if they had bene enemies, & open war proclaimed. Contrarily alſo, if Phocion had bene Captaine and generall, they would ſend out their ſhippes to the ſea to meete him a farre off, crowned with garlands in token of common ioy, and ſo would bring him to their cities. King Philip ſecretly ſeeking to winne the Ile of Evboea, ſent an armie thither out of Macedon, and intiſed the townes by tyrantes to rebell: whereupon Plutarke Eretrian prayed in aide of the Athenians, to take this Iland from the Macedonians, which they daily wanne more and more, if they came not preſently to ayde them. So Phocion was ſent generall thither, but with a few men only, becauſe they made account the men of that countrie would ſtraight ioyne with him, for the good will they bare him. But when he came thither, he found them all traytors, and rebels, and brybed with king Philippes money, which he lauiſhed out amongſt them: ſo that he was brought into great danger. Thereupon he retyred to a litle hill that is ſeuered from the fields of Tamines, with a great large valley, and there fortified himſelfe with that litle armie he had. Then he perſwaded his Captaines not to care for all thoſe rebels, pratlers, and cowards which fled out of their tents, and forſooke their enſignes and Captaines, but that they ſhould let them goe out of the campe where they would. For ſayd he, ſuch diſobedient ſouldiers here will do vs no ſeruice, and moreouer will hinder them that haue good will to ſerue well: and at home alſo, knowing them ſelues in fault, for that they forſooke the campe without licence, they dare not complaine vppon vs. Afterwards when the enemies came to ſet vppon him, he commaunded his men to arme, and put them ſelues in readineſſe, and not to ſturre, vntill he had done ſacrifice: but he ſtaied long before he came, either becauſe he could haue no lucky ſignes of the ſacrifices, or elſe for that he would draw his enemies nearer. Thereupon Plutarke Eretrian ſuppoſing he deferred to march for feare, went him ſelfe firſt into the field, with certaine light horſemen he had in pay. Then the men of armes ſeeing them giue charge, could hold no longer, but followed him alſo, ſtragling out of the campe one after an other diſorderly, and ſo did ſet vpon their enemies. The firſt being ouerthrowen, all the other diſperſed them ſelues, and Plutarke him ſelf fled. Then certaine bands of the enemies thinking all had bin theirs, followed them euen into their campe, and came to throw downe their rampiers. In the meane time, Phocion hauing ended his ſacrifice, the Athenians came out of their campe, and ſet vpon them, and made part of them flie immediatly, and part of them alſo they ſlue hard by the trenches of their campe. Then Phocion commaunded that the battell ſhould ſtand ſtill, to receiue their men that were ſcattered vp and downe the fieldes: and in the meane ſpace, he him ſelfe, with the choiſeſt men of his army gaue charge vppon the enemies. The fight was cruell betweene twene them. For the ATHENIANS ſought very valiantly, venturing their perſons: but of thē all, two young men fighting by their generall, (Glaucus the ſon of Polymedes, and Thallus, the ſonne of Cineas) caried the praiſe awaye. And ſo did Cleophanes that daye alſo ſhewe himſelfe very valiant. For he crying out ſtill vpon the horſemen that fled, & perſwading them to come and helpe their generall that was in danger: brought them backe againe, and thereby gotte the footmen the victorie. After this battell, he draue Plutarke out of ERETRIA, and tooke the caſtell of ZARETRA, ſtanding in a very commodious place for this warre, where the Ile draweth to a ſtraightnes, enuironned on either ſide with the ſea: and would not ſuffer his men to take any GRECIANS priſoners, fearing leaſt the Orators at ATHENS might moue the people ſodainely in a rage, to put them to death. After all theſe things were done, Phocion returned backe to ATHENS. But then did the confederats of the ATHENIANS ſtraight wiſh for his iuſtice and courteſie: and the ATHENIANS themſelues alſo knew his ſkilfulnes and manhood. For his ſucceſſor Moloſſus, that was generall for the reſt of the warre, delt ſo vndiſcreetly: that he himſelfe was taken priſoner there. Then king Philip being put in maruellous great hope, went with all his army into HELLESPONT, perſwading himſelfe, that he ſhould ſtraight take all CHERRONESVS, the cities of PERINTHE and BIZANTIVM. The ATHENIANS therupō determining to ſend aide, to preuent king Philips comming: the Orators made great ſute, that Chares might be choſen Captaine: but he being ſent thither with a good number of ſhippes, did no ſeruice worthy commendation, neither would the cities receiue his nauie into their hauens: but being ſuſpected of euery man, and deſpiſed of his enemies, he was driuen to ſaile vp and downe, and to get money of the allyes. The people being incenſed by the Orators, were maruellouſly offended, & repented themſelues that they had ſent aide vnto the BIZANTINES. Then Phocion riſing vp, ſpake vnto the people, & told them, that it was no reaſon that miſtruſting their confederates they ſhould be offended with them: but to be angry with their Captaines that deſerued to be miſtruſted. For they, ſaid he, doe make your confederates affraid of you, who without you notwithſtanding can not ſaue themſelues. The people changing their mindes by his oration, made Phocion againe their Captaine, and ſent him with an armie into HELLESPONT to helpe their confederates there, which was of great importance to ſaue the city of BYZANTIVM. Furthermore, Phocions fame was ſo great, that Cleon, the greateſt man of vertue and authoritie in BYZANTIVM, and had before bene Phocions companion and familiar in the Academy: he made ſute for him vnto the city. Thē the BYZANTINES would not ſuffer him (though he deſired it) to campe without the wals of their citie, but opening their gates, receiued him in, and mingled the ATHENIANS amongſt them. Who, perceiuing how much the Citizens truſted them, did ſo honeſtly behaue themſelues in their conuerſation amongſt them, that they gaue them no maner of cauſe to complaine of them: and ſhewed themſelues ſo valiant beſides in all battels and conflicts, that Philip (which before was thought dreadfull and inuincible, euery man being afraied to fight any battell with him) returned out of HELLESPONT without any thing done, and to his great diſcredite: where Phocion wanne ſome of his ſhippes, and recouered againe the ſtrong holds, in the which he had placed his garriſons. Furthermore, making diuers inuaſions into his countries, he deſtroied his borders: till that at length he was ſore hurt there, and ſo driuen to returne home againe, by meanes of a great army that came againſt him to defend the country: Shorty after, the MEGARIANS ſecretly ſent vnto him, to deliuer their city into his hands. Phocion fearing if the BOEOTIANS vnderſtood it, that they would preuent him: he called a common aſſembly earely in the morning, and told the people what meſſage the MEGARIANS had ſent vnto him. The people vpon this motion being determined to aid them: Phocion ſtraight ſounding the trumpet at the breaking vp of the aſſembly, gaue them no further leyſure, but to take their weapons, and ſo led them incontinently to MEGARA. The MEGARIANS receiuing him, Phocion ſhut vp the hauen of NISÆA, and brought two long wals from the city vnto it, and ſo ioyned it vnto the ſea: whereby he ſtood not greatly in feare of his enemies by land, and for the ſea, the ATHENIANS were Lordes of it. Now when the ATHENIANS had proclaimed open war againſt king Philip, and had choſen other Captaines in his abſence, and that hee was returned from the Iles: aboue all things, he perſwaded the people (king Philip requiring peace, and greatly fearing the daunger) to accept the conditions of peace. Then one of theſe buſie orators that was ſtill accuſing one or other, ſaid vnto him: why Phociō, how dareſt thou, attēpt to turn the ATHENIANS from war, hauing now their ſwords in their hands? yes truly, ſayd Phocion: though in warre I know I ſhall command thee, and in peace thou wilt command me. But when the people would not harken to him, and that Demoſthenes caried them away with his perſwaſions, who counſelled them to fight with king Philip, as farre from ATTICA as they could: I pray thee frend ꝙ Phocion vnto him, let vs not diſpute where we ſhall fight, but conſider how we ſhall ouercome, the which if we can ſo bring to paſſe, be ſure we ſhall put the warre far enough from vs. For men that are ouercome, be euer in feare and danger, whereſoeuer they be. When the ATHENIANS had loſt a battell againſt Philip, the ſeditious Orators, that hunted after innouation, preferred Charidemus to be choſen generall of the ATHENIANS: whereupon the magiſtrates and Senators being afraid, and taking with them all the Court and Senate of the AREOPAGITS, they made ſuch earneſt ſute to the people, with the teares in their eyes, that at laſt (but with much a doe) they obtained, that the affaires of the citie might be put into Phocions hands and gouernment. He thought good to accept the articles and gentle conditions of peace which Philip offered them. But after that the orator Demades moued that the citie of ATHENS would enter into the common treatie of peace, and cōmon aſſembly of the ſtates of GRECE, procured at king Philips requeſt: Phocion would not agree to it, vntill they might vnderſtand what demaunds Philip would make at the aſſembly of the GRECIANS. When his opinion through the peruerſnes of time could not be liked of them, and that he ſaw the ATHENIANS ſoone after repented them that they did not followe his counſell, when they heard they ſhould furniſh king Philip with ſhips and horſemen: then he told them, the feare whereof ye now complaine, made me to withſtand that, which now ye haue conſented vnto. But ſithence it is ſo that you haue now paſt your conſents, you muſt be contented, and not be diſcouraged at it: remembring that your aunceſtors in times paſt haue ſometime commaunded, and other while obeyed others, and yet haue ſo wiſely and diſcreetely gouerned themſelues in both fortunes, that they haue not onely ſaued their citie, but all GRECE beſides. When newes came of king Philips death, the people for ioy would ſtraight haue made bonfires and ſacrifices to the goddes for the good newes: but Phocion would not ſuffer them, and ſaid, that it was a token of a baſe minde, to reioyce at any mans death, and beſides that, the armie which ouerthrewe you at CHÆRONEA, hath not yet loſt but one man. And when Demoſthenes alſo would commonly ſpeake ill of Alexander, and ſpecially when he was ſo neere THEBES with his armie: Phocion rehearſed vnto him theſe verſes of Homer:

To reioyce at any mans hurt ſheweth a baſe mind, and vile nature.

How great a folly is it for to ſtand
Againſt a cruell king,
VVhich being armd and hauing ſword in hand,
Seekes fame of euery thing?

What, when there is ſuch a great fire kindled, wilt thou caſt the city into it? for my part therefore, though they were willing, yet will I not ſuffer them to caſt them ſelues away: for to that end haue I taken vpon me this charge and gouernment. And afterwards alſo, when Alexander had raſed the city of THEBES, and had required the ATHENIANS to deliuer him Demoſthenes, Lycurgus, Hyperides, and Charidemus, and that the whole aſſembly and councell not knowing what aunſwere to make, did all caſt their eyes vpon Phocion, and cried vnto him to ſay his opinion: he then roſe vppe, and taking one of his friendes vnto him called Nicocles, whom he loued and truſted aboue all men elſe, he ſayed thus openly vnto them. Theſe men whome Alexander requireth, haue brought this city to this extremity, that if he required Nicocles here, I would giue my conſent to deliuer him: For I would thinke my ſelfe happy to loſe my life, for all your ſafety. Furthermore, though I am right heartely ſory (ſaid he) for the poore afflicted THEBANS, that are come into the city for ſuccour: yet I aſſure yee, it is better one city mourne, then two. And therefore I thinke it is beſt to intreate the Conquerour for both, rather then to our certaine deſtruction to fight with him that is the ſtronger. It is ſayed alſo that Alexander refuſed the firſt decree which the people offered him vppon Phocions requeſt, and ſent away the Ambaſſadours, and would not ſpeake with them. But the ſecond, which Phocion himſelfe brought, he tooke: being told by his fathers olde ſeruantes that king Philip made great account of him, whereuppon Alexander, did not onely giue him audience, and grant his requeſt, but further followed his counſell. For Phocion perſwaded him, if he loued quietnes, to leaue warre if he deſired fame, then that he ſhould make warre with the barbarous people, but not with the GRECIANS. So Phocion feeding Alexanders humor with ſuch talke and diſcours as he thought would like him beſt: he ſo altered and ſoftned Alexanders diſpoſitiõ, that when he went from him, he willed him that the ATHENIANS ſhould looke to their affaires, for if he ſhould dye, he knew no people fitter to commaund then they. Furthermore, becauſe he would be better acquainted with Phocion, and make him his friend: he made ſo much of him, that he more honored him, then all the reſt of his friends. To this effect, Duris the hiſtoriographer writeth that when Alexãder was grown very great, and had ouercom king Darius: he left out of his letters this word Chærin (to wit, ioy, & health) which he vſed commonly in all the letters he wrote, and would no more honor any other with that manner of ſalutation, but Phocion, and Antipater. Chares alſo writeth the ſame. And they all doe confeſſe, that Alexander ſent Phocion a great gift out of ASIA, of a hundreth ſiluer talents. This money being brought to ATHENS, Phocion asked them that brought it, why Alexander gaue him ſuch a great reward, aboue all the other Citizens of ATHENS. Becauſe ſayd they, he only eſteemeth thee to be a good, and honeſt man. Phocion replied again, then let him giue me leaue to be that I ſeeme, and am whilſt I liue. The meſſengers would not ſo leaue him, but followed him home to his houſe, where they ſaw his great husbãdry and thriftines. For they foũd his wife her ſelfe baking, & he himſelf drew water before them, out of the well to waſh his feet. But then they were more earneſtly in hand with him than before, and prayed him to take the kings preſent, and were offended with him, ſaying it was a ſhame for Alexanders friend to liue ſo miſerably and beggarly as he did. Then Phocion ſeing a poore olde man goe by, in a threadbare gowne, asked them whether they thought him worſe then he? No, God forbid, anſwered they againe. Then replyed he againe, he liues with leſſe then I doe, and yet is contented, and hath enough. To be ſhort, ſayed he, if I ſhould take this ſumme of money and occupie it not, it is as much as I had it not: on the other ſide, if I occupie it, I ſhall make all the cittie ſpeake ill of the king and me both. So this great preſent was ſent backe from ATHENS, whereby he ſhewed the GRECIANS, that he was richer that needed not ſuch gold and ſiluer, then he that gaue it him. But when Alexander wrote again vnto Phociõ, that he did not reckõ them for his frends, that would take nothing of him: Phocion notwithſtanding would not take the money, but onely requeſted him for his ſake, that he would ſet theſe men at libertie, which were kept priſoners in the citie of SARDIS, for certen accuſations layed againſt them: Echecratides the Rethoritian, Athenodorus borne in the citie of IMBROS, and two CORINTHIANS, Demaratus & Spartus. Alexander preſently ſet them at liberty, & ſent Craterus into MACEDON, cõmanding him to giue Phociõ the choice of one of theſe foure cities of ASIA which he liked beſt: CIOS, GERGITHA, MYLASSIS, ELEA: ſending him worde, that he would be much more angrier with him now, if he did refuſe this offer, than he was at the firſt. But Phocion would neuer accept any one of them: and Alexander ſhortly after died. Phocions houſe is ſene yet at this day in the village of MELITA, ſet forth with plates of copper, but otherwiſe very meane, and without curioſitie. For his wiues he married, there is no mention made of the firſt, ſauing that Cephiſodotus the image grauer was her brother. But for his ſecond wife ſhe was no leſſe famous at ATHENS, for her honeſtie and good houſewiuerie: then Phocion for his iuſtice and equitie. And for proofe thereof, it is reported that the ATHENIANS being one day aſſembled in the Theater, to ſee new tragedies plaied, one of the players when he ſhould haue come vpon the ſcaffold, to haue played his part, asked the ſetter forth of the plaies the apparell of a Queene, and certaine Ladies to waite vppon her, becauſe he was to playe the part of the Queene. The ſetter forth of the plaies denying him, the player went away in a rage, and left the people ſtaring one at another, & would not come out vpon the ſtage. But Melanthius the ſetter forth of the plaies, compelling him, brought him by force on the ſtage, and cried out vnto him: doeſt thou not ſee Phocions wife that goeth vppe and downe the cittie with one mayde onely waiting vpon her? and wilt thou playe the foole, and marre the modeſtie of
